IT has become the fashion lately for artists who have obtained some character and reputation at home to wander abroad "in search of the picturesque;" and to this fashion we who stay at home are indebted for many novel and faithful illustrations of foreign life, manners, and customs. Thus Mr. Marshall Claxton, a well-known painter, contributes some excellent sketches of Life in India, three of which we engrave for our readers on this page.

In our first engraving is shown the manner of grinding grain in the northern provinces of India. The principal food of the people of Hindostan is rice in Bengal, and wheat in the North and the interior. The great mass of the people are cultivators of the soil. The farms are in general small, and the wealth of the farmer is estimated by the number of bullocks he owns. The implements of husbandry are rude to the last degree, little or no improvement having been made for ages in any of the most important farm-tools. Labor and living, however, are cheap, and tasteful and laborious cultivation makes up for rudeness of tools. With the light wooden plow, to which are hitched two bullocks, the fields are plowed and replowed, often a dozen times, till the soil is reduced to a fine powder. The reaping is done by hand. Threshing is performed by bullocks, who are driven over the sheaves spread on the ground. Large fans are used for winnowing the grain; and the straw is used for cattle fodder, hay being unknown in India.

When farms are not worked by families, villages unite for that purpose, lightening the labor by union of effort. The villagers live simple and happy lives. They are generally very poor; but their necessities are small, and their palm-thatched bamboo huts, containing a few mats, a few dishes, an iron plate for baking cakes, and a few cooking utensils, form all we see. The hall is the property of the village, and its use is common to all. The farmers begin their daily labors in the morning, and do not return till nightfall; laboring cheerfully all day for their pittance. Writers on India state that, notwithstanding the rudeness of their implements, the natives have a thorough, though traditional, knowledge of the rotation of crops and other arts of keeping up the vitality of the soil; and Europeans with superior instruments, capital, and knowledge, have rarely been able to compete profitably with the humble cooly on his own soil.

STROLLING PLAYERS OF THE UPPER COUNTRY.

In our next engraving, Mr. Claxton has depicted a party of the strolling players and jugglers who go about the country, from station to station, in rude bullock-carts, amusing the humble villagers upon feast and holidays by their antics. Reclining upon the cart beneath the shelter of the carpet-serving as seen the match girls, whose graceful dances and monotonous singing are unfailing accompaniments to every fete or celebration, religious or secular, in India. These girls are devoted to this profession from childhood up. Their dances require great attention, the dancer's feet being hung with small bells, which sound in concert with the music. In youth the women are often very beautiful, and always shapely, lithe, and of graceful carriage. They compose a separate class, live under the direct protection of government, and are governed by special laws. It is noteworthy that the lithe, graceful, and healthy shapes of the Indian women are the result of a habit of carrying light burdens upon the head, which they are trained from early youth. This strengthens the spine, elongates and develops the neck and shoulders, while it produces at the same time the erect and elastic gait which is so generally admired. It would not be advisable to introduce this among the exercises of our calisthenium.

The jugglers of India have long been noted for their adroitness, bodily activity, and the slightness of the means with which they produce the most surprising effects. Dr. Fryer relates that he saw a man actually swallow a jack chain, and cause it to jingle in his stomach.

Another, by suction or drawing of his breath, so contracted his lower belly that it had nothing left to support it, but fall flat upon his loins, the midriff being forced into the thorax, and the muscles of the abdomen so clearly marked out by the stiff tendons of the lean ribs as by the most accurate dissection could be made apparent, he moving each row like living columns." Mr. Johnson gives an accurate account of a native who swallowed a sword—or rather a stout iron rod—twenty-six inches in length, an inch in breadth, and one-tenth of an inch in thickness. Having edied the instrument, the fellow grappled his nose, and, bending backward a little, pushed the sword gently down into throat, "until my hand, which was on the handle, came in contact with his lips." The point of the rod could now be plainly felt between his breast and navel. A whistling fracture was fixed on the handle, and being fired, surrounded the juggler with a blue flame, while he sat calmly, but rather stiffly, before his audience. It was noticed that on withdrawing the instrument several parts of it were spotted with blood. Warren Hastings records that he saw a man actually stalk about in the water as one would on land, without extraneous machinery or encumbrance.

ELEPHANTS' STABLE AT BARRACKPORE.

Our third illustration shows an elephant stable at Barrackpore—a gigantic building. The elephant is the chief draught animal of India. Most of the wealthy men keep elephants as objects of luxury. In war they are of immense value in moving artillery and baggage; and their docility and power are made use of in a thousand different ways. Elephants are almost as common in the streets of Indian cities as horses are in the streets of New York.

They are caught in their wild state by being enticed by tame beasts into an inclosure prepared for the purpose, which is surrounded by a strong fence and deep ditch. They are tamed by a thorough course of starvation, and, when sufficiently subdued to trees, are afterward fed by their future mahouts or attendants. It is a singular fact that the existence of a rare of thorough cannibals, living within two hundred and fifty miles of Calcutta, was first discovered by a troop of elephants under command Major Gardiner, who were hunting to supply the Government stables at Chittagong. The fact came to us as these people called themselves—are low in stature, have prominent bellies, muscular limbs, harsh features, and hair a strong resemblance to the monkey tribe. They construct their dwellings in the tops of trees. So ferocious are they that even Major Gardiner's parties had always to go fully armed, and yet several men were killed and eaten by them. One poor fellow, caught off his guard, was devoured before the life-blood was cold in his veins. As individual of this race are very caught, and endeavors were made to civilize him, but he still habits were too strong upon him. After some months of polish, he murdered a fellow-workman, and was detected feasting upon the body; whereupon he was immediately hung up by the civil authorities of Chittagong.

LITERARY.

We have on our table this week two translations of Guerazzi's novel, BEATRICE CENCI, one by Leigh Hunt, published by Ticknor & Fields, the other by Mr. Watts Sherman, published by Mason Brothers.

This book is not, as advertised by the publishers "the book of the age." It is in point of fact a very stiff and tame novel, violating almost all the rules, closely as on Italian bandit violates law, and murdering truth for the purpose of the story as ruthlessly as Orsini and his companions murdered Parmisiun for the sake of reaching the Emperor.

The story of the Beatrice should not be told except on a sunny afternoon in the Barberini palace, and then we stand before those magnificent, mournful eyes, which seem even now to speak the agony and shame, mingled with sullen patience and faith, of the wronged and unprotected girl, and hear some enthusiastic Italian whisper the sim. ple and thrilling tale. Then we see the palaces and the splendor of her character by its allotations, and raise the interest of her story by its absurd romance.

Guido has written the story of Beatrice Cenci on exactly this level. Those who have read the whole; and no novelist—certainly no Guerazzian—can hope to share the fame of the author, or better by any translation the history which it perverts and records.

Speaking of that picture, let us remark in passing that the Beatrice was never copied but once. The masterless pictures that abound in galleries and private collections, public and private auctionrooms, are copies of a copy at the best, for the prejudices of the palace of which it is the pride will not see (even before the Fornarina of Raphael, which hangs on the same walls) have never allowed an artist to copy the room with pencil or brush, except in one instance. This one copy is possessed by a Florentine artist, and from it have come all the copies. But no one of all that we have seen conveys an adequate idea of the power, the grace, the sadness and melancholy of the eyes in that original which the painter sketched in the pen of the poet before she was executed on the scaffold.

From writing of the Beatrice, we pass naturally to the new book on our table, A MANUAL OF ORNITHANCY, by J. W. De Forest, published by Harper & Brothers; for the author starts in Florence. He was on a pleasant side of that Greek-eagle, and takes up along with him to Venice, and Rome to Sorrento, Piræus, Athens, Smyrna and there, and back to Florence and the Cascine, always with sparkling reminiscence, amusing anecdote and observation, the keen observant eye of an educated and wide-awake traveler, and the love of incident and amusement which will be much liked to make travel delicious. The book is more devoted to people than to places, yet the traveler's reader will enjoy passing allusions to localities which will remind him of his own life abroad. Who that has been in it will ever forget the marvelous gondola at Venice, and the funeral thought that one sees sails in it struggling with all the way from the island to the Hotel Danieli?

We have found Mr. De Forest a genial and hearty traveling companion, who looks at men as we like to have our silly look at them, gives us their "sketchees" at once without hesitation, and we commend him to the attention of our readers who have not been abroad, as well as to those who have, as the most delightful of companions. The sketches of the Cascine at Florence, the evening drive, the event, and the whole picture of the interest of assembly places, are alone worth getting the book to read, to say nothing of "General Jones of Baltimore," and other worthy Americans who figure here and there in these amusing pages.

Let us look at home. Here is an octavo, EARLY INDIAN TRIBES AND SURVIVORS, by Hon. O. H. Smith, a gentleman who has grown with the growth of the State to whose historical resources he adds this volume, which is published by Moore, Wilstach, & Co., of Cincinnati. Books of this class are eminently valuable in a historical point of view. They are the observations of a contemporary; the views of an intelligent observer of the facts of civilization wherever they grieve. Great dissatisfaction is expressed by the Democratic press at the Governor's course as to the constitution of the Select Committee of Investigation. They should have no fear in the matter, while they see in a minority also that the stronger Democratic party is represented. Of the seven men here cite are from the middle of the House.—Free Kansas Legislature met at Topeka on the 4th inst. The Free-soil Legislature will proceed to the Constitutional Convention and Committees to be appointed. Governor Medary has sent over certificates to any members who have not received them. Governor Walker's candidates have been elected: but nothing is yet known of the Legislature.

Governor Wise has issued a new manifesto in reply to Governor Pollock's address on anti-Lecompton meeting at Philadelphia. He says that a careful review of the Presidential Message has satisfied him that it is the true policy of his choice. He protests against the mode in which the Lecompton Constitution was prepared, and is objected, as anti-republican and aggressive, and as offensive to the Democratic party of the Northern States. He admits that the conduct of the Topekaites and violent anti-slavery men in their opponents made it necessary for the authority up to the submission of the Constitution to the people. He says that if the people of Kansas do not like the constitution the act has given the people, and it is the constitution that must be voted down. The contest will not justify the war, he is sure to be victorious, and can force the defeats of the Lecompton candidate, which though positive, will have the effect of adopting the Lecompton Constitution will be worse than referring it back to the people. Territorial discord is the way to ruin the Democracy and the feeds for demanding more slaves in a State. He says that the issue is not now to slavery but Kansas question against a single slave; it is the question of the Democratic party, and the Democratic party must be sustained Democracy is now the Black Republican flag over the Capitol in the next struggle for the Presidency. Governor Wise is for the Democracy.

MINISTER MADE IN DENMARK.

Hon. R. K. Meade, of Virginia, United States Minister to Spain, has been appointed by the President an ambassador from that foreign power to Denmark. In the course of his address Mr. Meade expressed himself as follows: "I am deeply impressed with a sense of the honor and remembrance and identity of interest which should make the intercourse of the two countries a matter of interest to the policy and aspirations of each. An equal extent of territory, of population, of resources, gives the natural assurance of future power that this is where the roots of the Danish Government are to be found. It is the policy that belongs only to consistent strength.

"The Danish Government, in asserting in their policy their constitutional organization, is well calculated to secure the confidence of the United States, and to secure the confidence of the United States in their progress, while an institution common to both countries, fixed and deeply rooted in the nature of many bodily interests, which will resume from without, does now establish an affinity between them, and will be a source of mutual benefit, of action and feeling that will prove invincible in the future."

These remarks have attracted some attention from the press.

ANOTHER ALLEGED OUTRAGE ON THE COAST OF CUBA.

The Navy Department has received dispatches dated at Pensacola, January 30, from Commodore Armstrong, commanding the African Squadron, "He says that British cruisers had committed another outrage by firing shot and not just cause, the James Watson, a vessel bearing the American flag, on the coast of Cuba, near Santa Lucia, and afterward released, there being no evidence that she was engaged in the slave trade. Another has been detained by the modern Wise, senior British officer, that the facts of the case will be investigated by the British Government, and that the officer who had committed the outrage would probably be deprived of command. Commodore Armstrong expresses the opinion that Cuba, of the nations now in existence, is inquire into the rail- of Wilkinson's Point to Governor's Island.

On Wednesday, 10th, the credentials of Senator Grimes of Iowa, appointed to fill the vacancy, were read. Petitions attempted to bring up his Kansas resolutions; but after a sharp passage at arms with Senator Douglas, Senator Davis and Mason, his motion was defeated by 13 to 35. Senator Green of Missouri, presented a memorial and resolution for repeasure. but Senator Toombs objected, and after much personal excitement the matter was laid off. The Army Bill was then taken up and debated by Messrs. Bayard, Hunter, Green, Fitch, Pugh, Clay, Wade, Crittenden, Iverson, and Cameron, the latter opposing Wilson's resolution inquiring what army officers are absent from their regiments, and why. The bill was then wrongly taken up, and debate followed. Senators Hunter, Bayard, Crittenden, Green, Clay, and Pugh spoke. A motion to strike out the first section was lost by 25 to 26. Senator Green, of Missouri, presented a memorial, and pointed by the President. The committee under the resolution of Senator Mason, of Virginia, was referred the Kansas Message and Lecompton Constitution, with instructions to report by bill or otherwise. The committee Morrill of Vermont, Seward of New York, Wade of Ohio, Trumbull of Illinois, Doolittle of Wisconsin, Grimes of Iowa, Collamer of Vermont, White of Indiana, Fessenden of Michigan, Anderson of Missouri, Stephenson of Kentucky, Bigler of Pennsylvania, Broderick of California, Bissell of New York; the Select Committee to examine the Post-office Department and report a bill to reduce the rate of postage to three cents. Mr. Hunter presented a memorial, although the memorial session kept away from the Senate. Messrs. Bayard of Virginia, Wade of Missouri, Florence of Pennsylvania, and Hall of Massachusetts, were appointed to act as the Select Committee by Messrs. Florence, Whitaker, and Workmen was considered by Messrs. Bayard of New York, Hall of Virginia, the Investigating Committee reported that the witness, Mr. Workmen, was not to be found. Mr. Florence, the Sergeant-at-arms, was directed to report to the Senate. Messrs. Stanton, Stone, and Company, and asked for a resolution to appoint a day for the Senate to visit Mount Vernon. This was carried after debate by Messrs. Stanton, Underwood, Phillips, Seward, Fessenden, John Cochrane, Brooks, Moore, Gould, and Lovejoy.

On Friday, the Senate not being in session, the contemptuous witness, Wolcott, was brought before the House by the Sergeant-at-arms, but on motion of Mr. Stanton, and after remarks by Messrs. Cochrane, Clow, Pendleton, Vallandigham, Campbell, and others, he was discharged on his answer to Mr. Stanton that he considered the Committee had looked out of their province in the matter of the Post-office Department, and referred to various newspapers on the subject. The question was then taken on Mr. Stanton's motion, and decided by Stephens, Washburne, and Giddings. It was then decided, by 105 to 85, that the question was not one of privilege.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

It is understood that the Senate Committee on Territories will send in three reports on the Kansas question one for the admission of Kansas with the Lecompton Constitution, from the majority of the Committee; another, from Senators Collamer and Wade, against that measure; and a third, from Senator Douglas, for action on the submission of that Constitution to the people at the election in June next. The latter report will be the most elaborate of the three, and will be received by both with a provision that nothing is to deprive the people of Kansas of the right of altering the Lecompton Constitution whenever they please. Great dissatisfaction is expressed by the Democratic press at the Governor's course as to the constitution of the Select Committee of Investigation. They should have no fear in the matter, while they see in a minority also that the stronger Democratic party is represented. Of the seven men here cite are from the middle of the House.—Free Kansas Legislature met at Topeka on the 4th inst. The Free-soil Legislature will proceed to the Constitutional Convention and Committees to be appointed. Governor Medary has sent over certificates to any members who have not received them. Governor Walker's candidates have been elected: but nothing is yet known of the Legislature.

Governor Wise has issued a new manifesto in reply to Governor Pollock's address on anti-Lecompton meeting at Philadelphia. He says that a careful review of the Presidential Message has satisfied him that it is the true policy of his choice. He protests against the mode in which the Lecompton Constitution was prepared, and is objected to, as anti-republican and aggressive, and as offensive to the Democratic party of the Northern States. He admits that the conduct of the Topekaites and violent anti-slavery men in their opponents made it necessary for the authority up to the submission of the Constitution to the people. He says that if the people of Kansas do not like the constitution the act has given the people, and it is the constitution that must be voted down. The contest will not justify the war, he is sure to be victorious, and can force the defeats of the Lecompton candidate, which though positive, will have the effect of adopting the Lecompton Constitution will be worse than referring it back to the people. Territorial discord is the way to ruin the Democracy and the feeds for demanding more slaves in a State. He says that the issue is not now to slavery but Kansas question against a single slave; it is the question of the Democratic party, and the Democratic party must be sustained Democracy is now the Black Republican flag over the Capitol in the next struggle for the Presidency. Governor Wise is for the Democracy.

MINISTER MADE IN DENMARK.

Hon. R. K. Meade, of Virginia, United States Minister to Spain, has been appointed by the President an ambassador from that foreign power to Denmark. In the course of his address Mr. Meade expressed himself as follows: "I am deeply impressed with a sense of the honor and remembrance and identity of interest which should make the intercourse of the two countries a matter of interest to the policy and aspirations of each. An equal extent of territory, of population, of resources, gives the natural assurance of future power that this is where the roots of the Danish Government are to be found. It is the policy that belongs only to consistent strength.

"The Danish Government, in asserting in their policy their constitutional organization, is well calculated to secure the confidence of the United States, and to secure the confidence of the United States in their progress, while an institution common to both countries, fixed and deeply rooted in the nature of many bodily interests, which will resume from without, does now establish an affinity between them, and will be a source of mutual benefit, of action and feeling that will prove invincible in the future."

These remarks have attracted some attention from the press.

ANOTHER ALLEGED OUTRAGE ON THE COAST OF CUBA.

The Navy Department has received dispatches dated at Pensacola, January 30, from Commodore Armstrong, commanding the African Squadron. "He says that British cruisers had committed another outrage by firing shot and not just cause, the James Watson, a vessel bearing the American flag, on the coast of Cuba, near Santa Lucia, and afterward released, there being no evidence that she was engaged in the slave trade. Another has been detained by the modern Wise, senior British officer, that the facts of the case will be investigated by the British Government, and that the officer who had committed the outrage would probably be deprived of command. Commodore Armstrong expresses the opinion that Cuba, of the nations now in existence, is inquire into the rail- of Wilkinson's Point to Governor's Island.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, 8th February, in the Senate, Senator Allen presented the credentials of Senator Dodge, re-elected. He regretted the Lecompton Constitution. Senator Seward presented petitions from New York for action on territory for secession. The Kansas question was then taken up, and Senator Douglas spoke in favor of the admission of Kansas with the Lecompton Constitution. Senator Pugh, of Ohio, followed, the motion to refer for President's Kansas Message, to refer the Constitution to the Committee on Territories to inquire into the number and legality of the votes cast in Kansas, and empowering the Committee to send for persons and papers, was lost by a vote of 22 to 28. The Message was then referred to the Committee on Territories. Senator Douglas hoped the Senate would take no resolutions acting on the Message. Senator Crittenden relative to Kansas; but Senator Mason moved an adjournment, which was carried by 27 to 25. Senator Mason took the first business in order, in pursuance of the Kansas Message, and moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Kansas Message. Senator Douglas opposed the motion; but by 31 to 23. Debate then followed on the Lecompton Constitution, in which Senators Green, Pugh, Mason, Bivins, Foot, Benjamin, and Hunter, of the Committee on Ways and Means, appropriating a sum of money to be paid from the Treasury, whereas the sum of $50,000 was appropriated for drawing the boundary line between the United States and Mexico, and for the payment of claims, against Mexico, under the treaty of 1853. Inquire into the rail- of Wilkinson's Point to Governor's Island.

On Wednesday, 10th, the credentials of Senator Grimes of Iowa, appointed to fill the vacancy, were read. Petitions attempted to bring up his Kansas resolutions; but after a sharp passage at arms with Senator Douglas, Senator Davis and Mason, his motion was defeated by 13 to 35. Senator Green of Missouri, presented a memorial and resolution for repeasure. but Senator Toombs objected, and after much personal excitement the matter was laid off. The Army Bill was then taken up and debated by Messrs. Bayard, Hunter, Green, Fitch, Pugh, Clay, Wade, Crittenden, Iverson, and Cameron, the latter opposing Wilson's resolution inquiring what army officers are absent from their regiments, and why. The bill was wrongly taken up, and debate followed. Senators Hunter, Bayard, Crittenden, Green, Clay, and Pugh spoke. A motion to strike out the first section was lost by 25 to 26. Senator Green, of Missouri, presented a memorial, and pointed by the President. The committee under the resolution of Senator Mason, of Virginia, was referred the Kansas Message and Lecompton Constitution, with instructions to report by bill or otherwise. The committee Morrill of Vermont, Seward of New York, Wade of Ohio, Trumbull of Illinois, Doolittle of Wisconsin, Grimes of Iowa, Collamer of Vermont, White of Indiana, Fessenden of Michigan, Anderson of Missouri, Stephenson of Kentucky, Bigler of Pennsylvania, Broderick of California, Bissell of New York; the Select Committee to examine the Post-office Department and report a bill to reduce the rate of postage to three cents. Mr. Hunter presented a memorial, although the memorial session kept away from the Senate. Messrs. Bayard of Virginia, Wade of Missouri, Florence of Pennsylvania, and Hall of Massachusetts, were appointed to act as the Select Committee by Messrs. Florence, Whitaker, and Workmen was considered by Messrs. Bayard of New York, Hall of Virginia, the Investigating Committee reported that the witness, Mr. Workmen, was not to be found. Mr. Florence, the Sergeant-at-arms, was directed to report to the Senate. Messrs. Stanton, Stone, and Company, and asked for a resolution to appoint a day for the Senate to visit Mount Vernon. This was carried after debate by Messrs. Stanton, Underwood, Phillips, Seward, Fessenden, John Cochrane, Brooks, Moore, Gould, and Lovejoy.

On Friday, the Senate not being in session, the contemptuous witness, Wolcott, was brought before the House by the Sergeant-at-arms, but on motion of Mr. Stanton, and after remarks by Messrs. Cochrane, Clow, Pendleton, Vallandigham, Campbell, and others, he was discharged on his answer to Mr. Stanton that he considered the Committee had looked out of their province in the matter of the Post-office Department, and referred to various newspapers on the subject. The question was then taken on Mr. Stanton's motion, and decided by Stephens, Washburne, and Giddings. It was then decided, by 105 to 85, that the question was not one of privilege.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

It is understood that the Senate Committee on Territories will send in three reports on the Kansas question one for the admission of Kansas with the Lecompton Constitution, from the majority of the Committee; another, from Senators Collamer and Wade, against that measure; and a third, from Senator Douglas, for action on the submission of that Constitution to the people at the election in June next. The latter report will be the most elaborate of the three, and will be received by both with a provision that nothing is to deprive the people of Kansas of the right of altering the Lecompton Constitution whenever they please. Great dissatisfaction is expressed by the Democratic press at the Governor's course as to the constitution of the Select Committee of Investigation. They should have no fear in the matter, while they see in a minority also that the stronger Democratic party is represented. Of the seven men here cite are from the middle of the House.—Free Kansas Legislature met at Topeka on the 4th inst. The Free-soil Legislature will proceed to the Constitutional Convention and Committees to be appointed. Governor Medary has sent over certificates to any members who have not received them. Governor Walker's candidates have been elected: but nothing is yet known of the Legislature.

Governor Wise has issued a new manifesto in reply to Governor Pollock's address on anti-Lecompton meeting at Philadelphia. He says that a careful review of the Presidential Message has satisfied him that it is the true policy of his choice. He protests against the mode in which the Lecompton Constitution was prepared, and is objected to, as anti-republican and aggressive, and as offensive to the Democratic party of the Northern States. He admits that the conduct of the Topekaites and violent anti-slavery men in their opponents made it necessary for the authority up to the submission of the Constitution to the people. He says that if the people of Kansas do not like the constitution the act has given the people, and it is the constitution that must be voted down. The contest will not justify the war, he is sure to be victorious, and can force the defeats of the Lecompton candidate, which though positive, will have the effect of adopting the Lecompton Constitution will be worse than referring it back to the people. Territorial discord is the way to ruin the Democracy and the feeds for demanding more slaves in a State. He says that the issue is not now to slavery but Kansas question against a single slave; it is the question of the Democratic party, and the Democratic party must be sustained Democracy is now the Black Republican flag over the Capitol in the next struggle for the Presidency. Governor Wise is for the Democracy.

MINISTER MADE IN DENMARK.

Hon. R. K. Meade, of Virginia, United States Minister to Spain, has been appointed by the President an ambassador from that foreign power to Denmark. In the course of his address Mr. Meade expressed himself as follows: "I am deeply impressed with a sense of the honor and remembrance and identity of interest which should make the intercourse of the two countries a matter of interest to the policy and aspirations of each. An equal extent of territory, of population, of resources, gives the natural assurance of future power that this is where the roots of the Danish Government are to be found. It is the policy that belongs only to consistent strength.

"The Danish Government, in asserting in their policy their constitutional organization, is well calculated to secure the confidence of the United States, and to secure the confidence of the United States in their progress, while an institution common to both countries, fixed and deeply rooted in the nature of many bodily interests, which will resume from without, does now establish an affinity between them, and will be a source of mutual benefit, of action and feeling that will prove invincible in the future."

These remarks have attracted some attention from the press.

ANOTHER ALLEGED OUTRAGE ON THE COAST OF CUBA.

The Navy Department has received dispatches dated at Pensacola, January 30, from Commodore Armstrong, commanding the African Squadron. "He says that British cruisers had committed another outrage by firing shot and not just cause, the James Watson, a vessel bearing the American flag, on the coast of Cuba, near Santa Lucia, and afterward released, there being no evidence that she was engaged in the slave trade. Another has been detained by the modern Wise, senior British officer, that the facts of the case will be investigated by the British Government, and that the officer who had committed the outrage would probably be deprived of command. Commodore Armstrong expresses the opinion that Cuba, of the nations now in existence, is inquire into the rail- of Wilkinson's Point to Governor's Island.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

MEETING OF PARLIAMENT.

PARLIAMENT was to assemble on the 4th of February. The Government will have a majority sufficient to prevent the early attendance of the supporters of the Government, in case of consideration of a vote of censure under discussion.

MARRIAGE OF THE PRINCESS ROYAL.

The Princess Royal of England was married to Prince Frederick William of Prussia, in the Chapel Royal in St. James's Palace, on 25th ultimo. We take nearly from the London Times the following account of the ceremony:

THE SCENE BEFORE THE CEREMONY.

Visitors were admitted to the Chapel Royal at 11 A.M. They were assembling there were some crown, of course, in attendance, but the Court generally was in the Throne of the Guard, and a party of diplomatists were generally assembled in the Throne Room. The various functionaries of this kind, and criticisms of each other's toilets by the ladies. Many of the ladies appeared in the prevailing style of dress was befitting a bridal; there were no many white dresses and gauze veils, but the general hues bore suggested a large number of brides had been dispersed among the company. The military and (particularly for gentlemen) portion had evidently been made up with especial care, and the uniforms of the Guards, Hussars, and Lancers, with their gold lace and facings, looked well, with the addition of bouquets of palm-leaves and flowers. Beneath every cocked hat was seen the full dress of a field guardsman, also his cuirass, and, finally, the rich full dress of a cavalry soldier, with his splendid drapery behind him.

THE MOMENT OF SUSPENSE.

It is now past twelve o'clock, and the excitement of expectation, unnecessarily wearied, is relieved when there enters near the door intrigue successfully to change their places with those who were before them. A noble cousins drops her cloak and stands over the gallery rail to the Hon. Miss Cavendish, who is in the adjoining litter course. It is increased, somewhat process, looking over, and the Duchess of Cambridge, and every one looks up such as people do at the theatre when the curtain is delayed over the rise.

ENTRANCE OF THE ROYAL PARENTS.

Suddenly there is a little stir, and the Princess of Prussia enters her son, leading the bride, followed by a rear of crown cards, and with her train borne by the youthful Princesses Alice and Helena. The appearance of the bride was the signal for the entrance of the Queen, the bridegroom-in-law (such passes as to the alter) leading her Majesty to the throne on the left-hand side. Shortly in the distance the long-drawn, clear, defiant notes of the trumpets rise from the Throne Room, announce and the last arrivals among the visitors hasten to arrange themselves. Then the officers of the household and two brilliant lines along the corridor by the chapel at either side. Step by step the procession approaches is felt—level; now they are descending the stair-case, the regiment of the Guards is heard presenting their present salute, and the prolonged, triumphant flourish proclaims the arrival of the Queen. The Prince of Prussia leads the Queen to the throne on the left-hand side of the Queen the bride of State to gentleman assistant.

The Prince of Prussia, on the left-hand side of the bride, and the Princesses Alice and Helena on the right. Behind the Queen, and next to her Majesty, leading in either hand Prince Alfred and Princess Helena, stands Prince Albert. Of course, on these occasions there is no applause, and nothing but the prolonged trumpet-flourish and the firing of the royal salute. Which the royal mother of the bride is welcomed, her Majesty passes at once to the throne, and the Prince of Prussia, with his son, quickly and audible, but self-possessed and stately. On her head she wore a splendid diamond coronet, the appearance to the effect which the lofty "veil" upon the royal caskets of the bridegroom. The bride was then conducted to the throne, and the Prince of Prussia, with his son, while he welcomed, her Majesty passes at once to the throne, and the Prince of Prussia, with his son, quickly placed between the three-embodored retinue occupied by the young and royal children.

The Prince of Prussia, on the left-hand side of the bride, and the Princesses Alice and Helena on the right. Behind the Queen, and next to her Majesty, leading in either hand Prince Alfred and Princess Helena, stands Prince Albert. Of course, on these occasions there is no applause, and nothing but the prolonged trumpet-flourish and the firing of the royal salute. Which the royal mother of the bride is welcomed, her Majesty passes at once to the throne, and the Prince of Prussia, with his son, quickly and audible, but self-possessed and stately. On her head she wore a splendid diamond coronet, the appearance to the effect which the lofty "veil" upon the royal caskets of the bridegroom. The bride was then conducted to the throne, and the Prince of Prussia, with his son, while he welcomed, her Majesty passes at once to the throne, and the Prince of Prussia, with his son, quickly placed between the three-embodored retinue occupied by the young and royal children.

Again there is a flourish of trumpets, a loose interval, and again the drums and trumpets are heard, and, ushered in with the same imposing ceremonies, comes the procession of the bridegroom. On his right walks his Royal Highness the Prince of Prussia, his father, and on his left his brother, Prince Albert. All eyes, however, are fixed upon the Royal bridegroom, as he walks slowly but with the most perfect ease and elegance of action, if not of gesture, to the throne. His uniform was full dress as to advantage, and as to all his breast, upon commanding figure, it was displayed to the best advantage. He wore the collar of the Garter, and the star of the order, with the most profound reverence, and, turning to his royal brother, kissed him on both cheeks. The royal bride then kissed that to the Queen, and then, kneeling in the centre of the chapel, prays with earnest devotion for a few minutes. His prayers ended, he rises and stands at the right hand of the altar, waiting his bride, and likewise submitting to such a scrutiny from hundreds of brilliant eyes as never bachelor withstood alone before.

THE BRIDE.

After a while the Chamberlain and Vice-Chamberlain again quit the chapel to usher in the procession of the bride, who is soon at the door, and stands "queen rose of the rosebud garden of girls" that bloom in fair array behind her. The gorgeous vail she wears depending from her head-dress is thrown off, and, hanging in massive folds behind, leaves the expression of her face completely visible as she walks slowly, her head slightly stooped in bashfulness and her eyes cast down upon the ground. Thus all can see distinctly the mild, amiable expression of her face, so replete with kindness and deep feeling, and that peculiarly touching aspect of sensitiveness, to attempt to portray which would "only prove how vainly words essay to fix the spark of beauty's heavenly ray." Her bright bloom of color has completely deserted her, and even when compared with her snowy dress her cheeks seem pale, and her whole appearance denotes tremulousness and agitation.

In these ceremonies, we believe, the dress of the bride ranks only next in importance to the celebration of the service; but on this occasion the Princess Royal wore one so thoroughly in good taste that it is difficult to remark any thing, save that it is exquisitely becoming, beautiful, and white. In fact, its unity only recalls to mind the belle of the French Court, who is said to dress with such a perfection of good taste that one can never observe what she wears. While, however, we mention this as the actual effect of the costume, we may state, for the further information of our readers, that it was composed of a rich robe of white moire antique, ornamented with three flounces of Honiton lace.

The design of the lace consists of bouquets in open work of the rose, shamrock, and thistle, in three medallions. At the top of each flounce in front of the dress are wreaths of orange and myrtle blossoms—the latter being the bridal flower of Germany—every wreath terminating with bouquets of the same flowers, and the length of each being so graduated as to give the appearance of a robe defined by flowers. The apex of this floral pyramid is formed by a large bouquet worn on the girdle. The train, which is of the unusual length of more than three yards, is of white moire antique, trimmed with two rows of Honiton lace, surmounted by wreaths similar to those on the flounces of the dress, with bouquets at short intervals.

THE APPROACH TO THE ALTAR.

As the bride passes up to the altar she stops and makes a deep reverence to her mother, though with evident agitation, and her face flushes like crimson; then, again turning, she renders the same homage to the Prince of Prussia. As she does so the bridegroom elect advances, and kneeling on one knee presses her hand with an expression of fervent admiration that moved the august audience. Taking their places then at the altar, and with their illustrious relatives standing round in a group of unequaled brilliancy, the service commences with the chorale, which peals through the little building with the most solemn effect. The words are particularly appropriate, full of feeling and piety, and the audience follow them in a whispered cadence as the choir sing—

This day, with gladsome voice and heart,
We praise thy name, O Lord, who art
Of all good things the giver!
For England's first born hope we pray—
Be near her now, and ever!
King of Kings, Lord of Lords,
Father, Son, and Holy Spirit,
Hear us, while we kneel before Thee!

THE CEREMONY.

The hymn over, the marriage service is commenced at exactly ten minutes to one.

The Rubric is rigidly adhered to throughout. After going through the usual formulary, the Most Reverend Primate, who was very indistinctly heard, asks the royal bridegroom,

"Wilt thou have this woman to be thy wedded wife, to live together after God's ordinance in the holy estate of matrimony? Wilt thou love her, comfort her, honor and keep her, in sickness and in health; and, forsaking all other, keep thee only unto her, so long as ye both shall live?"

To this the Prince replies, loud and clear, "I will."

To the same question the faint answer of the bride is barely audible, though the attention of all is strained to the utmost to catch the feebly-uttered words.

To the next—

"Who giveth this woman away?"

The Prince Consort replies, loudly, "I do."

Then the Prince takes his bride's hand in his own, in earnest warmth, and repeats, slowly and distinctly, after the Primate—

"I, Frederick William Nicholas Charles, take thee, Victoria Adelaide Mary Louisa, to be my wedded wife, to have and to hold from this day forward, for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love and to cherish, till death us do part, according to God's holy ordinance; and thereto I plight thee my troth."

Again, in reply, the words of the bride are almost lost, and she seems faint and tremulous enough to excite uneasiness among her ladies.

The Prince then, taking the ring from his brother Albert, said, with marked emphasis,

"With this ring I thee wed, with my body I thee worship, and with all my worldly goods I thee endow, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen."

The usual prayer was then offered up, and the Primate, joining their hands together, said, "Whom God has joined let no man put asunder."

AFFECTING SCENE.

Hardly had the last words of the chorus died away in solemn echoes when the ceremonial, as arranged by chamberlains and heralds, ended, and the bride, giving vent to her evidently long pent up feelings, turned, and flung herself upon her mother's bosom, with a suddenness and depth of feeling that thrilled through every heart. Again and again her Majesty strained her to her heart and kissed her, and tried to conceal her emotion, but it was both needless and in vain, for all perceived it, and there were few who did not share it. We need not mention how the bridegroom embraced her, and how, as she quitted him, with the tears now plainly stealing down her cheeks, she threw herself into the arms of her father, while her royal husband was embraced by the Princess of Prussia in a manner that evinced all that only a mother's love can show. The most affecting recognition, however, took place between the bridegroom and his royal father, for the latter seemed overpowered with emotion, and the former, after clasping him twice to his heart, knelt and kissed his parent's hand.

The Queen then rose, and, hurrying across the haut pas with the Prince Consort, embraced the Princess of Prussia as one sister would another after long parting, and turning to the Prince of Prussia, gave him her hand, which as he stooped to kiss she stopped him, and declined the condescension by offering her cheek instead. But words will feebly convey the effect of the warmth, the abandonment of affection and friendship, with which these greetings passed, the reverence with which the bridegroom saluted her Majesty, the manly heartiness with which he wrung the Prince Consort's hand, for, by the working of his face, it was evident he could not trust his tongue to speak.

THE TROUSSEAU.

The portion of the wedding outfit of the Princess Royal supplied by Howell and James consists of Spitalfields manufactures. Those of moire antique may be held in competition with, or even as exceeding in beauty and richness, those of foreign make, while in color they are both brilliant and lasting. English ladies would do well to follow the example set by her Majesty, and pride themselves upon wearing these rare specimens of Spitalfields manufacture. We may especially point to the moire antique silks of Spitalfields manufacture chosen by her Majesty and the Princess Royal. The effect of the watering is reduplicated by a thread of silver or gold interwoven, and gives to the watering the appearance of the silver light of a phosphorescent sea by moonlight. Of these the Princess Royal has chosen white moire antique, richly woven with real silver, and white poult de soie, striped with real silver. Her Majesty has a mauve-colored petticoat of moire antique, richly woven with real silver, Spitalfields; and a train of same color of Lyons velvet. The color "mauve" is that of the mallow in its early spring bloom; it is sometimes confounded with that of the peach blossom, but is more delicate in its hue. So exquisite is the color of the Lyons velvet in her Majesty's train that it is still kept in the loom, since the surpassingly delicate bloom upon it will not endure in perfection after more than five hours' exposure to atmospheric influence. The light tulle dresses are of fairy texture, looking as if a breath would puff them from their resting places. They are embroidered in white and colored floss silks in beautiful devices, and some have trimmings of lisse gauze, and bunches of lisse gauze flowers.

THE WEDDING PRESENTS.

The nuptial present given by Prince Frederick William to his royal bride consists of a pearl necklace of unusual beauty and costliness; the necklace consists of thirty-two large Oriental pearls, pronounced by connoisseurs to be remarkably pure, and the larger of which, those toward the centre, are of the size of a hazel-nut. The cost of this little collection, which has been completed only by dint of great diligence during a lengthened period, is stated to be 28,000 thalers (£4200). For six ladies, who have been the companions and friends of the Princess Royal hitherto (whether these ladies are the same as those selected by the Princess to officiate as her bridesmaids I have not heard), the Prince takes with him six golden bracelets, consisting of a broad rich band of gold, bearing a shield, on which is mounted a Prussian eagle; the wings of which are incrusted with diamonds. The Princess of Prussia has also had a set of diamond and turquoise ornaments arranged with excellent taste as her present to the Princess Royal. Another present, destined for the Bishop of London by the Prince, is a copy of the New Testament, printed in folio by the celebrated printing firm of Decker, in Berlin, which formerly enjoyed the monopoly of printing all State documents. This work was got up by this firm in 1840 at the fourth centenary of the invention of book-printing celebrated in Berlin, for the purpose of showing the world what Prussia could produce in this branch of industry, and was admitted to bear off the palm from all other competitors for fame on this occasion. The types, which are of unusual size and elegance of form, were all founded specially for the work, and the initial letters of the chapters are decorated and illuminated after designs by Kaulbach. As yet this work stands unrivaled as a typographical chef d'œuvre; but the triumph has not been obtained without a great sacrifice of money as well as of time and labor; for, although a single copy of this one volume is not sold for less than 200 thalers (£45), the printer still suffers a considerable loss by it. The copy destined for the bishop is bound in dark-blue velvet, and mounted with massive silver clasps, etc., richly chased, so that the book, in its bound state, weighs seventy-seven pounds.

The Prince has had his portrait, three-quarter length, taken in duplicate by an artist in Breslau, and has presented one of the two pictures to the Eleventh regiment of infantry, which he commanded for many months in Silesia. The other he has taken with him as a present to Queen Victoria in exchange for the portrait of the Princess Royal which her Majesty lately sent him. This latter, which is either the original, by Winterhalter, or a copy of it, the Prince has lent to Lord Bloomfield for his fête next Monday, and it may be expected to form one of the chief attractions of the evening. Invitations have been issued to four hundred guests.

THE RINGS.

The Berlin correspondent of the Times, writing before the wedding, says:

"The wedding rings that are to be used at the approaching nuptials are of Silesian gold, and have been made in Breslau. The maker of them—who has also a large gold refining establishment in that town—has had the two rings mounted on a skin of parchment, on which is engrossed, with every attention to caligraphy, a short history of his gold works in Reichenstein, from which we learn that in former days Silesia was a California on a small scale; gold was not only obtained by mining, but also by washing the sands of certain rivers (the same is still in the recollection of old people as having been the case with the Rhine). In this form of the heading to a historical document, the two wedding rings have lately been forwarded to the Royal bridegroom."

MOVEMENT OF THE LEVIATHAN.

The London Observer gives the following result of the operations of the Leviathan: "She now is within a few feet of the very extremity of the ways, and at the ensuing spring she will have amply sufficient water under her to be fairly floated. Indeed, on Wednesday, when there was a very good neap-tide, she showed very lively symptoms of freeing herself from bondage, as if anxious to bound into her future element, and was seen to lift at her stem and stern. As a matter of precaution to check her buoyancy, 1500 tons of water was put into her compartments to keep her down."

By the Niagara we learn that the steamship Leviathan had been pushed twenty-five feet off the ends of the launching ways, and her cradles were being removed. She had over seventeen feet of water under her, and it was expected that she would float on the 30th or 31st.

FRANCE.

THE ATTEMPT ON THE EMPEROR'S LIFE.

"When the first detonation took place before the Grand Opera," says the Patrie, "several of the horses of the lancers escorting the Imperial carriage took fright, and galloped along as far as the Rue Rossini before their riders could pull them in. That circumstance probably saved their Majesties from a portion of the danger, as the involuntary charge cleared the street, and forced back the crowd. When the escort wheeled round to regain their places near the carriage, there was scarcely a person in the middle of the street. After the third detonation, when the chamberlain on service, who was in the first carriage, and had escaped quite unhurt, hurried back to the door of the Imperial carriage he held his arm to the Emperor to alight. His Majesty, who had preserved all his sangfroid, said, 'But, mon cher, be so good as to let down the steps, if you wish me to descend.' The Empress alighted in her turn, and the scene which then presented itself was most terrible. Hébert and Alessandri stood near, streaming with blood, and a mass of functionaries, police agents, and soldiers, almost every one wounded, were grouped around, crying out 'Vive l'Empereur!' On the steps of the peristyle a number of persons were lying, either badly wounded or killed—the whole constituting a dreadful spectacle."

COOLNESS OF THE ATTENDANTS.

M. Lanet, commissary of police of the section of the Opera, received, as we have before mentioned, three wounds. He, however, retained sufficient presence of mind and coolness to be at the door of the imperial carriage, and, when it was opened, to ask his Majesty whether he had been wounded? "No," said the Emperor, "I have not been touched, but I see that you have not escaped." In fact, the blood was at the time streaming down M. Lanet's face. He is better, but the projectiles which penetrated both his thighs have not yet been extracted.

It is stated that in the confusion which immediately followed the explosion the escort of lancers remained as calm as on parade. After a while the officer in command asked in a loud voice, "Is any one wounded?" "I am, Sir," replied one of the soldiers, holding up his hand. In a few seconds he fainted and fell from his horse, and in the course of the night he died.

THE SCENE NEXT MORNING.

The correspondent of the Herald says: "I went myself early the next morning to inspect a locality which can not fail for the future to have a traditionary interest, and the spectacle was indeed a fearful one. The pavement was still wet with blood. The zinc screen was perforated like a colander with holes the size of an orange; the lamp posts, curb stones, and bases of the pillars were seared and torn as with grape shot. The windows of the theatre were smashed, as were many of those in the houses opposite. The street was thronged with persons of all descriptions, from the highest to the lowest, and a good deal of 'sensation' was manifest. I took some pains to collect the occasional droppings of an assemblage so heterogeneous, comprising the wealthiest millionaire to the lowest ouvrier. The loudest expressions of indignation came certainly from the better dressed, but the working man was more chary of his reflections. One bold man said, 'Well, he killed the republic in a drear, dark night—chacun à son tour. He has escaped this time.' 'Mind what you say;' some one rejoined, 'you have two of the police at your elbow.' I looked around, and certainly there were none but blouses within two yards of him; and so the police must have been, to use the technical expression, 'in plain clothes.' The more well-to-do people rather dwelt upon the wholesale cruelty of the attempt which, to attain its object, was prepared to sacrifice so many innocent lives; and whenever the name of the Empress was mentioned there was no mistaking the heartiness of the feeling."

THE WOUNDED.

The correspondent of the Times says: "A lawyer, M. Rasetti, had his life preserved by a circumstance which he was far from believing would prove so agreeable to himself. He had secured a good place in the front rank of the crowd to see the arrival of the cortège, when, just before the explosion, a woman crowded in front of him, and received directly in the abdomen a fragment of a bomb. This woman is the one who died at the Hospital Lariboisière. Another woman was saved by her enormous expanse of crinoline. The force of the projectile was spent before reaching her thigh, and the wound is not serious. The largest proportion of badly wounded persons is naturally among the police and soldiery. The lancers of the Imperial Guard have twelve men struck, two perhaps mortally. The Municipal Guard have eleven men struck, one now dead, and five severely wounded. The police number thirty wounded, of whom fifteen were of the secret police, the rest were sergents de ville, one commissary, and one divisional inspector, or chief of the secret police. Five horses were killed on the ground, five more were mortally wounded, and twenty horses of the lancers alone were wounded. The Emperor's second horse had to be shot."

REPORT OF THE SURGEONS.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times gives the following synopsis of the report of the surgeons who dressed the wounds of the victims: "The wounds in general are small and not deep—some are only skin-deep, while others descend into the muscles. In general these wounds have but one orifice, which is jagged. The fragments of the shell by which the wounds were inflicted are angular, with indented edges, and small; some are not larger than a pea, others resemble a broken nail or a grain of shot flattened. One remarkable circumstance is the number of wounds received by the same person. Surgeon Larrey counted twenty-seven on the body of one soldier, and twenty on that of a young man who was an innocent spectator in the crowd. The wounds at first caused but little pain—so little that several persons seriously wounded were not aware of the fact. A lady arrived from the provinces, who was dangerously wounded in the face, the arm, and the breast, thought at first that the explosion was caused by a fire-work let off in honor of the Emperor. After some days the wounds became extremely irritable, more so than might be expected from their small size. Some persons who were near the projectiles when they exploded had their bones broken and the interior of their stomachs torn open. One person, who died in the Hospital Lariboisière, received a large fragment of a shell in the abdomen. Fortunately such cases are but few. A great number of persons were wounded, not by the projectiles, but by splinters of wood or glass driven with great force against them by the concussion."

SYMPATHY OF THE BABY PRINCE.

The following appears in several of the French journals: "An affecting scene took place at the Tuileries after the mass of thanksgiving, at which the Emperor and Empress were present on the day following the late attempt. The Prince Imperial, when brought to his august parents, remarked the scratch made on the previous evening on the face of the Emperor, and said, in his infantine accents: 'Papa hurt!' The Emperor took the prince in his arms, and said: "You love papa, do you?" The prince replied by kissing the Emperor, and again repeated the word 'hurt!' At these caresses and these words of his child the man who had beheld death so near him without being disturbed and without changing countenance could not restrain the feelings of his heart and he shed tears." This story is told by the Univers. It is probably untrue, but will doubtless go the round of the papers.

THE OLD ANTI-BRITISH SPIRIT ASTIR.

Addresses from some of the regiments to the Emperor on the occasion of the late attempt on his life are worded in such strong language as to attract much attention. The Zouaves almost regretted that they had no opportunity to manifest their zeal in a striking manner, and the address of the Eighty-second regiment contains the following sentence: "And if your Majesty wants soldiers to reach these men, even in their haunts, we humbly pray you to designate the Eighty-second regiment as part of the advance guard of this army." Addresses from other regiments appear to have been worded still stronger; for the Moniteur has omitted some of the paragraphs.

DEATH OF THE QUEEN OF OUDE.

The Queen-mother of Oude died in Paris on the 24th of January. It was said that the Queen died of grief. She was attended in her last moments by Dr. Royer, one of the Emperor Napoleon's physicians. The prayers enjoined by the Buddhist religion were said over her deathbed. The body was watched by four women, and the arrival of the prince, the son of the deceased, who had been sent for by telegraph from London, was waited for before any arrangements would be made for the funeral.

THE JERKS IN FRANCE.

The following extraordinary tale appears in the Echo de la Frontière, published at Valenciennes: "A family named Brisson, consisting of two brothers, one married, two sisters, and a child five years of age, were, a few evenings ago, quietly seated at supper. All at once one of them, seized with some sudden vertigo, jumped up and began talking most incoherently, and all the other members of the family being attacked in a similar way, did the same. They then all began dancing, and afterward stripped themselves of the whole of their garments, singing, as they did so, sacred hymns. They next took the child, stripped him, tied him to a ladder as if to crucify him, and then stuck pins into the fleshy part of his person, continuing to dance and sing all the while. Their next exploit was to ascend to the roof of the house and pour water down the chimney to extinguish, as they said, the fires of purgatory. At this moment the neighbors interfered, and released the little boy, who was insensible from his sufferings. The cause of the sudden madness has not been ascertained."

ITALY.

THE POLITICAL PRISONERS AT NAPLES.

The Times' correspondent says: "I am glad to relate the following facts. On Saturday morning ten political prisoners were liberated from the prisons of Santa Maria Apparente, but the circumstances should be known. Eight were arrested early in August, 1856, on a charge of having proclamations upon them. The procès drawn up against them was set aside by royal rescript in June, 1857—a despotic act, though on the side of humanity or policy, for the King does not like political trials. Since June, when they were virtually pardoned, they have been kept in prison at the disposal of the police. An old man, too, Cavaliere de Luna, aged eighty-one years, and whose name has figured in your columns already, has received some amelioration in his condition. Misfortune has made him familiar with a prison. In 1799 his house was sacked by the Calabrese, his sister assassinated, and himself arrested. In 1821 he was again imprisoned, and obtained his liberty on the condition of perpetual exile. After twenty-seven years spent in France and England, he returned in 1848 to Naples. In 1850 he was again arrested by Pecchaneida, and though assoluto on his trial, is still in prison, in his eighty-first year and in his second childhood, with the sole improvement, recently granted, of a better room and a better bed."

INCIDENTS OF THE EARTHQUAKE.

The following is from the correspondent of the London Times:

"Some of the incidents which they relate seem more like fables than facts. An infant had been dug out alive, after having been under the ruins eight days. Its mother fed it too bountifully, and it died. A girl of eight years of age had been disinterred after eleven days' burial, and was still living. The monks of S. Francisco, in Padula, related a story of a girl of seventeen years of age who had been recovered after twenty-one days' burial; the monks added that the girl spoke of having been visited in her subterraneous tomb by a lady dressed in black, who gave her bread and water. She believed that it was the Madonna! Mules had also been dug out alive after twenty-one days' burial. One of the monks told my informants that on the night of the 16th ult. the shock was so violent as to throw him out of his bed, through the window, into the garden of the monastery. At Veggiano a poor woman had lost her husband and two children beneath the ruins; two yet survived, but they quickly died of hunger, and the wretched mother hanged herself. Tales of wonderful and tragic interest abound, and if the reader doubts their possibility, he has only to read Colletta's graphic description of the earthquake of 1783. The people had not settled down to any thing like regular occupation, but were grubbing among the ruins for whatever they could find, and seeking for the bodies of their friends, of whom hundreds still remain as yet disinterred. Supplies were slowly coming in for the poor people, but roads there were scarcely any, and much had to be transported on the backs of mules. The province of Basilicata is the largest in the kingdom, and yet has not more than one carriage-road through it of any importance. Potenza will not be rebuilt on the same site on which it stood; but, perhaps, lower down in the plain. I am glad to say that the English have, at length, obtained permission from Signor Bianchini, the Minister of the Interior, to send a deputation of two of their number into the Basilicata to distribute the funds collected among our countrymen. I believe that there is not a man among us who would not have felt the greatest confidence in the judgment and honor of Signor Bianchini in making a right use of whatever might have been committed to his care; but it is an Anglo-Saxon usage to manage one's money, and in Naples subalterns are many and needy, and the administration is not too good. As for Signor Bianchini, his praise is in every man's mouth."

INDIA.

THE LATEST NEWS.

The following has been received in England in advance of the Bombay mail of January 9:

"Sir J. Outram defeated the rebels near Alumbagh on December 22, and took four guns; his own loss was trifling. Sir Colin Campbell on December 12 advanced toward Ferukabad, and intended to proceed thence to Agra. Colonel Seaton's column reoccupied Mynpoore on the 27th of December, after defeating the rebels and taking six guns. Brigadier-General Chamberlain proceeds with a column to Rohilcund, and afterward joins Sir Colin at Agra. The Decca mutineers had entered the Assam country, and her Majesty's 54th Foot was in pursuit of them. The conduct of the Thirty-first Regiment of Native Infantry had excited suspicion. The population of Indore have been disarmed and tranquillity restored. The Punjab and Scinde were all quiet, but strong suspicions were entertained of Kholapoor Rajah's movements. New depredations by the Khandeish rebels have been reported, and the Peinth and Hassie rebels have been severely handled. A grand entertainment has been given by the native gentlemen of Bombay to all the European troops in the garrison at that place."

WYNDHAM'S DEFEAT.

The Times' correspondent gives a circumstantial account of the Wyndham affair; but the facts do not differ from those already before the public. The scenes after Wyndham's defeat are said to have been fearful. The hospitals were crowded to suffocation. The enemy directed their fire especially upon them, and it was not till Sir Colin Campbell returned, and, with a dozen haughty words, brought every man to his place, that order was restored.

TERRIBLE FIGHT AT LUCKNOW.

A medical officer attached to Havelock's force thus describes a terrible escape of his during the attack at Lucknow:

"All hope seemed gone; as a last resource I ran with four others into a small, one-storied house, three rooms on a floor, all doors and windows. Other fugitives now joined us, soldiers from the escort who had escaped, and two badly-wounded officers. The Sepoys now commenced yelling fearfully. I calculated their numbers at from 500 to 1000. Their leaders tried to get them to charge down on us, but as often as they came on we gave them a volley, and off went the curs; then they began their yelling again, and reviled us in Hindostanee, telling us that in a few minutes we should be massacred; they were not more than five yards off, but round the corner, and sheltered from our fire. At this time we expected instant death; it seemed incredible that ten effective men could resist 1000, who were firing a fearful hail of shot through the windows. Three of our number inside were struck down wounded, and this diminished our fire. The Sepoys all this time were massacring the wounded men in the palanquins (we rescued two more wounded men); perhaps they killed forty by firing volleys at the palanquins. The rebels now gave up the attempt to storm us, but crept up to the windows and fired in on us, so we had to lie down on the ground for a time, and let them fire over us; there was no door to the door-way, so we made a barricade of sand-bags by digging the floor with bayonets, and using the dead Sepoys' clothes to hold the sand; we also piled up the dead so as to obstruct men rushing on us. My duties, as the only unwounded officer, were to direct and encourage the men—as a surgeon, to dress the wounded—as a man, to use a rifle belonging to a wounded man when he fell. After a while we saw that the enemy were tired of rushing on us; we had killed over twenty of them, and must have wounded many more; this damped them.

FIRING FROM THE WINDOW.

"We now told off one man to fire from each window and three from the door. My post was at a window. I had my revolver, but only five shots left in it. I had no second, and, worst of all, no fresh charges. I must tell you that an eastern window means a lattice-work. At this I kept watch and ward. After a time a Sepoy crept up very cautiously, to fire as usual through the window, quite unconscious that at this time a Feringhee had him covered with a revolver. When he got about three yards from me I shot him dead, and another, who was coming up, was shot by one of the men. For nearly an hour now they were very quiet, only firing at a distance."

CHINA.

PREPARATIONS FOR THE ASSAULT OF CANTON.

The correspondent of the Times, writing from Canton River, under date Dec. 16, 1857, says that Commissioner Yeh has returned an insolent answer to the ultimatum of the English and French plenipotentiaries, and that the two forces would, in a few days, attack Canton.

Lord Elgin's demand was of the most temperate character. He asked for no more than that the treaty should be carried out; that Canton should be put upon the same footing as the other treaty ports—its gates open to commerce; that compensation be given for the damage to British merchants, and that the occupation of the Island of Honan be acquiesced in, as a material guaranty, until all matters are settled.

A letter from Hong Kong says: That Yeh's answer to Lord Elgin is couched in a sarcastic view. He tells his Lordship that the question of the treatment of strangers at Canton has been settled by decree of the Emperor; that Sir George Bonham was made a baronet for respecting that decree, and recommends Lord Elgin to follow his example; and as for compensation, Yeh had demanded of the British government for losses suffered by China.

A few days before this answer was received, Mr. Reed, the American Commissioner, solicited an interview in the city, and Yeh replied that he would meet him outside of the city, but that no barbarian should set foot within the limits of Canton.

THE LAST BALL OF THE SEASON.

THE GENTLEMEN'S DRESSING-ROOM.

THE LADIES' DRESSING-ROOM.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER XVI.

THOSE poor Pocket Candlabs, how easily does persecutly distend the air with their sensual grey wreaths! Pocket Candlabs are all males. But your Muscadet is the most offensive of all. He will never give you a light, even if you offer him a cigar.

WHATEVER the source that had supplied Harper Lesely with the money, from which he had paid the expenses of his visit to Scotland intended to console Wafer for the loss of Sophy, the source either dried up, or became wholly inadequate to his wants. For the elasticity was the felicitous peculiarity of Mr. Lesely's wants. They accommodated themselves to the state of his finances with mathematical precision, always requiring exactly five times the amount of the means placed at their disposal. From a shilling to a million, multiply his wants by five times the total of his means, and the product is a just conclusion. Harper called upon Poole, who was slowly recovering, but unable to leave his room and feed. Poole gentleman in a more melancholy state of mind than usual, occasioned by Uncle Sam's brutal gentleman that "everybody" for his godson's sins, he was not responsible for his debts"; and that he really thought "the best thing Lesely could do was to go to prison for a short time, and get whitewashed." Jasper began to launch into hard facts: "And just when one of the finest women in Paris has come here on purpose to see me," said the disappointed lover, "I am to have her enemy. Dolly Would have introduced you if you had been well enough to go; you can't be shown by proxy, sir." Lesely could not be cool. There's Mother Crane would sell her gown off her back for me, and Frank Trafford, an old friend, and positively pickles me. Besides, she lays traps to decease me —says me is dead, and then, when I would not just get there both? My Paris friend, Madame Caumartin, was going to Italy, but her plans are changed, and she is now all for St. Petersburg. She will wait a few days for you to get well. She will set off together and enjoy yourself. The Russians dost upon whist. We shall get into their swell sets, and live like princes." Harper's face was scrunched forth on the word Russian existence, in such glowing terms, that Dolly Poole felt sure that his worthy friend himself sledging down the Neva, covered with furs—a countess waiting for him at dinner, and events to induce him not to offer her, to a fabulous amount, that Jasper Lesely lost the rubber.

Having thus entered into the scheme of aerial castles, Jasper then, descending into the practical world, wound up with the mournful fact that one could not get to Petersburg, but when there, into swell sets, without having some little capital at his command.

"I tell you what we will do. Madame Caumarlin lives in prime style. Get old Latham, the money-lender, to advance her bill for three months, for £500, and we will all be off in a crack." "Capital suggestion," said Dolly. "Latham is too knowing a fish for that—an forgiver." He'll want security."

"I'll be security."

Dolly shook his head a second time, still more emphatically than the first time.

"But you ay he does discount paper—get rich on it?"

"Yes, gets rich on it, which he might not do if he discounted the paper you propose. No offence."

"Oh, no offense among friends! You have taken him bills which he has discounted?"

"Yes, many times."

"Any paper signed by good names is good paper. Who can sign good names if we know their handwritings."

Dolly started and turned white. Knew he was—knew he was—shrinking on the word—bad forgery! that crime was new to him. The very notion of it brought on a return of fever. And while Jasper was increasing his malady by arguing with his apprehensions, luckily for Poole, Uncle Sam arrived. Uncle Sam, a sagacious old tradesman, no sooner clapped eyes on the sick gentleman, than he pronounced for him a distrustful repugnance, similar to that with which an experienced gunner may regard a fine pheasant. Under the circumstances, he already learned enough of his godson's ways and chosen society to feel that Samuel Lesely had not indulged in very anti-commercial tastes, and been sadly contaminated by very anti-commercial society. Uncle Sam, therefore, saw, with the sole chance of redemption was in working on his mind and his body with all the energy of which Poole might, on recovery, break with all former associations. On seeing Jasper in the dress of an exquisite, in the sleeves of a purple dressing Uncle Sam saw the stalwart incarnation of all the sins which a godfather had covenanted for a godson should renounce. Accordingly, he made himself so disagreeable, that Lesely, in great disgust, took a hasty departure. And Uncle Sam, as he helped the nurse to plunge Dolly into his bed, had the benefit to tell his nephew, in very plain terms, that if ever he found that Brownmajor got in Poole's rooms again, Dolly would never again see the cheeks of Uncle Sam's money. Dolly beginning to blubber, and Uncle Sam threatening, patted him on the back, and said, "But as soon as you are well, I'll carry you with me to my counter box, and keep you out of harm's way till I find you a wife, who will comb your head for you—a which cheering prospect Poole blubbered more dolefully than before. On retiring to his own lodging in the Misenmere coffee-house, Uncle Sam, to make all sure, gave positive orders to Poole's landlady, who was married to Uncle Sam the man who might pay what Poole owed to her, on no account to let in any of Dolly's profligate friends that especially of the wild but found there; adding, "The as much as my godson's life is worth, and, more to the purpose, as much as your bill is." Accordingly, when Jasper presented himself at Poole's door, he was very courteously informed by expressed him of her orders; and, proof to his instant apprehensions, he found them true on his face. But a French chronicler has recorded that, when Henry IV. was besieging Paris, and was in want of money and corn, the walls, love-letters passed between the city and camp as readily as if there had been a spy at all. And does not Mercury preside over money as well as love? Jasper, spurred on by Madame Caumartin, who was now making excuses to exchange London for Petersburg as soon as possible, contrived to come most frequent correspondence with Poole by the agency of the mouse, who luckily was not above being bribed by cheese. Poole obtained a regular visit to the village proposed by Jasper; but, in the course of the correspondence, he found, more interchangeably—for his mind began somewhat to wander—a scheme equally fractious, which Jasper, Madame Caumartin, Madame Latham, and everywit, caught up, and quickly reduced to definite matter and form. Old Mr. Latham's profits he discounted, kept those of such more bashful customers as stipulated that their resort to temporary accommodation should be maintained a profound secret in his own safe. Among these bills Poole knew that there was one for £500, given by a young nobleman of immense estates, but so entailed that he could neither sell nor mortgage, but therefore obtained only of a few hundreds for pocket-money. The nobleman's name was Lord Lovell, well and favorably-well known; his honor unimpeachable. A bill of his any one would cash at sight. Could Poole not obtain that bill? It had, however, only a few weeks yet to run. Jasper or Madame Caumartin might get it discounted by my Lord —'s own banker; and if that were too bold, by my professional bill-broker; and all three, by no means to suspicion attaching to Poole. But to get at that safe a false key might be necessary. Poole respectfully submitted suggestion of his own. Jasper sent him a reader contrivance—a spectacle-looking tool that looked an instrument of torture, but was necessary evil to enable Poole to recover sufficiently to return to business, and to get rid of Uncle Sam by a pretence of a move to the country the moment Poole had capacities closely cleared some necessary arrears of work. Jasper, by correspondence, was ready. Jasper Lesely shunned Mrs. Crane, and took his medical opinion from a young friend of Madame Caumartin. He needed no dressing-gown and slippers to feel himself at home there. Madame Caumartin's house was a shop where one was in genteel street. Her own appurtenances were eminently what the French call déshabillée. Dressed to perfection, from head to foot; neat and finished as an epigram. Her face, in shape like a Spanish fan, small colors, eyebrows, eyes, mouth frontal, widening as the summit; chin tapering, but jaw strong; hair marvelously arched, small, and with points sharp as those in the maw of the fish called the "Sea Devil"; eyes like dark enemas, of which the pupil, when she was angry, or when she was scheming, retreated upward towards the forehead, leaving the impression given my that shot through space like the gleam that escapes from a dark lantern; complexion appetizingly Spanish—all of pale, but white, as if she lived on blanched almonds, peeled onions, and sugar candy; hands and feet so bloodless, with fingers so pointedly taper there seemed stings at their tips; manners of one who has ranged all the courts of Europe, from high to low set, and duped the most wary in each of them. But she played, it is certain, so strongly here thought her youth must have passed in the chambers of porphyry! Did she please it, as she probably would have enough to please her been a sénéchale. In age, perhaps bordering on forty. She looked scarcely more than she been a hundred and twenty she could not have been more wicked. Ah! happy, indeed, for Sophy that she was not in the same town with Mrs. Forstered in elegant boudoirs by those bloodless hands! Mrs. Forstered, originally married herself her envy from Arabella's less cruel unkindness; better for even Rouge's village stags, than for Arabella. Jasper, feigned himself to all the entire tricks of Sir Isaac!

Mrs. Crane, who used to Jasper to state here that in Lesely's recent design to transfer Sophy from Wafer's care to that of Madame Caumartin, he had not taken into the ideas of a village so execrable as the character of the Parisienne of the Rue de Rivoli, Arabella's house in the real object in getting the child, at that time, once more into his power was (whatever its remote and ultimate compass) the humiliation of Arabella's dark doubts. But still, if Sophy had been restored to Jasper, the object in regaining her foiled (as it probably would have been), what might then have become of her?—lost, perhaps, forever to Wafer—in a foreign land, and under such guardianship? Grave question, which Jasper Lesely, who exercised no little foresight in the paramount question, viz., what, some day or other, will become of himself, was not likely to have left unsolved by his reasoning?

Meanwhile Mrs. Crane was vigilant. The decision to which she looked, every day, for Mr. Lesely's departure was not information which Rogue desired, and which she could not long need. She gave the detective some information respecting Madame Caumartin. One day, toward the evening, she was surprised by a visit from Uncle Sam. He called ostensibly to thank her for her kindness to his godson and nephew; and to say her not to be offended if he had been rude to Mr. Lovely, who, he understood from Dolly, was a particular friend of hers. "You see, ma'am, Samuel Dolly is a weak young man, and easily led astray; but, luckily for himself, he has no means and no stomach. He can't get spent in time; and if I could find a wife to manage him, he has not a bad head for the main chance, and may become a prosperous man. Repeatedly I have told him he should go to prison, but there was only to frighten him, and so, I want to get him safe down into the country, and he don't take to that. So I am forced to say, 'My boy, cousin-hearted and kind-hearted Samuel Dolly, or a Lennon jail, and debtors' allowance.' Most give a young man his choice, my dear lady."

Mrs. Crane, observing that what he said was extremely sensible, Uncle Sam warmed in his confidence.

"And I thought I had him, till I found Mr. Lovely in his sick-room; but ever since that day, I don't know how it is, the lad has had something on his mind, which I don't like at all—cracky, I think, my dear lady—cracky. I suspect that old rip, poor Sammy, has been at her with it, and she immediately wanted to take her Bible-oath, and smelt of gin—two things which, taken together, look ugly."

"But," said Mrs. Crane, growing much interested, "if Mr. Lovely and Mr. Poole do correspond, what then?"

"That's what I want to know, ma'am. Because one likes to wish to diagnose, Mr. Lovely—a dashing gent, and nothing worse, I dare say. But certain it is, that he has not been the means of Dolly's head something which has cracked it! There is the lad now up and dressed, when he ought to be in bed, and wandering off to Mr. Latham's to-morrow, and that long arrears of work can not be considered. Now, ma'am, you talk of conscience before—that looks guilty! And it does not frighten him any longer when I say he shall go to prison for his debts; and he's very anxious to get me out of London; and when I threw in a word about Mr. Lovely, that my good lady—just to see its effect), he grew as white as that paper: and then he began strumming and singing and saying that Mr. Lovely would be a great man, and that he should be a great man, and that he did not care for money—he could get as much money as he liked. That looks guilty, my dear lady. And, why," cried Uncle Sam, clasping his hands, "I do fear that he's thinking of something worse than his bad ever done before, and that he can't stand it. And, ma'am, he has a great respect for you, and you've a friendship for Mr. Lovely. Now just suppose that Mr. Lovely should have been thinking of what your flash sporting gent—a harmless creature—and my sister's son should, being cracky, construe it into something criminal. Oh, Mrs. Crane, do go and see Mr. Lovely and tell him that Samuel Dolly is not safe—it not safe!"

"Must better that I should go to your nephew," said Mrs. Crane; "and with your leave I will do so at once. Let me see him alone. Where shall I find your afterward?"

"At the Gloucester Coffee-house. Oh, my dear lady, how easy I think you could do it. The boy can be nothing to you; but to me, he's my sister's son—the blackguard!"

CHAPTER XVII.

Direct labyrinths in one
Passages triangular Cires.—HORAT.

MRS. CRANE found Poole in his little sitting room, hung round with prints of opera-dancers, prize-fighters, race-horses, and, last not least, Samuel Dolly was in full dress. His cheeks, usually so pale, seemed much flushed. He was evidently in a state of high excitement. He was extremely low to Mrs. Crane, called her Countess, asked if she had been lately at the Opera-house, and if she knew Madame Caumartin; and whether the nobility at St. Petersburg were jolly, or stark-up Methodists, who played cards—not waiting for her answer. In fact his mind was unquestionably disordered.

Arabella Crane abruptly laid her hand on his shoulder. "You are going to the gallows," she said, suddenly. "Shown on your face, and on the one tell, and I will keep your secret, and save you; lie—and you are lost!"

Poole burst into tears, and dropped on his knees as he was told.

In ten minutes Mrs. Crane knew all that she cared to know, possessed herself of Lovely's letters, and, while Poole was lighting cigars in a more light-hearted, she hastened to Uncle Sam at the Gloucester Coffee-house. "Take your nephew out of town this evening, and do not let him from your sight for the next six months. Mark you, he will never be safe in town, and you may save him from the hulks. Do so. Take my advice." She was gone before Uncle Sam could answer.

She next proceeded to the private house of the detective to whom she had been formerly referred—this time less to give than to receive information. Not half an hour after her interview with him, Arabella Crane stood in the street wherein was placed the showy house of Madame Caumartin. The lamps in the street were now lighted—the street, even at day, a quiet one, was comparatively deserted. A few windows in the French woman's house were closed with shutters and curtains, except on the drawing-room floor. From those, which, from within streamed over a balcony filled with gay plants—one of the casements was partially open. And now and then, where the watcher stood, she could just catch the glimpse of a passing form behind the muslin draperies, or hear the sound of some louder laugh. In her dark gray dress, and still darker mantle, Arabella Crane stood motionless, her eyes fixed on these windows. The rare foot-passenger who turned by her turned involuntarily to glance at the countenance of one so still, and then as involuntarily to survey the house to which that countenance was lifted. So such observer so incurious as not to hazard conjecture what lady could be waiting in front of the dark laird eyes that watched it with so fixed a menace. Thus she remained, sometimes pausing, moving from her post, as a sentry moves from his, slowly pacing a few steps to and fro, returning to the same place, and the same incessantness; thus she remained for hours. Evening deepened into night—night grew near to dawn, but was still there in the street, and her eyes were on that house. At length the door opened suddenly, and Uncle Sam came forth with a light step, and humming the tune of a gay French chanson. As he came straight toward her she moved not—she remained as in watch, from her dark mantle stretched forth her large arm and hand, and seized him. He heaved, and recognized her.

"You here?" he exclaimed—"you!—at such an hour?—you!"

"I, Jasper Lovely, here to warn you. To-morrow rise before the lark, and fly from this accursed house. To-morrow that woman—not for her worst crimes, they elude the law, but for her last, by which the law can recover some will be a prisoner. No—you shall not return to warn her of your flight. Your word once broke away, and retreated some steps toward the house); "or, if you do, share her fate. Now, go!"

"What do you mean?" said Jasper, hesitating, but with some show of anger at the mandate. "Speak more plainly: if poor Madame Caumartin has got into a scrape, which I don't think she has, what has it to do with me?"

"The woman you call Caumartin fled from Paris to escape the hands of justice. She was tracked; the French Government have claimed her. Ho! you smile. This does not touch you?"

"Certainly not."

"But there are charges against her from English tradesmen, and if it be proved that you knew her in her proper name—the infamous Comtesse de Beaumarais—if it be proved that you passed off the French billets de banque that she—poor woman—forced upon tradesmen in obtaining goods under her false name—if you, enriched by her robberies, were aiding and abetting her in her crimes, you may be taken for exile from the French law, will you be safe from the English? Fool! you are in the hands of Lovely if so, fear nothing. You may be guilty; if so, hide, or follow me!"

Jasper hesitated. His first impulse was to trust implicitly to Mrs. Crane, and lose not a moment in obeying her; but reason and self-preservation set flight as an intelligence so superior to his own could suggest. But suddenly remembering that Poole had promised to get the bill for Lovely by the next day—that if flight were necessary, there was yet a chance of that bill—that it—unconstitutional hardihood, and the grasping cupidity by which it was accompanied, made him resolve to hazard that chance—that it—a few hours. And after all, might not Mrs. Crane exaggerate? Was not this the contact of a jealous woman? "Pray," said he, moving on, and fixing quick keen eyes on her as she walked by his side, "I must know did you know my particulars?"

"From a detective policeman employed to discover Sophy. In conferring with him, the name of Jasper Lovely as her legal protector was of course stated: that name was already coupled with the name of the false Caumartin. The policeman, eager, and raised in scent, recognized to that woman, saves you from sharing that woman's ignominy and doom."

"Ah, indeed!" said Jasper, musingly, though he winced at her words: "I don't, on reflection, see how I can be implicated in any crime, as I am not bound to know why a lady changes her name, nor how she comes by her money. And as to the bills with forged signatures, I will speak of; most of what she has got is paid for—a few are not, but they are less than the worth of her goods. Pooh! I am not so easily frightened—much obliged to you all the same. Go home yourself, you horribly fine, you look rather good-morning."

"Then you will not? If you see that woman again—if you attempt to save or screen her—I shall know, and you lose in me your last friend. Remember, Jasper, this plunges in a gulf."

These words were so solemnly uttered that they frightened Jasper more than the menace was. "I have no wish to screen or save her," he said, with selfish sincerity. "And after what you have said, I should as soon enter a fire-ship as that house. But let me have some hours to consider what is best to be done."

"Yes, consider—I shall expect you to-morrow."

He went his way up the twilight streets toward, a new lodging he had hired not far from the Surrey Theatre. She stood where they could count her gaunt figure, and, taking the opposite direction, threaded thoroughfares yet lonelier, till she gained her door, and was welcomed back by the faithful Bridget.

QUARTER-DAY.

SAYS blackbird to Thomas, "Your rent I must raise,
I'm so pragly pleas'd for the pelf!"
Says he, "Mr. Finch," (Quarter-Day—"your lord's main good,
For I never can raise it myself."

A FEARFUL BALLOON ADVENTURE.

WE are not related, His name is John Griffiths, and I am William Wallker; and we called ourselves the Pelagonian Brothers, because it looked well in the bills and pleased the public. We met by chance, about six years since, on the race-course at Doncaster, and so took a sort of mutual liking, and went partners in a tour through the midland counties. We had never seen or heard of each other up to that time; and, though we became good friends, we never grew entirely intimate. I was reading at his past life, nor he of mine, and I never asked him a question on the subject. I am particular to have it all, in case anything happening; for I am a plain man telling a plain story, and I want no one to misunderstand a word of what I am about to relate.

We made a little money by our tours; but we not, when we left, as I was aware that either of us had been able to earn before; so we agreed to stay together for a year, and see what we could do. This time we got an engagement at Astley's for the winter, and, when the summer came, joined a traveling company, and went about as before.

The circus was a capital thing—a republic, so to say, in which we were equals. We had no wages to get, to whom we paid a fixed salary, and the rest went shares in the profits. There were times when we did not make all our expenses; there were towns where we made ten and fifteen pounds a night; but the balance was always along with the good, and on the whole, we prospered.

We left with the company two years and a half, and by that time had a very good connection both and London. During that time we had found little to grumble at. There were each other's confidants through now to a hair, and grew bolder with experience; so that there was scarcely a new feat which we did not attempt which we did not learn. Even to the "pecke" business, and the trick of "the ladder," which is considered the most difficult. In fact is that we were admirably matched, which, in our profession, is the most important point of all. Each of us was a host to the nicknack of his mate, and we were not unlike in figure. If Griffiths were considerably a little more muscular than was the more active, and even that difference was in our favor. I believe that, in other respects, we suited each other equally well, and I know that, for the three years and a half which we had spent together constantly, we had never had a hard word or quarrel. We had been in the same bedroom and dressing-room, and shared our purse and our friendship with the circus folks), we had never had a difference. Griffiths was a steady, saving, silent fellow enough, with little gray eyes, and heavy black hair. I remember thinking, more or twice, that he was not quite the sort of person I would like for an enemy; but that was in reference to his face, and only a face of my own fancy. For myself, I can live with any one who is disposed to live with me, and I am not aware that I could better than any thing in the world.

We had come down as expert that we resolved to better ourselves and return to London, which we did somewhere about the end of February or the beginning of March, eighteen hundred and fifty-five. We put up at a little inn in the Borough, and, having nothing to do, we found ourselves engaged by Mr. James Rice, of the Belvidere Tavern, at a salary of seven pounds a week. Now that was a chance of which we were both previous gains; and the Tavern we try po means a bad place for the sale of a theatrical speculation.

Situated half-way between the West End and the city, surrounded by a densely populated neighborhood, and lying in the very path of the omnibuses, this establishment was one of the most prosperous of its class. There was a theatre, and a concert-room, and a garden, where dancing, and smoking, and rifle-shooting, and supper-eating was going on from eight till twelve o'clock every night all through the summer, which made the place a special favorite with the working classes.

Here, then, we were engaged (Griffiths and I), with a promise that our salary should be raised if the speculation succeeded, and raised it soon we, for we drew enormously. We brought out the perche and the ceiling business, and, in short, all the most of the new features a platform higher than the roof of the theatre; and, in short, did every thing that every yet was done in the way of trick and skill, too; though perhaps it is not my place to say so. At all events the great colored posters were pasted on the walls of the town, and our salary was increased to fifteen pounds a week, and the gentleman who writes about the drama in the Sunday Scout was pleased to observe that there was no performance in London half so worthy of a visit as that of the Pelagonian Brothers, for which I take this opportunity to thank him kindly.

We lived very well, of course, together in a quiet street on a hill, near Islington. The house was kept by Mrs. Morrison, a respectable, industrious woman, whose husband had been a gas-fitter at one of the theatres, and who was now left a widow with one child, a daughter about seventeen years of age. She was very good, and very pretty. She was christened Alice, but her mother called her Ally, and all the rest took the same habit; for they were very simple, friendly people, and we were soon as good friends as if we had been living together in the same house for years.

I am not hand at telling a story, as, I dare say, you have found out by this time—and, indeed, I never did set down to write one set before now, and I am well aware that I am getting on, and confess that I loved her. I also fancied, before many months were over, that she was not altogether unlike me; for a man's wits are twice as sharp when he is in love, and there is not a blush, or a glance, or a word, that he does not contrive to build some hope upon. So one day, when Griffiths was out, I went down stairs to the parlor, where she was sitting by the window sewing, and took a chair beside her.

"Ally, my dear," said I, stopping her right hand from working, and taking it up in both of mine, "Ally, my dear, I want to speak to you."

She blushed, and turned pale, and blushed again, and I felt the pulses in her little soft hand throbbing like the heart of a frightened bird, but she never answered a syllable.

"Ally, my dear," said I, "I am a plain man. I am thirty-two years of age. I don't know how to flatter like some folks, and I have had very little book-learning to boast of. But, my dear, I love you; and, though I don't pretend that you are the first girl I ever fancied, I can truly say that you are the first I ever cared to make my wife. So, if you like me, such as I am, I'll be a true husband to you as long as I live."

What answer she made, or whether she spoke at all, I do not remember. I can undertake to say no ideas were all confused, and I only remember that I kissed her, and was very happy, and that, when Mrs. Morrison came into the room, she found us with my arm clasped round my darling's waist.

I was not aware when it was that I first noticed the change in John Griffiths; but that it was something I could not help noticing I am decidedly certain. It is hard to put looks into words, and to account of trifles that, after all, are matters of feeling in the minds readers of fact. I can only say the change as well as myself, and no one could help observing that he began to be more distant, and less sociable than ever. He kept away from home as much as possible. He spent all his Sundays out, sometimes away the first thing after breakfast, and not coming back again till close upon midnight. He even put up a room to our self, and, instead of walking home together after our night's work was over, and joined a set of tap-room club that was kept by a boxer or so of the theatre, belonging to the theatre. Worse than this, he scarcely ever practiced with me, and never rehearsed at night, even when we were at meals. He watched about the room as if I had been a thief. And sometimes, when I spoke to him, I could see that he was willfully in my life. I caught him looking at me from under those black brows of his, and I did not like it.

More than once I laid my hand upon his sleeve as he was hurrying away on Sundays, or turning to the door, and asked him to stay with me; but he always made some excuse, and I thought, "Griffiths, have you got any thing against me?" or, "Griffiths, what is it that makes you behave cold with me to-night?" But he either shook me off without a word, or muttered some sulky denial of my question, and I began to think a secret answer as I got tired of pease-making at last, and let him go his own way, and chose for myself.

The summer was already far advanced, and our engagement at the Belvidere had well-nigh ended, when I found out the way the fellow was going to prepare her wedding things. Matters continued the same I told you, for a few months, and then it was fixed, I made up my mind to try him once again, and invite him in the church and the dinner. The circumstances of that invitation and of what he answered me, and the whole affair had taken place this morning.

It was on the twenty-ninth of July (I am particular about the dates), and there had been a general call to rehearsal at nine o'clock in the day. The weather was warm and hazy, and I started early in order to get a walk in the fields first. I knew that, what with the rehearsal and the new piece, and the Grand Concert, I should have enough to do before my day's work was over; and in the consequence was that I arrived about twenty minutes too soon. The gates gardens had not been up by daylight, but they were pleasanter, anyhow, than the theatre; so I went in, and strolled among the smoky trees, and watched the waiters making the stalks off the tables in the summer-house, and thought of the pleasant life I should lead when they were not playing, and what miserable gimcrack concerts the Surrey and the Cyder and the Cosmorama Gardens, and all the other watering places which looked so fine by the light of colored lamps and fire-works.

Well, just as I was sauntering on, turning these things over in my mind, whom should I see but one of the summer-houses but John Griffiths! He was lying forward upon the table with his face resting upon his folded arms, and seemed to be in very unsociable and glum stood close beside him, and his white bull-finch near his chair. A bottle and glass was taken in his, though his face was hidden; so I went up and touched him smartly on the shoulder. He started up scowling, and I said, "I thought I was here early; but it seems that you were before me, after all."

He sprang to his feet at the sound of my voice as if he had been struck, and then turned impatiently upon me.

"What did you wake me for?" he said, sullenly.

"Because I have news to tell you. I know that the sixth of August will be our last night here. Well, mate, on the seventh, please God, I'm going to be married to Ally."

"Curse you!" he interrupted, turning a livid face upon me, and with his eyes full of savage light. "Curse you! How dare you come to me with that, you smooth-faced hound?—to me, of all men living?"

I was so little prepared for this burst of passion that I had nothing to say, and could only ask—

"Why can't you let me alone? Why do you tempt me for? I've kept my hands off of you till now."

He paused and bit his lip, and I saw that he was trembling from head to foot with rage—scared—it's not likely that I should be a Patagonian Brother if I was; but the sight of his hatred seemed to have the effect of making me cool and steady.

"My God!" said I, leaning up against the table, "what do you mean? Are you mad?"

He made no answer; but looked straight at me, and then walked away. I don't know how it was; but from that moment I knew all. It was written, somehow, in his face.

"Oh, Alice, Alice!" I said to myself, with a kind of groan, and sat down on the nearest bench; I believe that, at that moment, I scarcely knew where I was, or what I was doing.

I did not see him again till we met on the stage, about an hour afterward, to go through our scene in the rehearsal. It was a grand Easter piece with a great deal of firing, and real water, and a live cake at in the last act; and Griffiths and I were Mozamboo spies, performing before the Rajah in the Hall of Candidates. Excepting that it cost a great deal of money, that is all I ever know about the plot; and, upon my word, I don't believe that any body else knew much more. By this time I had, of course, recovered my usual composure; but I could see that Griffiths had been drinking, for his face was flushed and his balance unsteady. When the rehearsal was over, Mr. Rice called us into the private room and brought out a decanter of sherry, with which, I must say, he was always as liberal as any gentleman could be.

"Patagonians," says he, for he had a wonderful lofty manner of his own, and always called us by that name, "I suppose you would make no objection to a little matter of extra work to-night, pay on the sixth—just to end the season with something stunning—hey?"

"No, no, Sir, not we," replied Griffiths, in a sort of hearty manner that wasn't natural to him, "We're ready for any thing. Is it the flying business you spoke about the other day?"

"Better than that," said the manager, filling up the glasses. "It's a new French trick that never yet been done in this country, and they call it the tragedy. Patagonians, your health!"

So we drank his in return, and Mr. Rice explained all about it. It was to be an exhibition of posturing and a ballet-act carried out in the same distance below the car was to be secured a triangular wooden frame-work, which Griffiths was called the trapeze. From the lower pole, or base of the triangle, one of us was to be suspended, with a leather strap or heavy leather cincture round the ankle, in case of accidents. Just as the balloon was rising and this man swung head downwards, the other was to catch him by the hands and go up also, having, if he preferred it, some hand or other to hold him in his companion. The idea was also we were then to go through our customary performances, considering them so long as the balloon remained in sight.

"All this," said Mr. Rice, "is made considerably dangerous in itself really. To mount of a balloon through the air is so stanky and imperceptible that, but for the knowledge of the ropes and the boatstope, you will perform almost as comfortably as in the gardens. Besides, I am speaking to brave men who know their business well, and are to be dashed by a trifle—hey, Patagonians?"

Griffiths nodded his head down heavily upon the table, and made the glasses ring again.

"I'm ready, Sir," said he, with an oath. "I'm ready to do any thing of any man born as afraid to go with me!"

He looked at me as he said this with a sort of mocking laugh that brought the blood up into my face.

"If you mean that for me, John," said I, quickly, "I'm no more afraid than yourself; and, if that's all about it, I'll go up to-night."

If I was to try from now till this day next year, I never could describe the expression that came over the face of Mr. Rice at those words. I seemed to turn all the current of my blood. I could not understand it then; but I understood it perfectly well afterward.

Well, Mr. Rice was mightily pleased to find us so willing, and a very few more words ended the matter. Mr. Staines and his famous Wurtemberg balloon were to be engaged; fifteen hundred additional colored lamps were to be hired; and Griffiths and I were to receive twelve pounds apiece for the evening, exclusive of our general salary.

Poor Alf! In the midst of the excitement I had forgotten her, and it was not till I got out of the theatre and walking slowly homeward that I remembered she must be told. For my own part, I did not believe there was the slightest danger, but I knew how her fears would magnify every thing, and my heart I came toward home grew more uncomfortable I felt. After all, I was such a coward—for I always am a coward when women are concerned—that I could not tell her what I had her even the next; and it was only on Sunday, when we were sitting together after dinner, that I found courage to speak of it. I had expected nothing of the sort; but I had no idea that she would have taken on as she did, and I declare that, even then, if the gentlers had not been already out and myself bound in honor to acting to my engagement, I would have gone straight to Mr Rice and declined the business altogether. Poor little, heartedarling! it was a sore trial to her and to me also, and I was an inconsiderate idiot not to have thought of her feelings in the least degree. But there was no help for it now; so I gave her the only consolation in my power by promising that I would be the first man tied to the trapeze. It was, of course, the safest position, and while I had secured her a vital point, I saved air. On all other points I logs my own counsel, and you may be certain I said as to that nothing.

I saw less of him than ever. He even took his meals in the city now, and during the seven days that elapsed between the theatre-night and the sixth, never once came face to face with me, except upon the stage.

I had a hard matter to get away from home when the afternoon of the sixth came round. My darling clung about me as if her heart would break; and although I did my best to cheer her, I don't mind confessing now that I went out and cried a tear or two in the passage.

"Keep up your spirits, Ally, dear," says I, smiling and kissing her the last thing before I left the house. "And don't be spoiling your pretty eyes in that way. Remember that I want you to look well, and that we are to be married to-morrow."

The multitude in the Belvidere Gardens was something wonderful. There they were—men, women, and children—thronging the orchestra, the orchestra stairs, and every available inch of ground; and there, in the midst of them, rolled and swayed the huge Wurtemberg balloon, like a sleepy, lolling giant. The ascent was fixed for six o'clock, and as we might come down again by daylight; so I made haste to dress, and then went to the greenroom to see after Mr. Rice, and hear something of what was going forward.

Mr. Rice was there, and three gentlemen with him, namely, Colonel Steward, Captain Crawford, and Sydney Baird, Esquire. They were fine handsome looking gentlemen, all three—especially Sydney Baird, Esquire, who was, as I have since been told, a play-writer, and one of the contributors to getting up arms free, going to draw back when I saw them sitting there with their wine and cigars; but they would have me to take a glass of sherry and shook hands with me all round as polite as possible, and treated me as handsome as any gentlemen could.

"Here's health and success to you, my brave fellow," says Colonel Steward, "and a pleasant trip to us all!" and then I found that they were going up in the car with Mr. Staines.

And now, I sat with their light cheerful ways and pleasant talking, and what with the glass of wine that I had taken, and the excitement and the hum of voices from the crowd outside, I was in first-rate spirits, and as impatient to be off as a racer at the starting-point. Presently one of the gentlemen looked at his watch.

"What are we waiting for?" said he. "It is ten minutes past six already."

And so it was. The ten minutes past the hour, and Griffiths had not yet been seen or heard of.

Mr. Rice grew very uneasy, and the crowd very angry, and he sent messengers everywhere to find him, we made up our minds to go without him, and Mr. Rice made a little speech and apologized to the company, and then there was a cheer, and a great bustle; and the gentlemen took their seats in the car; and a basket of Champagne and a cold chicken was put in with them; and I was made fast by one leg to the trapeze; and then the signal was just about to get in himself and give the signal to cut loose, when who should we see coming in a coach but the crowd but Griffiths!

Of course there was another cheer at this, and a delay of eight or ten minutes more for the drawing.

And at last he came, and it was now just a quarter to seven o'clock. He looked very pallid when he leaned out of the coach door, and seemed to stagger; but there was no time to change any thing now; even if I had thought so his Mr Rice was already dashed to pieces. But that soon passed away, and by the time we had risen to about three hundred feet I was as comfortable as I ever was in my life, and lived in the air with my head downward.

Never was there a more performance. Griffiths was as cool as possible—I never saw him cooler—and we went through every conceivable attitude; we were swinging by our heels, by our hands, and throwing somersaults one over the other. And during the whole time the fireworks and the squares seemed to sink away to the right, and the boiers from the living world died on the air—and, as I turned and looked, I could see that with every minute, I caught strange flitting glimpses of the sweet city, the city of my love, and of all the gentlemen leaning over the car and the tiny passengers swarming down below like ants on an ant-hill.

Then the gentlemen grew tired of leaning over, and began to talk and laugh, and drink Champagne over their heads. Then the Surrey hills drew nearer, and the city sank away to the right, farther and farther. Then the Thames appeared like green fields with lines of railway crossing them at one point, and then it was lost in a sort of misty mist, and we ceased to see any thing, except through breaks and openings in the clouds.

"Come, John," said I, "the hour of this business is done. Don't you think we might as well be getting down to earth?"

He was hanging below just then, holding on by my two hands, and had been hanging so quite quiet for some minutes. He didn't speak to me, and had no wonder, for the clouds were gathering now, and it began to be dusk; and I saw that the gentlemen up above grew muffled, and I could hardly see for a yard before me in any direction. So I called to him again, but he never made any answer.

He made no answer, but shifted his grasp from my hand to my wrist, and then up to the middle of my arm, so raising himself by degrees, till our faces came nearly on a level. I felt his breath, and I felt his hot breath on my cheek.

"William Wilson," says he, hoarsely, "can't to-morrow to have been your wedding-day?"

Something in the tone of his voice, in the question, in the breath and fetid coldness of it, struck with horror. I tried to shake off his hands, but he held me fast.

"Well, what if it was?" said I, after a moment. "You needn't grip so hard. Catch hold of the bag, will you? and let go of my arm."

He gave a short hard laugh, but never stirred.

"I suppose you are thinking of marrying Miss Ally, says he, and it seemed to me that he had something between his teeth. "If either of us was to fall, I'm afraid that you would be wrenched the ground."

I would have given the world at that moment to be able to see his face; but what with my own head being downward, and all his weight hanging to my arms, I had no more power than an infant.

"John!" I exclaimed, "what do you mean? Catch hold of the pole, and let me do the same. Your hands are slipping."

"Do you see this?" said he, catching my arms a couple of inches higher up, and looking right into my face. "Do you see this?"

It was a large, open clasp-knife, and he was holding it with his teeth. His breath seemed to him over the cold blade. "I bought it this evening—I hid it in my belt—waited till the clouds came round and there was no soul to see. Present I shall cut you away from the balloon. I took an oath that you should never have her, and I mean to keep it!"

The madness came over my eyes, and every thing grew red. I felt that in another minute I should be insensible. I thought I was so strong—that in setting my arms free, made a spring at the pole overhead.

That spring saved me. Our wrists were bound together, and so he rose to dree me along with him; for I was on his right hand, and I had made a great effort for myself.

I saw him hold by the pole with his left hand; I saw him put the knife in his right; I felt the cold steel pass between his wrist and mine, and then—

And then, the horror of the moment gave me back my strength, and I clung to the frame-work with all my might.

We were separated now, and I was still secured to the trapeze by one ankle. He had only his arms to trust to—and the knife.

Oh, the deadly, deadly strife that followed! It seems me a hundred of it. His only hope now lay in the cursed weapon; and so, clinging to the woodwork with one hand, he strove to stab me with the other.

It was life or death now, and I grew desperate. He fell his murderous clutch upon my throat, and, in the silence of that hideous struggle, to hear the click of a gentleman's cork—followed by a peal of careless laughter—overhead . . . . Oh, it was worse than death; a hundred times over I would have died rather than have had to fight that fight.

I am not clear as to all that followed. I remember that I got my right arm round together by a leathern strap, the signal was given, the band struck up, the crowd applauded, and I felt that I was standing upright and steady above the heads of the people.

Down sank the balloon, and I descended with a movement of upturned face. Down sank the roof of the theatre, and fainter grew the sound of the music and the cheering. Down sank the roofs of strange that, for the first moment, I was forced to shut my eyes and hold on as if I were in the act of dashed to pieces. But that soon passed away, and by the time we had risen to about three hundred feet I was as comfortable as I ever was in my life, and lived in the air with my head downward.

Never was there a more performance. Griffiths was as cool as possible—I never saw him cooler—and we went through every conceivable attitude; we were swinging by our heels, by our hands, and throwing somersaults one over the other. And during the whole time the fireworks and the squares seemed to sink away to the right, and the boiers from the living world died on the air—and, as I turned and looked, I could see that with every minute, I caught strange flitting glimpses of the sweet city, the city of my love, and of all the gentlemen leaning over the car and the tiny passengers swarming down below like ants on an ant-hill.

Then the gentlemen grew tired of leaning over, and began to talk and laugh, and drink Champagne over their heads. Then the Surrey hills drew nearer, and the city sank away to the right, farther and farther. Then the Thames appeared like green fields with lines of railway crossing them at one point, and then it was lost in a sort of misty mist, and we ceased to see any thing, except through breaks and openings in the clouds.

"Come, John," said I, "the hour of this business is done. Don't you think we might as well be getting down to earth?"

He was hanging below just then, holding on by my two hands, and had been hanging so quite quiet for some minutes. He didn't speak to me, and had no wonder, for the clouds were gathering now, and it began to be dusk; and I saw that the gentlemen up above grew muffled, and I could hardly see for a yard before me in any direction. So I called to him again, but he never made any answer.

He made no answer, but shifted his grasp from my hand to my wrist, and then up to the middle of my arm, so raising himself by degrees, till our faces came nearly on a level. I felt his breath, and I felt his hot breath on my cheek.

"William Wilson," says he, hoarsely, "can't to-morrow to have been your wedding-day?"

Something in the tone of his voice, in the question, in the breath and fetid coldness of it, struck with horror. I tried to shake off his hands, but he held me fast.

"Well, what if it was?" said I, after a moment. "You needn't grip so hard. Catch hold of the bag, will you? and let go of my arm."

He gave a short hard laugh, but never stirred.

"I suppose you are thinking of marrying Miss Ally, says he, and it seemed to me that he had something between his teeth. "If either of us was to fall, I'm afraid that you would be wrenched the ground."

I would have given the world at that moment to be able to see his face; but what with my own head being downward, and all his weight hanging to my arms, I had no more power than an infant.

"John!" I exclaimed, "what do you mean? Catch hold of the pole, and let me do the same. Your hands are slipping."

"Do you see this?" said he, catching my arms a couple of inches higher up, and looking right into my face. "Do you see this?"

"Ah, indeed! I stammered, again rubbing my eyes and unsealing my ears.

But the latter interrupted me, yet not inquitly, for I shall never die—nevermore. The only fault I have to find with my existence is, that I lived in public life fifty years before I should. I was a statesman before the age was ready for me. The era that makes Lord Derby a minister, and forbids audiences for Lola Montez, will crowded court-rooms for beautiful Mrs. Woodman, would have been impatient and disgusted with my little tricks with female society. And indeed, when the land worships Colonel William Wallace, its representative would have defiled Colonel Burr for hinting at his Western Empire. Instead of having been tried for my life, I might have been elected to the Presidency, or been mayoress of a calico ball, or attained to either high position. Forsan sic, forsan hæc habuit the first Filldmore! Had I not,worn a bitter oath never to leave private life again, I would run for Cuba and South Carolina to-morrow.'

Taking courage, I turned here to slip in. "Or perhaps Utah!"

Utah! cried the Colonel, springing to his feet, fumbling me with his eyes, and reaching out his long finger until my bones creaked like the cordage of a ship in a wintery midnight, "that gigantic trust to take away from the government. Take away! What said the Latin grammar? Why not Utah, Sir—Utah—and police garrisoned the whole territory. Ute consule is the example of the rule I would give Buchanan out of the Eton grammar as he no doubt yet preserves among his Pennsylvanian mutuals."

"It is certainly so, as you say, a very ignominious institution, this polygamy," I interrupted.

"It is almost as great an evil as to be said, Sir, I said no such thing." What, Aaron Burr quarrel with polygamy! Sir, I was an original Mormon. Why, I married the first woman Brigham Yoke Lake would have been my capital. I was always famous for polygamy. But, as I said, I was in advance of my age even in that practice.'

He caught my eye again as it rested upon a book on the table rack—the last Imbroglio volume by John C. Hamilton.

"Ah!" he continued, mencing me with his finger, "I know what you would say. That this book would not have appeared except for the General. I say it would! I acknowledge to you that I intended to kill him. I murdered him. I murdered him. All this stuff in the papers about my tenures is sheer bosh. As a murderer, this age would have placed me upon a pedestal. I would censured as sheer-pork. Lawyers would have carcased me; judges extended to me every indulgence; juries would have been fined for my entertainment.'

"My eye rested upon the next book, Randall's entertaining volume on Jefferson, and the sharp gray eyes saw that also, and the owner of it snapped his fingers contemptuously.

"There was another instance of my being in advance of the age. Such gentlemen as I practiced toward Jefferson would, in this day and generation of Congressmen, have earned me gold medals from the people. Sir, I was born in the time for intrigues, and I would have been the leader in all of them. Do you remember my Manhattan Water-works Charter with the concealed banking proviso? People said that was knavish. But nowadays I have learned that it was positively clever. Live to evade the Constitution?

The old gentleman was getting proxy, so I struck in with an audacious remark: 'But, Colonel, how about these letters in divers blue boxes, Smith, Wesley, and Lincoln, you know what all? Would this age tolerate that?'

"Yes!" he shouted.

"The Raven croaked 'Nevermore,' and I awoke.

"Am I not right, then, in confounding the country newspapers?

"Well, Boz, my dear friend," rejoined I, "you have had a wonderful dream, blank verse and all, after all, your friend the Colonel was more than half right in his observations."

"In your opinion," replied; but fell to abusing the coffee and chops, while I adjourned to pen, ink, and paper.

THE WAR IN MEXICO.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

CITY OF MEXICO, Jan. 19, 1858.

I HAVE only been here a day or two, but events have followed each other so rapidly that in seven months since I left Vera Cruz. You will see by the daily papers that the contest between Constitutionalists and the rival party has come to open fighting.

On 9th instant two proclamations, or pronunciamentos, were published by the Ministers of the Government, and straightway afterward, according to the custom of the country, barricades and other strong buildings began to be fortified and prepared to resist siege operations. This might have been expected from past and unmanning to the mob of commanding houses; heavily-laden carts followed each other in the streets, or were left a safe refuge in the country; merchants and bankers shut up their offices, and turned up such of their shutters as could be brought to a close; private citizens who could not leave the city hid in large stocks of provisions, and closed up doors and windows and shutter windows. Every body seemed to understand what was coming; there was no surprise expressed any where; a restlessness and strength-fights were calmly awaited as matters of course; and many speculated on the probable amount of the carnage. Clubs were formed in various parts of the city for the protection of the life and property of non-combatants; but most people seemed to trust little to these organizations. Those who had money or valuables hid or barricaded them as far down in the night-fingers as for out of harm's way as they could.

As early as Monday evening, 11th, shots were fired from the head-quarters of both parties; and accordingly, on Tuesday, and on the following day, the streets were completely deserted. Whenever an unfortunate wayfarer was seen, he was fired at from the tops of houses; and in this way it is believed many unwary foreigners have met their deaths. During the nights the streets were barricaded with sand-bags and stones, and in some places the barricade was strengthened by a piece of cannon, placed so as to sweep the street. But the favorite site for the fighting was on the house-tops. The flat roofs of the houses in the City of Mexico are, as you may be aware, a not uncommon retreat for the citizens during the hot nights of the summer months. They are well adapted, too, for military purposes. A few sand-bags convert them into so many forts, from whence a brisk fire can be kept up with very little risk to the gunners. Indeed, the only modes of attacking these house-top forts are either by assault from within the house, which would be utterly at variance with the

THE MORNING TRUCE FOR MARKETING.

THE HOUSE-TOP FIGHTING IN THE CITY OF MEXICO.

Mexican system of fighting, or by shelling them from a distance. The immense destruction of property which this mode of attack would involve deters the Government from resorting to it.

Throughout Tuesday and Wednesday sporadic firing was heard, with no greater result, that I can gather, than the loss of some eighty to one hundred lives on all sides, many of whom were, doubtless, stragglers in the streets. On Thursday morning, it being generally understood that the efforts of the diplomatic corps and other officious intermediaries had failed to suggest a compromise on which both parties could agree, a very heavy fire indeed was commenced from the Convent of San Augustin, which was occupied by the pronunciados, or insurgents. The Comonfort party were not at first in a position to return it with effect. But in the course of an hour or two a strong body of troops were led to an adjacent building, which they forced and occupied. From the roof of this they were able to return the rebels' fire with at least a semblance of effect. From that time till the present the fighting has been almost incessant. Both parties blaze away at each other with cannon and musketry till they are tired; but I don't think the shots do much damage, as a rule. There are about five thousand men engaged on either side; but all of these keep close under cover, and the marksmen are none of the best. Every now and then a lucky shot knocks over a poor fellow, as he leans over the breast-work of his house-top to look about him or take aim, and then the offices of the female ecclesiastics, nuns, or sisters of charity, are called into requisition. But these accidents are rare, in proportion to the amount of powder spent. The illustration on page 125 may convey some idea of this house-top fighting.

President Comonfort, whom I heartily admire for his pluck and gallantry, has offered to fight the pronunciados with any force they can raise if they will only march twenty miles from the city. But this challenge has not been accepted. The interest of rebels is naturally opposed to conservative measures; they would rather Comonfort were obliged to batter down half the city than not. As I write the cannon shots boom at very rapid intervals, and though life may be sparingly sacrificed there must be no slight damage done to houses and walls. If this conflict lasts much longer, Mexico may lose some of her finest edifices.

One of the most curious and characteristic incidents of the conflict is the morning truce which has just been declared. As while the fighting was going on no one ventured into the streets save at the risk of his life, many of the poorer inhabitants, who had not had forethought or means to lay in a stock of provisions, soon became reduced to the verge of starvation. For their sake, Comonfort, on the government side, and the pronunciado chiefs on the other, agreed that there should be every morning a truce for three hours to enable people to go to market, and hucksters and others to earn a livelihood. As might have been expected, the idea is very popular. The effect is that the business of the day is crowded into three hours. When the truce begins every body rushes into the streets to buy or to sell; every thoroughfare is thronged with market women and peddlers; housekeepers hasten to lay in an ample provision of victuals for the day's siege; poor mechanics hurry hither and thither trying to raise a few cents by the sale of some article of household furniture or gaudy apparel. The combatants on either side mingle in the throng, buy eatables and drinkables, and occasionally men from the hostile camps fraternize in the most ardent manner. In the general mêlée you may see plenty of sleek, fat priests, gliding unctuously through the crowd, and looking so pacific and amiable that, unless you knew the story, you would never suspect that they were the true originators of the anarchy and war now pending. At the close of the armistice, which is announced by the ringing of bells and lowering of flags, quickly followed by the rattle of musketry, a terrible scurry and race begin. Of course, many persons are taken by surprise, and some, I have reason to suppose, are shot before they can get home. The true plan, if you are so careless as to be overtaken away from home, is to slip into the first open door you find and make yourself at home till the truce begins next day. Those who have families, however, naturally object to being separated from them, and the confusion and scamper at the fatal hour are tremendous.

No one can tell where this will end. The longer the conflict lasts the worse it is for the government. If Comonfort had followed the dictates of his own judgment, he would have pursued the course which his enemies the Puros now advocate; he would have stripped the Church, and with the proceeds of the spoliation he would have been able to support a stable government for many years, and probably to regenerate Mexico. His heart failed him after he had begun the work, and now he is feeling the consequences. C. B.

Since the above letter was written we have received telegraphic advices of the end of the conflict, as follows:

On the morning of the 21st ult. Comonfort, having been abandoned by his troops, left the City of Mexico when the pronunciados entered the Palace and named a Corsigo de Notables as the head of the Government, and Notables elected Zeulaga as Provisional President of Puebla, Toluca, and other points within the radius of the city. He acknowledged the Government which had been organized and nominated its Ministers. They, however, up to the 7th inst., had not a single port, and were depending upon the clergy for support.

Juarazer, as President of the Supreme Court, is President of the Republic under the Constitution, and has called Congress together at Guanajanito, the great point of union of the Liberals, while Parodi de Clado and Artenja Degaledo, at several points, are preparing to unite and march against Mexico.

Lazare holds Orizaba, and the castle of Perote is in the hands of the Liberals.

Don Juan Alvarez is said to have all his forces under arms in the State of Guarero.

HEED NOT THE ERRING CHILD.

BY C. B. HANKINSON.

Heed not
The erring child,
Pass her by.
Heed not
Her accents wild,
Let her cry.

Hear not
Her dying moan,
Onward hie.
Hear not
Her parting groan,
Let her die.

Stop not
To shed a tear,
Nor come nigh.
Stop not
To mourn her here,
Pass her by.

Sound not
The tolling bell,
To the sky.
Sound not
Her funeral knell,
Out on high.

Leave her
Alone to rest,
Close her eye.
Calmly
On earth's cold breast,
Let her lie.

Down in
Her lonely bed,
Cover her o'er.
Leave her
With Him who said,
"Go, sin no more."

Miscellany.

VALUE OF INTELLECTUAL TRAINING.

"WHAT is the use of reading?" said Louis XIV. to the Duke de Montemar, the handsomest and wittiest of his courtiers.

"It has the same effect upon the mind, Sire, that your dainties have upon my cheeks."

The Duke was remarkable for a fine complexion.

Sir John Herschel says: "If I were to pray for a taste which should stand me under every variety of circumstance, and be a source of happiness and cheerfulness to me through life, and a shield against its ills, however things should go against me and the world frown upon me, it would be a taste for reading."

This taste for literature, this habit of cultivating the mind, should be formed in early life. The mental soil becomes so overgrown with weeds, if these are allowed to take root in the spring, that late in the summer neither flowers nor fruits have room to expand:

"A youth of folly, an old age of cards."

The young girl whose immortal faculties are all frittered away upon flounces and opera-music will grow into a vapid, silly old woman, shunned by the selfish, tolerated by the generous, and incapable of inspiring any higher sentiment than the compassion nearly allied to contempt. A butterfly belle may, at sixteen, attract "the white-gloved beaux;" but, alas! for a butterfly of sixty! Instances of such, and deplorable ones, too, we have seen; there are few more humiliating spectacles for our sex. Skill in the fine arts is delightful—a source of unfailing pleasure to its possessor and her circle of friends; but it is only in rare instances that nature gives talent for art worth the years of time and the very large amount of money necessary before the woman can attain an excellence that rewards her and her family for their sacrifices. The cultivation of elegant literature is in the power of every one who has leisure; and what young lady has not time on her hands? It is the cheapest, the easiest of accomplishments. Is it the least valuable? Which is the more desirable friend or companion? Which is capable of giving more entertainment at home or abroad, by the fireside or in the largest assembly? the woman who can warble half a dozen cavatinas as well as a tenth-rate opera-singer, or she whose well-stored, well-balanced mind is filled with the bright ideas of the best writers of every age; whose ample fund of knowledge is ready on every occasion; whose wit—not erratic or sarcastic, but properly curbed and tempered with kindness—gives brilliancy to old thoughts; and whose well-cultured judgment is able to produce new ideas? We can dance and sing but a few years at most; we can converse all our lives, unless our intellects have been weakened by years of habitual repression and factitious torpor.

THE WOMEN.

WOMEN are the real efficients that settle the great points of human existence. They exert their influence at a number of distinct epochs. They fetter us (males) alike before and after marriage; though many of them are wise enough to silence the clanking, and to conceal the iron. They rule us in infancy—in maturity—in age. No other hand knows the tender, adroit, and proper mode of binding our brows in pain and sickness. They stand by us in the last agonies with untiring and undismayed faithfulness. They soothe our dying moments. They shed the choicest tears of memory that water our turf. They are purer, less selfish, less destitute of true moral courage, more susceptible of kind and generous impressions, and far more so of religious feeling than men. Surely, then, every thing which concerns the education of this better-half of the species must be of intrinsic importance. If this world is ever to become a better and happier world, Woman, well educated, disciplined, and principled, sensible of her own influence, and wise and benevolent to exert it aright, must be the original mover in this great work.

STORY OF A JEW.

THE Countess D'Aulnoy, in her "Letters from Spain," relates this anecdote of an escape from the Holy Office of the Inquisition: "A Jew, named Ishmael, was put into the prison of the Inquisition of Seville, with his father, who was a Rabbin of their law. After four years of confinement, Ishmael, having made a hole, climbed up to the top of the tower, and, making use of ropes which he had provided, he slid down the wall with a great deal of danger; but having got down, he reproached himself for having abandoned his father. And without considering the risk he had run, after more than one manner, seeing his father and he were condemned, and were to be led, in a few days, to Madrid, with several others, to suffer there the greatest torment; yet this hindered not his determination, for he generously climbed up the tower, descended into the dungeon, drew from thence his father, made him escape before him, and got away himself."

VANITY.

"EVERY man," said Swift, "has just as much vanity as he wants understanding."

ENGLISH CREDULITY.

A GENTLEMAN informs us that, traveling in the West a few years since, he saw on one occasion about a thousand men and women in a grove, rolling hoops, flying kites, playing ball, shooting marbles, leaping, running, wrestling, boxing, rolling and tumbling in the grass, the women caressing dolls, and the men astride of sticks for horses, and the whole company intently engaged in all the sports of childhood. At last he ventured to ask what it meant. They told him that they were the little children to whom the Lord had promised His kingdom, and affected some surprise that he seemed not to have known that it was written, "Except ye be converted and become as little children," etc.

Again:

Not very long ago two clergymen of the Episcopal Church, traveling in Kentucky, called at a farmer's house, and not finding him at home, waited a while for his return, as night was near and they had occasion to claim his hospitality. By-and-by the farmer came home, and as he rode into the yard, or rather after he had dismounted, sang out to his man in a most extraordinary tone—

Go, give that horse some ears of corn,
He hasn't had any since I've been gone,
Glory Alleluia!

Then leading the two gentlemen into the house, he said—

Come in, my friends, and take something to eat;
Go, Katy, go, cook them a portion of meat:
Glory Alleluia!

It is easy for an American to see from the above (copied from an English paper) that the whole story about America has not yet been imparted to the people of Europe.

A RAPID TOILET.

ONCE more settled down we found time to be hungry, and accordingly ordered tea. Who could paint our despair when the men proclaimed that there was neither tea nor kettle to boil water in—both having been left behind! We had plenty of provisions with brandy and Ouralian nalifka, and these enabled us to make a meal. There is, however, nothing which can be compared to the beverage "that cheers but not inebriates," and makes the traveler supremely comfortable after a day of hard toil. We sat talking over our misfortune and the anticipated pleasures of the morrow, till past one o'clock; then lay down on the rocks and wrapped ourselves up for the night; but the joint effects of wine and smoke had given me a violent headache, which prevented me sleeping. A little before three o'clock I was up, and my toilet made, by rubbing the smoke out of my eyes, and giving myself a shake.—Atkinson's Oriental and Western Siberia.

WAIT A LITTLE LONGER!

Hoot away despair!
Never yield to sorrow;
The blackest sky may wear
A sunny face to-morrow.

LITTLE COURTESIES.

HOW much of meaning, of refinement, ay, of Christianity itself, there is in those little incidental attentions and politenesses which go a great way in making up the beauty of life!

We have known very many people—good, warm-hearted, and generous—who were capable of almost any act of self-sacrifice and abnegation, who would never have condescended to raise their hat to a lady, or offer her a glass of water, before drinking themselves. This is frequently the fault of a coarse-grained nature, but perhaps most often the result of early education. Indeed, we always think a man's manners are the "living epistle, known and read of all men," of his mother's training. Habitual politeness can only make a man a thorough gentleman—a woman a true lady. And this is most easily acquired in childhood, and in one's own household. If a boy be respectful and courteous to his sisters, he will be so to all women, so long as he lives; but if his intercourse with them be coarse, careless, abrupt, not softened and refined by a thousand nameless little attentions and graces, he will be rough, awkward—not fulfilling always the beautiful injunction of the apostle, "Be ye courteous to all men." Then, too, outward refinement influences and softens the inward character; for it is a law of our being that "expression intensifies the emotions and feelings."

But this work, after all, lies with every mother in the land—in the world; and we can only hope that these hints may influence some to consider it.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

IT was a beautiful compliment that Haydn, the musician, paid to a great female vocalist. Reynolds had painted her as Cecilia, listening to celestial music. Looking at it, Haydn said, "It is like her, but there is a strange mistake." "What is that?" asked Reynolds. "Why, you have painted her listening to the angels, when you ought to have represented the angels listening to her."

"Pompey, did you take that note to Mr. Jones?" "Es, massa." "Did you see him?" "Es, Sar, me did." "How did he look?" "Why, massa, he looked pooty well, 'sidering he's so blind." "Blind! what do you mean by that?" "Why, massa, when I was in de room gibbin de paper, he axed me whar my hat was, and perhaps you won't believe me, but massa, he war on de top of my hed de hull time."

During a recent trial in Essex county, Mass., a man was placed upon the stand to testify as to some boundaries of land. "How long have you lived in Gloucester?" asked the plaintiff's counsel, in a loud tone, approaching very near the witness. "Hey?" said the man, placing his hand behind an ear, and leaning forward. "How long have you lived in Gloucester?" repeated the lawyer, separating the words, with a tremendous roar. "Ah," replied the witness, "yes, about two rods." "You may step down," said the lawyer. "Yes," replied the witness, "it might be a little more."

An Indiana paper says that, during a trial in Lawrence court, a young lad who was called as a witness was asked if he knew the obligations of an oath, and where he would go if he told a lie. He said he supposed he would go where the lawyers went.

Hippolyte Lucas, a serious writer, in whom criticism finds no cause of attack but a long nose, was playing chess the other day with Louis Desnoyers at a moment when he was suffering from a cold in his head. "Blow your nose, my dear fellow," said Desnoyers, with considerable good-humor, as he saw him losing. "Blow it yourself," said Lucas. "It's nearer you than I."

"Pray, Mr. Professor, what is a periphrasis?" "Madam, it is simply a circumlocutory cycle of oratorical senorisity, circumscribing an atom of ideality, lost in a verbal profundity." "Thank you, Sir."

A courtly negro recently sent a reply to an invitation, in which he regretted "that circumstances repugnant to the acquiesce would prevent his acceptance to the invite."

The Marechal d'Etrees, aged one hundred and three, heard of the death of the Duke de Treame at the age of ninety-three. "I am very sorry for it," said the Marechal, "but not surprised; he was a poor worn-out creature; I always said that man would never live long."

The young lady who swooned on hearing it announced that a naked fact would be disclosed, came to on receiving positive assurance that it would be clothed in becoming language.

A man, named Gnio, of Cincinnati, cut off a young girl's hair, just for a joke, but was arrested and sent to jail for ten days on bread-and-water diet. It will puzzle him to discover, now, where the laugh comes in at his own joke.

"Oh, Johnny!" said one little boy to another, "let us play fighting! and you stand on the table; that's the fort; and I'll be the enemy, and undermine the fort, and blow it up—take the table by the legs, you know, and tip you over. Won't it be fun?" Johnny was doubtful, and suggested that Charley stand upon the table, or else he must decline playing.

The man who did not think it respectable to bring up his children to work, has just heard from his three sons. One of them was a driver on a canal, another had been taken up as a vagrant, and the third had gone to a public institution to learn the shoe business under a keeper.

Two gentlemen were chatting on the Boulevard; one was a great speculator, developing the plan of a magnificent project; the other a dazzled capitalist, ready to snap at the bait. He hesitated a little, but was just yielding, merely making a few objections for conscience' sake. Near these two paused a couple of youngsters of twelve years. They were looking into a tobacco shop close by, and one cries out to the other: "By the piper! I'd like to smoke a sou's worth of tobacco." "Well," said the other, "buy a sou's worth." "Ah! as luck will have it, I haven't the sou." "Hold on! I've got two sous." "That's the ticket! just the thing—one for the pipe and one for the tobacco." "Oh, yes, but what am I to do?" "You! Oh! you shall be the stockholder; you can spit." It was a flash of light. The capitalist thrust his hands into his pockets and fled. The speculator cast a furious look at the urchins and turned down the street.

Mr. Lyons of Scottsburg, Oregon, was so unfortunate as to lose his eyesight when a boy, and long before he came to Oregon. At the beginning of that shower of rain which commenced along the coast of Oregon early in November, 1856, and which lasted until the following April, a gentleman who had been indulging in something stronger than Oregon rain-water said to him,

"Mr. Lyons, you are the most fortunate man I've met with in Oregon."

"How so?" said Mr. Lyons.

"Why, Sir, you are unable to see what a miserable country it is that you are living in!"

"Does my son William, that's in the army, get plenty to eat?" said an old lady to a recruiting sergeant, the other day. "He sees plenty," was the laconic reply. "Bless his heart, then, I know he'll have it if he can see it; he always would at home."

"Why am de beloved ob my heart, Miss Dinah, de sunflower ob de hill, like a kind of cloth dey make in Lowell?" "I don't know, nigger. Why?" "Cos she's an unbleached she-ting."

If you are determined to commit suicide in consequence of poverty, do the deed early in the morning instead of late at night, and you will save the expense of three meals.

Drop by drop falls into the clear well-spring of youth the bitter water of experience, and there is no filterer this side of the grave that can restore the old purity.

A man well known for his uncommon avarice was boasting to Quin that he had lost a considerable sum at play without uttering a word of complaint. "No doubt," replied Quin, "deep sorrow is always silent."

Charles Bannister going into a pastry cook's shop with Parsons, the latter gentleman was very curious in examining an electric eel, and inquired of Bannister what sort of a pie he thought it would make. "A shock-ing one," was the reply.

A verdant Yankee expectant for office was advised the other day to apply for the consulship at the Lobos Islands, vice Guano removed. He had his letter written before he discovered the joke.

A coxcomb, teasing Dr. Parr with an account of his petty ailments, complained that he never could go out without catching a cold in his head. "No wonder," returned the doctor; "you always go out without any thing in it."

"Are those pure canaries?" asked a gentleman of a bird-fancier, with whom he was negotiating for a pair. "Yes, Sir," said the dealer, confidentially, "I raised them 'ere birds from this very canary seed."

In a recent ride to Peoria, says a Western editor, we discovered the following placard upon a gate-post:—"for Sall too story Hows And ben the Ouer Xpex to Go 2 california."

A person looking at some skeletons the other day, asked a young doctor present where he got them. He replied, "We raised them."

Dr. Jackson, the elder, of Boston, meeting his old friend Allen, Surgery (both part surgery) in the street the other day, accosted him with, "Well, Mr. Quibery, how much larger do you think your head is now?"

"Till I need no doctor," was the quick reply.

"And when did you need no one last?" inquired he Jr.

"Just eight-six years ago!" answered Mr. Quibery, adding the precise date of his birth.

An Episcopal clergyman, who rather likes a joke, was engaged to read the service for a brother minister, and was surprising to church a little heated on Sunday morning. A friend, seeing his discomfiture, inquired, saying, "Sir, why so hot?"

"I'm called in," replied he, "that he who reps may read."

Alexander Dumas receives twenty cents a line for his romances. One of his constant readers estimates that he has received hereupon a thousand francs for every volume. A cold perspiration stood upon the forehead of the creditor, "a little more and he would have paid."

The Syracuse Journal tells the following good story: "A man in a thousand miles from home having made an engagement, some years since, was called upon by a New York creditor, to whom he was indebted a trifling sum, with whom he proposed to settle at fifty cents on the dollar.

"The New York man replied, 'How can you pay fifty cents on the dollar? You owe me a hundred and fifty cents.'

"Well, never mind that,' said the unfortunate assignor, 'if my assets will not pay the fifty cents I will make up the deficiency out of my own pocket.'

"'Wait because of the New Yorker after that, deponent saith not."

The gallant brattler of the Troy Times describes "Mooted Issues" to be as

"Marrying a woman with the expectation of getting her with $20,000, and getting the value of a consumption to be presented with a bill for her last year's board."

In the year 1851 the Governor of Connecticut, Colonel Seymour, of Litchfield, was in the contest with our way of doing things, he wrote a letter:

"I can discover reason the office of governor shall pay twenty pounds annually, and no more. I have no desire to pay a penny; and whenever refuse the office of counselor or assistant, I'm promising."

A Mr. X. was about consulting the aide of a hero which he was very anxious to dispose of when a little urchin appeared, who innocently inquired

"Please, sir, which way you going to sell? Do one you built a fire under to make him draw?"

The bargain was at an end.

At a meeting of the friends and believers in spiritualism, not long since, among the "relics" of the departed, the spirit of Daniel Webster raged fearfully for rum. The great statesman, through the medium—a gray-headed negro—acknowledged that he had been a confirmed sot and that he had concealed many a cruet in the desk. His friends were astonished at the revelation, but the negro medium came, he was sorry to say, in his Dictionary.

There resides on Cure Hill, in Utica, an eccentric genius, reputed in the vicinities of Jersey and Whitestown, by my losing out of work but felt started on a tramp for a job. Having traveled a considerable distance on the road, he came near Sitterville, Jimmy's characters were reported to the post fingers to have a job, and he was offering a desire to test their quality, he thought he would call and try them. He accordingly went to the house and knocked a very genteel looking lady came to the door. After dinner and himself, the "Squire" wanted to know what Jimmy could do about this farm.

"Almost any thing you'd set me about, Sir."

"Well, Jimmy, if you can do that, I think you'll suit me. Are you a good cricker?"

"Pooh! it's mostly that," replied Jimmy; "but couldn't you give me some 'pot-door work?'"

Poverty is like a pestilence—catches everybody in the face and it will turn and flee from you, says an exchange. Yes, but like Davy Crockett's "coonskin," it's a nasty varmint to freeze to a fellow when it once gets a good hold, and the trick of the job is to make him go.

"John, can you tell me the difference between attraction of gravitation and attraction of cohesion?"

"Yes, Sir; attraction of gravitation is when a drunken man to the ground, and the attraction of cohesion prevents his getting up again."

A teacher had been explaining to his class the points of the compass, and all went down up in front, toward the north.

"Now, what's before you, Tommy?"

"The north, Sir."

"And what behind you, Tommy?"

"My coat-tail, Sir," said he, trying at the same time to get a glimpse of it.

When crossing-sweepers cease to touch their hats to you, consider that it is probably time for you to procure new clothes.

When reminded of their want of progress in agriculture and manufactures, the Spaniards generally reply, that Adam, once upon a time, requested leave to revisit this world—some half hundred years after his creation, and as angel commissioned to conduct him. On views of the new permanent, returned to the regions above, and so changed, so strange all seemed to him, that he felt at home nowhere until he came to his own grave, which he exclaimed he, "not an down here; every thing here is not as I left it!"

Some time ago the Westerly had an account of the trial of a man for stealing a dead-color hide. The Boston correspondent says:

"There is a mistake as to the place. The trial actually took place in this (the 13th) Judicial Circuit of the State of Illinois, and not in any court appointed by Commissioner Fuller, this State Attorney for this District, nor by any Judge presiding over the same. The counsel for the man of five dollars; the prisoner was finally discharged, and the jury discharged, and the prisoner from the court room, it became necessary to reduce it to the actual value of the till below its nominal value; and the defendant, of course, always the last to leave the room, set forth its fees in specie, and was at some small rate of discount in New York. After some consideration as to the admissibility of the testimony on that point, the arguments to the jury commenced. The attorney for the people beyond doubt, or proof, the value of the bill became the property of the alleged delinquent. On cross-examination of the defendant tried, 'might and main,' to steam the bill, and could not. Counsel for the defendant rested on the above fact, and contended that the property of this bill was the only point assailed; and, in addition to what you heard of his sayings, and the fact of the prisoner's having passed the bill at par, and called upon the jury to determine, under the oaths they had taken, as to whether the prisoner, when he stole the bill, took it at a value or not. The jury retired and sustained the latter with an eloquence and force which convinced the jury that the bill was stolen and had, prior to the theft, depreciated accordingly."

An English writer says, in his advice to young married women, that their mother Eve married a gardener. It might be added that the gardener, in consequence of his match, lost his situation.

It is said that Kentucky knows no law. This accounts for people making such a virtue of necessity.

"Now, George, you must divide the cake honorably with your brother Charles."

"Yes, mother, I will; but how shall I divide it honorably?"

"Why, George, it is one of the first things you learn at school. Don't you know the rule?"

The Rev. Dr. C——— was one of the earliest Presbyterian ministers in Upper Canada, and a man of talent and considerable learning, but somewhat given to the use of "big words," which sometimes led him into ridicule. On one occasion he was reading the lesson of the day, and came to "The Lord would take up a flyte-a-whirlwind." He paused, and said with strong Mission accent, "I don't know what it is—" Perhaps, said a gentleman of the congregation, "it was when a whirlwind is. Well, a quite-easier for a tea-saucer."

A lady friend of ours went into her kitchen one day, and said to her bright-eyed Irish cook, "Bridy, there is to be an eclipse of the moon to-night, which you can see if you sit up and watch for it." "Och, mum," she replied, "and is it the moon that you say is to be eclipsed. Sure, the moon's been quite dull enough for me. It's the sun in my country!"

A gay and gentlemanly fast fee from Exeter, was perhaps one of the most brilliant examples of conjugal tenderness upon the last century appeared. His husband had just been lead dying, and at length, as the clergyman of the parish approached to offer the holy visits, he found him in the disconsolate widow, as giving him an account of her husband's departure. "Sir," said she, "your dear man kept groaning and groaning, but he could not die: at last I got up, and I said I had got a pot of jam on the fire upon the drawer, so I took some of that and tied it in a handkerchief, and I put it to his nose, and he smelled it, and he said, 'Delicious and finger, and, poor dear! he went out like a lamb!'"

WHY DIDGEST THUS?

"Old man! old man! for whom dost thou thus grieve?"
I asked as I walked along:
For I saw in heart of London streets
A dark and busy throng.

Then a stranger, with a sad but a wilder with
Of the parted soul, to tie,
Which this mortal, possessed of living men
Who would pass him idly by!

So I said, "Old man, for whom dost thou thus grieve,
In the heart of London here?"
And the disordered voice of the digger replied—
"We're laying a gas-pipe down."

A reporter visited Gooster in the tragedy of King Lear, at Boston, and was much surprised to see suddenly dressed, and in the midst of the storm, no hood, who was singing, "Softly!" to cheerlier. He got on famously, until the scene came to be laid on the heath, and then he was obliged to ask permission to read the rest of his part.

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, Feb. 15, 1858.

THE foreign trade of the port compares as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Feb. 13, 1858	$2,026,100	$958,150
Corresponding week, 1857	1,045,000	1,004,000
Decrease	$9,018,776	$780,046

The specie movement was small, about $20,000 being sent to the Havana, and $10,000 to Europe. Since last Saturday the California steamer arrived with $1,343,207. The exchange market got down to 9½ per cent, and the exchange on Sargand is falling to a point at which it will pay specie to go out.

Our advices from England, per Niagara, at Halifax, state that the money market was somewhat easier at the Bank of England to 4 per cent.; in the discount market, however, rates were firm, and 4 a 5 per cent. was allowed on deposits by the discount houses.

The course of the stock market here continues upward, with no prospect of a check.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, February 15, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets during the past week were generally lower. The receipts of Western produce were limited, while the demand was more extensive, and prices were firm, and in some instances the sales effected at somewhat higher prices.....Cotton was very actively sought after, and 2,000 bales were disposed of. Advices from England having favorably affected the market for it.....Breadstuffs were in very active request, and prices sellers.....Provisions were moderately inquired for at former prices.....Ashes, Hides and Naval Stores were more sought after, and such advanced considerably.....Wool, per, yet prices were in fairly active demand, at full rates.....Hemp, Tobacco, and Wool were quiet, though the market had undergone advantage. The sales of Liverpool Grain at Liverpool, during the week ending Feb. 6, $1,421,218 against $3,450,922 the corresponding week in 1857. The stock of Grain in store at Liverpool on the 6th inst. $6,916,200 against $18,421,425 same time in 1857.....The receipts of Breadstuffs, Provisions, and Naval Stores were unproductive of any remarkable alterations..... We appear to have entered upon a season in fairly active, at full rates.

Receipts for extra State Flour, per bbl. $4 60 @ $4 69
Superfine to fancy Western do. 4 15 " 4 50
Extra Genesee, per bbl. 4 60 " 4 75
Fancy to extra Genesee, per barrel. 4 70 " 5 00
Superfine to extra Ohio, per barrel. 4 15 " 4 50
Mixed to Extra Southern, per barrel. 4 80 " 5 00
Fancy to extra Southern, per bbl. 5 05 " 5 50
Corn Meal, per barrel. 3 00 " 3 50
Rye Flour, per barrel. 3 90 " 4 00
Wheat, per bushel. 1 50 " 1 60
New Crop Corn, per bushel. 0 67 " 0 67
Rye, per bushel. 0 90 " 0 92
Barley, per bushel. 0 70 " 0 78
Barley Malt, per bushel. 0 80 " 0 84
State Oats, per bushel. 0 41 " 0 44
Southern Oats, per bushel. 0 37 " 0 38
Southern Oats, per bushel. 0 37 " 0 38
Mess Pork, per barrel. 16 75 " 16 75
Mess Pork, per barrel. 14 75 " 15 00
Country Mess Beef, per barrel. 9 00 " 9 50
Prime Mess Beef, per barrel. 10 00 " 10 50
Prime Mess Beef, per barrel. 11 00 " 11 50
Beef Hams, per barrel. 14 00 " 15 00
Cut Meats, per lb. 0 6 " 0 7
Lard, per pound. 0 10 " 0 11
Tallow, per pound. 0 8 " 0 8
Western Butter, per pound. 11 " 0 16
State Butter, per pound. 0 16 " 0 20
Rice, per 100 pounds. $ 3 75 @ $ 3 75
Cheese, per pound. 0 8 " 0 12
Cuba Sugar, per pound. 0 4 " 0 5
Cuba Molasses, per gallon. 0 30 " 0 32
New Orleans Sugar, per pound. 0 4 " 0 5
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon. 0 30 " 0 32
Clover Seed, per pound. 0 6 " 0 6
Oolong Teas, per pound. 0 0 " 0 0
Domestic Whiskey, per gallon. 0 0 " 0 0
Nuts Hay, per 100 pounds. 0 0 " 0 0
Hops, Crop of 1857, per pound. 0 0 " 0 0
Kentucky Tobacco, per pound. 0 0 " 0 0
Seed Leaf Tobacco, per pound. 0 0 " 0 0
Ass. Hemp, undressed, per ton. 0 0 " 0 0
Ass. Hemp, dressed, per ton. 0 0 " 0 0
American Flaxes Wool, per pound. 0 0 " 0 0
Saxony Fleece Wool, per pound. 0 0 " 0 0
Pulled Wool, per pound. 0 0 " 0 0
Spanish Wool, per pound. 0 0 " 0 0
Peruvian Wool, per pound. 0 0 " 0 0
Chilian Wool, per pound. 0 0 " 0 0
Tallow Tree, per pound. 0 0 " 0 0

Freights were moderately active, and rates were easier. To Liverpool, Cotton, 3-16d. @ 5-8d. per pound; Flour, 1s. 3d. @ 2s. per barrel; Grain, 4½d. @ 5d. per bushel. To London, Flour, 1s. 6d. @ 2s. 6d. per barrel; Beef, 5s. @ 6s. per tierce; and Heavy Goods, 30s. @ 40s. per ton. For other ports proportionate figures. The number of vessels, of all classes, in port on Saturday was 450.

The Live Stock Markets were less extensively supplied with beeves on Wednesday, and through the demand was very brisk, prices were somewhat firmer..... Milch Cows were in moderate request, and sales were effected at $45 @ $55 per head, as to quality. Sheep and Lambs were in pretty fair request, and rather higher prices were obtained. Swine advanced, and were in proved demand at strengthening quotations. The receipts at the Chapel of Live Stock during each of the last two weeks compare thus:

	Week ending	Week ending
	Feb. 8.	Feb. 15.
Beeves	2,242	2,109
Milch Cows	116	134
Veal Calves	93	93
Sheep and Lambs	8,804	6,988
Swine	1,200	1,200

Of the Forty-fourth Street Market supply of Beeves last Wednesday there were received from

New York	407	Virginia	167
Ohio	537	Indiana	85
Illinois	104	Connecticut	9

The range of prices according to the actual rules of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday was as follows:

Poor to premium Beeves, per pound	$ 7 @ $ 14
Common to extra Sheep, per head	3 00 " 6 50
Veal Calves, per pound	5 " 7½
Milch Cows, per head	30 " 60
" per pound	5 " 11
Live Swine, per pound	5 " 6½
Dressed "	6 " 8

The Country Produce Markets continue moderately active.....Apples, Cabbages, Cranberries, and Squashes were in fair request, and prices were firmly supported. Other commodities are essentially unchanged in value.

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT OF PROVISIONS AT MARKET.

Beef, Mess	$7 50	@ $8 75
Apples, dried, per pound	3	" 4
Peaches, dried, per pound	6	" 7
Plums, dried, per pound	12	" 13
Hickory Nuts, per bushel	2 50	" 2 75
Chestnuts, per bushel	2 00	" 2 50
Pecans, per bushel	2 50	" 3 00
Cranberries, per barrel	4 00	" 4 50
Potatoes, per bushel	1 75	" 1 87
" per basket	15	" 1 00
Onions, per barrel	4 00	" 4 50
Onions, per barrel	1 75	" 2 00
Cheese, per pound	8	" 12
Rosemary, per barrel	2 50	" 3 00
Sage, per barrel	1 00	" 1 50
Hops, per pound	1 25	" 1 50
Hay, per dozen	1 00	" 1 25
Parsnips, per barrel	1 00	" 1 25
Carrots, per barrel	1 25	" 1 50
Turnips, per barrel	1 00	" 1 25
Celery, per dozen	50	" 87
Beets, per barrel	1 00	" 1 25
Eggs, Limed, per dozen	10	" 11
Eggs, Fresh, per dozen	18	" 20
Chickens, per pound	11	" 13
Turkeys, per pound	11	" 13
Geese, per pound	11	" 13
Pigeons, per dozen	2 75	" 3 75
Venison, Saddle, per pound	12	" 14
Partridge, per pair	1 00	" 1 12
Rabbits, per pair	50	" 62
Hares, per pair	75	" 87
Squirrels, each	8	" 8
Beef, Corned, per pound	6	" 7
Beef Head, per pound	17	" 18

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FRESH AND IMPORTANT BOOKS
JUST ISSUED
BY HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the following Works by Mail, postage paid (for any distance within the United States under $300 dollars), on receipt of the Money.

ISAAC TAYLOR'S WORLD OF MIND. The World of Mind: A Supplement to the Essay on the Spirit of Christ. Author of "Wesley and Methodism." "Loyola and Jesuitism," "Elements of Thought," &c. &c. 1 vol. 12mo. Muslin, $1 00.

FOWLER'S ENGLISH GRAMMAR FOR SCHOOLS. The English Grammar; or, Lessons in Grammar, Parsing, and Analysis; Being an Introduction to the Author's English Grammar. By Wm. C. Fowler, LL.D., Professor of Rhetoric in Amherst College. 12mo, Sheep, $1 00.

FOWLER'S ENGLISH LANGUAGE, in its Elements and Forms. With a History of its Origin and Development. With a full Grammar. Designed for use in Colleges and Schools. New and Revised Edition. By William C. Fowler, LL.D., Professor of Rhetoric in Amherst College. 8vo, Muslin, $1 50; Sheep, $1 75.

GIESELER'S CHURCH HISTORY. A Text-Book of Church History. By Dr. John C. L. Gieseler. Translated from the Fourth Revised German Edition. Vol. II. Containing A.D. 1517 to the Present Time. By Francis Cunningham, LL.D., and Rev. Alexander Hall, M.A. A New American Edition. Revised and Corrected, with Additions, by Henry B. Smith, Professor in the Union Theological Seminary, New York. 8vo, Sheep, $2 50.

THE SPANISH CONQUEST IN AMERICA, and its Relation to the History of Slavery, and to the Government of Colonies. By Arthur Helps. Somerset Magazine. 3 vols. Large 12mo, Muslin, $2 00.

DR. LIVINGSTONE'S SOUTH AFRICA. Missionary Travels and Researches in South Africa; Including a Sketch of Sixteen Years' Residence in the Interior of Africa, and a Journey from the Cape of Good Hope to Loando on the West Coast; thence across the Continent, down the River Zambesi to the Eastern Ocean. By David Livingstone, LL.D., D.C.L. Two Maps by Arrowsmith, a Portrait, and Several Numerous Illustrations. 8vo. Muslin, $3 00.

BARTH'S NORTH AND CENTRAL AFRICA. Travels and Discoveries in North and Central Africa. Being a Journal of an Expedition undertaken under the Auspices of H.B.M.'s Government, in the Years 1849–55. By Henry Barth, Ph.D., D.C.L., Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society, &c. &c. With Maps and Numerous Illustrations. 3 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $6 00; Sheep, $7 50; Half Calf, $9 00. Or, in 3 Volumes, 12mo, Muslin, $2 25 per volume.

HARPER'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE.
THE UPPER MISSISSIPPI.
THE HISTORIC MUSE—Epic Legendary.
MY HUGUENOT FRIENDS.
THE TIMES.
Illustrations.—The Daily.
THE PICTURE OF THE MONTH.
Illustrated by Eighteen Engravings.
THE HARMONIOUS BLACKSMITH.
Illustrated by Four Engravings.
THE EASY CHAIR. By Charles Eliot Norton. (Concluded.)
PROGRESS OF WOMANHOOD.
WESTMORELAND.
THE CAPTAIN'S DILEMMA.
A PAPER OF ALL SORTS.
SERIES OF POEMS.
EVERY WHIT HER OWN CONTRADICTOR.
MY WIFE AND I.
Illustrations.—By W. M. Thackeray.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—1. Dancing Lessons.—Gossip At Home.—Gossip Abroad.—Gossip Abroad.
Illustrations.—Harriet Hunt.
CHAPTER XIV. Harriet Hunt (Concluded).
CHAPTER XV. A Brother Discovered.
Illustrations.—Harriet Hunt.
CHAPTER XVI. In which Gumbo shows Skill with the Left Hand.
THE STATUE IN CLAY.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERARY NOTICES. Books of the Month.
HISTORY OF ENGLAND.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
SUBSTANCE AND SHADOWS.
Illustrations.—Drawing for a Poem.—A Friend.—A Country Fig.—Queen Fig.—Hands.—A Banana.—The Calf.—The Cow.—Cow and Calf.—Cow and Cocoanut.—A Young Monkey.—An Old Woman.—Allsopp's Pale Ale.
HARPER'S WEEKLY.
Illustrations.—Carriage Customs and Boys' Dress.—Small Arms.—Cotton Plant.—Cotton Field.

MR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL. "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous Illustrations by the Author, commenced in the January Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. It is printed from early sheets, advance of the publication in monthly parts in England, for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) . 2 00
And an extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

Postage.—HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Twenty-four Cents a year.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA. Acts with extraordinary potency upon the fluids of the body, expelling them all from disorganizing matter, and as a restorative, disinfectant, and gentle purgative stands unrivalled. 1 dose.

Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 Fulton street, New York.

INCREASED ATTRACTIONS!

BULWER, THACKERAY, CHARLES READE, MRS. GASKELL, AND TWENTY OTHERS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

MR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL, "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous Illustrations by the Author, commenced in the January Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. It is printed from early sheets advance of the publication in monthly parts in England—for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST FAMILY NEWSPAPER

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER: $2 50 A YEAR.

BULWER'S BRILLIANT ROMANCE, entitled "THE CAXTONS," will be issued in HARPER'S WEEKLY in the masterpiece of this polished, witty, and learned writer. Illustrations of characters with the author's approval. HARPER'S WEEKLY simultaneously with the publication in London.

TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Two Years $3 00
One Copy for One Year 2 00
Two Copies for Two Years 5 00
Two Copies for One Year 3 00
Five Copies for One Year 7 50
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 40 00
An Extra Copy of HARPER'S WEEKLY for every Club of Ten or Twenty-five Subscribers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $2 25, is now ready.

Volumes I. and II. of HARPER'S WEEKLY, each containing Numbers bound, at Fifty Cents each. TWENTY-FIVE per cent. discount to Booksellers who buy to sell again by the dozen.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" will be furnished to one address for One Dollar a year each.

Numbers from the commencement of both the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY can still be supplied. Specimen copies furnished gratuitously. Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest Club rates.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" must be paid at the office where they are received. When prepaid quarterly in advance, the Postage is Thirty-two Cents a year on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty-six Cents a year on the WEEKLY.

Postage upon HARPER'S WEEKLY will not be in addition to their Subscription. Postmaster Cannot be required to collect Postage on the WEEKLY, and it is Unlawful to do so.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

MASTER SPARROW. "Look there, Tom! Young Fred is asleep!"
MASTER SPRAT. "Yes! Poor Little Beggar! What a shame it is to keep such a mere Child as that up so late!"

MR. LIGHTTOUCH does not dance, himself; but is always much gratified to see the Young Folks enjoy themselves. But, whether it is that Forty Summers (? Sixty) have impaired his vision, he can not, for the life of him, discern any thing but some Black Coats struggling frantically in a sea of white Muslin.

A SCENE IN CONGRESS—SPECTATOR'S GALLERY.

FIRST PROFESSOR OF THE NOBLE ART OF SELF DEFENCE. "I tell yer, Bill, them Republicans is in the chaps to strike out with their left."

SECOND PROFESSOR OF DITTO. "Well, Jim, I won't contradict yer; but if ever I seed better play of the Muslins nor them Co'lition chaps is making, yer, I'm an eyetic."

WHEELER & WILSON MANUFACTURING CO'S

SEWING MACHINES,

OFFICE 343 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Agencies throughout the Union.

Send for a Circular.

RICH CLOTH COVERS FOR VOLUME I. OF HARPER'S WEEKLY ARE NOW READY. PRICE FIFTY CENTS.

The Trade and Booksellers will be supplied at TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT. DISCOUNT.

PHONOGRAPHY; or, PHONETIC SHORTHAND. For Alphabet, Specimen Pages of the Phonographic Magazine for 1858, and List of Works (free), Address BENN PITMAN, Cincinnati, O.

THE FIRST VOLUME OF HARPER'S WEEKLY,

Handsomely bound in Cloth and Half Morocco, may be had of the following Booksellers:

IN BOSTON,
A. WILLIAMS & CO.,
JOHN J. DYER & CO.,
FEDERHEN & CO.

IN PHILADELPHIA,
J. WINCH,
W. B. ZIEBER.

IN PITTSBURGH,
HUNT & MINER.

IN NEW ORLEANS,
J. C. MORGAN,
B. M. NORMAN.
GEO. ELLIS.

IN ST. LOUIS,
JAMES M. CRAWFORD,
E. R. WOODWARD.

IN CINCINNATI,
H. W. DERBY,

And of Booksellers generally throughout the United States and Canada.

5000 COPIES ISSUED!

THE CITY OF THE GREAT KING; or, Jerusalem as it was, as it is, and as it is to be. By J. T. BARRAU, Missionary to Jerusalem.

This is the most complete, reliable, and valuable work on Jerusalem, Ancient, Mediæval, Modern, and Millenial, ever yet offered to the public. It is elegantly illustrated with Chromographic Illuminations in ten oil colors, Panoramic Views, Steel Engravings, &c. It is the result of Investigations made during three and a half years' residence in the Holy City, with facilities for procuring researches never before enjoyed.

Nearly 600 pages 8vo.

Cloth embossed, $2.50. Morocco gilt, $3.00.

By mail, post-paid.

JAS. CHALLEN & SONS, Publishers,
Dufield Buildings, Philadelphia.

$150 WILL PAY FOR BOARD AND TUITION in the PLUMBING FEMALE COLLEGE one year. Address Rev. WILLIAM H. GILDER, A.M., President, at Flushing, Long Island.

THE FULTON DEMOCRAT, LEWISTOWN, ILLINOIS.

FUN!!!

HARPER'S COMICALITIES.

SELECTED FROM DRAWINGS BY LEECH, DOYLE, AND OTHERS.

CONTAINING THREE HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS.

FIRST SERIES
PRICE TWENTY-FIVE CENTS.

For Sale by all Booksellers and Periodical Dealers.

DUPUY'S NEW PERFUME FOR THE SEASON.

KISS-ME-QUICK.

Distilled from FRAGRANT TEUFS.
E. DUPUY, Chemist, 689 Broadway.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1858, by Eugene Dupuy, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the U. S. for the Southern District of New York.

CRANBERRY CULTURE.—The Subscribers have issued a Circular on the Cranberry and its Culture, and will forward the same to applicants free of charge. Also will forward their Treatise on Cranberry Culture, for the States of the United States. Price $5 per 1000. Address SULLIVAN DATES & CO., Bellingham, Norfolk Co., Mass.

WING'S FARINA CRACKERS, highly celebrated for their good flavoring and healthful properties as an article of food, may be procured, at Wholesale, only of

A. N. THOMPSON & CO.,
Nos. 324 and 326 Pearl-st., New York.

THE REAL FRANGIPANNI PERFUME is manufactured only by Messrs. PIESSE & LUBIN, of London, and they take this opportunity to caution purchasers against imitations, of which there are many, however, approach in any degree the exquisite fragrance as made by P. & L.

Their agents for the United States, E. DUPUY, 689 Broadway, sole Depôt.

FLORIMEL. A NEW PERFUME FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF.

This exquisite bouquet is so highly concentrated that a single drop will leave its peculiar and delightful fragrance upon the handkerchief for many hours.

Prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston, and for sale by all Druggists.

DEBIT AND CREDIT. A NOVEL. Translated from the German of GUSTAV FREYTAG. By L. C. Wan's Preface, by CHRISTIAN CHARLES JOSIAS BUNSEN, D.D., D.C.L., Ph.D. 12mo. Muslin, $1 00.

☞ A fresh delivery of this extraordinarily successful work, pronounced by the Chevalier Bunsen to be the most popular German novel of the age, is just ready, and may be obtained of the booksellers generally throughout the country, or HARPER & BROTHERS will send it, post-paid, to any part of the United States under 3000 miles, on receipt of One Dollar.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

G. EVANS,
PUBLISHER AND ORIGINATOR OF THE GIFT BOOK ENTERPRISE.

Has just issued a complete Catalogue of NEW AND POPULAR BOOKS, suitable for the requirements of Libraries, which he will send to any part of the country, with $500 worth of Gifts with each $1000 worth of Books sold. All Books sold at Publishers' lowest prices. New Books received as soon as issued. A Gift worth from 25 cents to $100 will be delivered with each book sold at the time of sale.

Orders from the country promptly filled, and the goods forwarded by express or mail on the same day the order is received.

Liberal inducements to Country Agents.
Address G. G. EVANS,
439 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

HOME ADVICE. With Whispers to Home. A Social Book. By a Lady. With Notes for Dyspeptics. By a Physician. 12mo. Muslin, 75 cents.

HOME ADVICE. A RECENT BOOK just published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York, contains, in the first place, Minute Directions for an Elementary Style of Cookery; then the most economical Mode of Doing Things, and closes with a Physician's Directions for the Treatment of most of the Ailments that occur in a family, the Nursing, Dressing, and Feeding of Children, and the Management of Servants, so that the whole Philosophy, Wisdom, Fun, Sprees, and the like. Nothing is wanting to render it a Complete Manual of HOME ADVICE. Its study would not only give us the luxuries and comforts of life at the least possible cost, but save us a Doctor's Bill in innumerable instances.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of Seventy-five Cents.

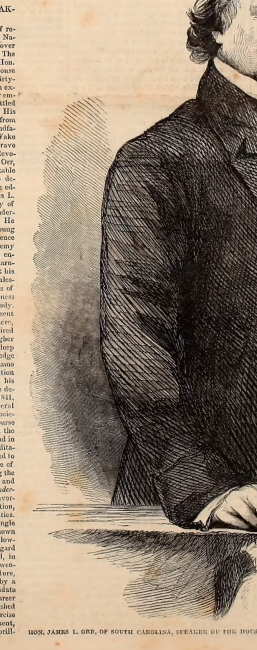
VOL. I. OF HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in CLOTH EXTRA, is now ready. Price $3 50

N.B. This Volume can not be sent by Mail on account of its weight. It will be sent by Express, if so desired, freight to be paid by the Purchaser.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. II.—No. 61.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.



CONTENTS

OF THE PRESENT NUMBER.

I. Speaker Orr, with a Portrait.
II. Editorials.
III. The Lounger.
IV. Bohemian Waltz and Tolka.
V. Our Single-Handed, with three beautiful Illustrations.
VI. A natural Castle in Pennsylvania, with an Illustration.
VII. The American Horse-tamer in England, with an Illustration.
VIII. Literary.
IX. Domestic Intelligence.
X. Foreign News.
XI. The Marriage of the Princess Royal of England, with two splendid Illustrations.
XII. What will he do with it? by Sir E. Bulwer Lytton.—Continued.
XIII. The late Bishop Waugh, with a Portrait.
XIV. The Pet of the Law.
XV. Travel Notes in Bible Lands, with two Illustrations.
XVI. Miscellany.
XVII. Things Wise and Otherwise.
XVIII. Financial, Commercial, and Market Reports.
XIX. Comicalities.

HON. JAMES L. ORR, SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE.

IT is a coincidence worthy of remark that both branches of our National Legislature are presided over by comparatively young men. The subject of this sketch, the Hon. James L. Orr, Speaker of the House of Representatives, is in his thirty-sixth year. Mr. Orr is of Irish extraction. His paternal ancestor emigrated to this country, and settled in Pennsylvania about 1730. His maternal ancestors came also from Ireland about 1786. His grandfather, John Orr, a native of Wake County, North Carolina, was a brave soldier and true patriot in the Revolutionary War. Christopher Orr, his father, was a highly respectable and successful merchant, who devoted his means liberally to the education of his children. James L. Orr was born on the 12th day of May, 1822, at Craytonville, Anderson District, South Carolina. He began his studies when quite young at a country school, from whence he was transferred to an academy at Anderson, and while there, engaged in the ardent pursuit of learning, he still found time to assist his father as a book-keeper and salesman, thus early blending habits of practical industry and usefulness with those of research and study. In his eighteenth year he was sent to the University of Virginia, where, by constant application, he acquired great proficiency in the higher branches of learning, laying deep the foundations of future knowledge and usefulness, while at the same time he won an enviable reputation among his fellow-students by his manly, generous, and honorable deportment. He left college in 1841, and devoted two years to general improvement, by mingling in society and pursuing a judicious course of reading. In 1842 he entered the law-office of Judge Whitner; and in 1843, after passing a highly creditable examination, he was admitted to the bar. He began the practice of the law at Anderson, and during the first year he also established and edited a newspaper called the Anderson Gazette, thus pursuing his favorite system of full mental occupation, to the exclusion of idle frivolities. Mr. Orr still found time to mingle with, and became thoroughly known to, and appreciated by his fellow-citizens. As a proof of their regard and confidence, he was elected, in 1844, when a little more than twenty-two years old, to the Legislature, from the Pendleton District, by a larger vote than any other candidate in the State received. His career in the Legislature was distinguished by usefulness through the exercise of sound sense and good judgment, rather than by any attempts at brilliant display; and yet his very first speech, which was in opposition to a movement intended to commit South Carolina to the doctrine of Nullification in regard to the tariff of 1842, gave him at once the reputation of an eloquent and able debater, and placed him in a leading position. His speech was received with applause throughout the State, and characterized as "one of the boldest, plainest, and most sensible of the whole discussion." Mr. Orr also advocated with great earnestness and ability the choice of presidential electors by the people—the practice being then, as now, in South Carolina, to elect them by the Legislature; thus in defiance of custom and prejudice, giving a pledge in the beginning of his career of his devotion to popular rights.

In 1848 Mr. Orr became a candidate for Congress. His opponent, who took the field some months in advance of him, was a lawyer of great talents and high reputation. They were both Democrats, and the contest resolved itself into one of personal popularity. After an animated and exciting canvass, Mr. Orr was elected by 700 majority—a flattering proof of the appreciation in which he was held, and a high tribute to his ability and worth. From that time to the present he has continued to hold his seat, being re-elected at the close of each term without opposition.

When Mr. Orr entered the Thirty-first Congress that body presented a brilliant array of talent. In the Senate were Calhoun, Clay, Webster, Cass, Douglas, and Benton; in the House Winthrop, Toombs, Stephens, M'Dowell, Bayly, and others of eminent ability. Among them the young statesman soon assumed a position which commanded both respect and esteem. He spoke seldom, but was always listened to with attention, and rapidly won his way to distinction. The principal speech made by him in this Congress was on the question of the Slavery Question, which he earnestly deprecated. His speech is marked by a high tone, calm, cogent reasoning, and sound constitutional doctrine.

It was during this Congress that the Compromise Measures were passed. Most of their features were opposed by Mr. Orr, on what he considered Constitutional grounds. These measures were much condemned in his State; and when he returned home in March, 1851, he found a formidable party organized in favor of secession from the Union by South Carolina alone. A Constitutional Convention had been called, and a majority of the delegates elected were pledged to vote for secession. Mr. Orr had been opposed in the beginning to the call for this Convention, taking ground that, if wrong had been done to the South, it was impolitic for her to attempt to redress it. The delegates elected from his own Congressional district to this Convention were two to one in favor of secession. He did not hesitate, nevertheless, to proclaim boldly his opposition to their policy, and, in a public speech at Pickens, a few days after his return, he warned his constituents eloquently and earnestly, against the disasters which would inevitably follow. The "Southern Rights Association" which had been formed the previous winter determined on holding a general convention in Charleston, which convention Mr. Orr attended as a delegate from Anderson. This body was distinguished for its intelligence and moral worth; and it was believed that the extreme opinions of the ultra party were largely in the ascendency. Mr. Orr introduced the resolution upon which the minority founded their report, and sustained it in a patriotic, fearless, and manly speech. Only about thirty members, out of 450, supported his views. He did not, however, quail before mere numbers, or shrink from his honest convictions. He maintained his position; his speech was published by the co-operation party, and circulated throughout the State; it produced the most powerful effect; and in October following, Mr. Orr and his colleague, Colonel Irby, were elected to the Southern Congress, which had been proposed, by an overwhelming majority over two talented and popular gentlemen, the candidates of the secession party: the majority in the State for Mr. Orr's party being over 8500! The welfare of the country was at stake, and the occasion called forth all his energies and self-sacrificing devotion.

That the crisis was one full of alarm and danger must be admitted even by those farthest from the scene, and most disposed to deny both the right and power of a State to secede; and that Mr. Orr, in the very opening of a brilliant political career, hazarded his future honors and prospects to a sense of right and duty, entitles him to the regard of every true lover of the Union. His triumph was highly honorable to himself, and fixed him more firmly than ever in the esteem and affections of his constituents.

The Congressional career of Mr. Orr, which a want of space prevents us from noticing more in detail, has been both a brilliant and a useful one. Always sustaining his positions with eloquence and force of argument, and exhibiting great fairness in debate, he has commanded attention, and exercised a powerful influence over the questions of the day. His habits of thorough investigation and analysis, and his tenacious adherence to his convictions of right, have frequently placed him at the head of important committees; and his reports are among the ablest in our legislative records. As chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, during the discussion of the most important and exciting measures, he displayed so much promptness, firmness, and intelligence in his decisions that he won the confidence and respect of men of all parties; and at the commencement of last Congress he was almost unanimously selected by the

HON. JAMES L. ORR, OF SOUTH CAROLINA, SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY WHITEHURST, OF WASHINGTON, D. C.]

Democrats as their candidate for Speaker. His party were, however, in the minority, and his election failed. When the present session of Congress opened Mr. Orr was nominated, without opposition, and elected its presiding officer. So far he has justified the expectations at his friends and of the party which placed him in the chair. In the fulfillment of the duties of his present position Mr. Orr will doubtless add honorably to the reputation he now enjoys. He is not wise a man not to perceive that while fidelity to party was the lead which helped him to rise to his present height, impartial neutrality will now serve his fame and ambition better.

The personal appearance of Mr. Orr is bold and striking. He possesses a manly form, a dignified bearing, a kindly and courteous manner, and a cheerful disposition. His countenance is open and intellectual; and his phrenological developments indicate promptness and decision of character combined with considerable powers of analysis.

Colonel Orr married, in 1843, Miss Mary Jane Marshall, daughter of Dr. Samuel Marshall, of Abbeville District.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1858.

MARCH OF IMPERIAL DESPOTISM.

EVENTS point to the prospect of a new revolution in France. Exasperated at the late nefarious attempt upon his life, and fortified by the unanimous expression of sympathy which that event elicited from the civilized world, the Emperor is pushing his despotism beyond the limits of human forbearance. Not satisfied with having crippled the press, he is now fast crushing it out altogether. Journal after journal is suspended upon pretenses which are absolutely ridiculous. One paper has been "warned" for stating that "the telegraph announced the Emperor's speech was applauded," instead of assuming the responsibility of the statement and asserting that "the Emperor's speech was applauded." Another has been suppressed for simply alluding to the historical fact that the Bourbons were often attacked in the public newspapers altogether.

It may seem absurd to talk of the liberty of the citizen in France. It would seem, however, from a bill now before the French Legislature, that the constitution of that land will bear some shadow of liberty to the French citizen, and that that shadow it is now proposed to take away. The bill in question authorizes the arrest and punishment of any person who shall have carried on a correspondence with any one at home or abroad, by which the interests might be endangered or brought into contempt; of any one who shall have sold detonating powder or "destructive machines" without a license; of any one "whom important circumstances may point out as dangerous to public safety." It is difficult to conceive an individual who might not, if the Government desired, be convicted and thrust into prison under such a law as this. It would simply amount to a legal declaration that the people of France, as a people, held their lives and liberty at the good will and pleasure of the Emperor.

Napoleon has not adopted this course without counting the cost. He foresees the struggle he may have to wage, and has prepared according-ly. He has divided France into five great military divisions, with a corps d'armée to act as police in each. At the head of each division he has placed an officer whose fidelity is guaranteed by the gratitude for past favors and his hope of future rewards. It is hardly necessary to remark, that as the new law "to provide for the public safety" will amount to a practical suspension of all liberty and property, so this new military arrangement is equivalent to placing the entire Empire in a state of siege.

It is not consistent with experience or reason to suppose that so high-handed a policy as this can be either successful. Napoleon is the French idol, they are not so utterly helpless as to submit to this. Servile as the army is, it can not always consent to play a part which must be odious to every man of heart or intelligence. There must, in a word, come a point at which the trampled citizen will rebel, whatever the risk, and the soldier-slave refuse his aid to the work of so endless a despotism. In spite of the Emperor's genius, there are many who think that point not far distant. Whatever strength the attempt of the Rue Lepelletier may have given to the Imperial Government has been lost in consequence of the recent "repressive measures." Many who, when they first heard of the attempt, executed the assassins, now, when they see how despotism works, almost regret the failure.

Charles the Tenth fell in trying to enforce such a law as Napoleon is carrying out. Louis Philippe fell in trying to restrain the popular liberty of the Parisians. Both had power enough; wanting more, they lost that which they had. The Emperor Napoleon the Third seems to have profited little by their example.

PHYSICAL DECAY IN THE UNITED STATES.

THE London Times, by an article on the physical decay of the people of the United States, has aroused the people of our large cities to some sense of their physical degeneracy. Whatever may be said in correction of trivial errors committed by our English critic, there can be no question but the charge he brings is generally well founded—that, as a general rule, our people are neither as strong nor as healthy as people of the same age and vocation in the old mother country.

There are for this three principal reasons.

In the first place, the climate of that portion of the United States which we inhabit, and from which our foreign critics draw their inferences, may be set down as not favorable to health and strength. The coast-line of the United States is decidedly unhealthful. Fevers, varying in severity from the black vomito to mild intermittent or fever and ague, ravage our sea-board from Texas to Massachusetts throughout the summer months. There are spots, of course, which are free from them; but speaking generally, the whole coast of the United States, from the ports of the interior—and these the most thickly settled portions—are swampy, and therefore unwholesome. In the country in the south, and so young, that thorough systems of drainage have not yet been established; when it is drained in England it is much drained in this country. Again, the startling vicissitudes of heat and cold in the central parts of the United States are unknown to Europe. While in winter the thermometer has a range of forty degrees in the twenty-four hours, People who have been almost expired with heat on Monday have been known to require a fire in the grate on Tuesday. In the spring sudden inclemencies of weather are common. They can not but injure the physical stamina.

Secondly, there seems to exist among the American people a decided aversion for field sports and open-air exercise. Among the people of the large cities physical exercise is not considered for a moment. No athletic exercises or sports are popular. We have cricket clubs, on which the bulk of English wealth and gentlemen. We have no hunts, with horses and dogs; a few enthusiastic persons shoot a little in the season, but the sport can not be said to be general. As a general rule the New Yorker never takes a gun in his hand except when he goes, as a popular delight, quail-shooting at Tonget Corners, which are usually equal parts of dullness and dirt. The Americans do not ride. Their idea of horse exercise is sitting in an uncomfortable wagon behind a fast trotting horse, which whirls you through clouds of dust on a road covered with flash men and flash teams. There are several gymnasia in the large cities. They are frequented by very few acolytes, and after a few months' patronage these generally desert them. In fine, it may be said broadly that, after every man of a certain school, they never seem to think that it is necessary to exercise their muscles.

Lastly, the hasty and ruling consideration of every American is business. Walk up Broadway, and listen to the conversation of the people whom you pass—ninety-nine out of a hundred are talking of dollars, percentages, and premiums. The same is true of the groups of men assembled in drawing-rooms, hotel-parlors, and bar-rooms. Wherever two or three Americans are gathered together, there you may be sure that business and dollars are on the topic. There are a few boys whose prime aim in life is to play Napoleon at school, but they are not an exception. The bulk of our people have not time to be vicious. They are too busy to be so. As Benjamin Watts remarks, the same the Evil One by the intensity of their application to the serious things of life. As Eu-lah merchant seems ever to make a dog's breakfast, eats a hearty dinner, and plays with his children till bedtime. A Frenchman drops into his office before breakfast, leaves business at noon, goes back to work at two, and dines at five, after which he may be seen at an opera or in a ballroom. An American begins work before he is dressed in the morning and never stops till he goes to bed. If he goes home, it is in order to write his letters and look up his accounts more quietly. Life for him is a mere ledger, in which he debits himself with sixteen available hours for work each day. This absorbing dollar worship can not but produce certain specific injurious effects. The mind can not be incessantly employed without detriment to the body. Men whose trade obliges them to use their arms incessantly are prone in the long run to have arms are usually feeble in the arms. Just so, these intense head-workers who are performing sums in addition, multiplication, and division, from seven A.M. till ten P.M. must necessarily lose bodily strength.

These three causes may be said to have led to the physical decay which attracts the notice of our foreign friends. All are curable. Proper hygiene of climate, a proper attention to natural habits of living and diet, will go far toward neutralizing the injurious effect of our climate. Enlarged experience will inculcate the necessity of more physical and open-air exercise. Increasing refinement and cultivation will discourage the general sacrifice of life to the pursuit of the dollar. When these reforms are generally adopted, the decay of the human forms in the United States will cease to attract attention, and our physical development will compare favorably with that of foreign nations.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

NEARLY half the working hours of Congress last week were taken up by "personal explanations." Mr. A wished to inquire whether Mr. B. in correcting that bill the XX says pickpocketics, had intended to include him; and Mr. B. thus interrogated, courteously replied that his remark had been made in a purely parliamentary sense, and that the A before him was not one of the A's whom he charged with picking pockets. Mr. C. rose to a question of privilege to ask whether, in striking him on the nose, and causing the blood to flow from that organ, Mr. D. had observed the ninth law, and Mr. D. instantly disclaimed any such intention, observing that the act was not in the least intended to be personal. It was evident, in short, that whatever study members may have made of Hinsdale and the "Congressional Directory Compendium," they were well up in their Fieldens.

Of course, so long as apologies are the order of the day on the floor, these personal explanations are productive of no positive injury. Whether they constitute a negative wrong to the country is a point on different matter. Congress will soon have been three months in session. What law has been passed during that time? What law is likely to be passed? What question discussed in a statesmanlike and thorough manner?

On looking over the reports of the proceedings as carefully reported in this journal from week to week, we find that three questions and three only have engaged the attention of the two branches of Congress. One is Kansas; the next the arrest of Walker by Commodore Paulding; the third the Army Increase Bill. Of these the second has never had any practical consequence. All the speeches which have been made in the arrest of Walker have been for buncombe; no national benefit could result from any motion which could have been made in connection with that event. The bill to increase the army is supposed to be doomed to defeat; at all events the speeches made concerning it will have been lost. There remains only the Kansas affair, which, if the two Houses can agree upon, will be the only measure of the State in accordance with the views expressed in some of the reports presented and to be presented by the committees, may possibly result in practical and useful legislation.

Will this be an adequate return for the cost involved upon the session? It will be so that Kansas is going to be an expensive addition to the confederacy if each step in her career is to cost three months' debate in Congress. We should manage our political concerns better if our national legislators were paid by the job, and not by the day or the session.

STRAWS.

SENATOR SEWARD has separated from his friends on the Army Bill; he voted with the administration Democrats and against the Republicans on that question—taking counsel, by the way, to proclaim his independence of party, and his full belief in the doctrine that the judges in the Supreme Court of the United States among the various sections of the country accordingly. Several republicans, by amendments, of course, the control of that tribunal would be secured to the most populous or Northern sections. In the height of these manœuvers Senator Seward has received the commendation of several Northern Democratic organs, and has been favorably mentioned as a presidency for 1860 by some of the more liberal Republican prints.

Senator Seward is generally supposed to have been disappointed by the nomination of Colonel Fremont by the Republicans at the last presidential contest. He seems to be taking his revenge on them for their neglect.

Senator Douglas has, in like manner, cut himself loose from his party. He has not only read out of the Democratic fold; and though the Democrats are happy to avail themselves of the aid of his talents and his vote, it is of course regard him as a doubtful convert, and would not be disposed to select him as a standard bearer. He could not anticipate any share of the profit in case of a Democratic triumph.

Have these two leading politicians committed political suicide? Or are they looking for an entire reconstruction of parties—a state of things in which the control of the country will pass into the hands of a new party of Northern extraction, but with moderate tendencies, and seeking and finding the support of such conservative men as every section of the common country?

THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

THE Prime Minister of England has introduced a bill for the transmission of the dominion of British India from the East India Company to the British Crown. It was shown in an article published some time since in this journal that the government of the Company has for years been merely nominal, that the real control of India rested with the British Cabinet, and that the patronage of the Indian service was the only remnant of the old dispotism which remained to the Company. The change contemplated, therefore, will simply amount to the abolition of the intricate formalities by which the nominal sovereignty of the Company was maintained, and the transfer of the appointment of Indian cadets from the Company's Directors to the future Secretary of State for India.

This, it is needless to remark, will avail but little toward the settlement of affairs in Bengal and Oude. A new system of government is needed there. The rebellion may be and will be put down with the strong hand. But the permanent cure of what was the active expression will survive. Until the British Government devise a system of administration which shall command the loyalty of the natives, the Indian problem will remain unsolved. To maintain a British army in the Indian Empire enough to subject the natives to an unpopular sway will not pay. Great Britain can not afford so expensive a luxury as an Indian dependency bristling with British bayonets. And though for a time the last for vengeance will drown the cry for economy, the hour is not far distant when the question of the ultimate disposition of India must be settled on economical principles. That settlement, if to be possible, will require a memorable precedent in the science of colonial government.

THE LOUNGER.

THE HISTORIAN PRESCOTT.

In the midst of the wild whirl of political items that daily fly along the telegraph there is sometimes heard a brief mention of some fact which excites a deeper and more personal interest, and in which the heart of the whole country is interested. Such was the late intelligence of the sudden death of the historian Prescott.

His fame was by devoted and earnest study, by a long series of historical pictures of the great days of Spain, when Spain was most intimately related to American events, and which interests excited by his heroic superiority to a misfortune which would have been unbearable to any lesser man for a life of silence, have all conspired to surround his name with the deepest regard in the popular heart. At this moment engaged upon the continuation of his history of Philip the Second, his labors lie in the most interesting period of his subject.

May the thin cloud gum before this paragraph is read, and the days and weeks of an honored and honorable life be long continued! Such the prayer of his friends, and the hope of his countrymen.

WOMEN'S RIGHTS.

EVERY woman has a right to express her opinion.

That, at least, is a safe and indisputable proposition.

Some women may find talking more profitable than dancing.

In that case they will do well for their own interests to talk as much and as often as possible.

Some women want to vote, and declare they have a right to do so. Other women laugh at them for wanting to vote, and declare that, although the ballot may be their right, they have a right to it dropped according to the whim of the woman.

"I pity the women," says one of the Lounger's correspondents, "who can not make two sons vote as she pleases." That distinguished public teacher, Mrs. Job Scott, makes a similar observation.

As a matter of curious speculation, will each woman vote as her husband votes, and will her vote are yearly deposited at the instance of women. What, for instance, are the chances that the multifarious subjects of voting for her fine generally national representative from Washington, vote for a female friend if one is? Is it unfair to say that possibly about a thousand votes are immediately or remotely affected every year in our elections by female influence?

If that be so, what becomes of the argument? How many men, if they think that their whiskers and whiskers are becoming, shave them in deference to female interference? How many, who are fond of it, smoke cigars because their women fear fast desires it—except, haply, during the sweet time wherein the drinker is wooing Miss to become Mrs.?

Besides, if every woman can persuade two men to vote as she does, would not her vote be as two strike ballots, and are not three better than two in any election?

Certain sagacious philosophers are of opinion that women ought to stay at home and rock cradles. Let them, they add, inquire how long it takes to deposit a ballot. Other philosophers assert that women don't know enough to vote. Let us, then, converse with our neighbors male, and reckon how many of them are competent to the privilege. Especially, let us compare the opinions and moral impressions of public questions among our wives and daughters with those of the valuable corpses of Erin-go-braghs which arrive daily, and which are of such inestimable advantage to the ballot-boxes of so intelligent and enlightened a ring, free and enlightened, star-spangled-bannering people. Other well-wishers of their kind think that women could not go to the political meetings or the dreadful dirty polls. Let us, then, investigate the question whether women ever go to any kind of public meeting, lecture, theatre, sermon, or debate, and then ask ourselves in secret whether an educated orator upon public affairs is less intelligible to women than upon morals, physics, or philosophy; while into dirty holes, which are not necessities in a republic, no decent man or woman—and decency is in the majority—ever care, upon any occasion, to go.

As for the Lounger, who—Heaven save the mark!—is not a politician, he never hears his friend Mrs. Lambswool Tagmutton eloquently proving that women ought not to vote, but ought to wear red petticoats and drink green tea and sew on breeches buttons, in peace and contentment, without laughing at the idea that his sarcastic and intelligent friend is not as competent to express an opinion by her vote as well as by her tongue.

WARLIKE CHARACTERS.

"COLLEGIAN" has stirred the Greek alphabet from alpha to omega. The Lounger has already said that the letter he lately published in the Greek character must end the controversy; and although the claims and concerns of the secret college societies are of the last importance, and excite the most profound and universal public interest, there is still a part of the public (a little dull, of course, dear Alpha, Beta, Gamma, Delta, etc., etc.) which desires to read of something else.

The Lounger's letter-box groans at this moment—like the public dinner-tables in John Thomas Jenkins's letters—under the good things which this controversy has caused to fall into it. Innumerable gauntlets—contemptuous defiances—sneers—calm contempts—grim humors—sarcasms—lies direct—Socratic series of questions—rebuffs—replies—rejoinders—objurgations—indeed every form of letter, is heaped up, and has many a time, as he hinted, kindled his inflammable box. Should he assume the responsibility of allowing them to get into his columns, this paper would cease to be safe in the hands of the reader; it would justly be called an incendiary sheet, and produce conflagrations in the domestic circle.

The Lounger deprecates any such result, and suggests a compromise to be carried into effect in the various chapters of the various societies. Thus:

1. Deadly and unappeasable hostility is to be assumed as the normal state of any secret Greek character society against all others.
2. Each society, at a convention to be especially called for the purpose, shall resolve unanimously that all the best fellows in every college always have and always will belong to itself: the fact of membership to be taken as the test of good fellowship.
3. Each society, at its convention, shall declare all the members of all the other societies to be entirely beneath contempt, and consequently of notice.

This proposition seems to cover the whole ground, and protects the honor of each society. It also releases individual members from the necessity of cherishing wrath, or writing letters denunciatory of others; and it has the great merit of expressing in permanent form the unalterable conviction of each member of every secret society respecting all the members of every other.

LIVING BY LITERATURE.

MR. CAREY JOHNS writes to the Lounger that he is a very lazy gentleman, but with native sense enough to distinguish himself in the world of letters; wonders how he ever came to know any thing; is twenty-eight, a bachelor, without profession, without fortune, and without energy; but is quite confident he could make a living by Literature, if he could only rouse himself.

This is a not uncommon complaint—laziness, with a tendency to Literature. It is one of the most fascinating and frequent alliterations in the world. For his comfort let Mr. Carey Johns observe two facts; first, that while he is lazy he will remain a bachelor, without fortune, without profession, and generally good for nothing, except to buy cigars, and that nobody but himself can cure his laziness; second, that to "make a living by Literature" is given to two kinds of writers—great geniuses and indefatigable hacks. To write a few tolerable articles for a magazine or a newspaper is not making a living by Literature.

There is a great deal of misunderstanding of this matter in the minds of lazy young men who like to smoke and read magazines, and who fancy they could do the thing if they only tried. Look at it for a moment:

You are resolved to live by Literature. Very well; you write a book, living meanwhile upon charity, for your book, of course, does not pay you any thing until it begins to sell. Your book is completed, and no publisher cares to print it. Of a hundred manuscripts offered to a publisher he may select two. Suppose yours is one of them, although the chances are against you. It is printed and issued. It may be a fair book, but nobody knows your name; the subject may or may not be attractive; the sale is very slow. There are copies given to the press; you give some to your friends. The press hails you as another Shakespeare, or as the American Martin Farquhar Tupper. Your friends compliment you, and young ladies to whom the book has been lent send for your autograph. You come down town trailing clouds of glory. You fancy that you read in the papers, and hear from the mouths of your friends, the verdict of the age and the salutation of posterity. You ask for an account, and, in a year, you find the work has not paid expenses. You will not believe it. You quarrel with the publisher for not advertising; you hint darkly of "cooked accounts." You are enraged, and the publishers are unpaid.

But meanwhile, pending the coming in of the profits upon your book, and resolved to live by Literature, you write for the magazines. Very well. How many magazines pay any thing for contributions? What are the chances that your prolusions will go in every month? And what will you be paid when they are accepted? It is a sum you can easily calculate.

If you are a great genius, and your book takes, then you have drawn one of the prizes, and are safe. But what is the chance that you are a great genius, and then that it will be recognized?

The Lounger speaks now to lazy young gentlemen lolling before fires and looking at the arena in which they are so sure they would excel. But if a youth is really in earnest, and has something to write, paid or unpaid, it will be written. He may drudge and delve, but his drudging and delving will be immortal labor. Goldsmith was a hack, and he hacked out works of imperishable charm. He was a genius, and lived by Literature. But it was not a pleasant life altogether, and he tried many things besides Literature to save himself from starving.

If Mr. Carey Johns wants to be an author at any cost, he must conquer his laziness and run the risk of starving. If he is disinclined to that risk, then he must seek some employment which is more secure in its rewards. A grocer's clerk is paid for his service, and sleeps sure of to-morrow. An author, with a MS. in his pocket, waits upon the whim of an editor. Mr. Johns must remember that the old College President spoke truly when he said that "very few young men have any particular vocation; they all have a necessity of making their living, and the talents of most men may be as well applied to one pursuit as another."

But if he shall resolve to take the risks, let him enter the guild. He may know that if his pay is not so sure his satisfactions are surer. If the artist and author are paid less in money, they have the immense gain of doing for a living what they would choose to do for pleasure. They live among the words and works of all that is greatest in history and best in human nature. If a man adopts Literature as his profession, he must do some hard drudgery; but if he is in earnest, he will be like one whose hands dig potatoes in a field, while his eyes converse with the glories of summer and the splendid spectacle of sky and air.

And so, Mr. Carey Johns, there is the "thesis."

MURDER AND DESPOTISM.

WHILE the English are marrying their Princess with national cordiality and sympathy, the French have seen their Emperor and his wife almost murdered, and some of the American citizens now in Paris have assembled and passed resolutions of congratulation upon his escape.

Now whatever any Lounger, foreign or domestic, traveling or staying at home, may think of Louis Napoleon, he can have but one opinion of assassination; and but one feeling in regard to this particular demonstration, which was so clumsily managed and arranged as apparently to involve the murder of crowds of innocent people. But that may be safely assumed; and it is to be hoped that the Emperor does not suppose that all who do not say they are glad he was not killed wish he had been or soon might be. The court may be presumed to know some things.

But if any man is glad that the assassins did not succeed, he must also be aware that the attempt is likely to be constantly renewed. The course of Louis Napoleon is pure despotism, and it will recoil upon his own head or upon that of his unfortunate descendants.

The evident objection to the entirely unnecessary step of the American gentlemen who passed the resolutions is, that it is a kind of approval of the Emperor's course, and will tend to confirm him in it. An American ought to be as much opposed to the Emperor's being a despot as he is to his being the victim of a murderer. He may justly be pleased at the failure of this attempt; but if he takes it upon himself to speak of it at all, he ought to blend with his felicitations a word of warning. If he can't do that, he had better hold his tongue.

THE WEDDING.

WELL, the wedding is over, and the young Prince and Princess have gone away under arches and over flowers, through illuminations, and homage, and happy huzzas. Jenkins has surpassed himself in the description of the nuptials. He has written a most interesting and twaddling and touching account, which we have all read, of course, with a mingled smile and sigh. Youth and Love are very real things, spite of Beef-eaters and Gold-sticks and venerable Palmerstons carrying symbolic swords; and although this wedding was a state ceremony, and the nuptial choice of royal personages is very limited, so that an intelligent young Prince and Princess in Europe must be rather dismayed at a survey of the lines within which they must choose, if they choose at all, yet this seems to have been a union of hearts as well as hands.

The poor old palace of St. James's is a shabby palace, to be sure, and the Continental guests, used to magnificent residences, may have stared a little at the low ceilings and dingy brickiness of that particular royal house of England; but the spectacle was splendid, beyond doubt, so far as fine men and women sumptuously attired can make splendor. The father and mother of the young bridegroom probably remembered their own pretty palace in Berlin, built by Schinkel, the Prussian Ictinus; and although the young bride will not be taken to that, she will live near by in the vast old royal schloss, or castle-palace, in whose extent there is a regal grandeur.

The severest Democrat ought to remember that a Princess Royal is, after all, a young woman; that a Queen is, in this case, a fond and careful mother; and when Jenkins describes the bride flinging herself upon her mother's bosom, not all his sympathetic adjectives can prevent the feeling that it was a very tender and tearful moment for that daughter and her mother. For in that vast, old, dreary, regal palace the bride is henceforth to live and lose her nationality. By-and-by she will sit upon a Queen's throne there. She ceases to be an Englishwoman, and her children will be Prussians. To be sure, her father is a German, but she, by birth, and residence, and education, is a good Englishwoman, and doubtless loves, and is proud of, her noble country.

It is a fine thing to be a prince or princess. There is, probably, not a valet or lady's maid in the world who is not of that opinion. But the hedges of etiquette, the fences of ceremony, the universal and eternal chin-chin-ing, must make a prince sometimes weary. One does not wonder at that "good" old George III. stealing away from the palace and pottering about the pots of the Windsor peasants: exercising his gracious and regal intellects with the problem how the apple did get in. And it is quite possible to conceive a princess looking from her bower with envy upon a rosy milkmaid.

When a king has not crowned himself, like Napoleon, he is part of the state machinery. The homage is not paid to him personally; but the state uses him as a mirror, and bows before him to its own reflection. That, also, is not a proud thought to a sensible man.

In fact, there are many things to be considered when you have done reading of the princely nuptials. The Lounger's friend, Nelly Lancer, and her friends, have been studying out the dresses and the presents, and it is just possible they have been half wondering how they themselves would have looked in that lovely attire.

On that point, of course, there can be no reasonable wonder; and if it were only a matter of orange-flowers, moiré antique, and pearl necklaces, who would not wish them all to be princesses royal, and all royally married in quick succession?

But those things are not all. And it is impossible to read Jenkins's glowing story without a profound sympathy for the young pair—without being glad that every thing and every body smiled so cheerfully—without gratitude to the ladies who wore plumes and ancestral jewels, and sat, hoops and all, in space some twenty inches wide; to the gentlemen who wore garters and coats of many colors; to Mr. Gooch, who conducted the locomotive safely; and to the Eton boys, who dragged the young pair to their nest.

And when the Queen said in her prayers that night, as she doubtless did, with all the anxious entreaty of a mother's heart, "God bless them!" and all English parents in their hearts cried "Amen!" can we not understand the prayer, and with hearty wishes and happy hopes join our Amen in sympathetic echo?

OUR LETTER-BOX.

"JANUARY, 1858.

"Modeste, dear Lounger, received the happiest of new Years you forwarded to yours correspondents, although unworthy of this qualification. She put her duty and hearty will in manifesting to you the same desire of felicity, multiplied by sincere thanks

"You recollect, dear Lounger, I added to my last missive the approximate number of fair people I saw at a conference meeting? But, darl ng, I will now entertain you of the balance: sickly, dear, coughing, hooping, struggling under the consumptive pressure, to the superlative comfort of who goes to church to be moralized or edified, according the state of consciences. It will no doubt astonish you, that, in the midle of the sunny couth of our people can pass, said Dante:

"' . . . . per la porta
Lo cui sogliare a nessuno è negato'

by another cause than of morbus or tropical fever.

"'Pa' has been to Europe and Asia several times, and speaks to us of the general heath of these countries as being far above our, specialy on the southern sections. The difference of rosy there, and yellow-white complexion here, may have some reasons indipendent of longitude or latitude, to wich I call your attention to day, dear Lounger, sure you will bring to evidence something better than charlatan's pills.

"If you excuse my profuse prattle, dear, I will try explain to you my opinion about this interesting consumptive people. The recipe wich Modeste think would be efficacious and humanly give gratis, bear the name of Gastronomy.

"She believe that in Gastronomy, consequently aided by her brother Culinary Art, as some suggestions of old Mother Vine consist in some degre the future and true happiness of our beloved country

"Mater Familias will cut to pieces the bridge to the bar and the bridge to the grave by hygienely placing on the meals' table a bottle of home-made wine

"'Pa' in accordance with travelers noted in Spain south-France, Italy, Greece, etc, the almost total absence of salt meat, corn bread, and if salt fishes are sometimes used they are drowned in olive-oil, as well as all kind of fecula. There it is said a cook is oftentimes pushed by: 'What shall I prepare for diner, for supper?' months passing without the repetition of a single dishe

"I hope, dear Lounger, under your patronage, something will be done.

"We, consistently, will begin by a salad with abondant sweet oil; a tolerably large napkin being produced to keep in a state of decency the 'co luxurious lips and mustaches; no doubt if the mentioned napkin could not appears on ours tables, you would find an accommodating medium.

"The product suggest me of its producer: olive-tree, Oh! olive-tree! Is it not a national sin the neglected culture of this peace emblem? This tree wich our Saviour was so found of promenading amid? In a word this anti-consomptive element?

"Your 'Bible lands' distinguished correspondent, in his No. XXIII. says: 'I cultivated Mustapha the first afternoon, and by sunset we were smoking the tenth chibouk, and I was telling him how much good he might effect if he would go to New-York and enligten the infidels there with the ligt of his wisdom and experiences, especialy on the question of olive-oil. The olive-oil question, by-the-by, is worth discussing if I had time for it.'

"Mister Mustapha would enligten our prejudices on the Mormons' poligamy controversy, of course. I come to my sheeps; do you think, dear Lounger, that your pacha's friend looks to the question he have not time to discuss, in the light of a lamp-oil? I wonder, we have so many kind of light nowadays beside the moon and electric ones, that the classification would become obscure to enligten committees.

"Wine is to Gastronomy, what nice ribbons are at a winter velvet bonnet. In the southern portions of Europe ladies drink wine as well as gentlemen, in private houses as at table d'hôte. I am dreaming just now, what could be more favorable to succes: ask Aunety to put wine on our table, or try to make her change the shape of her old fashioned chemisettes. Religiously, I say, the pilgrims ours fathers was not practicals in their knowlege of the scriptures, of not planting vines when they touched to this new land as did the good man of the arch, who I believe was the arch-bishop of that rainy season of the creation.

"I may be beside the question, but think the subjet as serious as to know if toads are viviparous, oviparous, carnivorous, herbivorous, nothing of it, but certainly rousers by nature.

"Confident in your proved good will, dear Lounger, and my candle going down, I can just write

"MODESTE."

Bohemian Walks and Talks.

THE LADIES ON THE ICE.

THE cold weather naturally makes me think of ice, and ice naturally leads to skating, and skating to the ladies who have lately taken up with this graceful and elegant exercise. In my skating days—and I shall not tell you how long since they have been over—it was not considered the thing for the girls to skate. Indeed the boys were sometimes subjected to cruel, unusual, and unconstitutional punishments for beguiling the young women to venture upon the ice in a hand-sledge. And there was another piece of injustice for which I never could account. When came the first ice of the season, and several hundred embryo Presidents and militia captains were getting up an appetite for the Thanksgiving dinner upon the lovely lake—vulgate "mill-pond"—the ice cracked, and the valiant band were precipitated into the foaming flood. Of course they all received paternal correction—for what? Not for skating, but for falling through! In fact, the boys were obliged to suffer for the treachery of the ice. And I have never forgotten that early lesson. The successful misdemeanor is never punished, but the unlucky rogue who fails gets a kick from every body.

To return, however, to the feminine athletæ. I have noticed that some country editors, in want of a paragraph, have rudely maligned the ladies that are learning to skate, by saying that the crinoline is terribly in the way, and that the dear creatures must either give up the hoops or the skates. Quite the contrary. Very few ladies are strong enough to skate against the wind, and when going before it the crinoline is a great advantage. Every body knows how a ship goes when she has the wind "dead aft." And other feminine productions are subject to the same laws. The other day a Maine girl, carrying out the motto of her State, led a party across a large lake, offering a kiss to the young gentleman who was the first to overtake her. She made splendid time, and was not caught until she had neared the opposite shore. Ethelinda, who knows a great deal about such things, thinks that the young woman adopted this osculatory proceeding in order to throw out signals to some nice young man who was quite at home upon his skates, but who found the drawing-room a very slippery and uncertain foundation. I think we might have iced flirtations as well as iced creams. I have seen some (flirtations, not creams) that could not have been cooler.

THE TRAGEDY AFTER THE COMEDY.

ALL the ladies have been devouring with much goût the elaborate and lengthy accounts of the marriage of the senior Miss Guelph with the heir of that king who always has a superfluity of double eagles, and whom, I remember, the English journals delighted to call bad names, such as "Old Cliquot," and various other disrespectful appellations. I rather like such things—and read all about the chamberlains, and beef-eaters, and lords-in-waiting, and maids of honor, and gold and other sticks; but here is a bit which I discovered in an out-of-the-way corner of a London paper. It is worthy the particular attention of the ladies:

"Janet Fife was the fortunate pupil of the government school of art in Gower Street who received her Majesty's commands to design a dress and vail for the Princess Royal. Day and night dear Janet labored to get it done in time. She could ill afford a new dress to smarten herself, to take the drawings to Windsor, and was much disappointed when she arrived at the Castle to be told to leave them. After a few weeks' anxious suspense she wrote respecting them, and received for answer that she would hear about them at the proper time. Before that time over-exertion and anxiety had done their work—the cold clay had closed over her before any answer arrived. All honor to the dead! An Englishwoman has designed the marriage robes of royalty, and the court papers say it took fifty girls a twelvemonth to work the vail, at a cost of six hundred pounds (about sevenpence a day each girl)."

The designer loses her life. The fifty girls wear out their eyes and fingers upon fine lace-work for about twelve cents per diem. It seems to me that that wedding robe was rather a grave affair, with misery and destitution and hunger and want lurking in every wave of its graceful drapery. But I really can not see why it was necessary to kill Janet Fife, unless in order that the Princess Royal's Honiton might have the extra design of a bleeding heart.

AN ORPHEAN JOURNALIST.

AMONG other good things forthcoming at the Academy of Music, the manager announces the speedy production of an opera by Mr. W. H. Fry, an acute critic, and a sturdy, vigorous journalist. I do not know any thing of Mr Fry's constructive abilities in a musical way, but if he can build up half as well as he can pull down, his "Leonora" will make a grand sensation. It is quite certain that Mr. Fry will not be governed by any absurd technicalities, but will ignore every thing that is not bold, striking, and effective. The opera has never been sung in Italian, but was given at Philadelphia several years since in English, and therefore is quite as good as new. I presume that the composer will conduct in person, as he is not one of the half-way men by any means.

THE START.

OUR SLEIGH-DRIVE.

BEING a foreigner, a native of a country where the snow never lies an hour upon the ground, I could not be expected to understand the free-masonry of sleigh-rides. I had spent three weeks in the village of ——, in Maine, and I have no objection to confess that I considered the two Misses Grower the sweetest girls I had ever known. Nelly was a sweet, soft, tender creature, with soft eyes and a loving expression; Bessie was a tall brunette, with flashing eyes which looked through and through you, and an air which seemed to say that she would as soon fight as love. Both were very handsome girls, and all the youths of the village had been, or were, or expected to be, their recognized admirers. I, a sickly foreigner, roaming the North in search of health, crept into their acquaintance almost unawares. My physician had prescribed riding; we met frequently in the narrow path through the wood, or in the narrower road which leads up the mountain; and, in obedience to rural etiquette, we bowed at our first, spoke at our second, became social at our third meeting. Afterward we usually rode together. I called at the house—a fine old country mansion, with more rooms than half a dozen families could fill, and a glorious wood fire blazing on a broad hearth every evening; and I was delighted to make the acquaintance of old Mr. Grower, a farmer and lumber-man, well-to-do in the world, who had but one idea beyond crops and logs, and that was Kansas; of his wife, a jovial dame, who, though gay and very stout, insisted on superintending every detail of her household, and of half a dozen sons and as many daughters—as hearty and amiable a family as I ever met. When we became intimate, they pressed me to occupy a room in their house; and the girls and boys led me through room after room, in order, as they said, that I might make a choice; but I could not consent to trespass so far upon their hospitality, and contented myself with spending almost every evening by the side of their genial hearth.

I had been notified that it was necessary to provide myself with a sleigh, and had done so. When Nellie told me that a party had been made up for a sleigh-ride to the Indian Cross next day, I said, simply, "Very well"—having no idea of the social importance of the affair.

"I suppose," said Bessie, in her quick way, "that you will drive Lucy Thompson?"

"If I am at liberty to invite a partner, of course you and your sister would have the refusal."

"I'm sorry," said Nellie; "but I am engaged."

"And you?" I asked, turning to Bessie.

"I'll drive with you; and as we always drive three in a sleigh, we'll take Cousin Mary."

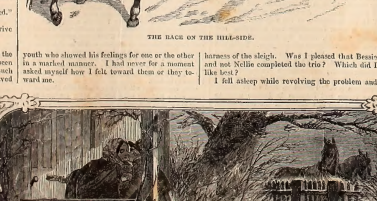
"Agreed."

Till that evening I had never thought of the sisters separately. I don't think I had ever been alone with either of them. We had met on such friendly, confidential terms, that I had behaved rather as a brother than as a lover, and had viewed them in the light of sisters. They had told me of their little love affairs, and we had laughed over them. I used to quiz them about this or that youth who showed his feelings for one or the other in a marked manner. I had never for a moment asked myself how I felt toward them or they toward me.

THE RACE ON THE HILL-SIDE.

This sleigh-drive shed a new light on the state of affairs. I knew that Cousin Mary was an excellent girl, who was engaged to a lawyer at Bangor, and that she would regard me as a part of the harness of the sleigh. Was I pleased that Bessie and not Nellie completed the trio? Which did I like best?

I fell asleep while revolving the problem and weighing the merits of the sisters. I admired Bessie; I think now she is as fine a woman as I ever met; but there was something in Nellie which touched me. I dreamed that night that her head was leaning on my shoulder, and that I was passing my hand through her long, loose, fair ringlets. When I awoke in the morning I was quite disappointed that she was not to drive with me.



My horses were in magnificent condition. It was several degrees below zero, and the poor brutes could hardly be induced to stand still while I entered the old farm-house and met the assembled guests. The man who had supplanted me—for I began to regard it in this light—was a doctor from a neighboring village, a young fellow well educated, no doubt, but as green a whip as myself. He was—so I was told by her youngest brother—"uncommon sweet on Nellie." I should have liked to have driven my whip-handle down his throat.

We started. The road was splendid: the snow crenked and whistled under our runners, the horses were soon covered with flakes of congealed moisture—we flew over the ground. There were nine teams altogether, our places had been assigned by lot; mine was the seventh. It was settled that any one who could pass another without danger might do so; but a collision was to involve the blindfoldest of the two sleighs in the disgrace of taking the last place in the procession.

I never saw Bessie look handsomer than when she took her seat beside me. The cold brought a ruddy flush to her cheeks, and her eyes gleamed; her spirits rose, and as we started she rallied me on my dullness till I almost lost my temper. Nellie was far ahead. At the signal, away we went. I soon found that it would not do to sit down. I stood up, and with whip, rein, and voice, urged on my horses. We positively flew over the snow; at times the drift raised by the six teams before us shut out the road from my sight, and if any thing had happened to Joe Berryman, who was in front of us, we must have gone over him.

My cattle were the best that the village contained. I had chosen them with great care. They entered into the spirit of the thing as well-bred horses will. We had driven but ten minutes when we came to a spot where the wind had left the road nearly bare. With a yell, I took advantage of the place, and passed Joe and the sleigh in front of him. I was now sixth, and my noble horses seemed to exult even more than I did in the prospect of leading the race. Five minutes more and a crossing—of which Bessie, who knew the country, notified me in due time, gave me another chance; I applied the whip, and with a shout at the proper moment, number five was outstripped, and we took his place. Number four was the doctor's sleigh, with Nellie and her friend. Now I had them.

It was plain to see at a glance that his horses were not fit for the work. Their heads drooped already; which perhaps was no wonder, considering the pace we had made; but mine were fiercer than at the start. I gripped the reins with a firmer clutch, and looked out for a safe place to pass.

GOOD-NIGHT!

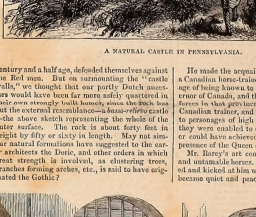
Nellie, who seemed quite as excited in the race as any of us, pointed me out to the doctor, and from her gesticulations seemed to be impressing upon him the disgrace of being outstripped. Bessie, sitting close behind me, screamed to her sister that we would be happy to take any message from them.

Our road skirted the mountain. Sometimes it rose over a spur, and descended into a valley on the other side. I made up my mind—so insanely excited had I become—that I would pass the doctor at the first turn we came to, no matter what the consequences to life or limb. But I was foiled. At the first corner, I shouted to him to make way, and flourished my long whip over the horses; but he shrewdly guided his sleigh squarely in the middle of the road, and rendered it quite impossible to pass him. My turn was coming, however. We came to a place where the road skirts the mountain in a regular curve for three quarters of a mile, with a steady descent throughout the whole distance. Of course the advantage of "the inside track" on such a break-neck race as we were running was quite apparent. My neighbor saw it, and drove as close to the mountain side as his horses would go. I watched him. At a spot where the road descended suddenly for a few paces, I suddenly shouted, "Make way inside!"—dashed my team almost between him and the hill-side, and drew them back suddenly. The ruse succeeded. With a tremendous effort he forced his horses off the track into the snow nearest the hill, and, as we to be expected, upset his sleigh and tossed his ladies into the snow; at which moments I passed, shouting lustily and crowing, with my team snorting proudly at the feat.

I saw no more of Nellie and her friend till we met for dinner. He was silent and quarrelsome. I was wondering what I should do if he tried to fasten a quarrel upon me, when Josiah—Nellie's brother—came to me and proposed that Bessie should take Nellie's place on the drive home, if I had no objection, as Nellie and the doctor had had a tiff. I need not say that I agreed.

The homeward drive, after a hearty dinner and a short but lively dance, was tremendous. I started sixth, but long before we got home I was first and led the way. It was silent and quarrelsome. I was wondering what I should do if he tried to fasten a quarrel upon me, when Josiah—Nellie's brother—came to me and proposed that Bessie should take Nellie's place on the drive home, if I had no objection, as Nellie and the doctor had had a tiff. I need not say that I agreed.

The homeward drive, after a hearty dinner and a short but lively dance, was tremendous. I started sixth, but long before we got home I was first and led the way. It was bright moonlight, and the snow bright and crisp. As I had no passenger, I sat down between Mary and Nellie. Mary went to sleep. But few words passed between Nellie and me; but I noticed that her cheeks were very cold.



That evening, when we arrived, poor Mary was so fast asleep that it took us some moments to wake her. We got her in at last, and Nellie, the dear affectionate heart, staid outside with me while I shook the snow from my collar and the sleigh robes and turned the horses into the yard. It really seemed as though the noble creatures were inspired with human intelligence. I was taking Nellie in, on the gallery, and had looked around to see if my one was watching; I saw no one, and proceeded to —, when suddenly my horses neighed.

"Silence, you brutes!" I roared in my ecstasy. "Isn't she going to be my wife?"

"Yes!" said the sweetest, softest little voice in the world.

A NATURAL CASTLE.

NEAR the village of Shawnee, in Pennsylvania, some three miles from the Delaware Water Gap, a locality affluent in varied natural charms, has recently been disclosed, by the chopping of the wood in which it has until recently been obscured, a rock of remarkable appearance, forming a natural bastion or castle. The elevated position it occupies, as well as its architectural adaptedness, would favor the idea, if history does not, that here the early Dutch settlers, who migrated from Europe about a century and a half ago, defended themselves against the Red men. But on surmounting the "castle walls," we thought that our portly Dutch ancestors would have been far more safely quartered in their own strongly built homes, since the rock has but the external resemblance—a most perfect one—the above sketch representing the whole of the entire surface. The rock is about forty feet in height by fifty or sixty in length. May not similar natural formations have suggested to the early architects the Doric, and other orders in which great strength is involved, as clustering trees, branches forming arches, etc., is said to have originated the Gothic?

A NATURAL CASTLE IN PENNSYLVANIA.

THE AMERICAN HORSE-TAMER IN ENGLAND.

THE accompanying illustration represents the American Horse-Tamer, Mr. John S. Rarey, performing his singular feats in presence of Queen Victoria, her family, and several of the heads of the military departments of Great Britain. Mr. Rarey is a horse-breeder of Columbus, Ohio, and, like his father, who is in the same line of business, is well known throughout that and the adjacent States.

He made the acquaintance, some time since, of a Canadian horse-trainer, who enjoyed the advantage of being known to Sir Edmund Head, the Governor of Canada, and the commander of the British forces in that province. These officials gave the Canadian trainer, and his friend Mr. Rarey, letters to personages of high rank in England, and thus they were enabled to do what intrinsic skill never could have achieved, namely, to exhibit in the presence of the Queen and the Royal Family.

Mr. Rarey's art consists in subduing untamed and untamable horses. One horse, who had neighed and kicked at him when he first entered its stall, became quiet and peaceable, and submitted to be sat upon and played with, after Mr. Rarey had spent a quarter of an hour in its company. Another, an unbroken blood colt, belonging to Prince Albert, evinced the most marked symptoms of willfulness and vice when Mr. Rarey approached it. He requested the spectators, among whom were the Queen and her family and the chief officers of the Horse Guards, to withdraw for a few minutes. They complied with his request; at the expiration of a quarter of an hour they returned, and found the vicious colt lying down, with Mr. Rarey reclining between its legs, and resting on its haunches. He took the colt's head and lapped them together. He drove a wheel-barrow round it. He beat a drum close to its ear. During all these performances the animal lay still, and gave no sign of life. It seemed pleased when Mr. Rarey caressed it, and was as docile as any amiable horse.

Another blood horse, who was submitted to Mr. Rarey, had never allowed any one to ride him. He was so vicious that he could scarcely be groomed. When Mr. Rarey first entered the box where he was he showed plenty of fight, both with heels and teeth. After some ten or fifteen minutes spent in private with the animal, Mr. Rarey requested the company to reappear on the stage. In their presence he mounted the horse, and rode him round the inclosed ground. He made him lie down at the word of command, and pretended to sleep, using his haunches as a pillow. Seizing a plank, he laid one end of it on the horse and drove a wheelbarrow up it. While on his back he beat a drum, and suddenly opened an umbrella over the horse's head. None of these manœuvres appeared to frighten the animal. So far as could be judged he was possessed by one idea, and one alone—affection for his new acquaintance.

The authorities of the British Horse Guards appear to have been much struck by Mr. Rarey's performance. Sir Richard Airey and others, to whom he has communicated his secret, certify that there is nothing in it which can be injurious to horses, and that it deserves the attention of all lovers of the horse tribe. Accordingly, Mr. Rarey advertises that he will teach his method to pupils as soon as he can secure five hundred at fifty dollars apiece.

This taming of horses is no new thing. For many years, at every European fair, men have figured as horse-tamers or horse-whisperers, and have exhibited feats similar to those of Mr. Rarey. They have always been regarded as charlatans. One Sullivan figured for many years in England as a horse-whisperer. Like Rarey, he could subdue the most vicious horse by a little private conversation. Unfortunately for Sullivan, he had the folly to pretend that his control over horses was acquired by whispering certain things in their ear, and this, of course, discredited him and his grooms.

It has long been known that certain medicaments will exercise a peculiar influence over the horse. The oil of cumin is a thing which he can not resist. If any one chooses to rub some oil of cumin on his hand, and with that hand put a horse's nose, he will perceive a magical change in the animal's temper. It will make him stand as still as a rock, no matter how wild or vicious he may be. Thus let the experimentalist take about eight drops of oil of rhodium in a small phial or a thimble, and, gently opening the horse's mouth, pour it on his tongue, and he will be an obedient slave. He will follow his trainer at call; at the word of command he will lie down; no noise will frighten, no experiment disturb him, so long as the superior being who has charmed him remains by his side. As for sparrows as a little incidents will, after this, achieve a permanent conquest.

THE AMERICAN HORSE-TAMER PERFORMING BEFORE THE QUEEN AND ROYAL FAMILY IN ENGLAND.

Mr. Ramsy's process is still a secret. But it will naturally be conjectured that these chemicals have some part in the wonderful triumphs he has won over the horses of England.

LITERARY.

DUNGLISON'S MEDICAL DICTIONARY, published by Blanchard & Lea, Philadelphia, appears in a new and much extended edition, offering to any one who may desire it the fullest information on all medical subjects. We imagine that no physician, whatever his particular pathy, can get along without this volume at his elbow; and for family purposes it is a valuable book of reference. Indeed, in this day, no one who reads the newspapers can dispense with it. If a physician is called to testify before a court or a coroner's jury he considers it his privilege to talk a language which is neither Latin, nor English, Greek, nor Hebrew, but which may be styled the medical language. In many instances it is like the Scotchman's definition of metaphysics, which he said was "When the man you're talking to does know what you're saying, and when you think he has what you've said yourself." The commonest words are translated into this jargon. We now some physician's testimony run thus FOURTEEN OF REV. AMOS BARTON'S MR. GILFIL'S LOVE STORY and JANET'S REPENTANCE. These stories were esteemed among the best contributions to Blackwood, where they originally appeared. It is not often that the author has ventured into the Church for his heroes or his incidents. But no one will read this interesting story without feeling satisfied that the walls of a country parsonage may contain as much of the romance of life, as much love, passion, and faith, as more pretty and as many disappointments as the walls of a palace. There is a thrilling story, and at the same time a great gentleness, in these stories, not without some fun and grotesque humor, which unites of qualities chiefly commends them. They form the 3d and 4th Library of Select Novels.

No one will be more astonished than was Mr. Motley on his arrival at the Hague, whither he has gone to examine his literary labors. He found himself famous in a moment, and most amusingly so. A translation of his DUTCH REPUBLIC is soon to appear in the French language, under the superintendence of M. Guizot, to whom Mr. Motley concluded the sight of translating some months ago. A reprint has been published in Amsterdam, and has had a good sale. A translation of the work, complete, has been published, in the Dutch language, at Leipsic and Dresden. A translation into the Dutch language has been made, under the supervision of Professor Johannes Vanden Brink, Archivist-in-Chief of the Kingdom of the Netherlands—the most learned man and the greatest writer in that country. He has written an introductory chapter to the book, of a very complimentary character, and has added many notes and comments. It is publishing in numbers, very handsomely printed, and will scarcely be completed before the close of the year. An elaborate commendatory article upon the book has just appeared in the Gids, the leading review of the country, written by one of the best historical writers of Holland. These various editions and notices will be a great wonder-shock without any solicitation on the part of the author; and we can only refer to the fact as a newer heard of any of them except the French edition, which was brought about by an application to him from the editor of the Edinburgh Review, on behalf of M. Guizot, for permission to make the translation.

Dick & Fitzgerald publish in cheap form WILKIE COLLINS'S HOUSE AND HOME, an odd and outré story, in which there is a dead-and-living girl in a coffin, and no love, although it is a love-story. The plot turns on a life-interest and deed in an ancient English girl, and the return to England long afterward of her brother, who seeks revenge for her wrongs. Some of the passages are good, and on the whole the book is not up to the ordinary standard of the author.

Eastern travelers, readers of such works as Gibbon and Lindsay, and especially students of history, will find in the valuable addition to the LIBRARY OF CLASSICAL ATLAS FOR ANCIENT GEOGRAPHY, a new edition of which is published by Blanchard & Lea, Brothers. The labor bestowed on it was immense, and there is no pains-taking in ancient geography, or which the reader of ancient authors will meet with the name of, that he can not instantly locate on these maps with all of a single reference to the accompanying index. The volume is an octave, of good library size, and should be on every lady's shelves.

Carter & Brothers send us another volume of the Rev. J. C. Ryle's EXPOSITORY THOUGHTS ON THE GOSPELS. The former volume covered the Gospel of Matthew. This contains Mark. The author belongs to that class of Churchmen in England who are commonly designated as Evangelical, and his works contain practical and orthodox reflections and suggestions.

Among the papers on mathematics presented to the Academy of Sciences at Paris, none rose age, was one which excited considerable attention, and it was referred to an eminent mathematician in order to examine it and be in due time reported on it. In the last sitting a letter from the author of the paper was read, and he, to the surprise of the learned academicians, announced himself as a single paragraph abandoned of practical living, who knew nothing of mathematics except what he had learned by unaided study. He wrote with much modesty, and begged that the bad spelling in his letter might be excused.

Crosby and Nichols issue the AMERICAN ALMANAC FOR 1858. It is to be supposed that every one knows the value of this publication, which has long since become a standard work. It is the only compendium of the kind, and, as a full and complete statistical account about the United States, general and the several States, it is, of course, a necessity to every library and to every office.

Professor Rogers, the well-known author of the "Eclipse of Faith" and "The Greyson Letters," has become Professor of Logic in Queen's College, a post vacant by the resignation of Dr. Vaughan.

A little printing-press has been sent from Paris to Constantinople. It is to find its place in the office of Ibrahim Effendi, and will be used exclusively for the benefit of the Turkish ladies. The wife of Ibrahim Effendi is said to be well versed in the French and English letters, and she intends to publish a collection of the best Western novels in a Turkish translation. The enterprise, it is to be hoped, will produce no pecuniary gain or satisfaction to the people of Turkey. Indeed, if the Turkish ladies have not been refreshed their right, and that Territorial Government in the Territory of Kansas is entitled to the legislative sphere of promised freedom.

The Lecompton Constitution in the form of adoption were presented to the Convention for its consideration and decision. To submit it by Congress to be in given notice of the Territorial Government in regarding, and to secure that people, not to an election fairly and legally conducted, as to submit it to the people of a Constitutional State. Calhoun shall hereafter proclaim, and an such conditions as he may deem proper, that the will of the majority, and incontestable indecision and reserve but encourage agitation for the purpose of peace, will of territory deemed to disappointment.

GENERAL CALHOUN'S REPORT.

Another minority report, committed by Judge Douglas, takes the ground that it is to be submitted to a vote that the Constitution framed at Lecompton is the act and deed of the people of Kansas, and that it is to be by no means that the Convention was not clothed with competent power to make the Constitution without the consent of Congress, which has been expressly withheld in the Act of 1854. The Lecompton Convention was the creature of the Territorial Legislature—and rightfully creator, and was bound to obey the will of its creator, and not to go to Congress on a memorial for authority to do that which the Legislature had already established the paper—that the Convention was bound by the Legislature, and have been held in strict obedience to the authority of the Territorial Government which made it. In fact, it was not to be to form, and to take effect in defiance of the Territorial Government, and in the face of the authority of the press, and that the only lawful election held on the subject of the Constitution was that on the 4th of January last, which was in obedience to the law passed by the Territorial Legislature, and submitted by the Territorial legislative power on all rightful subjects within the Territory.

GENERAL CALHOUN ON THE KANSAS RETURNS.

General Calhoun's report, which accompanies the report of the Delaware Crossing election returns, which proves to be in accordance in the settlement of the whole of all complaints of the Kansas Legislature. He says: "I have carefully examined the returns of the Delaware Crossing precinct which gives to the Democratic party a majority of the Legislature and an overwhelming majority in favor of the Lecompton Constitution. I have no doubt of the correctness of the returns, and I have no doubt that the Democratic party is entitled to the majority of the Legislature, and that the Lecompton Constitution has the majority of the people of Kansas in favor of it. I declined to be governed by the oaths of the judges. I declined to be governed by the legality of the returns. Of that I was judge and determiner. I shall do so still, by the same conscientious rule of right and duty. I pardon and truth and the right. If it shall, as it probably will, be the determination of the State of Kansas that the basis of my examination was not right and correct, but that I was not entitled to the oaths of the judges, and that the duty with regard to the returns of said precinct shall fall in the honest discharge of my official duties. I have written the foregoing report in the presence of the statements of the judges of this controverted precinct, which I have not read, and which I do not intend to read, to secure a free and unbiased exhibition of facts. By the sworn statements thus obtained, I shall be governed in giving the certificates of election to the members of the Kansas Legislature from Delaware Crossing."

GAIETIES AT WASHINGTON.

"Jenkins," the Washington correspondent of the Herald, thus writes of the third reception at the White House:

"In the absence of Mrs. Buchanan, Miss Lane presides here. Miss Lane, still in mourning, and wearing no ornaments but a single white camellia, is a very pretty blonde and visitor, Miss Brown of Pennsylvania, who stands about five feet high. Her dress—the ornamental flounces tipped with pink, while a green wreath surrounded her head. It was amusing to see how the modern fashion individuals endeavored to establish themselves in the good graces of the President's niece. Some were successful, and others were not. Some got the green prize, and others into the east room. Also, the Secretary's department has also had its levee, and the Secretary of War, in which set the nearest hand, making a regular promenade concert of the whole affair. The Secretary himself gently decked out with epaulettes and aiguiletts, wielded to court the fair, leaving his chivalrous aid to attend with majestic grace. If General Henderson will abolish the custom of wearing his cocked hat on reception days, well, for it even seemed to disturb Colonel Hartley, the gentlemanly commissioner of the public buildings, and no end for the District, who has also complied and sought to be relieved of it."

The Duke of Newcastle, Lord Lyons, Mr. Dickenson, Hon Houston, and Colonel May; the latter seemed to be in high spirits, and was the centre of much sport last Gussey and my lady were there, giving out a few appointments for the evening. Lord and Lady Lyons, and Senator Washington Bartlett exercise his beautiful daughter, who has returned from the fashionable circles of Europe. Senator Hale had his lady (who wore a flaming and fashionable dress) and his two accomplished daughters. The other, crowned with their Assistant-secretary Appleton and Mrs. Appleton, one of the handsomest women in Washington. Mr. Appleton's personal appearance did not add to the grace of the occasion. Mr. Appleton is a very pleasant lady and his pretty daughter with the opening Saturday night. Mrs. Judge Black, Mrs. Cass, and Mrs. Dallas graced more richly than any other young lady present, and were the most elegant and fashionable appearing of flowers which ornamented the tissues of her fine satin."

THE EXPEDITION.

By telegraph from St. Louis we have news from the Utah expedition to New York. The troops were in excellent spirits. From the Mormon papers we learn that Brigham Young has issued a proclamation well advised of the movements of the Saints, who were making active preparations for the reception of the troops in the spring. Their immaterial regulations were very stringent, and forbid the sale of provisions except to keep the least inclined to favor the action of the United States Government, and to prevent the Mormons leaving the duties of his office, so far as he was able. The settlement bound main very making good progress, and the many Indians whom they met manifested friendly feelings.

A letter from Colonel Johnston, dated December 12, to his friend in Washington, says: "Our troops are well. We are still encamped at the Ham's Fork settlement. Until we move in the spring. The army has abundance of food and clothing, and is well sheltered from cold in Sibley tents. With your knowledge of camp life you would pronounce our situation one of great comfort. These Sibley tents are tall, conical tents, twelve feet high and twenty feet in diameter, open at the top, with a view to prevent its smoking, which it does not quite do. With a stove in the tent, in the middle, it is a great improvement in the comfort of the soldier. It has an appearance of warmth, and looks like a home."

Some think the Mormons, when it is necessary to make the issue with the troops, will submit to arrangement. I do not agree with them. I think their treason, and killing of Gentiles, will be fought to the bitter end; and I think our government ought to desire it, as the only means of eradication of the pestilential question. If they resist, a final settlement would be at the hands of a company, and the Territory be free from the terms of subjugation.

Brigham Young votes to me a few days since, reading as a present some 800 pounds of salt, or if preferred, we will have the money. I have declined the salt, and have told a fabulous delight in the knowledge that he would be very much surprised when he received the check. Enough we have no salt, I sent it back to him with this message: That Brigham Young and his associates are in rebellion against the government of the United States to their allegiance and obey the laws, I will accept no favor or consideration from them, neither shall I correspond with them; that when I advance, the people who remain at their homes may enjoy only in their private business will be undisturbed. If I find them armed in force I will consider them enemies, and treat them as such. If they entertained the delusion that the army would not fight, they will find out their error. I am confident that the army will never take salt one day late."

A. S. JOHNSTON."

PERSONAL.

The Times says: "A correspondent of the New York Evening Post corrects, in that journal, a statement borrowed from the Times of the 4th inst., that Mr. Bryant was a great admirer of his namesake, Bryant, of the French Academy of Moral and Political sciences, by adding to the name of Bryant, Bryant, Governor of North Carolina College, and now of Columbia College in this city, in lieu of Bryant, Bancroft and Prescott on the list of 'Foreign Associates.' But the correspondent of the Post is himself in error. Bryant, of the Foreign Academicians of the Academy in question, and the honor conferred upon Mr. Bryant, was a personal tribute, and of a lower grade. He has been appointed not an Associate, but a Correspondent of the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences.

The New York correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune writes: "Mr. Longstreet, Governor of Georgia, has written three letters yet. I had a long letter from him at the White House yesterday, and he has written me a letter since. He is a man of great intellect, and I consider him as much united and contried there as he has been every where. There is something of the Southern Goldsmith, after all, which I have never found elsewhere. His wife is a perfect gentlewoman, and a lovely lady. Bryan Dameiros of the Academy in question, and the honor conferred upon Mr. Bryant, was a personal tribute, and of a lower grade. He has been appointed not an Associate, but a Correspondent of the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences.

The New York correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune writes: "Longstreet, Governor of Georgia, has written three letters yet. I had a long letter from him at the White House yesterday, and he has written me a letter since. He is a man of great intellect, and I consider him as much united and contried there as he has been every where. There is something of the Southern Goldsmith, after all, which I have never found elsewhere. His wife is a perfect gentlewoman, and a lovely lady. Bryan

Mr. Theodore Sedgwick, of New York, is said by the Boston Transcript to have made a present to the city of $12,950, a beautiful residence on "Gallows Hill," Lenox, Mass. The gift is to be used as a public library, and Sedgwick put forth his vision touching the Temperance question, which is the astonishment of the Abolitionists. He opposes prohibitory laws, and says: "I have not only never drunk a glass of liquor, but have never even tasted, and have always found those who were in the habit of it, and were the very persons who were best, and where all had the most enjoyment of his kindness. I have found that you can among excellent millions the further they are removed from the temptation of drinking, and the more they forget the effect of its products the greater you will find the temperance and virtue of the people."

Mr. Ingram, who came to this country in the wife of Mr. Henry Ward Beecher, is now residing in the city of New York, where he has earned a high reputation as a pulpit orator. He is a native of Scotland, and is now in the 32d of May. His remarkable talents run in his family in India, where he will practice his beautiful art.

Mr. Spencer Hosmer, of the Albany Journal estimates the following: "The sudden and serious illness of Mr. Speaker Hosmer has caused much anxiety to his friends, and by telegraph last night we received the intelligence that to the probable removal of Colonel, the heir of the Assembly, and his appointment from Colonel Wright. Only a few hours before her indisposition commenced she was speaking as a delegate from Mercer, Burlington and New Jersey, and was invoking her numerous friends to attend a meeting in Trenton. Mrs. Hosmer, who has been passed near unto the dark valley, and her illness has only been a source of great anxiety to her friends, which makes an opportunity to discharge its poisoned shafts."

Mr. Thomas Ewbank, Commissioner of the United States Patent Office, has lately been appointed to the Commissioner of Patents, and has been appointed to the Commissioner of Patents, and has been appointed to the office. Mr. Brouwer did not return to his home, No. 139 George Street, Jersey City, on the night of the meeting, and as he was absent all night his family became much alarmed. On Tuesday he returned home to his office, but found the door locked. On getting a key he entered and found Mr. Brouwer lying on the floor, and by a bandkerchief to the knob of his iron safe. He had evidently been dead for some time.

The late Chevalier François André Michaux, the distinguished botanist, died at Paris, in 1855. He had travelled throughout the United States, but journeyed to the Rocky Mountains and explored the whole of the vast unexplored country between the then extant settlements, and published an account of his travels in 1804.

A correspondent of the Evening Post, writing from Rome on the 30th of January, says: "Rome here seems to be the reverse of that which I have proved on the other side of the Atlantic—a dearer country. Indeed it is easier than has been known for many years. Yet the hotels still exist at which the travelers have been 7½ Fahrenheit, and roses and violets are still gathered in the open air. Rome is, in fact, more populous than ever, and the season. Of New Yorkers, however, there are but few. Among the latest arrivals are Mr. and Mrs. George Ticknor, Edward Everett Hale, Longfellow, Sumner, and others, with their families. In addition to these may be noted a number of artists, as Mr. Page, Mr. Terry, of Philadelphia; Joseph E. Sheffield, of Connecticut; Mrs. W. W. Boardman, of Connecticut with their families; also the family of George P. Robbins, of New York. The latter gentleman, by the bye, resides here, has just arrived."

The following is quoted in the New York correspondence of the Boston Journal:

"Mr. Powers has built a wall and a post. The marble in Mrs. Powers's studio is finished by Mr. Davies, who has more of Young America in him than any Yankee on the Bonds, and who has won the hearty advocates of Junior Jerry up their march. The figure of the boy reading is very much admired. Mr. Hedge has placed an hour-glass before the lyre. The other day a gentleman known Mr. Mr. Bliss was on the floor. He talked and talked, and listened that he could not get in a word. At last, in despair, he said, 'I could not go till Mr. Bliss had ended his argument.' Whereupon the gentleman in question remarked the following couplet:

'Mr. Bliss is the plain bolds not to run,
Endless Bliss has just begun.'"

A statue of Lawrence, by Thomas Rogers of Hartford, the Hartford sculptor, now in Rome, is said to be a statue of a man of 50, which has been put chased by a gentleman of Philadelphia. Eve is seated on the stump of a tree, around which the serpent is entwined. Her hands are clasped, and her head bent down—she is evidently contemplating the sad consequences of her disobedience. Her hair hangs disheveled almost to her feet, and forms a graceful drapery. The pedestal is of marble, with bas reliefs, representing the temptation, fall, and expulsion of Adam and Eve."

Hon. T. L. Clingman, Professor Phillips, and other distinguished personages, are engaged in a wordy warfare in the newspapers of North Carolina, to establish the fact whether the late Dr. Mitchell was or was not the first man who gained the top of Black Mountain on a scientific exploration.

Rev. J. J. Dana, of South Adams, Massachusetts, has caused a sensation in that village by a sermon entitled, "The Hole in the Wall, or South Adams as it is." Its rebukes seem to have been aimed at sins at home, instead of the faults of the heathen in Asia, or the stubbornness of the Jews 2000 years ago, and could not fail, therefore, to be rather exciting. Mr. Dana said the sixth commandment of the manufacturer is, "Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work, and on the seventh make thy repairs."

The New Orleans Picayune of the 6th inst. says:

"Among the news of the day we hear that Colonel Preston has sold his extensive plantations in the parish of Ascension, the Houmas, to Mr. Burnside, of this city, for $1,000,000, of which $300,000 cash down. There are 12,000 acres of land, 500 to 600 hands, three sugar-houses, besides a large amount of stock, etc. This is the heaviest landed operation we have been called upon to notice in this State.

The venerable widow of President Harrison, the Cincinnati Gazette says, has been for a considerable time confined to her bed, at the residence of her son, J. Scott Harrison. Old age, rather than any particular disease, has asserted its influence upon a naturally robust organization. Mrs. Harrison is now more than eighty years of age.

The Salem Register notices the execution of a statuette of "Virginia Dare," in marble, by Miss Louisa Landor, a young artist of that town, who is pursuing her studies of the art of sculpture in Rome. The lady was a pupil of Crawford.

A girl of eleven, in the Taunton poor-house, has just given birth to a child weighing eight pounds. The father is fourteen years old, and the mother was born in the poor-house.

Another strong-minded female is in trouble. Dr. Lydia Sayer Hasbrouck, of Middletown, New York, refused to pay her tax, and her goods, like those of Lucy Stone, have been levied upon.

A man named Maylet was picked up in the street at Keokuk, Iowa, on Friday evening, while laboring under a heavy pressure of liquor, and confined in the calaboose. He represents himself as being a Mormon preacher, and has in his possession an Elder's certificate from his Highness, Brigham Young.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT.

PARLIAMENT reassembled on 4th February. Lord Palmerston gave notice of his bill to amend the government of India; and Earl Grey gave notice of a petition from the East India Company against any change. Lord Palmerston likewise gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill to amend the law relative to conspiracies to commit murder.

Mr. Roebuck asked Lord Palmerston whether there had been any communications between the governments of France and England respecting the Alien Act, or any alteration in the criminal code of England. He spoke with much bitterness against the Emperor of the French, and against the position taken by Counts de Morny and Persigny, and the addresses of the French army in regard to the recent attempted assassination of the Emperor.

Lord Palmerston said in reply that a dispatch had been addressed by the Foreign Minister of France to the French Embassador in London upon the late transactions in Paris, and conveying the wish of the French government that the British government should take such measures in consequence that they in their wisdom might think fit, but not pointing out any measures whatever. The French Minister simply left the case to the British government. No reply had been made to the dispatch of the French government. He condemned the intemperate language of Mr. Roebuck, and repelled his charges against the French Embassador.

A resolution was adopted conferring pensions of £1000 a year each to the widow of the late Sir H. Havelock and the present baronet.

THE LAUNCH OF THE LEVIATHAN.

The Leviathan was launched at last on Sunday, 31st January. We take from the Times the following extracts relative to the event:

"Friday afternoon's high tide gave a depth of 18 feet 2 inches under her stern. The tide of Friday night should have been some four or five inches higher, but the change of wind kept it down to less than 15 feet.

"All Saturday the adverse wind continued, but on Sunday the weather was fine, clear, and calm, with scarcely any breeze, and what little there was all in favor of the vessel and a high tide. The public had been so often disappointed as to the launch that, although it seemed generally known that yesterday was the best and highest tide, and that, if ever, she would float on that day, the prospect of her floating at all seemed quite as generally disbelieved. The presence of all the workmen in the yard yesterday, therefore, was regarded as a thing of no account, and not till the huge monster actually floated did the preparations for hauling her off seem to excite much interest.

"The tide ran up with unusual swiftness; and as the flood relieved the weight upon the launching ways, some of the hydraulic machines were set to work, for the last time, to push the monster as far as possible into the centre of the river. She moved easily, and with such a low rate of pressure, that a short time gave an advance of 80 inches, which showed that more than half the cradles were quite pushed off the ways and rested on the river bottom. At half past one the men in the row-boats stationed alongside observed that she no longer rested on the cradles—that she was, in fact, afloat, but, of course, the transition was so gradual that few were aware of it until the tugs began steaming ahead, and showed that at last she was fairly under way. Then the cheers which arose from the yard and from the decks, from the boats in the river and the crews of the ships at anchor up and down the stream, spread the great news far and wide, and thus, under the most favorable circumstances, the Leviathan commenced her first voyage on the Thames.

THE SURGING OF HER CRADLES.

"Two powerful tug-boats were at her bows and two were fastened astern. Other steamers also were in attendance and rendered their aid, but the efforts of the four we have mentioned were mainly instrumental in managing her. At first the efforts of those ahead seemed to have little effect, and when at length some way was made on her it was abruptly checked by one of the paddle-wheels fouling the cradles. It took some time to clear her of this obstacle, but at last it was accomplished; her head was let swing partly round with the tide, and the steamers began moving her slowly, but very slowly, forward, clear of the cradles. These, as our readers are aware, were composed of immense balks of timber, on which the vessel's bottom rested, and which her weight alone kept down. The police, therefore, had to take unusual precautions yesterday to keep all boats clear of her while the wrecks of the cradles plunged up in tremendous masses as each was released by the onward movement of the Leviathan.

"It was curious to see these huge groups of beams emerge from the river, rising rapidly from the surface of the water 20 or 30 feet, with a slow, heavy movement, and then falling over with a great crash that churned the water into foam around them. Some, broken and splintered by the violence with which they were thrown against each other, formed a loose tangle of timber-work, and went slowly drifting up the river in little islands, which rose some four or five feet from the water. Others, long after the great mass had floated up, came plunging to the surface, falling about in a way that showed the necessity of the precautions taken by the police, and the certain destruction that would have overwhelmed any boat within their reach.

TERMINATION OF HER FIRST VOYAGE.

"After some further obstacles the Leviathan was again got under way and brought slowly down to her moorings opposite Deptford. Here she was instantly made fast, stem and stern, to the Government moorings in the centre of the river, at a part where, even at low water, she will have almost double the depth required to float her."

DEPARTURE OF THE PRINCESS ROYAL.

The Prince and Princess Frederick William, of Prussia, quitted England on the 2d inst. They proceeded from London by railroad to Gravesend, where they embarked in the royal yacht, under a salute from Tilbury Fort and the squadron in attendance, and amidst the enthusiastic cheers of the assembled crowds. In the City of London and along the route there was a perfect ovation to the young couple.

THE PARTING BETWEEN THE PRINCESS AND HER FAMILY.

At Gravesend fifty-eight young ladies had been directed to strew flowers under the feet of the young bride. They were all uniformly attired in light white dresses, with mantles of blue, trimmed with swan's-down, and on their heads a wreath of drooping lilies of the valley. With much good taste the young ladies selected for this graceful act of homage to the Princess were nearly all children, and their faces were radiant with delight, partly in anticipation of their pleasing duties, and perhaps also in recollection of the conspicuous and striking feature which they themselves formed in the tableau. The Mayor's daughter, an exceedingly pretty and interesting child, came laden with a magnificent bouquet, which she was specially charged to present to the bride. In compliance with some stentorian injunctions issued just before the advent of the Royal party, there was very little cheering on the pier itself, and the good taste of this arrangement among such a number of people, in such a comparatively confined space, was obvious. Still, however, it could not altogether prevent the cheers which greeted the bride as she stood leaning on her husband's arm. Her face was slightly flushed, as if with the excitement of the scene; and, with her eyes red and swollen, as if from weeping, she courtesied with a stately grace peculiarly her own, in return for the deep reverences which welcomed her, and seemed, though self-possessed, to look around with something of a feeling of timidity and hesitation.

The Princess soon entered the cabin of the royal yacht, and there took leave of her father and brothers. On reappearing on deck the Prince Consort was grave, but composed, though the effort which it cost him to maintain an appearance of serenity was visible to all. With less self-command, the Prince of Wales and Prince Alfred made little attempt to conceal their grief, and the latter especially wept with all that bitterness which marks the affliction of the young. The yacht then weighed anchor. As she steamed away the Prince Consort waved his hand to the Royal bridegroom again and again, but kept his composure, but not so did the young Princes, whose grief seemed only redoubled by the tokens of farewell around them. Neither could conceal his sorrow, and neither tried to do so, but stood brushing away the tears from their eyes, and still watching the royal yacht, till, as her distance from the shore increased, Prince Alfred fairly hid his face in his handkerchief and sobbed as if his heart was breaking. On such an occasion there were not many who could resist the contagious influence of a sorrow so innocent and so sincere, and there were few who looked with dry eyes upon this scene at the departure of the daughter of England.

THE PROPOSED ALIEN LAW IN ENGLAND.

The Press says: "We believe we may state confidently, that among the earliest measures introduced by Government at the approaching meeting of Parliament, a bill, framed with special reference to the recent atrocious attempt upon the life of the Emperor of the French, will be produced to restrict the privileges of aliens. It is obvious that the unrestricted liberty hitherto enjoyed by political refugees in this country has been conditional. There has ever existed a tacit understanding that our hospitality was not to be abused; and if such men commit a willful infraction of that understanding, they can have no just cause of complaint at the imposition of a restrictive law."

LADY BULWER IN TROUBLE AGAIN.

It seems from a circular signed "Isaac Ironside, Free Press office, Sheffield," that Lady Bulwer Lytton is in urgent distress, and has nothing to hope from her husband. She has been advised to have recourse to legal proceedings against him, and Mr. Ironside solicits subscriptions from her friends to defray the expenses of the suit.

FRANCE.

MEETING OF AMERICANS AT PARIS.

A very numerous and highly respectable meeting of Americans was held on 29th January, in the Hôtel du Louvre, Paris, to express their sentiments on the recent atrocious attempt to assassinate the Emperor of the French. The Hon. John Wethered, ex-member of the United States Congress, was called to the Chair, and in a few observations he explained the object of the meeting. Mr. Pillé, of Louisiana, then proposed, and Mr. Prescott, of Boston, seconded the following resolutions:

"Whereas, By the Constitution of the United States, the conduct of our relations with foreign Governments is confided to the President of the United States, we, as citizens of the United States, now assembled, disclaim all inclination of purpose to interfere with the Executive of our country in the discharge of its duties; and,

"Whereas, While temporarily sojourning in Paris, an attempt has been made to assassinate their Majesties the Emperor and Empress of the French, and that by means which necessarily endangered the lives of many of both sexes and all ages, against whom the murderers could have had no cause of ill-will; and,

"Whereas, Americans regard with horror the crime of assassination and such diabolical attempts to commit it;

"Resolved, That we have heard with detestation of the attempt made on the 14th inst. to destroy the lives of the reigning Emperor and Empress of the French.

"Resolved, That we express our congratulations at the escape which, under Providence, has been accorded to their Majesties from the terrible dangers to which they were exposed.

"Resolved, That the Chairman of this meeting be requested to communicate these resolutions, so that they may be made known to their Majesties."

These resolutions having been put from the chair, were adopted unanimously, and the Chairman signed them. The meeting then broke up.

THE EMPRESS TO BE REGENT.

On Feb. 2, M. Fould read the following Message to the Senate from the Emperor:

"MESSIEURS LES SENATEURS,—The Senatus-Consultum of the 17th of July, 1856, leaves a doubt which I now think it advisable to put an end to. In fact, it only confers the Regency on the Empress, or, she failing, on French Princes, provided the Emperor has not by some public or secret act willed it otherwise.

"'I believe I am responding to the public wish at the same time that I follow my own feelings of the highest confidence in the Empress by designating her as Regent. Actuated by the same feeling, I designate, she failing, as her successors in the Regency, the French Princes in order of hereditary succession to the Crown.

"'I have also wished to provide for any doubts which might arise as regards the Council of Regency from the alternatives left open by the 18th Article of the Senatus-Consultum of the 17th of July. Consequently, I have established a Privy Council, which, with the addition of two French Princes nearest in the line of hereditary succession, will become the Council of Regency from the sole fact of the accession of the Emperor a minor, if at that moment I should not have established another by public act. This Privy Council, formed of men who enjoy my confidence, will be consulted on the great affairs of the State, and will prepare itself by the study of the duties and necessities of a Government for the important task which the future may have in reserve for it.

"'Whereupon, I pray God to have you in His holy keeping. NAPOLEON.

"'PALACE OF THE TUILERIES, February 1, 1858.'"

The Message was accompanied by letters patent, nominating the Empress Regent and the following a Council of Regency: His Eminence Cardinal Morlot, his Excellency Marshal Duke of Malakhoff, his Excellency M. Achille Fould, his Excellency M. Troplong, his Excellency Count de Morny, his Excellency M. Baroche, his Excellency Count de Persigny.

THE NEW REPRESSIVE MEASURES.

The repressive measure which has been proposed to the Corps Legislatif consists of certain additions to several of the articles of the Penal Code. Article 2 punishes with imprisonment of from one month to two years every individual who, with the object of disturbing the public peace, or of exciting hatred and contempt against the Government of the Emperor, shall have practiced any intrigues or carried on any correspondence either within this country or abroad. 3. Every individual who, without being authorized, shall have manufactured, sold, or distributed, firstly, destructive machines acting by explosion or otherwise; secondly, fulminating powder of whatever description, shall be punished with imprisonment for six months to five years, and by a fine of 50 to 3000 francs. Article 7 declares as following: "Any individual may be interne in France or Algeria, or expelled, who was condemned, expelled, interne, or transported in May or June, 1848, in June, 1849, or in December, 1851, and who may again have been pointed out by important circumstances as dangerous to public safety."

EMASCULATED CONDITION OF THE PRESS.

The Paris correspondent of the Times writes: "This extreme severity has reduced the press to the most extenuated condition. It is not the shadow of what it was. No journalist thinks of expressing an opinion of his own on the topics of the day. To speak or to be mute is equally hazardous. The Spectateur was suppressed for having, at the close of its article denouncing the crime of the 14th, said a few words about hereditary right; the Journal des Débats is denounced for not saying enough; and the Phare de la Loire officially reprimanded for quoting its authority for a fact. I take the papers this morning as a specimen of what the press is reduced to. The first in seniority, rank, and talent, the Journal des Débats, contains a brief summary of intelligence from India, taken from the English papers, from New York, from Mexico, from Hayti, and the Vienna Gazette. The rest of its first and second page is occupied with extracts, most cautiously selected, from the European and provincial journals, or from the French Moniteur; the third page contains a review of the literary works of Rancon, and the fourth advertisements and theatrical news.

SECOND ESCAPE OF THE BARK ADRIATIC.

From the following paragraph from the Paris Correspondence of the London Globe, it may be inferred that Captain Durham, of the bark Adriatic, has again eluded the vigilance of the French authorities, and has made his second escape from captivity:

"You have already heard how that maritime Jack Sheppard, Captain Durham of the Adriatic clipper, has broken loose again, and is once more over the waters of the dark blue sea. Count Cavour telegraphed to the authorities at Marseilles and Toulon his arrival in the Gulf of Spezzia, whence the French war steamers dragged him to Genoa, the weather being too stormy to proceed farther. It would appear that they relied on the Genoese Captain of the Port for safe custody, and the port Captain on the French; but between them, amidst the squalls and darkness, the clipper crept out at night, and dashed off in a smart and clever style. Lever tells of a Tipperary peasant, when asked to pay for prayers for his son, who had come to grief, saying: 'My boy, when alive, broke out of every jail in Munster, and he won't stay long in purgatory.'"

MARSHAL BOSQUET WOUNDED IN A DUEL.

A correspondent writes: "A duel was fought a few days ago between Marshal Bosquet and a general officer whose name I am not at liberty to mention. The Marshal was wounded. The cause of meeting was very delicate, essentially French. In some countries, instead of being called out, the gallant Marshal would till lately have figured as defendant in a crim. con. case. The outraged husband surprised the guilty couple flagrante delicto, and according to French law would have been justified in avenging his honor by killing the adulterer on the spot. The authorities are trying to hush up the matter."

ANOTHER NEWSPAPER WARNED.

The editor of the Phare de la Loire, a journal published at Nantes, has received a warning from the Prefect of the Department, for having published an article describing the opening of the Legislative Session, in which a doubt is cast on the fact of the Emperor's speech having been received with cries of "Vive l'Empereur! Vive l'Impératrice! Vive le Prince Imperial!" The speech, it appears, was forwarded to the papers previously to its delivery, with the "Vives" inserted at the places where it was thought by the authorities they ought to occur. The Phare said that the cries were stated to have been uttered, but did not confirm the assertion that they actually were so.

FUNERAL OF THE QUEEN OF OUDE.

A Paris paper thus describes the funeral of the Queen: "During the night the body of the Queen, after having been embalmed and wrapped up, received from the hands of the princesses and the women of their suite the last marks of attention. A diadem was placed on her brow, a necklace of lapis lazuli round her neck, and circlets of amber round her arms and legs. A number of amulets were also attached to the covering in which the body was enveloped. The coffin was of rather singular form, as it was made to receive the body in a sitting posture. It was entirely lined with wadding covered over with silk. Prayers were recited during the whole night by the Mohammedan priests who had accompanied the Queen on her journey, it being to that religion that her Majesty belonged, and not to the Buddhists, as has been erroneously stated. The females also watched during the whole night near the body. In the morning the rich ornaments were taken off, and the last preparations having been completed, the body was placed in the coffin, which, being covered with gold brocade, was raised amidst the tears of all the persons present, and placed on the funeral car. This vehicle was hung with white silk, and drawn by six horses richly caparisoned. Six officers of the Queen walked by the side of the car, and behind it was the brother and the chief officer of the household of the deceased. The chief mourner was Prince Mirz, son of the deceased, who leaned on the arm of General d'Orgoni. The prince wore a sort of red turban, richly ornamented with precious stones, and surmounted by an aigrette in diamonds. After him walked the servants of the Queen. Thirteen mourning coaches followed, the cortége being headed and closed by a body of sergents de ville, who had some difficulty in clearing the way, so dense was the crowd assembled. The procession went along the Boulevards to Père-Lachaise, and, after appropriate prayers had been recited in the mosque, the body was deposited in the Turkish cemetery." The proceedings then terminated, and the crowd dispersed.

RUSSIA.

NARROW ESCAPE OF A DIVER AT SEBASTOPOL.

The following is from a letter communicated to the Tribune:

"'We had a terrible excitement on board one day last week. One of the divers (Harris, the English marine spoken of before), a first-rate fellow, and bold as a lion, goes down examining the outside of the ship on which they are at work. He had been forward and was going aft, along the bottom, in sixty feet of water, when he suddenly signaled for more air, and though the pressure was instantly increased, two more signals for 'air,' and 'to come up,' followed in rapid succession, and then ceased all reply to signals given. Thinking the fault was in the air-pump, the speed was increased until a pipe bursting near the engine showed that the hose was foul. Then they shouted to the other diving party, in a row-boat at a little distance, to come to the rescue. That diver was brought up by his tenders, and they commenced rowing for the steamer. Meanwhile, poor Harris made no more response to the anxious signaling of his tenders, and they had tried in vain to haul him up—the 'life-line' was also foul. The pump was kept slowly in motion, but no bubbles came up from the water, and we knew that no air was reaching him. The row-boat was coming as fast as possible, but I thought it never would arrive. At last they came alongside. The diver's helmet was closed, strong hands worked rapidly and silently, and in an instant he was lowered out of sight, the hose of his suffocating companion in his hand; there was an interval of two or three minutes of fearful suspense, in which no word was spoken by any of the score of men gathered there, save one whisper—'It must be too late.' Suddenly a second column of rising air-bubbles appeared. 'The hose is cleared—he has air!' several voices spoke eagerly. Then followed the signal for rising, and up they came, poor Harris all stark and motionless. 'Stop the pump, he is dead!' said one, unscrewing the eye-glass through which he saw the ghastly countenance and frothy lips. But the cold air striking his livid face, the eyelids half opened and closed again. 'He is alive!' they all cried, joyfully, and removing the unsightly helmet, and dashing water on his head and breast, he presently began to breathe perceptibly, and after an hour's diligent rubbing from as many strong and willing hands as could get around him, he began to come to consciousness. He suffered great pain for hours in the head and breast, but is now altogether recovered, and diving as usual."

INDIA.

NO QUARTER GIVEN.

An officer in command of a regiment says: "I never let my men take prisoners, but shoot them at once. I have made made many a Sepoy pay the penalty for mutinying and killing my brother officers and friends, and trust more will suffer ere I have done."

CHINA.

DIPLOMATIC AFFAIRS.

The correspondent of the London Times says: "There has been solemn conference at Macao, and it has been whispered that Count Putiatine was admitted to the councils of Lord Elgin and Baron Gros. A rumor soon spread that Mr. Reed had taken an independent line, and had met with a rebuff. He had, so went the story, sent a proposal to Yeh to treat with him inside the city, but Yeh replied that he should be happy to see him outside the city, but could not think of admitting any barbarian within the walls of Canton. Mr. Reed then proceeded to Macao, but even rumor did not venture to affirm what he proposed to himself by this journey, or whether the rather contemptuous refusal he had just received had in any way modified his opinion as to entangling alliances. The Chinese have another version of this affair. They profess to have seen a copy of the answer, and laugh when they speak of it. I have not been able to induce any of them to procure me a transcript, and can not make much of their description of it. If it should reach you by way of America, I think you will find that the Imperial Commissioner has replied to his Excellency, Mr. Reed, by what is vulgarly called 'a sell,' a sort of Chinese version of 'Don't you wish you may get it?' Certain it is that Mr. Reed is very irate with his Celestial friends, and has rather abandoned his idea of being master of the position. Yeh seems resolved to show the world that he is determined to carry out the policy openly acknowledged in that notorious Chinese state paper, and to consider the terms of the last treaty binding only so long as he had not force enough to break them. He seems to be confident also that the present is a proper season for perseverance in this policy. He has doubtless heard of the might and wonderful contrivances of the Minnesota. Nothing that can be said in praise of her discipline and arrangements, her exquisitely-finished machinery for economizing labor and time in the working of her guns, her Sharpe's rifles, her officers' cabins, and her state reception-rooms, can be too great praise, but Yeh has heard all about these."

NARROW ESCAPE OF THE ILLUSTRATED NEWS CORRESPONDENT.

He adds: "Another affair has happened, which has attracted some attention. Intelligence travels slowly from ship to ship in our widely separated force, but I believe the circumstances are these: On the afternoon of Monday, Lieutenant Pym, of Arctic celebrity, who now commands the Lanterer, landed for exercise in the neighborhood of a Mandarin village some way down the river. He was accompanied by Mr. Wurgman, the artist who is here sketching for the Illustrated News. Allured by the friendly appearance of the inhabitants, they entered the village, and they appear also to have entered the house of the Mandarin there. Whether Lieutenant Pym was acting prudently or properly in doing this I am not able to state; my information is too indistinct to allow me to offer even a suggestion upon this point. All that is certain is, that, as the party returned to the boat, the population of the village suddenly encompassed them, and poured in a volley from gingals and other fire-arms. Five men were killed. Lieutenant Pym was shot through both legs. The interpreter then jumped overboard, and was followed by several of the men, who retreated across the paddy fields. They were followed by the Chinese multitude, and six wounded. All this took place within sight of the Nankin, whence assistance was, of course, dispatched at the first sound of fire-arms. The Nankin men arrived just in time to rescue Lieutenant Pym, who was keeping the Chinese at bay with his sword and revolver. Of the whole party every one was either killed or wounded, except Mr. Wurgman and two seamen. This seems to have been a most treacherous and unprovoked assault, and an attack upon the village was subsequently made by the Nankin. The first attempt was, I believe, not very successful, but it will doubtless be renewed."

MEXICO.

THE FALL OF COMONFORT.

The correspondent of the Herald writes: "On Wednesday, the 19th ultimo, the firing commenced at 11 A.M. with unusual severity, and the day will long be memorable in the annals of this city as that on which occurred the fiercest fighting which Mexico has ever witnessed, although fighting, or rather civil wars, are common here. The bombardment was sustained without an instant's intermission, until late in the afternoon, and as the fire was well directed, great havoc was made in many parts of the city.

"About 2 P.M. the pronunciados obtained possession of one of the most important positions of the government, and repelled a large force of government troops which were sent against them. Having once obtained this position, they silenced immediately one of the most effective batteries of the government party, and brought their guns to bear with telling effect upon the San Francisco, the palace, and in fact all the remaining posts of the government. The success of the pronunciados here inspired confidence throughout their ranks, and, of course, struck terror upon both the leaders and men of the government. To such an extent did the panic spread among the government troops that long before the chances of their success became desperate, they deserted in bodies with their officers at their heads, and passed over to the enemy, preferring such a course, dishonorable and dangerous as it might be, to trusting themselves to the tender mercies of the pronunciados in case of a defeat. Comonfort himself, though he manifested the most admirable courage and coolness throughout the whole affair, was rendered powerless by the desertion of his forces, and was obliged to retire to the palace while he yet held it, and make hasty preparations for flight. Thus, in one day, by a successful manœuvre on the part of the pronunciados, and the desertion of the government troops, a civil war which, under ordinary circumstances, would have lasted many weeks, was brought to an end at once. On the following morning, Thursday, the 21st, Comonfort, with the miserable remnant of his former army which still remained faithful to him, left the city and took the road to Vera Cruz. All the positions which had been held by the government were abandoned during the night, and the pronunciados entered them triumphantly on the following morning.

"The rejoicings being over, General Zuloaga, one of the leaders of his party, and a man who has risen from the lowest station in life, was duly elected President of the republic, and en suite all the other public officers were elected in the same manner."

THE BRIDESMAIDS

THE WEDDING OF THE PRINCESS ROYAL OF ENGLAND.

THE WEDDING OF THE PRINCESS ROYAL OF ENGLAND.

Of the illustrations on the preceding page, one represents the wedding of the Princess Royal of England in the Royal Chapel, in St. James's Palace, London; the other, the noble bridesmaids who attended the Princess to the altar. The attention which the event has attracted throughout the world will justify the space which it occupies in this week's paper.

The Princess Royal was born on 21st November, 1840, and was christened by the names of Victoria Adelaide Maria Louisa. As she was the eldest child of the Queen, she was, until her brother was born, the heir-apparent to the throne, and as such acquired, during the first year of her life, more of the public attention than she has ever since enjoyed since. Her dangers and sufferings during that first year were elaborately chronicled by the most serious journals of Great Britain; a volume of poems was written on the acute agony she endured when, in the courtly language of the Jenkins of the day, "she was first introduced, at the age of six months, to solid food." In the course of the next year however her mother made his appearance, and the poor Princess relapsed into a secondary rank.

From time to time, however, she provided the Court newsman with material for a paragraph. When she was four or five years old, she was kept awake one night by the incessant snoring of a sentry under her window. She seems to have made no remark about it; but next evening, hearing the same cough as she was walking on the terrace, she ran up to the unfortunate cougher, and asked, in infantile accents—

"How is your cough, soldier? I hope it's better."

This was considered an extraordinary evidence of the Princess's sensibility; no doubt it was.

She was eight years old when, on the occasion of the Prince of Prussia's visit to England, the possibility of an alliance with the Royal House of Prussia glanced more to have dawned upon the mind of the Heroic Father-in-Law-Bobus-Imbecillus. Be that as it may, we are told, with the Prince of Prussia; and he was, or appeared to be, equally surprised and delighted at the vivacity and intelligence displayed by the youthful Princess. His son, Prince Frederick William, was seventeen—about seven years older than the Princess. It is believed that he was straightaway noticed that it depended upon himself to make a very prepossessing match, and one who was the best match in Europe.

When the happy Prussian first met is not recorded in history; but it is certain that when the Princess was fifteen she was staying at the Queen's highland home, at Balmoral, and was there visited by the Prince Frederick William. The young people walked and rode together—as we are told—and were much pleased; and, whether they only followed the dictates of their own feelings, or their part was prompted by the senior managers of the affair, the young Prince Frederick William left they were privately engaged.

The course of true love, it seems, can not run smooth even in royal families. An accident very nearly deprived the Prussian lover of the Princess's love. In a fit of abstraction, one evening in her boudoir, the Princess raked her arm over the fire, and set fire to her gauze sleeve. It was summer time, and her white dress was of that transparent tissue which is best calculated to burn; for a moment it seemed possible that the unfortunate girl would be burned alive. She showed, however, enough presence of mind to take up her dress and roll her burning arm tightly in it; by that means the fire was extinguished, and the Princess escaped with some severe burns.

Soon after this the attitude of Prussia in the Crimean war threatened to disturb the happiness of the young couple. The King of Prussia was not the brother-in-law and intimate friend of the Emperor Nicholas. Furthermore, Prussia had no political end to serve by participating in a war test in which she had no real interest. When, therefore, the Russian Empire was called on by the Western Powers to espouse their cause against Russia he resolutely refused. The English, proportionally selfish and unprincipled, were not surprised for a moment the situation of the Prussian monarch; they changed his judicious neutrality into a vile crime, and ruled at him as though he had been a pariah. We can all remember the caricatures with which Punch pelted "Frog-Frederick," and the bitter diatribes which overflowed from the London press. One of the cleverest of these articles touched a tender spot. A hint of the engagement of the Princess Royal was given to the Times; and that journal fiercely inquired whether "a daughter of England" was to be traded off to the heir of England's enemy? The question was difficult. Though, of course, the Queen could marry her daughter to whom she pleased, it could not obtain a portion for them save from Parliament, and that, as the Court well knew, could never be obtained so long as the Times opposed the marriage. The Queen's advisers resolved to temporize. The young lovers were separated. The Prince went back to his Court, the Princess to her studies; meanwhile Queen Victoria on one side, and the King of Prussia on the other, prayed earnestly that some accident would relieve them from their embarrassment.

It was the knowledge of the antipathy entertained by the English for the Prussian marriage which induced the young King of Prussia to visit England. He, too, was in search of a wife, and was not insensible to the great advantage to accrue of an alliance with the English House of Brunswick, or to the particular comfort of a fat sovereign assured to his wife by Parliament. He was very popular in England, as he had done precisely what Prussia had refused to do; he had sent a contingent to the Crimea. He was a fine looking young fellow, with generous, liberal principles, and remarkable capacity as a lady-killer. Altogether there seemed to be a fair prospect for his suit, in case he pressed it. How the affair came to an end we are not yet informed. It is generally surmised that the Queen, whose Protestantism is of no tolerant kind, interposed a veto on the marriage of her daughter to a Roman Catholic. Courtiers assert that the Princess, having once plighted her troth, had too much honor to entertain the idea of encouraging another suitor. Certain it is that the King of Sardinia failed.

The next point was to overcome the prejudice existing in the British mind against every thing Prussian. This was managed with considerable dexterity. The Prussian press were warned by the police that the Princess Royal of England would marry no one who would involve the immediate suppression of the indolent newspaper. The British press was conciliated by the Court. They were invited to state circumstances, and more generally encouraged to forget that Prussia had ever been the case before. Peace had been declared with Russia; thus the cause of offence was removed. Personally, the young Prince was not unpopular; a recent incident had won him the favor of a large section of the British people. The Duke Hinckelby, Minister of Police at Berlin, had rendered himself very odious to the Prussian nobility by his severe or else by very unjust measures. Themselves, the Prussian nobles decided not to dance with Mademoiselle Hinckelby at a ball at which they were to be given just afterward. Their decision was communicated to Prince Frederick William. His Highness was "sorry" for the circumstance; he begged to me that whatever differences you may have with Prince Hinckelby, you will not visit them upon me," and not with his daughter. For my part, I intend to open the ball with that lady." The story got wind, and did the Prince credit.

At length, in May, 1856, it was considered safe to venture upon a public announcement of the engagement; and, after some preliminary "feelers," the Gazette announced the official consent of the Queen to the "contract of matrimony." No sin was made till, in the spring of 1857, a formal application was made to Parliament for a "provision" for the Princess Royal. For some weeks before the imminence of such an application was disclosed, and the Radical and Opposition press had sounded notes of alarm. A natural outcry was raised against the idea of the heir of England's house to support the wife of a Prussian Prince. There was reason to fear that the Queen's refusal to grant this consent involved at the utterance of extravagant rumors with regard to the amount which the Prussian would expect. When the terms of marriage were freely circulated before Parliament met, to the effect that a large annuity was settled upon her for twenty thousand a year, were the least that the Princess would take. The Radicals prepared for action on the basis of these figures. But it is asserted, that, when the Government declared that the Princess would take only ten thousand of these amounts, the Opposition was cheated out of its rapture; and after a few wordy speeches, Parliament granted, by a large majority, the sum of £40,000 down, and an annuity of £40,000 a year. A very comfortable thing it is for a young couple to get the whole allowance of Prince Frederick William is only £30,000 a year.

The wedding was postponed by various accidents —the illness of the King of Prussia, the death of the Duchess of Sussex, &c.—till the 25th of January. A general wish was expressed that the ceremony should take place in Westminster Abbey, which is a more large building, capable of receiving several thousand spectators; but the existence of illness in the Royal Family, and a marriage induced the Court to defy public opinion, and to adhere to the original design of having the marriage celebrated in the old Chapel Royal in St. James's Palace. The event set newspaper men a-thinking about the dress of the bridesmaids. This was to be honored by the nuptial ceremony; whence it appeared that, after having served as a manufactory for many years, it became a hospital for "maiden lepers;" then a palace, where Anne and Queen Caroline were successively married the last days of Bloody Queen Mary, where Charles the First took leave of his children, and was before his execution, where Charles the Second was born, where Anne and the Georges spent their still uninteresting lives. At last it was considered to be married in, certainly. The Chapel was consecrated for the marriage of Queen Victoria in February, 1840; but remembrances still hung round it of that fatally inauspicious marriage which, in the course of the next half century before, when George the Fourth, fortified by copious draughts of Cura oa, went through the ceremony by candlelight to the unhappy Caroline of Brunswick.

A very full account of the ceremony was given in last week's paper.

The bridesmaids selected were Lady Cecilia Lennox, Lady Susan Pelham Clinton, Lady Susan Murray, Lady Catherine Hamilton, Lady Cecilia Maynes, Lady Adelaide Paget, and the Honorable Villiers, and Lady Victoria Noel. It may be presumed that they were selected with a due regard to considerations as from their intimacy with the bride. Lady Emma Stanley is the daughter of the Earl of Derby; Lady Frances Villiers, that of the Earl of Clarendon; Lady Susan Clinton of the Duke of Newcastle; the fathers of the other bridesmaids, though of the highest rank, are less known than those we have named. Respecting their appearance on the occasion of the chapel, the reporter of the Times remarks:

"It is but just praise to say how well those noble maidens upheld even the high traditionary fame of England's beauty, and how they added their own in no meanings of the first and noblest of the land. Astbey move along forward, scanning the brilliant audience with timid glances now and then, the lines which Byron has applied to the Queen's attendants, to the 'Dove and the Leaf,' irresistibly recurto memory, and the spectators realize the vision of the poet when he sang—

'A train the brightest which e'er graced
Behind the sons of Heaven to rebel.
I saw their fairy and every dimpling grace,
Less than an angel would their worth debase.
But their mien, like liveries of a kind

Simple, but rich, in fresh within my mind.'

In calm white as more the troop was greet'd,
The same with sparkling jewels set around.

"The dresses worn by this fair train are from a design furnished by the illustrious bride herself. They consist of a white glace petticoat, entirely covered by six deep tulle flounces, over which falls a tunic of tulle trimmed with ruches of tulle, looped up on one side with a bouquet of gold roses and white lavender. The body is trimmed with draperies of tulle, with hanging sleeves of the same material, trimmed with ruches of lavender. The head dress is worn in the girdle and open each other."

Of the bride's dress we gave in our last number a pretty full description. Our old subscribers will remember that we likewise gave, at the time of her betrothal, in No. 25 of the Weekly, an excellent portrait of the late Prussian Prince Frederick William. Without being beautiful, she has a pleasing countenance; her cheeks are rich and red, her eyes good, her auburn hair very heavy and rich; her face is test decided, perhaps, by saying that it is unmistakably English. Were Hush so frequently discerned by a frown, it would be subject of severe criticism and admonition. The Princess's figure is excellent. Wholesome exercise in the open air—riding and walking—have imparted to her form strength and elasticity which are rare even among ladies who are not so fortunate as to be princesses.

Needless to say that the wedding has given a tremendous impetus to the pastry cook portion of the British literati. Tons of verse have been written on the nuptial altar; the sacrifices of rhyme, good taste, and grammar offered have indeed been immense. We can only make room for a couple of them.

The first is the poem obligato by the Poet Laureate, Alfred Tennyson, who receives £1000 a year for firing off verses when the state of the nation requires them. It runs as follows:

God bless our Prince and bride!
God bless our lands allid,
God save the Queen!
Clothe them in righteousness,
Crown them with happiness,
Them with all blessings bless,
God save the Queen!

Pair fall this hallowed hour,
Farewell, our royal flower,
God save the Queen!
Farewell, but stay!
Let both the peoples say,
God bless the Queen!
God bless the Queen!

The other is the contribution of Punch, Mark Lemon, and has been set to music by Frank Romer. It reads as follows:

Fair-haired virgin weighs the gold
Which her finger doth enfold,
Ruth with hope and pain and height
On a perfect circumbin
Hammering, hammering merrily:

When the day was nearly shed,
Ere its Eden-scent had fled,
Fairy hands in silver flowers
All her wreath of bridal flowers
Gathering, gathering lovingly:

All the mode that belongs
To summer's most splendid songs,
Songs we scarcely hear yet feel,
Seem to make her bridal peal,
Ringing, ringing joyfully:

In the cot and lordly bower
Love then watch'by her flower—
Kindly words half hushed in tears—
Hopeful prayers for coming years—
Uttered, uttered lovingly.

The Athenæum has collected much interesting gossip respecting the wedding and the previous processes of England. The first English princess, of true English descent, who was married in England was, it was thought, Mary, whose lover and husband was so poor that he couldn't pay his traveling expenses to the wedding place, and a tax of three shillings was levied on every hide of land throughout the kingdom to enable him to pursue his journey. Mary, daughter of Stephen, followed suit. She was an abbess; but her daughter lover, William of Aimale, was not to be denied. He broke into stormy night, broke into the convent, carried off the abbess—neither with or without her consent we are told—and rode off with her on a pillion in high good-humor. Joanna, daughter of King John, married Alexander of Scotland, but he was a very poor devil, and the English paid his traveling expenses to the tune of £200. The money was performed, and back to Edinburgh. So his successor, the third Scottish Alexander, who not only got paid for traveling from New York to marry the daughter of Henry III., but insisted on a regular salary from the English monarch during the whole period of his absence on the wedding trip, and greatly exasperated the English by refusing, after all their liberality, to do the usual trilling for the English knee! which the King had bestowed upon him.

Intelligence of the Princess Royal's wedding must have been. When Joanna, daughter of Edward the First, was married to the Earl of Gloucester, the Welsh bards "sang sweet dirges, but alluded to sisters to wee old ones; and, not content with this, to soon as the unmarry was over he made the Welsh give up her fine clothes, as "they would do very well for the next of her sisters who was married." On this occasion twenty-eight shillings were contributed in largesse to the people.

We read of the marriage—that of Mary, daughter of Charles the First, to William, afterward Prince of Orange—which must have been a serious night. The bridegroom was a mere boy, a brisk nine, the bridesmaids all very little children. Bishop Wren performed the ceremony: the children had a good romp; the happy couple were obliged to stand up and receive so many congratulations that they could hardly be kept awake till bedtime.

The first marriage, in England, of a Princess of the Georgian era, occurred," says the Athenæum, "in March, 1733, when the Prince of Orange, fifteen years old, was called up—almost as George the Second a 'baboon,' was crowned by the Princess Anne, 'in the French Chapel,' St. James's. The groom was hideously ugly, and the bride was marked by the small-pox. The ceremony took place in the evening. At midnight there was a public supper, and at two in the morning the unromantic couple sat upin bed, in rich undresses, while the Court and nobility, as a chronicler remarks, 'feed from an extraordinary supper and strong wines, defiled before them, making pleasant remarks that the while, as fair gentlemen used to make who were born in our Augustan age.' As similar observances marked the other royal marriages of the children of George II. a retrospect into the happy state, a simple record of the fact, by mark the decline of the times."

It must be confessed that the times have improved since then. There is offered, reason to believe, no marriage which the Court has taken place was prompted by as sincere affection on both sides as in the present wedding with great state; and every kind-hearted person throughout the world will wish bride and bridegroom joy and happiness!

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Hope tells a flattering tale to the sages. He is understood by a Solicitor, and left to mourn; but in turn, launch unconsciously. Mr. Gotchod is left to mourn by a Solicitor, and the Solicitor deceives his client, which is 6s. 8d. in the Solicitor's pocket.

The next morning Arabella Crane was seareshy dressed before Mr. Riggs knocked at her door. On the previous night the Bailiff had informed him that William and Sophy Wade were discovered in a house called by courtesy Crane, the unhappy manager rushed to the steam-packet office, and was favored by an inspection of the books, which each confirmed the bailiff's allegations. As if in mockery of his bereaved and deluded state, on reaching home he found a letter from his mother, requesting him to call at the office of that eminent solicitor, with reference to a young gentleman named Wade, Sophy, and hinting "that the visit might prove to his advantage." The morning for a visit however that Mr. Lonely, conscience-stricken, might through this solicitor pay back £100, he rushed incontinent to Mr. Gotchod's office, and found it once admitted into the presence of that stately practitioner.

"I beg your pardon, Sir," said Mr. Gotchod, with formal politeness, "but I heard a day or two ago accidentally from my brother-in-law, who had learned it also accidentally from a sporting friend, that you were existing at Hazlewood, during the race-week, a young actress named on the play-bills (here is one) 'Juliet Arambury,' and whom, as I am also informed, you had previously exhibited in Surrey and elsewhere; but who was suspected to be your daughter under private engagement, and left your stage with her grandfather, William Wade. I am instructed by a distinguished client, who is desirous to avoid, who from motives of mere benevolence, invests himself in the said William and Sophy Wade, to discover their residence. Please, therefore, to render up the child to my charge, apprising me also of the residence of your daughter. If he be not with you; and without waiting for further instructions from my client, which I am aware, I will venture to say that any sacrifice in the loss of your juvenile actress will be most liberally compensated."

"Sir," cried the miserable and impudent Lonely, "I paid £100 for my daughter's child—a three years' engagement—and I have been robbed. Restore me the £100, and I will tell you where she is. Not a farthing else."

"Certainly, Sir, that is my property."

"Then it is quite clear that though you may have wheedled her out of my power by your lover self, and can not, therefore, place her in my hands. Perhaps she is—in heaven?"

"Confound her, Sir! no—in Americs! or on the seas to it."

"Not sure?"

"I have just come from the steam-packet office, and seen the names in their book. William and Sophy Wade sailed from Liverpool last Thursday week."

"And she has formed an engagement with you —received your money; broke the one, absconded with the other. Bad characters indeed!"

"Bad, Sir! my wife will never get rid of scribbling scoundrels, the whole lot and kin. And the impudence to!" continued Lonely, "I was more than a father to that child" (he began to whimper); "I fed her, I clothed her; my own wife died of convulsions in teething. I thought that child would have supplied its place, and I dreamed of the Lord Mayor's Show; but that vice was lost in the folds of a marvelously dirty red pocket-handkerchief.

Mr. Gotchod having now, however, learned all that he cared to learn, and not being a softhearted man (first-rate clients excepted), here, here pulled out his watch and said,

"Sir, your loss has been much exaggerated, I perceive. I must wish you good-day: I have an engagement in the Cre. I can not help you back to your £100, but accept this trifle (a £5 note) for your loss of time in calling" (ringing the bell violently). "Door—show out this gentleman."

That evening Mr. Gotchod wrote at length to Mary Darvill, informing her that, after great pains and prolonged research, he had been so fortunate as to ascertain that the strolling player and little girl whom Mr. Darrell had so benevolently requested him to look up, were very bad characters, and had left the country for the United States, as, happily for England, bad characters were wont to do.

That letter reached Guy Darrell when he was far away, amidst the forlorn pomp of some old Italian city, and Lionel's tale of the little girl not very fresh in his gloomy thoughts. Naturally, he supposed that the boy had been duped by a pretty face and his own inexperienced kindly heart. And so and so—why, so end half the efforts of men who intrust to others the troublesome execution of humane intentions! The scales of earthly justice are poised in their quivering equilibrium, not by huge hundred-weights, but by infinitesimal grains, needing the most wary caution—the most considerate patience—the most delicate touch, to arrange or readjust. Few of our errors, national or individual, come from the design to be unjust—most of them from sloth, or incapacity to grapple with the difficulties of being just. Sins of commission may not, perhaps, shock the retrospect of conscience. Large and obtrusive to view, we have confessed, mourned, repented, possibly atoned them. Sins of omission, so vailed amidst our hourly emotions—blent, confused, unseen, in the conventional routine of existence—Alas! could these suddenly emerge from their shadow, group together in serried mass and accusing order—alas, alas! would not the best of us then start in dismay, and would not the proudest humble himself at the Throne of Mercy!

CHAPTER XIX.

Joy, nevertheless, does return to Mr. Rugge; and Hope now inflicts herself on Mrs. Crane. A very fine-looking Hope, too—six feet one—strong as Achilles, and as fleet of foot!

But we have left Mr. Rugge at Mrs. Crane's door; admit him. He bursts into her drawing-room, wiping his brows.

"Ma'am, they are off to America—!"

"So I have heard. You are fairly entitled to the return of your money—"

"Entitled, of course; but—"

"There it is; restore to me the contract for the child's services."

Rugge gazed on a roll of bank-notes, and could scarcely believe his eyes. He darted forth his hand, the notes receded like the dagger in Macbeth, "First the contract," said Mrs. Crane. Rugge drew out his greasy pocket-book, and extracted the worthless engagement.

"Henceforth, then," said Mrs. Crane, "you have no right to complain; and whether or not the girl ever again fall in your way, your claim over her ceases."

"The gods be praised, it does, ma'am; I have had quite enough of her. But you are every inch a lady, and allow me to add that I put you on my free list for life."

Rugge gone; Arabella Crane summoned Bridgett to her presence.

"Lor, miss," cried Bridgett, impulsively, "who'd think you'd been up all night raking! I have not seen you look so well this many a year."

"Ah," said Arabella Crane, "I will tell you why. I have done what for many a year I never thought I should do again—a good action. That child—that Sophy—you remember how cruelly I used her?"

"Oh, miss, don't go for to blame yourself; you fed her, you clothed her, when her own father, the villing, sent her away from hisself to you—you of all people—you. How could you be caressing and fawning on his child—their child?"

Mrs. Crane hung her head gloomily. "What is past is past. I have lived to save that child, and a curse seems lifted from my soul. Now listen: I shall leave London—England, probably this evening. You will keep this house; it will be ready for me any moment I return. The agent who collects my house-rents will give you money as you want it. Stint not yourself, Bridgett. I have been saving, and saving, and saving, for dreary years—nothing else to interest me—and I am richer than I seem."

"But where are you going, miss?" said Bridgett, slowly recovering from the stupefaction occasioned by her mistress's announcement.

"I don't know—I don't care."

"Oh, gracious stars! is it with that dreadful Jasper Losely?—it is, it is. You are crazed, you are bewitched, miss!"

"Possibly I am crazed—possibly bewitched; but I take that man's life to mine as a penance for all the evil mine has ever known; and a day or two since I should have said, with rage and shame, 'I can not help it; I loathe myself that I can care what becomes of him.' Now, without rage, without shame, I say, 'The man whom I once so loved shall not die on a gibbet if I can help it; and, please Heaven, help it I will.'"

The grim woman folded her arms on her breast, and raising her head to its full height, there was in her face and air a stern gloomy grandeur, which could not have been seen without a mixed sensation of compassion and awe.

"Go, now, Bridgett; I have said all. He will be here soon; he will come—he must come—he has no choice; and then—and then—" she closed her eyes, bowed her head, and shivered.

Arabella Crane was, as usual, right in her predictions. Before noon Jasper came—came, not with his jocund swagger, but with that sideling sinister look—look of the man whom the world cuts—triumphantly restored to its former place in his visage. Madame Caumartin had been arrested; Poole had gone into the country with Uncle Sam; Jasper had seen a police-officer at the door of his own lodgings. He slunk away from the fashionable thoroughfares—slunk to the recesses of Podden Place—slunk into Arabella Crane's prim drawing-room, and said, sullenly, "All is up; here I am!"

Three days afterward, in a quiet street in a quiet town of Belgium, wherein a sharper, striving to live by his profession, would soon become a skeleton, in a commodious airy apartment, looking upon a magnificent street, the reverse of noisy, Jasper Losely sat secure, innocuous, and profoundly miserable. In another house, the windows of which, facing these of Jasper's sitting-room, from an upper story, commanded so good a view therein that it placed him under a surveillance akin to that designed by Mr. Bentham's reformatory Panopticon, sat Arabella Crane. Whatever her real feelings toward Jasper Losely (and what those feelings were no virile pen can presume authoritatively to define—for lived there ever a man who thoroughly—thoroughly understood a woman?), or whatever in earlier life might have been their reciprocated vows of eternal love, not only from the day that Jasper, on his return to his native shores, presented himself in Podden Place, had their intimacy been restricted to the austerest bounds of friendship; but after Jasper had so rudely declined the hand which now fed him, Arabella Crane had probably perceived that her sole chance of retaining intellectual power over his lawless being, necessitated the utter relinquishment of every hope or project that could expose her again to his contempt. Suiting appearances to reality, the decorum of a separate house was essential to the maintenance of that authority with which the rigid nature of their intercourse invested her. The additional cost strained her pecuniary resources, but she saved in her own accommodation in order to leave Jasper no cause to complain of any stinting in his. There, then, she sate by her window, herself unseen, eying him in his opposite solitude, accepting for her own life a barren sacrifice, but a jealous sentinel on his. Meditating as she sate, and as she eyed him—meditating what employment she could invent, with the bribe of emoluments to be paid furtively by her—for those strong hands that could have felled an ox, but were nerveless in turning an honest penny—and for that restless mind, hungering for occupation, with the digestion of an ostrich for dice and debauch, riot and fraud, but queasy as an exhausted dyspeptic at the reception of one innocent amusement, one honorable toil. But while that woman still schemes how to rescue from hulks or halter that execrable man, who shall say that he is without a chance? A chance he has—WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BOOK V.—CHAPTER I.

Envy will be a science when it learns the use of the microscope.

When leaves fall and flowers fade, great people are found in their country seats. Look!—that is Montfort Court! A place of regal magnificence, so far as extent of pile and amplitude of domain could satisfy the pride of ownership, or inspire the visitor with the respect due to wealth and power. An artist could have made nothing of it. The Sumptuous every where—the Picturesque nowhere. The House was built in the reign of George I., when first commenced that horror of the Beautiful, as something in bad taste, which, agreeably to our natural love of progress, progressively advanced through the reigns of succeeding Georges. An enormous façade—in dull brown brick—two wings and a centre, with double flights of steps to the hall door from the carriage-sweep. No trees allowed to grow too near the house; in front, a stately flat with stone balustrades. But wherever the eye turned there was nothing to be seen but park—miles upon miles of park; not a corn-field in sight—not a roof-tree—not a spire—only those lata silentia—still widths of turf, and, somewhat thinly scattered and afar, those groves of giant trees. The whole prospect so vast and so monotonous that it never tempted you to take a walk. No close-neighboring poetic thicket into which to plunge, uncertain whither you would emerge; no devious stream to follow. The very deer, fat and heavy, seemed bored by pastures it would take them a week to traverse. People of moderate wishes and modest fortunes never envied Montfort Court; they admired it—they were proud to say they had seen it. But never did they say,

"Oh, that for me some home like this would smile!"

Not so, very—very great people!—they rather coveted than admired. Those oak-trees so large, yet so undecayed—that park, eighteen miles, at least, in circumference—that solid palace which, without inconvenience, could entertain and stow away a king and his whole court—in short, all that evidence of a princely territory, and a weighty rent-roll, made English dukes respectfully envious, and foreign potentates gratifyingly jealous.

But turn from the front. Open the gate in that stone balustrade. Come southward to the garden side of the house. Lady Montfort's flower-garden. Yes; not so dull! flowers, even autumnal flowers, enliven any sward. Still, on so large a scale, and so little relief; so little mystery about those broad gravel walks; not a winding alley any where. Oh for a vulgar summer-house; for some alcove, all honey-suckle and ivy! But the dahlias are splendid! Very true; only dahlias, at the best, are such uninteresting prosy things. What poet ever wrote upon a dahlia! Surely Lady Montfort might have introduced a little more taste here—shown a little more fancy! Lady Montfort! I should like to see my lord's face, if Lady Montfort took any such liberty. But there is Lady Montfort walking slowly along that broad, broad, broad gravel walk—those splendid dahlias, on either side, in their set parterres. There she walks, in full evidence from all those sixty remorseless windows on the garden front, each window exactly like the other. There she walks, looking wistfully to the far end—('tis a long way off)—where, happily, there is a wicket that carries a persevering pedestrian out of sight of the sixty windows, into shady walks, toward the banks of that immense piece of water, two miles from the house. My lord has not returned from his moor in Scotland—My lady is alone. No company in the house—it is like saying, "No acquaintance in a city." But the retinue in full. Though she dined alone, she might, had she pleased, have had almost as many servants to gaze upon her as there were windows now staring at her lonely walk, with their glassy spectral eyes.

Just as Lady Montfort gains the wicket she is overtaken by a visitor, walking fast from the gravel sweep by the front door, where he has dismounted—where he has caught sight of her; any one so dismounting might have caught sight of her—could not help it. Gardens so fine, were made on purpose for fine persons walking in them to be seen.

"Ah, Lady Montfort," said the visitor, stammering painfully, "I am so glad to find you at home."

"At home, George!" said the lady, extending her hand; "where else is it likely that I should be found? But how pale you are. What has happened?"

She seated herself on a bench, under a cedar-tree, just without the wicket, and George Morley, our old friend the Oxonian, seated himself by her side familiarly, but with a certain reverence. Lady Montfort was a few years older than himself—his cousin—he had known her from his childhood.

"What has happened!" he repeated, "nothing new. I have just come from visiting the good bishop."

"He does not hesitate to ordain you?"

"No—but I shall never ask him to do so."

"My dear cousin, are you not overscrupulous? You would be an ornament to the Church, sufficient in all else to justify your compulsory omission of one duty, which a curate could perform for you."

Morley shook his head sadly. "One duty omitted!" said he. "But is it not that duty which distinguishes the priest from the layman? and how far extends that duty? Wherever there needs a voice to speak the Word; not in the pulpit only, but at the hearth, by the sick bed; there should be the Pastor! No—I can not, I ought not, I dare not! Incompetent as the laborer, how can I be worthy of the hire?" It took him long to bring out these words; his emotion increased his infirmity. Lady Montfort listened with an exquisite respect, visible in her compassion, and paused long before she answered.

George Morley was the younger son of a country gentleman, with a good estate settled upon the elder son. George's father had been an intimate friend of his kinsman, the Marquis of Montfort (predecessor and grandsire of the present lord); and the Marquis had, as he thought, amply provided for George in undertaking to secure to him, when of fitting age, the living of Humberston, the most lucrative preferment in his gift. The living had been held for the last fifteen years by an incumbent, now very old, upon the honorable understanding that it was to be resigned in favor of George should George take orders. The young man from his earliest childhood thus destined to the Church, devoted to the prospect of that profession all his studies, all his thoughts. Not till he was sixteen did his infirmity of speech make itself seriously perceptible; and then elocution masters undertook to cure it—they failed. But George's mind continued in the direction toward which it had been so systematically biased. Entering Oxford, he became absorbed in its academical shades. Amidst his books he almost forgot the impediment of his speech. Shy, taciturn, and solitary, he mixed too little with others to have it much brought before his own notice. He carried off prizes—he took high honors. On leaving the university, a profound theologian—an enthusiastic Churchman—filled with the most earnest sense of the pastor's solemn calling—he was thus complimentarily accosted by the Archimandrite of his college, "What a pity you can not go into the Church!"

"Can not—but I am going into the Church."

"You, is it possible? But, perhaps, you are sure of a living—"

"Yes—Humberston."

"An immense living, but a very large population. Certainly it is in the bishop's own discretionary power to ordain you, and for all the duties you can keep a curate. But—" The Don stopped short, and took snuff.

That "But" said as plainly as words could say, "It may be a good thing for you, but is it fair for the Church?"

So George Morley, at least, thought that "But" implied. His conscience took alarm. He was a thoroughly noble-hearted man, likely to be the more tender of conscience where tempted by worldly interests. With that living he was rich, without it very poor. But to give up a calling, to the idea of which he had attached himself with all the force of a powerful and zealous nature, was to give up the whole scheme and dream of his existence. He remained irresolute for some time; at last he wrote to the present Lord Montfort, intimating his doubts, and relieving the Marquis from the engagement which his lordship's predecessor had made. The present Marquis was not a man capable of understanding such scruples. But, luckily perhaps for George and for the Church, the larger affairs of the great House of Montfort were not administered by the Marquis. The parliamentary influences, the ecclesiastical preferments, together with the practical direction of minor agents to the vast and complicated estates attached to the title, were at that time under the direction of Mr. Carr Vipont, a powerful member of Parliament, and husband to that Lady Selina whose condescension had so disturbed the nerves of Frank Vance the artist. Mr. Carr Vipont governed this vice-royalty according to the rules and traditions by which the House of Montfort had become great and prosperous. For not only every state, but every great seigniorial House has its hereditary maxims of policy: not less the House of Montfort than the House of Hapsburg. Now the House of Montfort made it a rule that all admitted to be members of the family should help each other; that the head of the House should never, if it could be avoided, suffer any of its branches to decay and wither into poverty. The House of Montfort also held it a duty to foster and make the most of every species of talent that could swell the influence, or adorn the annals of the family. Having rank, having wealth, it sought also to secure intellect, and to knit together into solid union, throughout all ramifications of kinship and cousinhood, each variety of repute and power that could root the ancient tree more firmly in the land. Agreeably to this traditional policy, Mr. Carr Vipont not only desired that a Vipont Morley should not lose a very good thing, but that a very good thing should not lose a Vipont Morley of high academical distinction—a Vipont Morley who might be a bishop! He therefore drew up an admirable letter, which the Marquis signed—that the Marquis should take the trouble of copying it was out of the question—wherein Lord Montfort was made to express great admiration of the disinterested delicacy of sentiment, which proved George Vipont Morley to be still more fitted to the cure of souls; and, placing rooms at Montfort Court at his service (the Marquis not being himself there at the moment), suggested that George should talk the matter over with the present incumbent of Humberston (that town was not many miles distant from Montfort Court), who, though he had no impediment in his speech, still never himself preached or read prayers, owing to an affection of the trachea, and who was, nevertheless, a most efficient clergyman. George Morley, therefore, had gone down to Montfort Court some months ago, just after his interview with Mrs. Crane. He had then accepted an invitation to spend a week or two with the Rev. Mr. Allsop, the Rector of Humberston—a clergyman of the old school, a fair scholar, a perfect gentleman, a man of the highest honor, good-natured, charitable, but who took pastoral duties much more easily than good clergymen of the new school—be they high or low—are disposed to do. Mr. Allsop, who was then in his eightieth year, a bachelor with a very good fortune of his own, was perfectly willing to fulfill the engagement on which he held his living, and render it up to George; but he was touched by the earnestness with which George assured him that at all events he would not consent to displace the venerable incumbent from a tenure he had so long and honorably held—and would wait till the living was vacated in the ordinary course of nature. Mr. Allsop conceived a warm affection for the young scholar. He had a grandniece staying with him on a visit, who less openly, but not less warmly, shared that affection; and with her George Morley fell shyly and timorously in love. With that living he would be rich enough to marry—without it, no. Without it he had nothing but a fellowship, which matrimony would forfeit, and the scanty portion of a country squire's younger son. The young lady herself was dowerless, for Allsop's fortune was so settled that no share of it would come to his grandniece. Another reason for conscience to gulp down that unhappy impediment of speech! Certainly, during this visit, Morley's scruples relaxed; but when he returned home they came back with greater force than ever—with greater force, because he felt that now not only a spiritual ambition, but a human love was a casuist in favor of self-interest. He had returned on a visit to Humberston Rectory about a week previous to the date of this chapter—the niece was not there. Sternly he had forced himself to examine a little more closely into the condition of the flock which (if he accepted the charge) he would have to guide, and the duties that devolved upon the chief pastor in a populous trading town. He became appalled. Humberston, like most towns under the political influence of a Great House, was rent by parties. One party, who succeeded in returning one of the two members for Parliament, all for the House of Montfort; the other party, who returned also their member, all against it. By one half the town, whatever came from Montfort Court was sure to be regarded with a most malignant and distorted vision. Meanwhile, though Mr. Allsop was popular with the higher classes, and with such of the extreme poor as his charity relieved, his pastoral influence generally was a dead letter. His curate, who preached for him—a good young man enough, but extremely dull—was not one of those men who fill a church. Tradesmen wanted an excuse to stay away or choose another place of worship; and they contrived to hear some passage in the sermons, over which, while the curate mumbled, they habitually slept—that they declared to be "Puseyite." The church became deserted: and about the same time a very eloquent Dissenting minister appeared at Humberston, and even professed churchfolks went to hear him. George Morley, alas! perceived that at Humberston, if the Church there were to hold her own, a powerful and popular preacher was essentially required. His mind was now made up. At Carr Vipont's suggestion, the bishop of the diocese, being then at his palace, had sent to see him; and, while granting the force of his scruples, had yet said, "Mine is the main responsibility. But if you ask me to ordain you, I will do so without hesitation; for if the Church wants preachers, it also wants deep scholars and virtuous pastors." Fresh from this interview, George Morley came to announce to Lady Montfort that his resolve was unshaken. She, I have said, paused long before she answered. "George," she began at last, in a voice so touchingly sweet that its very sound was balm to a wounded spirit—"I must not argue with you—I bow before the grandeur of your motives, and I will not say that you are not right. One thing I do feel, that if you thus sacrifice your inclinations and interests from scruples so pure and holy, you will never be to be pitied—you will never know regret. Poor or rich, single or wedded, a soul that so seeks to reflect heaven will be serene and blessed!" Thus she continued to address him for some time, he all the while inexpressibly soothed and comforted; then gradually she insinuated hopes even of a worldly and temporal kind—literature was left to him—the scholar's pen, if not the preacher's voice. In literature he might make a career that would lead on to fortune. There were places also in the public service to which a defect in speech was no obstacle. She knew his secret, modest attachment; she alluded to it just enough to encourage constancy and rebuke despair. As she ceased, his admiring and grateful consciousness of his cousin's rare qualities changed the tide of his emotions toward her from himself, and he exclaimed with an earnestness that almost wholly subdued his stutter,

"What a counselor you are!—what a soother! If Montfort were but less prosperous or more ambitious, what a treasure, either to console or to sustain, in a mind like yours!"

As those words were said, you might have seen at once why Lady Montfort was called haughty and reserved. Her lip seemed suddenly to snatch back its sweet smile—her dark eye, before so purely, softly friend-like, became coldly distant—the tones of her voice were not the same as she answered—

"Lord Montfort values me, as it is, far beyond my merits—far," she added, with a different intonation, gravely mournful.

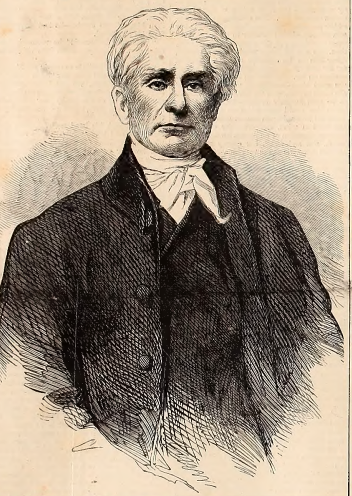
"Forgive me; I have displeased you. I did not mean it. Heaven forbid that I should presume either to disparage Lord Montfort—or—or to—" he stopped short, saving the hiatus by a convenient stammer. "Only," he continued, after a pause, "only forgive me this once. Recollect I was a little boy when you were a young lady, and I have pelted you with snow-balls, and called you 'Caroline.'" Lady Montfort suppressed a sigh, and gave the young scholar back her gracious smile, but not a smile that would have permitted him to call her "Caroline" again. She remained, indeed, a little more distant than usual during the rest of their interview, which was not much prolonged; for Morley felt annoyed with himself that he had so indiscreetly offended her, and seized an excuse to escape. "By-the-by," said he, "I have a letter from Mr. Carr Vipont, asking me to give him a sketch for a Gothic bridge to the water yonder. I will, with your leave, walk down and look at the proposed site. Only do say that you forgive me."

"Forgive you, Cousin George, oh yes. One word only—it is true you were a child still when I fancied I was a woman, and you have a right to talk to me upon all things, except those that relate to me and Lord Montfort; unless, indeed," she added, with a bewitching half laugh, "unless you ever see cause to scold me, there. Good-by, my cousin, and in turn forgive me, if I was so petulant. The Caroline you pelted with snow-balls was always a wayward, impulsive creature, quick to take offense, to misunderstand, and—to repent."

Back into the broad, broad gravel-walk, walked, more slowly than before, Lady Montfort. Again the sixty ghastly windows stared at her with all their eyes—back from the gravel-walk, through a side-door, into the pompous solitude of the stately house—across long chambers, where the mirrors reflected her form, and the huge chairs, in their flaunting damask and flaring gold, stood stiff on desolate floors—into her own private room—neither large nor splendid that; plain chintzes, quiet book-shelves. She need not have been the Marchioness of Montfort to inhabit a room as pleasant and as luxurious. And the rooms that she could only have owned as Marchioness, what were those worth to her happiness? I know not. "Nothing," fine ladies will perhaps answer. Yet those same fine ladies will contrive to dispose their daughters to answer, "All." In her own room Lady Montfort sunk on her chair; wearily;—wearily she looked at the clock—wearily at the books on the shelves—at the harp near the window. Then she leaned her face on her hand, and that face was so sad, and so humbly sad, that you would have wondered how any one could call Lady Montfort proud.

"Treasure! I—I!—worthless, fickle, credulous fool!—I—I!"

The groom of the chambers entered with the letters by the afternoon post. That Great House contrived to worry itself with two posts a day. A royal command to Windsor—



"I shall be more alone in a court than here," murmured Lady Montfort.

BISHOP WAUGH.

A good man has fallen at his post. Rev. Beverly Waugh, D.D., Senior Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, died in Baltimore, on the morning of the 9th inst., in the sixty-ninth year of his age.

Bishop Waugh was born in Fairfax County, Virginia, in 1789. He connected himself with the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1805, when only in his sixteenth year; early felt a call to preach the Gospel; and with much diffidence, and after earnest struggles of mind—as is evident from the entries in a diary kept by him at that period—decided upon preparing himself for the ministry. In 1808 he was regularly admitted into the connection, in the Baltimore Conference. He served the Church acceptably and profitably, on station and circuit, within the limits of that conference, until the year 1827, when he was chosen to superintend the Book agency in New York, in connection with the late Bishop Emory. This post he held until the year 1836; meanwhile, by his faithfulness and business tact, doing very much to develop the resources of the Book Concern and increase its efficiency. In 1836 he was chosen and ordained Bishop by the General Conference which met at Cincinnati; and the varied and responsible duties of this office he fulfilled with zeal and discretion for more than twenty years, until his death.

After his ordination Bishop Waugh's residence was Baltimore. But the bishops of the Methodist Church are of necessity but little at home. Their never-ceasing round of duty calls them to all parts of the land, and not the least of the privations suffered by those invested with the arduous offices of the Episcopate is the prolonged, almost continuous, absence from home and its tranquil enjoyments. In the first year of his Episcopacy Bishop Waugh visited Texas, where he organized the first Methodist Episcopal Conference in that State. Since Bishop Hedding's death, in 1852, Dr. Waugh has been the Senior Bishop of the Church.

THE LATE REV. BEVERLY WAUGH, D.D., SENIOR BISHOP OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

[From a Photograph by Brady.]

The last illness of the Bishop was probably brought on by his labors at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, whither a revival in the Church had led him to preach, pray, and counsel. There his last sermon was preached. Gray-haired, with trembling limbs and feeble utterance, the aged man yet adhered to his post until stricken down by the illness of which he died. Returning home, he had so far recovered that his friends thought him out of danger. On the morning before his death he led the family devotions. Retiring early, he was heard to pray long and earnestly for the Church and for his family. He evidently knew his end was near; but sank quietly to sleep. About one o'clock he uttered sounds of distress. Mrs. Waugh attempted to turn him, in bed, to ease his pain, on which he said "Never mind, my dear." These were his last words. Before the physician arrived he had expired.

The body was attended to the grave by a numerous concourse of Christians of all denominations. The grave is near where lie his eminent companions in office, Bishops Asbury, George, and Emory.

In manners and presence Bishop Waugh was a pattern of the Virginian gentleman of the old school, uniting affability with dignity. He was not eminent as a preacher; but had the clear head, good administrative talents, and calm practical common sense, so necessary to complete success in the difficult office of the Episcopate. Above all, he was a man of genuine everyday piety, zealous in his ministry, prayerful always. After serving the Church with all his powers for forty-eight years, he has gone peacefully to his reward.

THE PET OF THE LAW.

Ever since I can remember, up to the period when I reached fifty years of age, I was a thief; not an amateur occasional thief, not one of those impulsive fallen respectabilities who do some piece of inartistic crime, and then are sorry for it; but a regular professional trained thief, who was, and is still, proud of his profession.

I am married, and have four children, three boys and a girl—all thieves, and all, I am happy to say, at this present time doing well. The girl, aged nineteen, has a decided talent for shoplifting, and I have had proposals for her hand from a celebrated housebreaker (I must not mention names), which I shall certainly accept, as it will be a very good match. I have also apprenticed my youngest boy, aged twelve, to this artist, to learn his branch of the trade, and I hear very satisfactory accounts of the lad's progress. My next boy, aged fifteen, who has taken quite naturally to the pickpocket and church business, has just returned, after a twelve-months' imprisonment, as plump as a butcher, and looking as if he had been at the sea-side for a long season. My eldest son, aged twenty-two, is out on a ticket-of-leave; and we often talk together about the way in which he interested the chaplain in his welfare. He said he thought he could be of immense service in trying to convert his family from the evil course they had adopted, and the chaplain and the governor of the prison—a governor of the new school—thought he could. To do the young man justice, he mentioned the subject once or twice when he came home; but I think he broke down when he pretended to prove to his sister, in the presence of the chaplain, that needle-work was, in the long run, more profitable than shoplifting. What effect his arguments might have had if he could have devoted more time to enforcing them, I can not tell; but he is out a great deal, especially at night, and is doing very well, to judge by the money that I have seen him with lately. The rumor that he was the man who gave the gentleman that ugly blow the other night in the fog, I treat with the contempt that it merits. A man is innocent until proved guilty before a jury of his countrymen. My wife is not altogether undistinguished in the profession (you may remember the great plate robbery at Lord Mumblepeg's, in which she was concerned), but I will not dwell upon that. I did not marry her for her virtues, nor her talents, but to secure her from coming against me as evidence at any time.

Our business—the business of thieving—does not differ from any other business in which the profits are high and the risks proportionately great. We go into it, knowing exactly what forces are arrayed against us. Some men prefer the army, some, gold-mining; some, the excitement of the Stock Exchange; some, the delirium of the turf. I, and a very numerous body of fellow-professionals, prefer thieving.

Many persons suppose that we detest the police, and look upon them as our bitterest enemies. On some occasions, I admit, we find them troublesome; but, generally, we consider them as wholesome checks upon the increase of unskillful thieves, who diminish the profits without adding to the credit of the profession. The ordinary police force is not a very highly paid, highly educated, or highly intelligent class; and any man who knows his business can easily avoid coming in contact with them. As to the detectives, those awful men in plain clothes and curious disguises (which latter they might save themselves the trouble of putting on, as we know the wearers as well as our own fathers), they benefit us by inspiring an unbounded faith in their efficiency in the public mind, and stopping the appointment of real preventive officers. The sum they require as a reward, if successful in tracing a crime, is another element of our security; as is also their plan of fostering the development of small thieves until they become important criminals. They carefully tend the criminal fruit until it is rotten with ripeness, and then—if it does not escape them—they shake it gently into the lap of justice; but they never nip it in the bud. Why should we be on unfriendly terms with such weak and agreeable guardians?

When I come to consider the rules of evidence, the comforts of prisons, and the general leniency of the criminal law and its administration (and I have devoted a good deal of attention to these subjects during my retirement), I can not believe that any one is in earnest for the suppression of our class, but that we are considered worthy of preservation as providers of wholesome excitement, employers of capital in a peculiar direction, agents for the distribution of wealth, bodies to be experimented upon by the social philanthropist, problems to exercise the ingenuity of, and provide amusement for the legal mind, and members in that company which is conveniently styled "necessary evils." When I was engaged in the active duties of my profession I was tried, for the first and only time in my life, in conjunction with the whole of my family—my wife and four children—for a robbery of some magnitude. We were guilty, of course, but we had managed matters very artistically. My boys were not so old or so experienced as they are now, and when the magistrate cautioned us, at the preliminary examination, that we were not bound to say any thing to criminate ourselves, the two youngest could scarcely believe what they heard, and thought, in their simplicity, that we had all made an impression upon his worship. I remember having the same feeling myself when I heard the same remark addressed to my father, on the occasion of his trial, many years before. The youngest lad was so overcome by this, to him, unexpected exhibition of legal tenderness, that if it had not been for an additional caution from the worthy magistrate, and a sharp nudge from his mother, he would have there and then made a clean breast of the whole affair. That boy, like myself, and, I may say, all the family, is now a firm believer in the fact that the law does not want to discover the truth, but only desires to give an opportunity for a display of legal learning and ingenuity.

When we came up for our trial at the Oyer and Terminer, we were again put upon our guard, and very amusing the trial must have appeared to the spectators, for it amused even me. There we stood in the dock, a very happy family—a father, mother, daughter, and three sons—all implicated in one crime, and all warned to hold our tongues, lest we should spoil the sport of the trial. The counsel for the prosecution opened the case with a highly ingenious speech, full of eloquent denunciation but very empty of facts; and when he had finished, he proceeded to call witnesses in support of his charge. Several persons were examined without adding much to the previous knowledge of the case, for we had taken most elaborate precautions to shield ourselves from being proved guilty, although we could not avoid suspicion.

Once or twice, when some of the most absurd suppositions were put forward in place of better evidence, I thought we should all have burst out laughing in concert, they were so very wide of the mark. One witness at last succeeded in proving to the apparent satisfaction of the court that, on a certain night, I was at a place which I never saw in my life; but as this supposed fact had nothing to do with the case, it was not of much benefit to the prosecution. Maddened by his ill-success, the prosecuting counsel wished, in defiance of law, to put a question to my daughter, but our solicitor at once objected to this, and the judge spoke up against it like a man, amidst a murmur of approbation that ran through the whole court. If they had put the question, I am afraid we should not have got off as we did, for my daughter is rather nervous, and could not have stood a cross-examination. But we were spared the trial, and the liberty of the citizen was preserved.

The case lasted a long time, and during its progress some very pretty circumstantial evidence was adduced, which all fell to the ground, bit by bit, under the vigorous blows of our solicitor. When the speech for the defense came, it was necessarily short, for there was really nothing of any moment to answer.

The summing-up of the judge was pleasant and dignified, with, of course, a little dash of the severity required by the duties of his position. But I can not think that he was dissatisfied with his day's work; and the jury, who had been highly amused by the legal fencing displayed, and who—bless their hearts!—could not have put a question about the case to our happy family for the world, were glad to hurry over an acquittal and get to their dinners.

I can not believe that a public hangman dislikes murderers, or that a judge dislikes wretched suitors; or, seeing the leniency of the laws, the mode of criminal procedure, and the vast amount of employment that we thieves give to capital, I can not believe that judges, juries, public officers, police, jailers, governors of prisons, jail-chaplains, and legal practitioners, are at all in earnest and interested in our extermination. So a long life and a merry one to all those honest gentlemen, and similarly to us!

TRAVEL NOTES IN BIBLE LANDS.

No. XXVIII.

(From our own Correspondent.)

A Kenterkiar in the Mediterranean.—Bringing Pompeiopolis to New York.—The Altar of Bacchus in a New York Club-House.—Tarsus.—The Cadi's Court.

My last letter left us standing on the shore at Mersina, escaped from the wreck of the ship which had brought us and our fortunes from the coasts of Syria.

A more miserable and uncomfortable place could hardly be found, from the Northern Ocean to Timbuctoo, than that same little town of Mersina on the coast of the Mediterranean. It has been founded for the sake of a port to the modern town of Tarsus. I have already said here in my letter. On a long sandy sweep of the shore stand a few modern-looking frame houses, which are inhabited by the usual mixture of all Eastern nations found in Mediterranean sea-ports. As we walked up from the scene of our disaster into the village we were accosted in every language that the East knows. Now an Arab shouted his Sohal leer, and now a more civilized Syrian growled a Marhobba. An Italian, Spaniard, German, and French crowd talked all at once in their several dialects, and in the confusion of tongues it was not a little astonishing, as well as gratifying, to hear a hearty welcome in "American-English."

"Well, stranger, it came mighty near being a goner, didn't it?"

"Kentucky, by Jupiter!" said John Steenburger, looking around him in the gloom, and scanning the faces of the crowd to see what pair of lips had uttered the familiar sounds. We were not long in suspense. From behind, the man, a tall sinfooter of the pure Ohio River breed, elbowed his way through the motley crowd, and stretched out his brawny hand for a grasp that we were not slow to take; and chatting as familiarly as if we had just dropped together by accident in a street of New York or Cincinnati, we strolled on up to the little stone pier, where Sir John was standing guard over his baggage, while Miss Kate sat on a carpet-bag listening to the heavy dash of the surf, and, as I verily believe, wondering whether one of us two were before that time overwhelmed in its dark abysses. The other of the two I don't believe she had thought of, for on our approach she sprang to her feet with an exclamation of delight, and her mood became on a sudden as furiously gay as it had seemed to be anxious and sad.

In half an hour we had found lodgings for the night in the upper part of a sort of half-shop and half-inn, answering in appearance to a rum-hole on the line of a canal in America. Two rooms, swept thoroughly, and with the windows wide open, served in some sort as a protection from the night air; and here we had a tolerable supper in a few minutes, and a cup of irresistible coffee which smoothed down the last ruffle of our tempers.

In the evening I went down into the room below, and, on my honor, I could imagine myself in an old-fashioned store at the cross-roads in the country, where the men and boys gather in the evening, and swing their heels from the counter, and talk and tell stories, and exchange the gossip of the day.

My Kentucky acquaintance was on hand, and I may as well tell you at once what he is here for. He has come to see if it will pay to carry Pompeiopolis to America.

That is it precisely.

Pompeiopolis, once known as Soli, was in its day a glorious city, and is glorious in its ruin. All along the shore, a few miles west of Mersina, stand or lie its magnificent ruins. We rode out with him the next day to look at them. It was a terrible ride through brush and thicket. All the glory that I have so often seen in ruin was here. The city which Antony and Cleopatra visited with their splendor is now a howling waste. About forty columns remain standing of some two hundred that once formed a splendid arcade; and of the other great buildings of the city, a theatre and a temple, both in ruin, and both overgrown with dense wild thickets of brush, remain in the most mournful grandeur to attest the ancient magnificence of the city.

EASTERN THRESHING.

I have not time or space to linger on a description of the ruins of this city. You will readily remember the fame of Soli, which was once the chief city of Cilicia, and which Pompey rebuilt and named after himself. Well, Sir, there is here a Kentucky gentleman who thinks it feasible to put all the old marbls of Pompeiopolis on ship-board, and take it to America and make it pay! Think of that! Imagine the shade of the Parthenon sawed in a New York marble-yard! Imagine the shade of Bacchus cut into monuments for a New York whit-bussing, and the threshold of the Holy of Holies of the Temple of Aphrodite made the mantle of a house of ill-fame! To what base uses we may come!

Latterly a great business has been commenced in the East, and Athens is yielding to its temptation. Ship-loads of Pentelican marble have already been sent to America, and my enterprising friend was looking at these ruins with the idea that the very columns and stones that once did duty for Pompey and his noble friends are none too good for New York houses, and withal are in very close proximity to the sea and easily shipped!

But these ruins have a nobler and a grander interest to me. I have no doubt that this now desolate shore once rang to the voice of the great Apostle. Here was the old sea-port of Tarsus. Hence came the ships of Tarshish. The River Cydnus was once navigable for small vessels nearly up to the city of Tarsus, but Soli, doubtless, was the great sea-port of the capital of Cilicia. Here Saul the young man often wandered before he had heard of Him of Nazareth. Here, in later years, I can not doubt, he preached the new gospel he had learned.

Feeling thus at Soli, you may, if you can, imagine how I felt the next day when we reached Tarsus. Space and time forbid that I delay you but four hours in the saddle, and then we saw the old city. It is as ruinous almost as Soli. It is a miserable modern Arab town. So they all are. I tell you the same story of every one I visit.

Yet I confess I had expected something more of Tarsus, for the Turks speak of it now with some admiration. But alas for the old town, it has no present wealth, no ruins of ancient greatness, and no hope for the future! Yet here Saul was a tent-maker, and here in after years he was a prince with power to call dead men from the grave. Yes, it was a mighty change!

The city has perhaps thirty thousand inhabitants. The River Cydnus is no longer navigable. But it flows as coldly as when Alexander nearly perished in its icy flood, and the old hills of Taurus look down in solemn majesty as of old on river and plain, on city and ruin.

Does Taurus remember that gorgeous barge in which Cleopatra came up the Cydnus in old days —that barge whose fame has been handed down from age to age? The scene was before me as I stood at the fall of the river, where it dashes over the rocks below the city with the same murmur and hoarse roar that it has continued, incessant, since the days of the Egyptian Queen.

I am aware that I am writing you a very rambling letter. I can not well do otherwise. In following as we now do the track of the Apostle, every step is of deep interest to us, every foot of ground has its sublime associations, but volumes will not suffice to convey them to you.

It is to me a striking thought just here, that Paul was born and brought up in a highland country, a land of lofty mountains and dashing torrents. Who can doubt that much of his boldness and courage, much of the grandeur of his character and the force of his intellect, was derived from the sublime majesty of Taurus, whose glittering summits stand now above Tarsus, a memorial and a monument alike of his own great power and the sublimity of that faith on which he rested.

Our lodgings in Tarsus were of rather better quality than we have been accustomed to find. A worthy Armenian merchant, hearing of our arrival, insisted on placing his house at our disposal. It stands outside the city, among groves of fruit trees, and we found it a delightful place. In the forenoon we amused ourselves with examining the primitive methods of farming going on around us, and listening to the quaint songs of the cattle-driver who is managing the curious threshing-machine of the East. In the afternoon, when the sun was well toward the west, we went into the city and strolled about its streets, talking with the shopkeepers and studying human nature in the people of Asia Minor.

Human nature is pretty much the same thing all over the world. An Armenian silk-vender cheated Miss Grandison as thoroughly and neatly as the thing could have been done in New York or London. He sold her a damaged article for a full price, and when it was brought back to him he avowed that he had told her it was damaged. The opportunity for an appeal to the Cadi was too good to be lost, and we took the shop-keeper thither. Miss Kate knew nothing of our intention, or she would have prevented it, and I confess to a strong disinclination myself to call for the assistance of Government any where in the East in such cases, for punishment follows detection with a suddenness and a severity not at all satisfactory to American sensitiveness.

But it is well to be informed of the courses of practice in legal matters all the world over, and once in a while John and myself have taken the risk of seeing a man bastinadoed for the sake of gaining useful information.

The officers brought him into the presence of the Cadi as if he were a murderer carried to execution. There was a general howling, kicking, and struggling, prisoner and captors vociferating and fighting even to the very foot of the throne of justice.

When silence was procured, John Steenburger stated the case, for he was with the lady when the purchase was made. The silk was produced, and the shop-keeper denied every thing, and insisted on proof in the most approved Western style of legal proceeding. But the law of the Turk admits no quibbles. The Cadi looked at the offender, and the RUINS OF SOLI ON POMPEIOPOLIS (NEAR TARSUS).

Miscellany.

A PROFITABLE USE OF TIME.

MARK the point of time. Suppose the little Telegraph, but there are sundry expedients, any one of which, if fairly tried, would make that little business longer. Most of the men who have died enormously rich acquired their wealth not in huge windfalls, but by minute and careful accumulations. It was not one vast sum bequeathed to them after another which overwhelmed them with inevitable opulence; but it was the hoarded money which most men would lavish away, the little sums which many would let run out of their looking after, the pennies of which you would keep no reckoning—these are the items which at the year's end would have reared their pyramid of fortune. From these money-makers let us learn the noble practice of saving. Let us, in the strongest and most elaborate poems of recent times we composed in the streets by a physician, who had practised there, the brief snatches of time when passing from one patient's door to another. And if order to achieve some good work which we have much at heart, you may not be able to secure an entire week, or even an uninterrupted day. But try what you can make of the broken fragments of time. Glean up its golden dust—those ragings and parings of precious metal—those leavings of days and remnants of hours which so many sweep out into the dust-heap unheeded. Sometimes, if you be a miner of moments, if you be fired and heart up odd minutes and half-hours and unexpected holidays, your careful thrift may make you not a long and useful life, and you may do at last rather in extense than intensive proportions what is all their own. The time which some men waste in superfluous slumber and idle visits and desultory applications, were it all redeemed, would give them wealth of leisure, and enable them to execute undertakings for which they could not find a single life than theirs essential. When a person says, "I have no time to improve my mind or to a kind turn to a neighbor," he may be telling what he thinks, but he should not think what he says; for it is not the time the time already, he may get it by redeeming it.

THE FEMINIVES OF PARIS.

When Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette were led to the place of execution, though at different periods, the Parisian fish-women observed no breach of decorum in their loud expressions of joy. In their savage joy they danced before the cart which led the royal captives along the streets, and mockery of their sufferings, and sons held up their clenched fists, exclaiming, that if there were another world, he would hunt them out of it there, and that he revenged upon them.

When old General Custine appeared before the revolutionary tribunal, he was accompanied by his daughters-in-law, Madame de Custine. She was descending down the steps of the conciergerie of the La Force, when a silent crowd, with the most infuriated gestures, gradually closed around her path. An exclamation, or the slightest token of fear, would have been instantly fatal to her. She is said to have bitten her lips until the blood flowed, in order to prevent herself from becoming pale. On her path was a hideous-looking female fish-seller, armed with an infant in her arms. Madame de Custine passed for a few seconds, and expressed her admiration of it. This touched her heart, without daring to understand perfectly the critical position of madame. "Ah, ha," said the fish-woman, perceiving the child; "you will give it back to me below." Madame de Custine obeyed; and, protected by that shield, she descended the steps in perfect safety. When she had reached the street she made signs to the child to return, without daring to murmur thanks, which would certainly have proved dangerous to both.

HOPE AND CHARITY.

ALL seem to speak and to dream are prone,
Of better days before them:
We see them waving and hasting on
To the happier goal that's over them.
The world's movement all is onward,
But man hopes ever for better days.

How leads man into his earth years below,
Round the bay doth it brightly hover,
It lights up his path with its golden glow,
Nor quite him when life is over.
When, sad and weary, his spirit must cease,
With "hope" on its footstone, he slumbers in peace.

It is not a fiction empty and vain,
From a full faith flowed it;
A voice in our heart cries once and again,
For better things we're intended.
And the whispering voice can hope impart
That ne'er shall deceive the trusting heart.

TURNING TO A VIRGINIAN.

A CURIOUS book might be made out of the blunders of travellers on the Continent and the inquisitions under which they suffer. A fine young fellow whom I met in Florence, a Virginian, told me of a really yet laughter-provoking blunder which was put upon him by one of the Custom-house officers on board the packet which brought him from Leghorn. Having purchased specimens in front of Dennis's, he wanted to visit his brothers, Messrs. Maquay and Parnham. The two called a coachman, and asked him if he knew of the whereabouts of the said firm. The cunning rogue professed ignorance, and sent a boy to the Hotel des Nord, near by, under pretense of inquiring if there were any such people in the city. The boy came back with the direction, as he said, and John, after some haggling, agreed to carry the party for a dollar, or fifty cents. A boy got in, paid the inevitable lagger for shutting the door, and leaned back in attitude of waiting for the word to start and drive. Coachy turned his horses, drove across the street, and pulled up. There was a shop with the name on the sign, MAQUAY AND PARNHAM, BANKERS. They were indignant, of course, with the scamp, called him all the bad names they knew in the language, and refused to settle. He quietly answered that the distance was a dollar, and went away, with browning moderation, that, "as they were foreigners, he would let them off for three paols." That was worth this, and he pocketed it, and then the money.—De Forest's "European Acquaintance."

MISSIONARY DIFFICULTIES IN INDIA.

A RECENT French traveler asked the Bishop of Agra what progress missionaries were making in communicating Christianity among the Hindoos.

"Progress!" said the bishop, shaking his head; "what influence can we have in enlightening the minds of such a people? As soon as we speak to a Hindoo of the miracles of Jehovah or of Christ, he answers us immediately by exercises and recounting miracles of Krishna, who raised a mountain in his little finger to serve as an umbrella to protect his shepherdess from a storm. He does not doubt the reality of our stories; he is only surprised at our ignorance in regard to his gods and miracles. In such a matter, nothing appears to him too extraordinary. He believes in all, because that, in order to open the eyes of Christians, Satan brought the sun and moon down to the earth, and then made them ascend again. The respective places like ballooms, without the slightest inconvenience to the three gods, who have actually received it without any difficulty: the Buddhist and Puranu legends have warmed him in this respect; but, after the miracles of Father de la Mare, he would remind you of some still more incredible folly performed by a Christian type, Kirsnu."

WHAT DOES IT SIGNIFY?

The world it goes round,
And the people go mad,
When good and evil
We must put up with bad:
Go things as they will, I never mind 'em,
But take 'em all just as I find 'em—
For what signifies it to me?

Your stark-looking fakes,
Who shrug with grimace
At genteel plays,
Or a thing out of place,
Are mighty contemptible characters:
I laugh while they screw up their features—
For what does it signify?

A light heart must win,
All must allow that;
Gloom grants and groans thin,
Mirth helps to fat:
Your sour, crabbed folks are more smirkers,
And look themselves up in their partners—
For what signifies it?

LUXURIOUS LIVING IN SIBERIA.

AMONG the higher classes in Siberia there is no lack of refinement and luxurious living. The Archangelsues of St. Petersburg have been transferred to the mountains of the Ural, where officials of all ranks, and military officers, live in the "Parisian style" affected by Western capitalists. With the refinement of civilization it will be seen that luxury of its bad habits flourish there also.

"A traveler from the most civilized parts of Europe, who should come here to gratify his curiosity, would not find a very remarkable difference between the style of living in this remote country and that of the same class in his own country. He would find the ladies handsomely clad in dresses made after the latest fashions from Paris and London; and would be welcomed at the feasting, and on all occasions, with a degree of hospitality seldom to be met with elsewhere. If asked to dinner, he would find the table covered with a repast that would not disgrace the best hotels of the same countries. Fish and game of every kind are most abundant here, and luxurious living in these regions are not wanting. Wines of the finest quality, and a great variety of them, are served out at the tables; the only drawback to comfort being the quantity of Champagne the traveler is obliged to drink. Their balls are elegant, and conducted with great propriety, and they dance well. The elder members of society spend their time over cards, and pay much money in this way. It is deeply to be regretted that the young men are also much addicted to gambling—a vice which is very much in vogue here as elsewhere. During my stay in the Ural a young officer left himself in consequence of his losses at cards. Even the fair sex in Ekaterinenburg pass much of their time in card-playing. I am acquainted with a lady who has lost as much as less than eleven children; there is not a day in the week that parties are not assembled at one house or six hours at cards, unless prevented by sickness; and when once she sits down to the cardtable, hunger, thirst, and all the necessities which know another lady here, the principal business of whose life is card-playing. She has a moderate income, and passes her days and most of her nights at cards; she has her daily rounds, and goes with as much exactness to her haunts as the most punctual merchant to his office. Ten o'clock in the morning is her hour for rising, when the cards are opened and the cards placed. If no one call before this hour she goes forth to her usual occupation, and seeks some one among her friends who will sit down and play, if only for an hour. The games over at one place she goes to another, till she finds some one who will indulge her in a second rubber; and so the time passes until dinner. After dining she sleeps a couple of hours, and wakes quite fresh for her favorite pursuit. In the evening she has no difficulty, for many are willing to play: thus the time is spent until a late hour."—Athenæum.

THE LACE-MERCHANT'S DOG.

WHO would have imagined that a dog had been made accessory to a theft, and that, too, under his master's upward of a hundred thousand crowns? And yet an incident like this happened a few years since in Europe.

One of those industrious beings who know how much to charge for a trifle cast out a little piece, determined, in extreme poverty, to engage in trade. He preferred that of the merchandise which occupied the least space, and was calculated to yield the most profit. He borrowed a small sum of money from a friend, and, repairing to Flanders, there bought pieces of lace, which, without any delay, he smuggled into France in the following manner:

He trained an active spaniel to his purpose. He caused him to be shaved, and prepared for him the skin of another dog, of the same hue and the same shape. He then killed the last-named dog, took off his dog, and put over it the garment of the stranger so adroitly that it was impossible to discover the trick. He then, when arrived in his pocketed handbag, he would say to his docile messenger, "Caraway, my friend, I am fatigued, and you would start and pass boldly through the gates of Malines or Valenciennes, in the face of the vigilant officers appointed to prevent smuggling." Having passed the bounds, he would wait for his master at a little distance in the open country, where they mutually caressed and feasted, and the merchant placed his packages in a place of security, and resumed his position as mercantile traveler.

Such was the success of the smuggler that in five or six years he returned to his native town, and kept his coach. Envy pursues the prosperous. A mischievous neighbor betrayed the lace merchant, and, notwithstanding his efforts to disguise his dog, he was suspected, watched, and discovered. How for the future the cunning of man could prevail! Did the spies of the custom-house expect him at the gate, he now threw at a distance, and promptly rewarded the attack. Were the gates shut against him, he overcame every obstacle—sometimes he leaped over the wall; at others was secretly lowered a carriage, or running between rivulets of travelers, he would thus accomplish his aim. One day, however, while swimming in a stream near Malines, he was shot, and died in the water. There was then found him five hundred crowns worth of lace; the loss of which did not affect the master, but he was inconsolable for the loss of his faithful dog.

MARRIAGES ARE MADE IN HEAVEN.

UPON this James Kelly, the collector of the Scottish proverbs, remarks, "Matrimonia ex cœlo petuntur: heaven, sone had few friends there"—a peculiar remark which probably has no more meaning than the real spirit of the proverb than Trench's unctuous comment. A proverb," he says, "of such religious depth and power as this could have been quite impossible for all antiquity to have produced, or even respectfully to have apprehended. It is not quite beside the mark; for there is no religious depth at all in the proverb, and its hearty cousin only in its wide expression of the fact that matchmaker observation, that it is not forethought, deliberation, or mutual desire that makes marriage, there in bringing couples together in matrimony. More efficient than all these is the force of circumstances, and the accidents of time and chance, fate, fortune, destiny, and so forth, as often as they find it making wrong out of their calculations, and bringing about results they had not dreamed of. In the French version of the adage—" Marriages are written in heaven—we find the special Christian, and, we entail fatalism, and fatalism in every where the popular creed requires a religious form. The Scottish proverb, "A man may woo where he pleases, but he must wed where his hap is." Hence, as Shakspeare says,

"The ancient saying is no heresy, Hanging and wiving go by destiny."

VENICE.

Once did she hold the gorgeous East in fee,
And was the safeguard of the West: the worth
Of Venice did not fall below her birth.
Her strength was in her sea. Down upon the Ocean
She was a maiden city, bright and free.
No gods adored, no force could violate;
And when she stood to meet the flying foe,
She most opposed the everlasting sea.
Such was she: and with sea-born grace she rose,
Those tides vanish, and that strength decay;
Like some sea-flower she on the waves must play.

When her long life had reached its final day:
Men say, the sea mists rose round her like a shade
Of that which once was great is passed away.

NEVER BE HAUGHTY.

A HUMMING-BIRD once met a lamb-pie, and, being pleased with the beauty of its person and glory of its wings, made an offer of perpetual friendship. "I can not think of it," was the reply, "as you once sported me, and called me a drawling dolt." "I supposed it was a compliment," said the bird; "I always entertained the highest respect for such beautiful creatures as you." "Perhaps you do now," said the other; "but when you insulted me I was a caterpillar. So let me give you a piece of advice: never be haughty to the humble, as they may, some day, become your superiors."

EDUCATION.

EDUCATION does not profess to give the gifts of God, by creating abilities in man, but merely to draw such out as are inherent within him, so that he may be enabled to apply them to his advantage and happiness in life. Schools are arenas for mental training—places for mental gymnastics—where, by strenuous effort and exercise, the faculties and mind become strong.

THINGS WHAT ARE OTHERWISE.

SOME years since I happened, in company with a number of others, at the house of Colonel H——, a gentleman away down South. After having regaled ourselves with a social pitfall the weed, the Colonel said, "Now, gents, let us take a drink all round." To this appeal there was neither remonstrance nor a negative. The glasses being then duly emptied, Colonel H—— turned to the Colonel, "Let us have another smoke. I always make it a rule never to drink more than once after smoking, and never after drinking." And he did it. He lived up to his principles.

Judge Holmes, of the northern part of the State of New York, is one of the most celebrated wits in the country of our "great country." The Judge has a son who was recently admitted to the bar. Meeting him, the Judge, by way, has now "joined the Sanns" and referred, with considerable emphasis, to the profession which is his brother's brilliant wit, and he sometimes even put a little of it into his decisions.

The Judge was presiding at the trial of a case which involved the question of his place of residence, and the counsel on the other side, in order to show that he had been a voluntary child in the audience kept up an incessant laughing. At last the Judge, becoming annoyed through with, and the Judge and his son got into their carriage and started for home. After riding some distance in silence, the Judge said:

"Frank, I am afraid that that child disturbed the audience very much."

"Yes, father," said Henry, "I didn't observe that they was kept awake by it."

The Rev. Sydney Smith was one of the wittiest men of an old-fashioned country town, kept by an inveterate wag named Hall. On a certain day a gentleman from London, who was passing through the village, called at the tavern to inquire himself. The landlord and several of his acquaintances not easily chatting before the fire, and politely made room for the traveler to take his seat. "Landlord," said he, "a good day," says he. Affirmed unanimously. "An ugly day," says he. "Ugly," said the landlord. "Yes," replied the host, "only"—in his dry way—"they say the day after." "Why, sir," said Henry, "I didn't observe that child." After a while he arose, walked across the room, and approached the door. "Landlord," said he, "your servant." "Servant, sir," said the landlord, "I have none." he, inquired of the traveler what he'd have to drink for his dinner. "Nothing at all," said he, "I dine at home." "Why then did you let him money here?" "Am sure, sir," said the host, "I did not." "Landlord," said he, "you chap knew his daddy, to give him a few coppers to jog him get to the school."

In one of the picturesque hill-top towns of Western Virginia there lived an ardent spirit. Once, after indulging in a little too much drink, he started out on a tempting to fly, and, to obtain a startling point, climbed to the top of a high house. Here he was seen by a crowd of people, who, fearful of the consequences, called to the yielding atmosphere. Gravity—not that of the lyceum—soon brought him to the ground in a mangled state. The next day our sorrow friend was asked how he found himself. "Well, sir," he replied, "it's nothing to fly, but it's mighty hard to light."

A hen in Iowa having made the most devoted efforts for several successive days to lay an egg without success, they obstinately remained unhatched, and on breaking it open a young chicken was found within. The hen had evidently a common knife out.

A Western editor had a friend of ours was the other day rounded, as many an older head has been, in trying to "paddle his own canoe." His spirit so distended that he endeavored to explain. "You said you loved me just now?" "Yes, dearest, I did." "Then why did you call your betrothed 'it'—'no.'" Your hand? your foot? your head? your heart?" "Why, no, dearest, I—I—" Stammering and being flattered from one member to another as they were successively named, she at last exclaimed, indignantly, "Why, you don't know what I love with—what is it—the fifteen that pushes?

A Western settler once broke forth in the following eloquent strain: "Stranger, I'm a backwoodsman, I am, I am. He and my client can't never be intimidated nor bamboozled by no man mark that, and as sure as this court decides against us, we'll file a writ of ejectum, sir, and we'll have it by the Supreme Court of the opposite counsel, who wanted to know what he meant by a writ of ejectum, replied, "Why, sir, it's a writ to eject another to ascertain who's the best." "I don't just remember the exact word, but it's what will knock the out of court and settle the question forever."

Few men have a readier excuse for their homage than the Grecian sage, who, being asked why philosophers always run after rich men, but rich men never courted philosophers, replied, "Because the latter know they need wisdom, but the former are ignorant of the fact that they want wisdom."

We have known a lawyer of the world say, "The state of widowhood is inconvenient—for one must assume all the authority of a young girl, without being able to feign her ignorance."

A benighted husband says that, learned of himself and world-wise, he has not yet learned to tell his wife so.

The buck-keeper who fell from a column of figures it still in a considerable way.

Mentem, the philosopher of Brooklyn Heights, calculates the whole depth of all the rain and snow (if melted) which has fallen since the flood, and found it would cover a hundred and fifteen feet. If it had all remained where it fell, the present northern hemisphere would direct from Albany to Quebec. How fortunate it is that it "dried away."

There is a woman in Blackwell's Island Lunatic Asylum who thinks Roman Catholics are trying to build a cathedral in her stomach.

A favorite mode of introduction in Brazil is said to be: "This is my friend, at whose disposal I have placed a certain responsible for a month."

Has a poor fellow ever been penned than that Knowle put into the mouth of Virginia?

"I have a curious case on hand that nothing cannot
"Twixt is and nineteen!"

The Northampton Courier vouches for the truth of a statement that a gang of Irish Catholics, by a majority of one vote, a year or two since, waited until the St. Lawrence river was frozen over, and then went over to the other side distance of more than a hundred miles, and then, before the ice broke up, returned to their own side of the river. Such a thing is of common occurrence, where he has since remained in faithful subject.

A Wisconsin correspondent of the Rochester Union relates that a boy from Prairie du Chien fell down stairs a few days ago, a singular scene was presented on the premises. A man who had been watching the accident was preaching to a small crowd gathered around him on the middle principle to keep them together. Some of the other extremity of the saloon there was music and dancing.

A few days since a rough, country-looking fellow entered one of our city banks, and marching up to the cashier, exclaimed, "Here I am; I want you to take a fair look at me." Without saying a word further he stood back. The next day the same customer appeared, and, with the same words, and again disappeared. The next day at about the same time, he walked in, and advancing to the cashier, said, "Here I am again; I've been three days now, and I guess you've seen me long enough by this time, I want the money for it."

A machine for "pumping" witnesses is among the improvements of the day. The inventor is first sworn to the old man who made leather spikes.

A young lady thus describes her feeling, and casts sympathy:

My heart is sick, my heart is sad,
I'm sick of all the world, and not glad;
I am not glad, I am not sad,
I'm not myself—I'm not the same;
I am indeed, I know not what;
I'm changed in all, except in name—
Oh when shall I be changed in what?

One of Mitchell's best characters is Alcazie, in "The Mansion of Agony," a beautiful but treacherous girl reared, educated, and allowed a control which her slight have gained to be lost by default, but which, in the hands of a woman of genius evidences could get power.

In the hearing of an Irish case for an assault and battery, a counsel, while cross-examining one of the witnesses, asked him what they had said the first place they stopped at? "Your honor, sir, sir." "What next?" "Two pints of whisky, sir." "And then?" "One pint more of brandy." "What next?" "A flight."

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, Feb. 25, 1858.

THE movement of confidence of trade and aggregation of money in the financial centers continues with undiminished vigor. The foreign trade of the past last week compares as follows for the last four corresponding weeks of 1857:

Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Feb. 20, 1858	$3,853,055 ... $3,577,764
Corresponding week, 1857	5,624,637 ... 1,440,378
Decrease	2,571,582
Increase	$2137,386

Since 1st January the imports at this port feel up over twenty millions less than they were in the same time last year. The spring trade will decidedly be dull, but the country will be under the new tariff a year, and business will revive in the fall with all the more vigor.

The movement of specie is still very heavy against the California arrival, so that the Banks will probably show over thirty-one millions this week. The specie line rates at 19@@ 20 in London, and 5.16 @ 5.14 on Paris. At these rates it will hardly pay to ship specie.

We learn by the Africa that the Bank of England has reduced the rate of discount to 2½, and that money is abundant in London Street at 2½, and even 2 per cent. Every thing indicates a speedy and healthy revival, save the imminence of an unprecedented plethora of money at the financial centers.

The upward movement in the Stock Exchange continued throughout the first half of the week, but a reaction was checked on Friday and Saturday. Since this day last week, however, we see no important change of from ½ to 5 per cent. in the leading railway securities, while State stocks are good.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, February 23, 1858.

THE Wholesale Trade Produce markets during the week have been quite active for Flour, which has been in lively demand, chiefly for home use, at generally advancing rates. The receipts have been light, and the available supply has been reduced. Wheat has responded to the Flour market, and sales have been very limited. Corn has been pretty active for export and purchases have been made for shipment at the seaboard stations at buoyant quotations. Cotton opened the week with a fair demand, but for several days past it has been more quiet, the receipts of the season being rather quite yet steadily. Groceries were in good demand at generally steady prices. Provisions opened with a pretty active inquiry at rising prices, especially for Lard, which was in great demand for export. Tobacco was dull and Manufactured Tobacco have been more sought after, but without any increase of sales. Hides have been in better and dearer. Hay was less firmly offered, and sales were made at lower prices. Hides and Naval Stores were more inquired for at improved rates. Ice was in fair demand, and the stock in the trade are available at an early reduction of 2 c. per pound from the highest rates of the season. Metals and Goods held for full prices. Freights were in fair demand, chiefly from and to ports of Southern Europe, there being a very slack inquiry from Western America. Shipping was generally firm, and in prices of unbleached Cotton Goods more inquiry was perceptible. Domestic sales are still unusually numerous, but are gradually becoming less important and less attractive. . . . The total import of dry goods amounted to $1,579,126 against $1,194,173 the corresponding week in 1857. The total amount thrown on the market has been $2,114,124 against $2,677,550 same time last year. The total withdrawals for consumption have been moderate, and reproductive of any remarkable alterations . . . We append a revised list of the prices of staple articles for the week ending to-day:

	Week ending Feb. 23	Week ending Feb. 16
Ordinary to extra State Flour, bbl.	$4 15 @ $4 65
Superfine to fancy Western do.	4 30 @ 4 65
Extra Western Genesee, per barrel	4 70 @ 5 00
Fancy to extra Genesee, per barrel	5 05 @ 5 50
Superfine to Extra Canadian, per barrel	4 30 @ 5 00
Fancy to extra Canadian, per barrel	5 05 @ 5 50
Fine to Superfine Rye Flour, per bbl.	2 90 @ 4 00
Corn Meal, per barrel	3 00 @ 3 25
White Wheat, per bushel	1 10 @ 1 40
Red Wheat, per bushel	1 05 @ 1 10
New Crop Corn, per bushel	70 @ 71
Rye, per bushel	70 @ 72
Barley, per bushel	75 @ 75
Western Oats, per bushel	40 @ 42
State Oats, per bushel	41 @ 42
Southern Oats, Virginia, per bushel	38 @ 40
Southern Corn, White	70 @ 72
Cotton, middling, per pound	11 @ 12
New York, per barrel	12 @ 13
Prime Pork, per barrel	13 @ 13
Country Mess Pork, per bbl.	12 @ 12
Country Prime Beef, per barrel	6 00 @ 7 50
Prime Mess Beef, per barrel	11 00 @ 13 00
Beef Hams, per barrel	17 00 @ 18 00
Cut Meats, per pound	9 @ 9
Lard, per pound	9 @ 10
Tallow, per pound	8 @ 8
Eastern Butter, per pound	15 @ 17
Western Butter	13 @ 15
Rice, per pound	4 @ 5
Rio Coffee, per pound	10 @ 13
Java Coffee, per pound	14 @ 14
Cuba Molasses, per gallon	29 @ 32
New Orleans Sugar, per pound	5 @ 6
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon	28 @ 30
Hams (canvas), per pound	11 @ 12
Young Ham, per pound	10 @ 10
Sidemeat, per pound	9 @ 9
Shoulders, per pound	7 @ 7
Dried Beef, per pound	11 @ 12
Pickled Pork, per pound	6 @ 7
Pickled Hams, per pound	10 @ 11
Pickled Shoulders, per pound	6 @ 6
Pickled Tongues, per dozen	1 00 @ 1 25
Pickled Pigs' Feet, per dozen	50 @ 75
Pickled Lambs' Tongues, per dozen	50 @ 75
Pickled Lambs, per dozen	50 @ 75
Pickled Oysters, per barrel	1 75 @ 2 25
Pickled Oysters, per gallon	75 @ 1 00
" seconds, per barrel	4 50 @ 5 00
" seconds, per gallon	1 00 @ 1 25
Turnips, per barrel	75 @ 1 00
Turnips, per bushel	25 @ 50
Cabbages, per 100	4 00 @ 5 00
" per dozen	50 @ 75
Parsnips, per barrel	1 00 @ 1 25
Carrots, per barrel	1 00 @ 1 25
Onions, per 100	3 00 @ 4 00
Celery, per dozen	50 @ 75
Eggs, per dozen	12 @ 12
Eggs, Limed, per dozen	11 @ 12
Eggs, Fresh, per dozen	15 @ 16
Chickens, per pound	11 @ 13
Turkeys, per pound	11 @ 12
Guineas Fowl, per pair	44 @ 50
Ducks, per pair	50 @ 75
" per pair	75 @ 1 25
Turkeys, per pair	1 50 @ 2 00
Geese, per pound	8 @ 10
Geese, per pair	1 00 @ 1 25
Partridges, per pair	1 00 @ 1 25
Pheasants, per pair	1 00 @ 1 25
Roasting Pigs	1 75 @ 2 50
Venison, per pound	10 @ 12
Hares, each	37 @ 50
Rabbits, per pair	37 @ 50
Venison, per pound	9 @ 15

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CRANBERRY CULTURE. — The Subscribers have issued a Circular on the Cranberry and its Culture, which will be sent to any address Post Paid, on receipt of a Postage Stamp. They will forward the plants by express in a few days after receiving orders. Price by express, $3 per 1000. Address SULLIVAN BATES & CO., Bellingham, Mass.

RICH CLOTH COVERS FOR
VOLUME I. OF HARPER'S WEEKLY
ARE NOW READY.
PRICE FIFTY CENTS.

The Trade and Booksellers will be supplied at
TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT. DISCOUNT.

DEBIT AND CREDIT. Translated from the German of GUSTAV FREYTAG. By L. C. CASE, A.M., Professor of Modern Languages in Hobart College, D.D., D.C.L., D.D. Third Edition. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of Price.

FUN!!!

HARPER'S COMICALITIES.
SELECTED FROM DRAWINGS BY
LEECH, LANDELLS, AND OTHERS.
CONTAINING
THREE HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS.
FIRST SERIES.
PRICE TWENTY-FIVE CENTS.

For Sale by all Booksellers and Periodical Dealers.

DUFFY'S NEW PERFUME FOR THE SEASON.
KISS-ME-QUICK.
Distilled from Fragrant Tufts.
DUFFY, Grocer, 6 Broadway.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1858, by DUFFY, Grocer, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the U. S. for the Southern District of New York.

TO FATHERS AND MOTHERS.—Scarlet Fever teaches the importance of purifying the blood by a brisk purgative. Let BRANDRETH'S pills be used in sufficient doses to purge freely, and the disease will be entirely manageable from its commencement; for, by keeping the bowels open the humors, so dangerous, so strong, as there are none when in order the ordinary treatment after the complaint has made its appearance, will be found to be much more successful than it is in localities where it exists. Oh, what misery would be prevented if parents properly appreciated the value of Brandreth's Pills! Sold also at 250 Bowery and 106 Fulton street, Brooklyn; 274 Canal Street, New Orleans; 151 Third Avenue, and 176 Fulton Street, Brooklyn. Price 25 cents a box.

☞ Will be sent by mail, postage free. ☜

TICKNOR & FIELDS'
NEW AND CHEAP EDITION OF THE WAVERLEY NOVELS.

TWENTY-SIX VOLUMES NOW READY. VIZ.:
WAVERLEY 2 vols. HEART OF MID-LOTHIAN, 2
GUY MANNERING, 2 vols. vols.
THE ANTIQUARY, 2 vols. BRIDE OF LAMMERMOOR, 2
THE BLACK DWARF, AND LEGEND OF MONTROSE, 1 vol. THE NOVELETTES, 2 vols.
OLD MORTALITY, 2 vols. KENILWORTH, 2 vols.
THE PIRATE, 2 vols.

We are now publishing a beautiful Household Edition of the Waverley Novels (the abridgement heretofore issued, to be completed in of portable size in 16mo form. The paper is of fine quality (all the original plates are not of sufficient size), the type having been cast expressly for this work. The plates, illustrating each novel, with capital steel plates wood engraved in the best manner, after drawings and paintings by the most eminent artists, among whom are Hicket, Foster, Darley, Billings, Landseer, Harvey and Read. The publishers believe all the latest revised corrections of the authors, a Glossary and Index; and some edition of Waverley, with the Author's Introduction and Notes, and Lamentations, being in preparation, will be shortly over published. The notes are at the foot of the page—a great convenience to the reader, but one that is generally overlooked by the publishers of other Editions of Scott's Novels.

TWENTY-EIGHT VOLUMES

It is the intention of the Publishers to issue two volumes completed, bound in cloth, stamped with original and appropriate designs every month, until the whole is completed. The price will be 75 cents per vol.

The opinions of the Press as to the superiority of Ticknor & Fields' New and Cheap Edition of the Waverley Novels, when such notices appear in the New York Tribune, Publishers' Circular, Boston Courier, Boston Transcript, Boston Mercantile Journal, Boston Atlas, Worcester Spy, Worcester Palladium, Albany Argus, Albany Evening Journal, Harper's Magazine, Boston Christian Examiner, Advertiser, Post, Bee, and all the other Papers and Periodicals published in the country.

FOR SALE BY

The principal Booksellers in the United States.

MISS EDGEWORTH'S NOVELS.
With Illustrations. 10 vols. 12mo. Muslin, 12 cents per Volume. The Volumes are sold separately or together.

Vol. I. Castle Rackrent; Essay on Irish Bulls; Essay on the Absentee. The Fountain Vase; The Good Aunt.

Vol. II. Angelina; The Good French Governess; Mademoiselle Panache; The Knapsack; Lame Jervie; The Will; Out of Debt, Out of Danger; The Limerick Gloves; The Manufacturers.

Vol. III. Moral the Umbrella; The Manufacturers; Rosanna; The Contrast; The Grateful Negro; To-morrow; The Dun.

Vol. IV. Manœuvering; Almeria; Virtue.

Vol. V. The Absentee; Madame de Fleury; Emily de Coucheyne; The Modern Griselda.

Vol. VI. Belinda.

Vol. VII. Leonora; Letters on Female Education; Patronage.

Vol. VIII. Patronage; Comic Dramas.

Vol. IX. Harrington; Thoughts on Bores; Ormond.

Vol. X. Helen.

It is unnecessary at this day to eulogize the works of Miss Edgeworth. They have become standards in the English literature. Sir Walter Scott, with his characteristic generosity, has awarded the palm of superiority to the Irish novelist, and Lockhart records in his Life of Scott that when Miss Edgeworth was introduced to the great Scotchman he exclaimed, "Here is the lady to whom the generation passing away has to thank when new exertion was required for the natural energy, and genius genuine to the national characteristics of his countrymen.

Miss Edgeworth's delineations of character, whether grave or gay, Miss Edgeworth is confessedly without a rival. Her comic and playful satire knocks hard high in the dominions of humor, while it is confined within the limits of good taste, and a pure and elevated description which seldom fail to be fat of the wit or the humor of the most brilliant writers of romance.

The style of the works, as published in this edition, is unobjectionable, and they are admirably suited for the family bookshelf.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Works by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of Seventy-five Cents.

THE REAL FRANGIPANNI PERFUME is manufactured only by Messrs. Piesse & Lubin, of London, and they take this opportunity to caution purchasers against imitations, and to request that they be aware, approach in any degree the exquisite fragrance of the genuine article.

Sold by Agents for the United States, E. DUFUY, 466 Broadway, late (Hope).

THE CHURCH HISTORY.

THE THIRD VOLUME OF GIESELER'S CHURCH HISTORY.
A Text-Book on Church History. By Dr. John C. L. Gieseler, translated from the fourth German edition. By SAMUEL DAVIDSON, LL.D., and Rev. HENRY TORRY, B.A. Vol. III. Fourth American Edition. Revised and Edited by Rev. HENRY B. SMITH, D.D., Professor in Union Theological Seminary, N.Y. 8 vols. 8vo. Sheep, $9 75.

In the new and improved and Comparable Church History, a thorough revision of the translation has been made, with the additional advantage of the latest and best German works. The alterations are numerous, and in the department of Church History and Church Doctrine they are most important.

The work, when finished, will form a complete and authentic digest of Christian Church History in A.D. form, compared with abundant and careful learning, especially in the line of the Church Fathers, and is available as a guide to any who would examine the original sources.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

EUROPEAN ACQUAINTANCE. Being Sketches of People in Europe. By J. W. DE HAAS. 12mo. Muslin, 75 cents.

Mr. De Haas has a quick eye for rare fact and judgment to let the guide-books alone, and write only of what he actually saw and heard. Hence his unpretending volume affords the most life-like, animated, and charming picture of the European tour that we have yet met with.—Boston Courier.

One of the most readable and interesting books of travel that has appeared for many months.—Pubs. Circular.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of Seventy-five Cents.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.
For all manufacturing purposes SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES are deemed indispensable. The public insist upon having their clothing, &c., made by them. SINGER'S FAMILY SEWING MACHINE is the latest invented for competition, and being arranged with full instructions, has awarded the palm of other machines for similar uses, has awarded for exhibition at the late Fair. Sewing Machine Company, 458 Broadway, New York.

☞ Circulars sent free. Letters for information to be sent answered. Price $100 and upwards.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR MARCH.

CONTENTS.

THE UPPER MISSISSIPPI.
Illustrations of Rural Improvements.
MY ILLUSIONS SPARE
THE TRUE STORY OF ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Family.
TROPICAL PLANTS AND FLOWERS.
Illustrated by Elaborate Engravings.
THE BELLE OF THE FAMILY. (Concluded.
Illustrated by Four Engravings.
JACK OF THE CLIPPER. By CHARLES DEMAS. (Concluded.)
PROGRESS OF WOMANHOOD.
WESTMORELAND.
THE CASTLE OF ANCALMUD.
A PAPER OF ALL SORTS.
THE BOOK OF NATURE.
EVERY WIFE HER OWN TORMENTOR.
MY WIFE AND I.
THE WILDFLOWER. By W. M. THACKERAY.
Illustrations.—Beginning Again.—Commencement.—An Unfortunate Case.—Half.—Hoof-Hearted.—Cheerful Fellow.—Ill Professional.
CHAPTER XIV. Harry in England.
CHAPTER XV. Harry in Scotland.
CHAPTER XVI. In which Genius shows Skill with the Oil Cloth and Scissors.
THE STATUE IN CLAY.
EDITOR'S HISTORY OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERARY NOTICES. Books of the Month.
EDITOR'S TABLE.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
SUBSTANCE AND SHADOWS.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Sculpture.—A Pump.—A Parrot.—A Greedy Pig.—A Queer Fish.—A Bantam.—The Cat, and how she Catches Mice.—A Young Monkey.—An Old Woman.—Aliegge's Pale Ale.
FASHIONS FOR MARCH.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Carriage Costume and Boys' Costume.—Evening Costume.—Bridal Costume.

MR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL, "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous Illustrations by the Author, will commence in the Illustrated Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. It is printed from early sheets, and will be issued in advance of the publication in England, for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$2 00
Two Copies for One Year	3 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00

And an extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Five Subscribers.

The postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the office where it is received. The Postage is Twenty-four cents a year.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

A NEW PERFUME.—Messrs. JOSEPH BURNETT & CO. have produced a new and most delightful perfume, entitled MOSS ROSE, for which they have shown the very appropriate name of "Portical." It partakes of the richness of the Rose, and the delicacy of the Violet, and is the most delightful perfume ever produced. Sold by all Druggists and Perfumers. Manufactory and Depot, 13 Winthrop Street, Boston. Also, for which sell all fifty cents each, and superior to all the principal Imported and Domestic Perfumes.

INCREASED ATTRACTIONS.

DULWER, THACKERAY, CHARLES READE, MRS. GASKELL, AND WILKIE COLLINS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

MR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL, "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous Illustrations by the Author, was commenced in HARPER'S MAGAZINE for January. It is printed from early sheets received from the Author in advance of publication in England, for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$2 00
Two Copies for One Year	3 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00

And an extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Five Subscribers.

The postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the office where it is received. The Postage is Twenty-four cents a year.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

HARPER'S BIBLIOTHECA CLASSICA.

DULWER'S BRILLIANT ROMANCE, entitled "RIENZI, THE LAST OF THE TRIBUNES," presented to the subscribers of this polished, witty, and learned novelist, in advance of publication in any other, appears in HARPER'S WEEKLY simultaneously with its publication in England.

TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

One Copy for One Year	$2 00
Two Copies for One Year	3 00
Three Copies for One Year	4 00
And one Copy for One Year (each)	2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Twelve Subscribers.

Volume I. of "HARPER'S WEEKLY" for 1858 is now ready. Price $1 50, Muslin, Postage 52 cents. Subscribers can have their Numbers bound handsomely at the office of publication for 25 cents. Discount allowed to Booksellers.

"HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY," when taken together, are supplied at Five Dollars a year.

Numbers from the commencement of both the Magazine and Weekly can always be had. Complete sets are furnished gratuitously. Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest Club rates.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" must be paid at the office where they are received. When paid quarterly in advance, the Postage upon the Magazine is Twenty-four cents a year; upon the Weekly, Twenty-six cents a year.

Persons residing in the British Provinces will remit Twenty-four cents additional for the Postage on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty-six Cents on the WEEKLY, if the latter is required.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

Portrait of a famous Steamboat Commodore, taken at the moment he was told that Congress was going to oblige Steamers to carry Life-Boats to save their Passengers in case of Shipwreck.

MAN OF THE WORLD. "What Rubbish to talk about Marrying on $1000 a year! Why, it ain't enough to Buy a Pellah Cigars!"

ISAAC TAYLOR'S WORLD OF MIND. The World of Mind. An Elementary Book. By ISAAC TAYLOR, Author of "Wesley and Methodism," "Loyola and Jesuitism," "National History or Enthusiasm," &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

Justly commands attention, Mr. Taylor is a lucid and elegant writer, as well as original and profound thinker, and knows how to mould his subject in the most attractive form. His present work is a closely reasoned book on mental philosophy, in which the earlier chapters relate to pure metaphysics — abstractions ultimate, mixed and concretive, the sense of fitness and the grounds of certainty in relation to metaphysical speculation — while the bulk of the volume concerns what is properly physical in mental philosophy, as the laughter and weeping, language, the emotions and tastes, &c.

General readers who desire to attain, without much labor, a clear understanding of the elementary principles of intellectual philosophy, and to train and invigorate their reasoning faculties, can not better accomplish the purpose than by studying this easy on the World of Mind. — N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

GENT. ON HORSEBACK. "Get out of the Way, Boy! get out of the Way! — My Horse don't like Donkeys!"
BOY. "Don't he? — Then why don't he Kick you Off?"

FANNY FERN BLOWN UP.
BUY NO BOOKS BEFORE
People start in great amaze,
From their eyes they wildly gaze,
Crying, "Is the Comet here?"
"No — 'tis only Fanny Fern at last!"
Keep cool, people.—'tis not so—
Fanny Fern is still the go!
'Twas a Fanny Fern afloat,
Name bestowed upon a book
Read the choicest works of Fanny,
Get a book and gift from Bonney.

Not only the works of Fanny Fern, but the choicest gems of literature by the best authors of the day are sold at the great gift book store, 213 Broadway, and every book or valentine sold is accompanied by a splendid present. Catalogues sent free. Address as above.
A. BANNEY, Agent.

GROVER & BAKER'S
CELEBRATED
FAMILY SEWING MACHINES,
495 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
18 SUMMER STREET, BOSTON,
730 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

The Machines are justly admitted to be the best in the market for family sewing.

G. EVANS,
PUBLISHER AND ORIGINATOR
OF THE
GIFT BOOK ENTERPRISE.
Has just issued a complete Catalogue of NEW AND POPULAR BOOKS, embracing all the departments of literature, which is mailed free to any part of the country. $200 worth of Gifts with each $100 worth of Books sold. All Books sold at Publishers' lowest prices. New Books received as soon as issued. Gift worth from 25 cents to $100 will be delivered with each book sold at the time of sale.

Orders from the country promptly filled, and the goods forwarded by express or mail on the same day the order is received.

Liberal inducements to Country Agents.
G. EVANS,
439 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

THE FIRST VOLUME
OF
HARPER'S WEEKLY,
Handsomely bound in Cloth and Half Morocco, may be had of the following Booksellers:

In Boston
A. WILLIAMS & CO.,
JOHN J. DYER & CO.,
FREDRIHEW & CO.

In Philadelphia
A. WINCH,
W. B. ZIEBER.

In Pittsburgh
HUNT & MINER.

In New Orleans
J. C. MORPHY,
B. M. NORMAN,
GEO. ELLIS.

In St. Louis
JAMES M. CRAWFORD,
E. K. WOODWARD.

In Cincinnati
H. W. DERBY,
And of Booksellers generally throughout the United States.

WHEELER & WILSON MFG CO'S
SEWING MACHINES,
OFFICE 505 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
Agencies throughout the Union.

Send for a Circular.

$150 WILL PAY FOR BOARD AND TUITION in the FLUSHING FEMALE COLLEGE one quarter. Rev. WILLIAM H. GILDER, A.M., President, at Flushing, Long Island.

MESSRS. JUDSON & BROTHER, of the Egypt of Illinois, having come to New York for the first time in their lives, proceed to visit the shipping, and are much struck with the size of a China Clipper, when the above little accident cuts short their observations.

SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE. The Sad Fortunes of the Rev. Amos Barton. — Mr. Gilfil's Love-Story. — Janet's Repentance. A Novel. By GEORGE ELIOT. (Originally published in Blackwood's Magazine.) 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

Their quiet and original humor, the delicate insight into character displayed, the tender and subtle pathos of the several stories, have secured for Mr. Eliot a considerable, and not a common reputation. — Leader (London).

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid to any part of the United States on receipt of Fifty Cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

DR. LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS.
70th THOUSAND.

A fresh Delivery of Dr. Livingstone's Africa will be ready next week, when the work may be obtained of the Booksellers generally throughout the United States and Canada; or,

☞ Harper & Brothers will send it by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of Three Dollars.

MISSIONARY TRAVELS AND RESEARCHES IN SOUTH AFRICA; including a Sketch of Sixteen Years' Residence in the Interior of Africa, and a Journey from the Cape of Good Hope to Loando on the West Coast; thence across the Continent, down the River Zambesi to the Eastern Ocean. By DAVID LIVINGSTONE, LL.D., D.C.L. Two Maps by ARROWSMITH, a Portrait on Steel, and Numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00.

CAUTION!

Messrs. Harper & Brothers take this opportunity of cautioning the Public against several spurious publications, which, by artful advertisements, are made to appear as though emanating from Dr. Livingstone. They are authorized to say that Dr. Livingstone repudiates them entirely, and wishes it to be generally known that the genuine work is the

ONLY AUTHENTIC NARRATIVE OF HIS ADVENTURES AND TRAVELS IN AFRICA

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

POSTAGE STAMPS FOR SALE,
IN ANY QUANTITY,
AT
HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE.

PHONOGRAPHY; or, PHONETIC SHORTHAND. For Alphabet, Specimen Pages of the Phonographic Magazine for 1858, and List of Works (free), Address BENN PITMAN, Cincinnati, O.

MYSTIC HALL SEMINARY for Young Ladies, 6 miles from Boston. A Catalogue may be obtained of the Principal, Mrs. T. F. SMITH, Box, Boston, Mass.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. II.—No. 62. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 6, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

CONTENTS.

I. SENATOR WILSON, OF MASSACHUSETTS, WITH PORTRAIT.
II. THE RUBY CASKET.
III. UMBRELLAS.
IV. THE LOUNGE.
V. DOMESTIC VALES AND TALES.
VI. SLEIGH-RIDING IN BROADWAY, WITH A SPLENDID ILLUSTRATION.
VII. SEATING, FROM A LADY'S POINT OF VIEW, WITH TWO ILLUSTRATIONS.
VIII. LITERARY.
IX. DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.
X. FOREIGN NEWS.
XI. THE LAUNCH OF THE LEVIATHAN, WITH A MAGNIFICENT ILLUSTRATION.
XII. BOOKMAKING BY THE HOUR.
XIII. PULPWOOD'S STORY.—"WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?"—Continued.
XIV. ANECDOTES OF RACHEL.
XV. MISCELLANY.
XVI. THE FRENCH ASSASSINS, WITH THREE ILLUSTRATIONS.
XVII. A WOMAN'S QUESTION.
XVIII. PARDY AND I.
XIX. THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.
XX. FINANCIAL AND MARKET REPORTS.
XXI. CONCEALITER.

SENATOR WILSON, OF MASSACHUSETTS.

THE Hon. Henry Wilson, Senator in Congress from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, whose portrait we this week present to our readers, is emphatically a representative man of New England. Springing from that great fountain, THE PEOPLE, he has risen by his own exertions through every grade of useful toil, and has ever filled the measure of the expectations of those who have supported him.

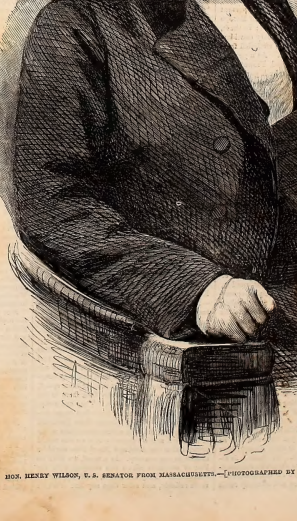
His life is a noble commentary on our republican institutions. He was born on the 16th of February, 1812, at Farmington, New Hampshire. His parents were very poor, and as they had many children to support, he left his home, with their consent, when he was but ten years old, and apprenticed himself to a farmer in the neighborhood, with whom he remained until he was twenty-one years of age. At the end of his severe and laborious service of eleven years, he received as compensation therefor a yoke of oxen and six sheep, which he sold for eighty-four dollars.

During this apprenticeship he was allowed to attend school about one month in a year, on an average; but so zealous had he learned to read than his inclination for learning was strongly manifested, and he devoted his Sabbaths and evenings to reading. In that period he read more than seven hundred volumes of history and biography, most of which were selected for and loaned him by the wife of the Hon. N. Eastburn, a sister of that distinguished statesman and judge, the Hon. Levi Woodbury. To the judicious kindness of this accomplished lady, who early discovered his great talents, the future senator was indebted for the means of acquiring much solid knowledge, and of forming habits of study and of reflection which have largely contributed to his subsequent success.

Mr. Wilson, after attaining his majority, worked upon a farm for eight months, at nine dollars a month. Hoping to better his condition, in December, 1833, he quitted his native town, and, with a pack upon his back, made his way to Natick, Massachusetts, his present residence. There he hired himself to a shoemaker, who agreed, in return for five months' service, to teach him the art and mystery of St. Crispin. At the end of six weeks Mr. Wilson bought his time of the shoemaker, and went to work on his own account, working with such diligence that the constant confinement injured his health, and compelled him, at the end of two years, to quit the bench.

In May, 1836, Mr. Wilson made a visit to Washington, and passed a month in regular attendance on the debates in Congress. Calhoun's "Incendiary Publications' Bill" was at this time before the Senate, and Pinckney's celebrated "Resolutions" were before the House of Representatives, producing discussions which excited the sectional pride of the attentive listener, and excited a desire on his part to oppose the politicians of the South on their most vulnerable point. Returning to the North, Mr. Wilson entered Stafford Academy, and afterward studied in the Academy at Wolfsboro', in which town he taught school in the winter of 1836–7. In the spring he entered Concord Academy, where he remained six months, and during that time was chosen a delegate to the Young Men's Anti-Slavery State Convention, before which body he made his first public speech. In the autumn he returned to Wolfsboro' Academy, and at the close of the academic term went again to Natick, Massachusetts, where he taught school during the winter of 1837–8.

In April, 1838, Mr. Wilson engaged in the shoe-manufacturing business at Natick, which he continued until 1848, making from 40,000 to 125,000 pairs of shoes annually. It was this that gave him the sobriquet of "the Natick cobbler," when, in 1840, he took the stump in favor of General Harrison. During that campaign he made upward of sixty speeches.



In 1840, and again in 1841, the town of Natick elected him its representative in the Legislature; and he was a member of the State Senate in 1843 and in 1844. In 1845 Mr. Wilson and a large portion of the Whigs of Massachusetts arrayed themselves in opposition to Messrs. Levi Lincoln, Abbott Lawrence, Nathan Appleton, and others, who favored the annexation of Texas; and since that time he has been the acknowledged leader of the successful Free-Soil movement in that State. From January, 1849, to January, 1851, he was (at a heavy personal loss) the editor and publisher of the organ of that movement, the Boston Commonwealth, taking a prominent part in the politics of the Northern States.

In 1850 Mr. Wilson was again elected to the State Senate by a large majority, and for two successive years he was chosen President of that body. When a State Constitutional Convention was called in 1853, he was not only elected a delegate from Natick, but from the distant town of Berlin; and the journal shows what an active part he took in the deliberations. Twice nominated as a candidate for Governor, he was defeated by the Whigs in 1853, and by the American in 1854. By the aid of the last-named party he was elected, in 1855, by the Legislature of Massachusetts, to fill the vacancy in the U. S. Senate occasioned by the resignation of Mr. Everett, and has since taken a prominent part in the political questions of the day. His nonserial career has met the best expectations and warmest wishes of a large majority of the people of Massachusetts, whose views he represents.

In 1842 Mr. Wilson was elected Major of a uniformed regiment of artillery in the Massachusetts Militia, which he afterward commanded. Elected Brigadier-General in 1845, he for five years commanded his brigade at the encampments kept up in that Commonwealth, with marked ability, and is familiarly known as General Wilson. He is also a favorite lecturer with the Lyceum organizations of the Northern States, and is proverbially ready to contribute his talents, time, or money, or all of them, for the rational enjoyment of the public.

As a political orator Mr. Wilson has few equals. His retentive memory and quick intellect enable him to turn to effective use statements well calculated to incite the sectional pride of his hearers, to inspire them with confidence, and to invigorate and stimulate them to action. Although avowedly a party man, true to his political friends and to their principles, we believe him to be a firm friend of the American Union, with an abiding confidence in its permanency.

Personally, Mr. Wilson is an athletic, good-looking gentleman, quick in his movements, rapid in his conversation, and of the Anglo-Saxon type. Married in early life to a lady of amiable character and domestic disposition, and blessed with an intelligent son, he never appears to such advantage as at the social fireside. Of unbending integrity, strictly temperate habits, and generous disposition, he possesses the personal esteem of bitter political opponents, and the devoted affection of a host of friends.

HON. HENRY WILSON, U. S. SENATOR FROM MASSACHUSETTS.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY WHITEHURST, OF WASHINGTON, D.C.]

THE SURE CASKET.

I HAD a garment rare—
A robe of cost;
I hoarded it with care
From sun, and dust, and air;
Lo! the moth marr'd it sore,
It charms the sight no more—
'Tis lost!—'tis lost!

I had a ring of price—
A wedge of gold—
Hat to their secret bed
The cancerous rust hath spel'd:
It hath made a fatal sweep—
It hath eaten bread and deep—
Look! look! Behold!

I had a precious gem—
A jewel lone;
Close in my bosom's core
That talisman I bore:
How shall the robber's eye
My life of life espy?—
'Tis gone!—'tis gone!

Alas! poor, rifled heart,
Buried with care—
What friend shall take thy part?
Who draw the envenom'd dart
From thy despair?
List to yon music free!
Calleth it not to thee?

——Heaven hath a casket fair,
Where are no moth, nor rust,
Nor thief to mock thy trust;—
Heaven hath a casket sure,
Ta treasure up earthly,
Lay thine up—there!

DAY AND NIGHT.

BRIGHT and bold, like a knight of old,
With a plume of snow and a shield of gold,
The beautiful, bive-eyed Day
Goes on his happy way.

Filling the world with light.
But Night, the stealthy Night,
In treacherous, dark Malay,
That dogs his victim's track,
And, while he is dreaming of peace,
Wraps out his horrible cross,
And stabs him in the back!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 6, 1858.

THE DEFEAT OF THE ARMY BILL.

IT is unfortunate for Mr. Buchanan that he made the Army Bill an Administration measure. With so vital a matter as the Kansas admission to engineer, he would have acted prudently in not compromising his Administration on the minor question of the increase of the army. Under proper conditions, Congress could hardly have refused to sanction the employment of a sufficient number of volunteers to perform the service required; and why this would have been less satisfactory to the President than the addition of more companies to the existing regiments can not readily be perceived by those who are unacquainted with internal Hibbardism. As it is, Mr. Buchanan has greatly weakened his party, and damaged his prestige for the Lecompton fight.

We are not yet informed whether the Administration will consent to avail itself of the services of volunteers for the Utah expedition. There can be no doubt but both branches of Congress would cheerfully sanction the employment of four or five thousand volunteers for a couple of years to bring the refractory Mormons to terms. And this he will find that a decision of them, the President could hardly do better than make known his readiness to take volunteers, as he can not obtain regular troops. The former would certainly answer as well as the latter, so far as service in Utah is concerned.

It is possible, however, that a show of force may be necessary even to raise volunteers. The latest advices from Kansas justify the belief that all the troops may be removed from Kansas by the first of the spring; and we notice that General Quitman has proposed to raise a regiment of mounted volunteers for frontier service in Texas —which step would liberate other United States troops now stationed in that locality. Altogether, unless the Mormons should prove more than formidable adversaries than is generally anticipated, it is probable that the work of subduing them to order, or even of expelling them from the Territory might be achieved without any addition to the present standing army.

In view of party politics, the defeat of the Army Bill leaves the Administration in a tryingly position. It has very much to say though the "cohesive power of the public plunder" was exhausted. It is not vouch for a President to be defeated so early in his Administration, or before his whole patronage has been distributed. The debate on the Message in relation to the arrest of General Walker and the vote on the Army Bill seem to render it highly desirable for the President to adopt some new measure, or suggest some line of policy, which will have the effect of welding together the diverging elements of the party on which he relies for support.

ELECTIVE OFFICIALS.

THE discussion, in the Legislature of this State, of the Metropolitan Police Act of last session, has led to a general inquiry as to the best mode of filling administrative executive offices.

Under monarchical governments it may justly be said that such offices are filled by appointment by the executive head of the government to which they belong. Kings appoint their ministers; such minister appoints his clerks; and, theoretically, if not practically, each clerk of bureau organizes his office in the manner which he deems best calculated to insure effective service. In the free countries of Europe the elective powers of the people are restricted to the selection of legislative officials and the supreme head of the executive, the latter of whom fills all the inferior stations.

In this country we began national life with a similar theory. The people elect the President and Vice-President; the President appoints his Cabinet and the entire staff of subordinate officials of the general government throughout the country. The people have no patronage. When they have chosen their President their duty is finished. Vacancies in the Supreme Court, in the highest grades of the Army and Navy, in the Post-office, in the Customs, in the diplomatic service, are all filled by the mandate of the elected Chief Magistrate. In practice respect is paid to the desire of the people, as expressed through their representatives, in the selection of officials; but the theory is, that that selection is made by the President alone, and that he alone is responsible to the people for the entire administration of the Government.

This was the original theory of Democratic Government in the United States. It is still a full force and vigor as far as the confederacy is concerned. But in several of the States innovations have latterly been introduced. In several States—among others, in New York—the idea prevailed many years since that the patronage of the people was too circumscribed. To enlarge it, a number of offices, which, according to the old theory of Democratic government, would have been filled by appointment by the Governor, were made elective. The people elected State officers, the Canal Commissioner, and elected judges. In some parts, as in this city, they went still further, and elected the most subordinate officials, as City Chamberlain, Corporation Counsel, and a number of commissioners charged with the performance of various minor details of executive duty. They said that the plan been pursued much further we should have come to elect the very clerks and messengers in the police offices of city and State; and even the thousand policemen who are supposed to keep watch and ward over us.

In practice, doubts have arisen as to the wisdom of so wide-spread an elective system. Judges, it is true, it was found, were unobjectionable. In this State, for instance, neither the judges nor the State officers, nor the city officials who had been elected by the people, have been in eminent or so popular as to vindicate the wisdom of the popular choice. And an opinion has been gaining ground that, in the various offices had been filled by a conscientious and high-minded Governor, in the case of the State, and by a like Mayor, in the case of the latter, in the case of the City, the public business would have been better administered at less cost and with greater advantage to the community. In other words people are beginning to think that popular sovereignty does not consist in imposing on the people the duties of chief magistrate, and that the sooner we retrace our steps the better.

It will be curious to watch how long it will take these views to penetrate the minds of the several Legislatures. ‡

THE RAILROAD SYSTEM IN THE UNITED STATES.

THE unusual plentifulness of money at the present time, and the reason combined with the organization of commercial enterprise, has received speculation in the leading railway securities, and caused a decided rise in the stock and bond markets. The event is of greater consequence than those who merely look at it in its stock-gambling aspect will be disposed to admit.

Those who judge the railway system of the United States by the rules which obtain with regard to railways in Europe, commit a serious error. European railways are carriers' enterprises, constructed solely with a view to profit by the transportation of passengers and goods. They are usually short lines between important points of commerce. In some parts of Europe military roads have been constructed; in these, of course, profit has been a secondary consideration; but the railway system of Europe is confined to the subject. As a general rule, all the railroads in England, France, Belgium, and Germany have been laid out early and altogether with a view to the earning of money as carriers. No other principle, indeed, considering the size and general development of European countries, could have justified their construction.

In the United States the case is widely different. Our country is so vast that we might almost annex Europe bodily and make a State of it without doubling the bulk of population. Our railways correspond; we have, in round numbers, 25,000 miles in operation—considerably more than there are in all the rest of the world. And the idea which prompted the construction of these 25,000 miles was not the mere making of money by the transportation of goods and passengers, but the development of immense tracts of productive country, which, without railways, could have been opened to commerce, agriculture, and industry.

These, therefore, are the attempt to deduce from European experience rules for the guidance of American railroads in respect to tolls, rates of fare, expenses of working, cost of construction, expense of repairs, and so forth, must necessarily fall into gross errors. The great ruling idea of our railroads is the opening up of new land; to build the road at any cost, to borrow money at any rate, to trust the stock to the tender mercies of Wall Street, and to submit to any depreciation of stock and bonds, but —to build the road. No prudent man in this country has invested in railway securities without coupling the investment with a purchase of land along the road; nor, on the other hand, has any far-seeing proprietor of land ever refused to contribute according to the extent of his land for the purpose of running a railroad through it.

Hence it follows that while it is of the highest importance in Europe to put fares and tolls as high as possible, in order to make money, here the very reverse is the rule. So, there, it is vital that no competing lines should be constructed; here, the very essence of our system requires as much competition and as many roads as possible. There, bonds and preferred stocks are dispositions as being likely to damage the prospects of stock; here, dividends on stock being a minor consideration, no sound objection is made to the raising of money by mortgages or privileges when the enterprise requires it, and it is on that basis that we proceed.

The revulsion of last fall narrowly missed doing the country a fatal injury by prematurely breaking down a number of the leading railways. How some of them escaped total wreck is indeed marvelous. Half a dozen great companies are now in possession of the protest, and received legal notice that their property would be seized, or eroded the calamity by a timely compromise. And the depression of last October continued till the present time it would have been out of the power of many of them to escape the fate of insolvent debtors. They would have been sold under the hammer, and railway enterprise in the United States would have received a shock from which it would not have recovered in a generation.

That misfortune has been averted by the accidental influx of money which is now the leading feature of the financial world. In the absence of safe and profitable mercantile investments, capitalists are driven into the railway market for employment for their means, and this competition is that nearly all the roads which were on the verge of bankruptcy a few months ago now lid fair to surmount their difficulties and become solvent. It is no slight gain to the country at large that such concerns as the Erie, Cleveland and Toledo, Michigan Central, Hudson, Illinois Central, etc., should be rescued from insolvency. When they fail, railroad enterprise—which is merely another term for the development of the country—will receive a fatal blow. As it is, they may now flourish long enough to justify further expenditures for the construction of new roads and the opening of new tracts of virgin soil to commerce and agriculture.

THE USURY LAW.

THE Committee on Banks in the New York State Legislature has reported a bill fixing seven per cent. as the legal rate of interest on all loans of money, but abolishing the old forfeiture of principle and interest where a larger interest than the legal rate was stipulated. According to this bill, where a creditor has covenanted to receive more than seven per cent. the debtor may, on proof thereof, cheat him legally of all his interest, but can not, as at present, defraud him of his capital sum.

We ought to be thankful for small favors, and the Legislature is therefore entitled to some gratitude. At the same time it may not be out of place to remark that the Report is evidently less elaborate than the Bill. It continues which looks almost exclusively to bonds and mortgages on land, and hardly at all to loans on mercantile paper and securities. It continues which looks almost exclusively to bonds and mortgages on land, and hardly at all to loans on mercantile paper and securities. It is impossible to borrow money on farm-lands under ten or twelve per cent. Without inquiring into the soundness of this belief, it may be suggested that it is quite possible to frame a compromise which shall be equally satisfactory to the landholders of the rural districts and the capitalists of the cities. It is not likely that the latter are desirous of lending their money on bond and mortgage on country property. They are but little addicted to that class of investments. What they want is to be protected against the dishonesty of persons who borrow money of them in Wall Street at the current rates of the day and afterward turn round, plead usury, and cheat them of principal and interest. A law declaring that money might be sold at its market value in Wall Street, but that it should not be lawful to exact more than seven per cent. on land and mortgage on land, would be gladly accepted by the opponents of the usury laws: why should not such a law meet the views of the country members?

A DISGRACE TO THE COUNTRY.

IT being determined that the Collins line of European steamers is to be abandoned, the question arises —How is the steam transportation business between the United States and Europe to be transacted? And the only answer that can be made is, that it must fall into the hands of the Scottish Cunard Company.

There is an American company which owns two steamers plying between New York and Liverpool, the Arctic and the Baltic. They are very fair steamers in their way, and very favorably run and managed; but neither their speed, nor their size, nor their route place them in the first rank of ocean steamers. They are a second-rate line. There is a first-class steamer—the Vanderbilt—plying between New York and Southampton; but she can not constitute a line of steamers, and we presume that no one would pretend that the Ariel and North Star could be classed as her consorts. In a word, we have no line of steamers which can compete with the Cunarders. And the longer, hence, this opinion is more reliable, and safer than any line of which the United States can boast, and the natural consequence is that they will monopolize the travel between this and Europe.

We have little sympathy to bestow on the Collins line. It was a poor enterprise, depending for support on an unjustifiable subvention from the Government, and so managed that it could not support itself without public help. But we do think that it is a disgrace to this country that, with all the enterprise, and all the capital, and all the facilities which American shipyards enjoy, the business of transporting freight and passengers across the Atlantic should be abandoned to foreigners. After all our brag and bluster, the British can beat us in steamers, we had best be a trifle more modest in proclaiming our national go-ahead capacity in future.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF CANTON.

CANTON, it seems, has been successfully bombarded by the English and French. In a strategical point of view, the operation must be regarded as purely a foraging expedition; for it is not to be supposed that the loss of so distant a port will affect the resources of the Chinese Government, considering the disturbed state of the empire, and the notorious ignorance of the Chinese Government of that part of the most distant parts of his dominions. It is merely, on the other hand, a pull at the purses of the wealthy Cantonese, and also a sober, a tub to the whale in England and France.

But it may fairly be presumed that this opening of hostilities will be followed, by measures calculated to produce more decisive results. A great expedition against Pekin or the vicinity is understood to have been prepared, and unless no accident supervene, it may be expected that it will be undertaken so soon as the allies have been adequately refreshed by the plunder of Canton.

The belligerents seem to be much exercised by the religious and sectarian views of their master, Mr. Reed, who is not only debarred from participation in their councils by the instructions of his government, but is effectually restrained from hostile intercourse with the Chinese by the impossibility of getting his ship near them. If, however, the Chinese have no better repartee for their outrages upon our vessels—and it is believed they have—it is not easy to perceive any ground upon which we can justify hostility to war with them. Our European neighbors are fortunate in Mr. Reed's inaction in the midst of their bustle and activity; they may not have forgotten the fable of the fox who had lost his tail.

THE LOUNGER.

THE LOUNGER RE-LOUNGERED.

A FORTNIGHT ago last night, said "Does any reader of history, who knows what he is about for a moment that George Washington, an English colonial military officer, at the age of twenty-two, a century ago, would have refused the challenge given under such circumstances as are related in the tenth chapter of "The Virginians"?

In view of the times, the probable character of Washington was very young, and, as it is likely enough to be heard of again, may as well be stated at some length.

"Lord Fairfax and Colonel Washington," says the Lounger's correspondent, "were attentive to a party. Fairfax challenged Washington to the second, and they exchanged shots, when an explanation ensued, and Fairfax admitted that he was in the wrong. Washington had the pistol in conviction Fairfax of his error before they went upon the ground, but he preferred to exchange shots first."

This is the story; and the writer then proceeds to speak of the impossibility of getting it into history, and concludes that "he must rely on his own other source than American history for history and not sole or exclusive." The "sole" authority in his estimation, lying in the great truth that George Washington was only fought a duel, but a silly and unnecessary duel!

Now when Lord Fairfax first met Washington the nobleman was fifty-nine years old, and the Virginian sixteen. Fairfax, from the first to the last, was the particular friend of Washington; and the first great undertaking of the latter was the survey of the vast lands of Fairfax, in Virginia. It is one of the "sole" authorities of history that the decendant of the Lord Fairfax who conquered with Cromwell at Marston Moor was, in the words of Irving, "one of Washington's earliest friends, and in some degree the founder of his fortunes." (See also an article upon "Governor Court" in Putnam for June, 1857.)

Will the Lounger's friend, Marmion, U. S. A., put that in his pistol and fire it off into the story which he has been in the habit of believing?

But there is unpublished testimony directly to the point, of which Thackeray could have had no knowledge, and which is probably known to very few of Washington's contemporaries. The Lounger is indebted to one of our most accurate and accomplished historical scholars for the perusal of an extract from a letter of George Mason's to Edmund Randolph, written in reply to one of Randolph's, after the difference between General Lee and Washington at the battle of Monmouth, and expressing an apprehension that a duel might be the result. Mason says that Randolph need have no fear—that he had known Washington from his boyhood to have had but one opinion of dueling: that it was essentially wrong, and no indication of moral courage.

It is a very interesting and important fact. Thackeray, of course, could have had no access to it; and no author can be reasonably required to know every thing that was ever said or written about a personage incidentally introduced into his story. As the case stands in published history and the probabilities of the case, Thackeray is right. But as the Lounger said before, "it is in the general tone of his portrait that the likeness lies." Let any reader carefully compare the young Washington of Thackeray's romance with the young Washington of Irving's biography, and decide if they are not substantially the same character.

SIR LUCIUS O'TRIGGER.

In Manilla and the West Indies, and in effete India not long since, a very favorite amusement in cock-fighting. "I have often seen a man in Manilla," said Henricus to the Lounger, within a few days, "hurry to save his game-cock from being run over, leaving his child to be killed himself." The sport consists in tying steel spurs to the legs of the birds, putting them down in a ring—having previously betted heavily—and the one who strikes first kills his foe and wins the day, having also covered himself with honor. In this kind of business there is some reason, because the successful bird makes money for his master.

But why should our Congress, and the Army and Navy, keep game-cocks, and having put steel into their hands, instead of upon their legs, and without betting, or any possible advantage to any body or thing except the undertaker and surgeon, "pit" them together to strike or fire?

Or, again, when two men in a bar-room, or a barber's shop, or a hall of representation or any other house of uncertain character, give each other the lie, or break each other's nose, or spit in each other's face, and then, having slept, prayed, and made their wills, go out to complete the business by killing each other, why in the name of humanity courage and moral heroism, should any body talk about honor?

Honor is a cock-pit!

If a man spits in your face, and you fight a duel to show your courage, everybody says that the world knows that you fight not because you are brave, but because you are not a miserable poltroon that you can not endure to hear miscroppos tell you a coward. A duel is sheer cowardice. A man professes to be afraid of public opinion, and fears to pass for a coward—to be branded as showing the white feather. What is public opinion public opinion of which he stands in such fear? Who brand him? Who account him a coward? Are they generous, noble, heroic, who make him fight that they may peppery and pop-cocky Sir Lucius O'Trigger?

There is not a solitary instance in history or human experience, of a man who has increased the respect with which he was regarded by honorable men and women by fighting a duel. The indignant and instinctive shout of the whole world that Washington could ever have consented to a duel is the present evidence of it. The feeling with which the country has always pursued Aaron Burr is another proof of it. Can any honest, highminded man put his hand upon his heart and say that he likes Hamilton better for having fought with Burr?

We can make all allowances of different times, different circumstances, different sentiments; but should we excuse prodigacy in Lady Russell now if the more readily because profligacy was fashionable in her time?

OUR POETS.

NAMELY, the Lounger's poets. He is happy to be the vehicle which excellent verse as has been already passed through him into the public mind and memory.

Of such is the following:

TO MY DISHONIN ANGEL.

O! horrow! how I quarrelsis at what sine going to say mi trumbles dare not go to words mi follee wil Betra.

O mi hart, its of a fire
now sis or lump or ise won minnit its or wharlin roun
the next its in ver ice.

O ladee dere, it isent fer that makse mi trumbel so but with ur start makse this mi hart like fevers agur go—

fur Sally, si the agog sees that makse mi hart so wise
Wot greddete horrible to fer
i mail mi mine to say.

Bistur jeruba shee mail catalp too
i kant so happy bee fur spurits aather in do spare tre tuk to bring me—

jeruba wen the kittel bins
in orful angrich screams
She takes too sliver out an lets the angrish out in stemeh

So isa a kittel in town fums
but in a forful quiver
I shuld leave sil to pease but that pootry is mi liever

O Sally, you I love so i wasent much effeckt
If gra on me so stedfully
It never war suspected
Shill i break down at ur wunst si cupide dart shot thru an ive ben dum in De gross fur morns or mouth or tu

O ladee fare it beist yer bare nur nuther bolt yer lix
Surpassing, but treen an bolt
the charm so fatal lies
Yer love is him er meetin house and then sich goofy bare an yer complexions like the sno thuis just cum down a fare
tis yer perfickshun amazes that of the Miss Cluffs da yer mimic is nuthin to ta la tha blame on in nil pride i pumpke lee an tes like i etickle a thavin whilin in a kab with a viper is a livin an a maxim.
Seeday last in the Queenses
nil go to se au shows an fashinge dare amount to me
Si dent want no no close but dont let mi fale worry u
a endless kabb to pay of a hot sever so pooly on hiah spirits to stay.

u eadent help looking sweets
wibout contradicted trubbel an truthout hee natteret not to mails wurts fur sope nails not to babbel

i spare yer feelins of i can in it all fab i ay
i shold hoe nipped it in the but insted ov lettin it spred sums made fer kiess & liv an mave an bettin at bagpipes an others grin an bare it with a smile & a sweet grimace its natteral for man to bee jest everything—multiply—adding, dimynishing so if they evir se thuns
there sure to be sum one i ax for nuthin Sam—ol
you hez to giv, youre gone
i drame not ov sich a one i only ax to love go on be happy Sara an dont let ot thort se me cause i wood be jilus er chip thelz gat nils yer tes
but kepe a——combolog
may nest down tu yu serene last youth has bloomed in his yer fateful Valentine

THE FITNESS OF THINGS.

THERE was a late election in the Legislature of this State for a Judge of the Court of Appeals. This, of course, a purely literary office; but property to distribute the money and to direct the management of elections, requires some literary knowledge and sympathy.

The name of a gentleman was proposed who is not only one of the most illustrious men of letters in America—loved and honored as a poet wherever the English tongue is spoken—but also accomplished and various scholar—but also a man of great practical experience, and shrewd in affairs, public and things; of the largest popular sympathies and profound political sagacity—a man whose genius is as much his own as his name is Sedgwick. It was as palpable and foregone a conclusion that he was as proper a person for the place, as that the sun rises every day that Washington was first President.

The Empire State was about to elect William Cullen Bryant one of its University Regents. But while it was refusing him, Massachusetts was calling her Judge Hoar to a seat in her Senate, as one of the overseers of her University.

There was a difference, perhaps, between Lawrence Boston and Athens.

POETRY.

TO THE PRARE PHLOSENCE.

Composed while sitting on an Omnibust. By John, Jr. Jr. Jr.

O Parare Phlen! with thy sweet pymals,
Of pluinonces, and small bunnit on the top;
Just tell us what's been passin dicy:
if they go on as we're before they stop.

Pains pluinonces make about the size
Of a big——
You are a bird—a trump!—Trumpet the shop
Where these phino things they plurnish. How do you do?

(Do fro, the phrench say—meaning how dumsyed)
And I probably am very very well boy.
If you're phine phiries happed to collapse—
Tell them to send for Dr. Phillips directly,
And all that phire phoet spread quite thro'd away!
A strange, strange life you lead—just like a play—
A phinny phiction—with never drops.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

IF any thoughtful reader will consider that the Weekly is published only once a week, that the Lounger, in a single week, fills only one side of it, he may arrive at the conclusion that if ten correspondents send him over three closely written sheets of advice, inquiry, remonstrance, and flattery, it will be very hard for him to make room for it in type—even if he wishes to do so. How, then, if thirty and fifty do the same thing?

NOTICE, therefore, TO THE CORRESPONDENTS OF THE LOUNGER.

You are expected to pack your wit and wisdom into one page of YOUTH-PUNCH paper; else the Lounger's Letter-Box will never be a Bon-Mots-Hole of Calcutta, in which you will all straight each other.

Dear correspondents, the Lounger will do the best he can with you this week, and don't be afraid that every line you write will not be carefully considered, for it is so. If Uncle Sam doesn't bring the letters, do you mean to swear at the Lounger?

—How could we better begin, to-day, than by a hearty thanks to the luckiest cigar the probable smpz?

"Here's to the Lounger's good health and better acquaintance in my best bumper of egg-nog. More power to his elbow and magick pen! May he live to improve the present age by his Wisdom, wit, sincerity, and humor, and see his grate grate grand Children profit by his virtious example."

The Lounger listens for an "Amen" from Katalin to Sacramento.

—MISS MELINDA BROADSKIRT, who has already opened the subject of smoking and spitting upon the Brooklyn ferry-boats, and in cars and steamers generally, now says, in personal explanation:

"In your comments upon my first communication you confer upon me the maternity title of Mrs.—a distinction that I have not yet attained, however much it may be desired, and it may happen my future prospects to permit such an egregious error to be proclaimed to the world unmolested. At once the strongest evidence that I am just emerging from my sixteenth year, and without a graduate of one of the numerous seminaries that are bored locust in almost every ward in this and adjacent city. I took my degree for beauty and intelligence, but am possessed of sufficient of both to answer my purpose, and to adorn one of those wedding, prize-fighting communities that women have their rights, the sanctity of which can not be invaded; and though this is a free country, and the largest liberty awarded to all, yet men have no excuse for making 'smoke-stacks' of themselves while enjoying the society of ladies, whether in the drawing-room or public conveyance.

The Lounger respectfully recommends to Miss Broadskirt to carry in her 'reticule' (a word of great elegance) a package of envelopes of the Anti-Tobacco Society, and to hand one of them quietly to every sinner who dis colors in the very smoke. He will read upon it, among many choice observations, the following:

"A MOKE WHO SPITS—Lickspit, dickers, dickens, keepers under! Begin smoke! Little, rapped, dingy, dainty, everyone knows! Fodder, fodder, fodder, no wicker, 'can't you oppose to manufacture?' Yes.' 'They get me a box of Havannas.' And again: "Can I be excused?" (or Miss Melinda Broadskirt's shirt), I please!' 'Oh yes, my friend; you can be a shaving, cleaning, cudgel, quilting, dimynishing animal of your choice. You can your little soul!' Stand aside, my little boy, I want to pass.' 'Don't call me a 'little boy.' I have studied and chewed these two years!"

Try a few envelopes, Miss Melinda, just a few!

—"I was at a card party the other evening, and, among others, there was a young man present who was quite an adept at cutting paper. I being quite the contrary, I took great pleasure in presenting me as an object of ridicule to the company."

So says WILLIAM PACKCARD, asking advice, and requesting that "a young man" may be corrected. William, let us leave that to the ladies. Women are more perceptive than men. If "a young man" shows himself to be no young gentleman," a young lady" (for whom have I "a lady's delicate etcetera" (it is usually called love, William) will perceive it at once, and correct her opinion of him accordingly.

—"The Dog-epic" fails to enchant the Lounger. It begins:

"Heard ye the crash of the bob-dogs' bones?"

The Lounger must think his correspondent maligns the "crash of wits" which he describes as entertained by it.

—RESTICUS describes the Diana of his dreams, to whom he can only be near than he can be his bosom. "DESPAIRING also appreciates to a certain extent," he says, "and gives a man admiration for the esteem enough to make him in love with himself, but never shows the least desire to rival him in actual affection." Restricus, do you know the white mountain-lizard? Do you recall its form, love-more than any other animal we can think the most exquisite vases? Do you think how, in dog-days, it lies upon hot mountain-sides, like a thought of snow to distract the sun? Do you in other side of the mountain—in the next county—in the next field, even, it will not stir, nor bite, nor scarce a spell be enough to compel it? Wrestle your brows with that lizard, and in the cold moonlight sing under your lizard's window that poem of Matthew Arnold's in which are these stanzas:

"She smiles and smiles, and will not sigh,
While we for sighing passion die;
Yet she would love, those eyes declare,
Were but some waiting lover there.

"Yet, oh that Fate would let her see
One of some sterner race than we!
One for whose sake she once might prove
How deep she could love!

"Then will she weep—with smiles, till then,
Coldly she marks the sons of men:
Till then her lovely eyes will mantle
Their gay, unwavering disdain."

—J. MAYNARD writes that he suffered a young lady, his cousin Sallie, to go to his writing-desk. Presently,

"Having occasion to write a note, I looked for an envelope in which to place it, but to there was none to be found. What was the meaning? Why it was only yesterday that I placed a pack of fine cream laid in that very drawer; but they were not all cousins; that's certain—and I must look elsewhere. While searching for one envelope I discovered a dozen or more, and for the purpose of directing it, but to my surprise it was directed to some one—not to my brother; it seemed to be duplicate of the former; another and another was examined until the whole pack had been examined. Every envelope had a different superscription on each, some written one way and some another. Curiously he ran to the fireplace, and there discovered a letter unfinished directed to the same person. Why were they so carefully destroyed? Simply because they did not exactly suit the fastidious taste of the young lady."

Ah, Sallie!

"But, lasting adds, it is not the envelopes themselves that annoy me so much; it is the fact that twenty-five were used for one letter when it required but one. Now, if this habit prevails with the rest of the sex, it be fair to presume will be equally as when more important matters are under consideration and the opportunity is afforded her of doing as she pleases!"

Cousin Sallie's name is Legion. Let your indictment that so le J. Maddon's; and that every man who sees the extravagance of a young woman lavishing one of his luckiest cigar the probable amount of her married disbursements.

—A SUBSCRIBER says that on Valentine's Day

"I found in my pigeon-hole to my address many aspiring belittling the day, in which I was relentlessly made to appear as a fool. I am forty: that my hair is turning decidedly gray: that at forty-one's chicks would be blowed, yet I can't help but feel a little annoyed at the fact that my wife would prove an unpleasable blessing: that we are commanded to be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth, etc., etc. And then graded to the quick, they took to cast a ray of sunshine upon my almost forlorn hope by relating many happy marriages even at forty—and some have gone so far as to venture an offer, on confidence, however, that no secret was ever comply with."

But he adds that one note had awakened hope even in his aged heart. The handwriting was feminine, and he was sure that the portrait was self-drawn from life. Let us wish the bachelor well married!

—"A good wife is the most constant and faithful companion you can possibly have with you through the journey of life. She can smooth your linen and your brow; assist your genius and your fortune; encourage you, comfort your moments as well as your toes and coffee. If you are overtaken with misfortune your tongue, alas! often does the same to your debut bosom. If she occasionally sees aside to your pocket, it is some consolation to find that she sees your bottom as nothing. If you are too proud or too fiery to dig your own potatoes, she can scratch them and save you permission to have it done, she will do it for you. Her love for her husband is such that she will do many hard things to please him. When woman loves, remember it is with a double-distilled devotedness."

LYNVOL

"Alarum: flourish: exeunt omnes." So sometimes end books, plays, and lives. But sometimes also "Sufficunte: the scene changes" in the glad life of Lynvol. Lynvol shall be the Lounger's reading today—passing the reader through music to his neighbor the Editor's Table.

SONG FROM A NORTHERN SHORE.

The cold, grey sunset over lonely seas,
The grating moan, that frets the ridges of the sand,
Are all that recompense me for the breeze—
The wild, wild breeze that lost her love by the land!

Ere now she glides along through tropic airs,
Green islands, bathed in mist, before her pass,
Where lamb and cocoanut trees sense perfumed bears,
And orange-flowers its scattered on the grass.

Pale forms, rich odors, magic warbling birds,
Winds wailing sounds of sorrow all day and night,
Are much for her as music for sweet words—
As sweet as sorrow—the lightest for the light!

Will the spring come again? Will lives frost
Unlock his icy doors, and bid us live?
Will summer bring again the lost and dead,
And warmer seas once more my treasure give?

Wait, then, in hope, my heart! Be strong in love!
Let faithless be my prompting, and despair!
But conquering sin thy selfish dreams above,
And trust the boon that helps thy sadness there!

She will not thus forget thee; and when spring
Voices for brook and bird once more has brought,
Oh, welcome hearts! still sad, and sweet!
May't then not find the words thou long hast sought!

Nightingale Dean. G. LAW RAY.

Bohemian Walks and Talks.

THE SUNDAY LAW.

ON present estimate Mayor, following the example of several of his predecessors, has proposed the enforcement of the ordinances against Sabbath-breaking in this city. I see by the daily papers that a number of policemen, commanded by a sergeant and supported by a corps of reporters, made a raid in Bowery yesterday. Information lodged against the German theatres, beer-shops, and concert-gardens, made some beer, and numerous arrests against those breaking the law that they were detailed to enforce. I opine that there could be no great difficulty in the way of enforcing the law in the city of New York. It is claimed that the majority of Sabbath-breakers are Germans. In the streets of Frankfort, for example—is as quiet on Sunday as the Fifth Avenue. The difficulty here is with the police administration. The law should be detailed to shut up the theatres, and to keep them shut. But in the present constitution of things between the Common Council and the Police Commissioners it is not probable that any thing will be done. The last time I was in Paris was in a new city springing up on the "East side." In this city there are still vacant lots and unoccupied streets, scattered together, speaking their own languages, practicing their own customs, and declining to associate with the American population. So far from assimilation, the most bitter hostility exists, and numerous combats ensue. The quiet of these streets is often broken by mobs pursuing some unfortunate fellow-being, which I still think should be the law, while the police are discussing the Kansas question over a quiet cigar. They can find more terror-millen in the streets of Paris. A most interesting territory. On Sunday the tumults, disorders, and riots are directed; drinking, dancing, fighting, during the chief amusements of the people. It is a disgrace to the boasted civilization of the nineteenth century.

POPULAR DELUSIONS.

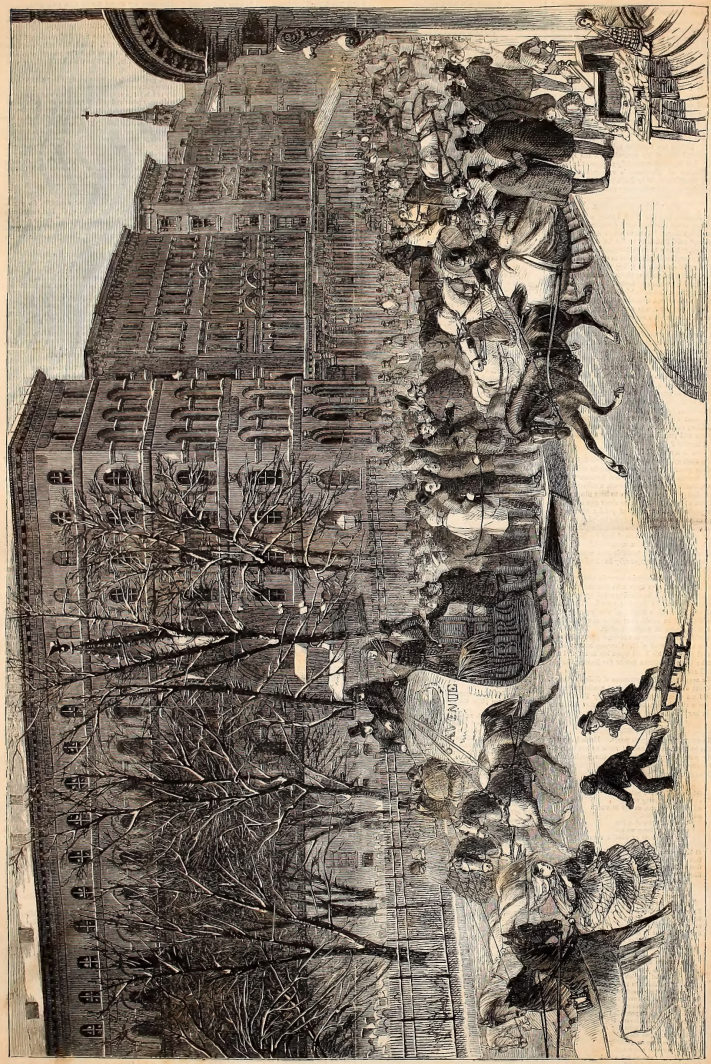
THAT the Washington papers are published for the information of their readers, and their principal value is as repositories for the clerks in the Departments.

That the Washington correspondents write what they believe, or believe what they write.

That the reception of Congressional proceedings by telegraph contains any reliable information as to what is done or said in either House.

That all the dramatic critics have grown rich through the contributions of artists.

That Saturday Lost all the young ladies substitute sketchish for crinkine.



That the public press of this city is in such a high state of perfection that the President of the Commission deserves something handsome for his arduous labors in writing resolutions and receipting for his salary.

That the streets of the city are in "as good a condition as could be expected."

That "every body" has adopted the Balmoral petticoat.

That money is "so easy" that every body can get as much as they want.

That the Ottoman Rear-Admiral intended to article all the New York ship-builders.

SLEIGHING IN BROADWAY.

SLEIGHING IN BROADWAY.

THE late fall of snow has exhibited Broadway in a new light. Sleighs have taken the place of wheeled vehicles, and the usual rattle of the great street has been diversified by the clang of bells and the creak of sleigh runners. Of late years, this winters have been so severe that sleighing in Broadway almost lost its charm by its long continuance; but this winter the mild weather lasted so long that there seemed a prospect that the omnibuses would retain their control of the thoroughfare till spring. Happily for the spirits of the Broadway promenaders, and for the prospects of the farmer, the late storm has re-established the uniformity of the seasons.

For the benefit of our country readers we may say that a Broadway sleigh is a long box, with a seat for the driver in front, and ledges running parallel to the runners for passengers to seat themselves. A Broadway sleigh is intended to carry twenty people; but such is its elasticity, and such the spirit of accommodation among the traveling public, that it has been known to receive eighty persons at once, and sixty is no uncommon cargo. A few eldrin seats, the others stand—where they can; in cold weather the latter are the more fortunate of the two. There are no skins in the Broadway sleighs, and a long ride in one of them is apt to chill the blood.

Of an evening, in sleighing time, the javasible portion of our people enjoy a sort of saturnalia. It is allowable to snow-ball every sleigh as it passes. The consequences are more agreeable to the snow-ballers than to the snow-balled. A heavy lump of snow and ice striking a lady in the face is not so pleasant to her as it may be to the playful urchin who launched it at a venture. Under such circumstances, however, the best thing that she can do is to wipe away the blood which the missile is apt to draw, and to congratulate herself upon living in a land of such unbounded liberty. When that amiable and lovely portion of our people to which Rodgers and O'Connell belong partake in this agreeable pastime, they usually put stones in their snow-balls; this makes them much surer as projectiles, and if they strike a lady in the face they may knock out her eye or maim her for life. The advantages of this novelty will at once be recognized. To complete the picture, we only need realize a policeman splitting his sides with laughter at the sight of a lady knocked down by one of these missiles—such, occasionally, is sleighing in New York.

SKATING IN THE NORTH OF EUROPE.

SKATING, FROM A LADY'S POINT OF VIEW.

T' the Editor of Harper's Weekly.

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—Will you be so kind as to have the inclosed picture—representing a recent scene on our pond near ——, Massachusetts—published in the next number of your Weekly? You may if you choose combine with it the other print which I send; it represents a skating scene in Northern Germany or Sweden, and is pretty enough, though the fair skaters, I flatter myself, suffer by the contrast with the girls of our village.

Between you and me (I hope you will not publish this paragraph) your fair correspondent must forgive us, but we could not think of maintaining her letter. —Ed. H. W.]. Papa doesn't like skating. He thinks it is unladylike, and he says such awful things (I wouldn't repeat them for the world) about our going out at night with gentlemen. But as Emily says—Papa is behind the age; in his time (he is over sixty) there were no telegraphs or railroads; no, perhaps I didn't), a few days ago we had a grand party on the pond. I had made up with Paul on purpose (you must know that he left me sitting on a chair at Mrs. Timothy's ball a few days before while he danced with that stuck-up thing Jemima Bell—and it was very Christian-like of me to forgive him, wasn't it?) (Undoubtedly, and we recommend Paul not to regret the offense.—Ed. H. W.); and the Bells, and the Simpsons, and the Hudsons had agreed to go, and each girl was to have two gentlemen to wait upon her; oh! it was to be such a time! It was quite seven when we left home, and though Jim drove as fast as the mare would go, it was a quarter to eight by the time we arrived at the pond, as we had to stop for several things on the way. The moon was up, and it was almost as clear as day; the ice was smooth as glass, and it was just cold enough for one to hate to stand still—a clear, bright cold, which makes the snow creak under your feet, and brought out the smoke from the chimneys in broad bold lines against the sky.

There was a great fuss about tying on our skates. Every gentleman wanted to fasten every lady's straps; such shoving and quarreling as went on among them—though for my part, what pleasure can be derived from having a wet, dirty, lady's boot in your lap, and twisting it about and handling it without gloves on a cold night, I can not see. However, they all seemed to like it, and I'm sure Paul took long enough to fasten my skates. I was 'most frozen when he let go my foot (will you believe it, Mr. Editor, the impudent fellow actually kissed the toe of my boot as he put it down? Such nonsense!) (We do believe it, and our opinion of Paul improves.—Ed. H. W.), and then away we went.

Mary Hudson seized my hand and we dashed off together, taking the left and right alternately, then the in-turn, and winding up with two parallel circles of eight. The chill soon passed off, and I never enjoyed any thing so much in my life. I challenged any of the gentlemen to a race the whole length of the pond. About a dozen of us started.

SKATING IN NEW ENGLAND.

Susan Bell—the little cheat—started first and got the lead, but we were soon after her, and I tell you, Mr. Editor, the ice creaked "some" under our flying skates. David Wynn, who was second, struck a branch or something, and went down, and poor Emily Bell, who was close behind him, went over him. We saw nothing but a cloud, and her poor feet sticking out of it. Then Paul, who, poor fellow! went out of his way to help her up, tripped and struck his head a terrible blow on the ice. I was sorry for him, and under other circumstances would have stopped to ask if he were hurt; but could I be expected to do so in the middle of the race? [Of course not; we entirely approve our correspondent's neglect of Mr. Paul, under the circumstances.—Ed. H. W.] After a few seconds of the race, Jim was first, Susan second, Martha Simpson and her brother third and fourth, I fifth, the others nowhere. I am the best skater of our village (you needn't sneer, Mr. Editor, I am; if you come down our way, you shall judge for yourself) [We should leave at once, if our engagements permitted; meanwhile we beg to state that we have not the least doubt of the fact stated by our correspondent. —Ed. H. W.]; so, as you may fancy, my blood was up. With a few vigorous efforts, I passed the two Simpsons, and was close behind Susan. She was flying over the ice; her skates scarcely seemed to touch it; and she is so strong. Still I made sure of passing her, and edged inward toward a bend which the pond makes.

Suddenly as I dashed along, I saw Jim draw up. The heels of his skates cut furrows in the ice an inch deep, and he shouted—"Look out ahead! The ice bends!"

Susan stopped short. Not so I. I had made my mind up to win the race, and, bend or no bend, on I went. In less time than you take to read this I was first, and had but a few yards to skate to win the race. Just as I passed them the moon slunk under a cloud. Directly afterward I heard a tremendous crack just behind me. The ice had given way. I was now safe. The others could not overtake me. Victory was mine.

At the instant these thoughts occurred the ice under me broke, and I felt myself suddenly plunged into very cold water. Instinctively I threw out my arms and caught the ice. This saved me. My feet did not touch bottom. I sustained my head above water; but every time I tried to raise myself upon the ice it broke.

For some moments I was too proud to call for help. It was my own fault. I had been duly warned. I fancied the girls jeering me for my foolhardiness. I realized my father gravely saying that he had known all along how it would end. So I tried again and again to work my way toward a solid place in the ice; but without the least success. Just as I fancied I was going to escape from my watery prison the ice broke, and I went under.

I was growing very cold. Strange thoughts of hungry fish came into my head, and clustered round twinges which I began to feel in my feet. The idea of death in that place burst upon me. I, a poor girl, to be drowned under that ice! It was horrible. Overcome by the thought, I renounced my pride, burst into tears, and screamed aloud for help.

A dead silence followed. Oh! was it possible that they had gone home? or that they could not hear me?

I screamed again with all my strength, the cold converting the end of my cry into a feeble chatter.

A dozen bold shouts instantly replied:

"Where are you?"

"Here, here, oh! here." I tried to scream, but my voice was going fast.

I heard more shouts, but did not understand them. I heard, or thought I heard, skates cutting over the ice, and splashes, as if the ice had given way under other skaters as it had under me. Voices rang in my ear, but whether they were near or far I could not tell. My feelings were not painful. On the contrary, they were rather agreeable—something similar to what one feels when sinking into a fainting fit.

Some one was in the water beside me. Who it was I could not say. But he said:

"Put your arms round my neck."

I had just sense and strength enough to do so.

"Now boys, haul away, for God's sake!" he shouted in a voice very like Paul's.

"Give way, there, like men!" roared some very stern voice in the dark distance.

Then we were in a farm-house, and I was in bed, warm again, with all the girls round me. And they told me what a narrow escape I had had; how they had all supposed that I had fallen through at the place where the ice first cracked and had been carried away by the undercurrent; how Paul, who had been disabled by his fall, suddenly revived, went on like a maniac, getting into the hole, and diving under the ice, till they were obliged to hold him back; how he and the rest of them were beside themselves with agony when my distant cry was heard; how Paul, whose clothes were stiff, and who was nearly frozen to death, had again started up at the sound of my voice, had dashed over the dangerous ice, and had reached me first; how brave cousin Jim (noble fellow! he always does precisely the right thing at the right time) had thrown him the end of a rope which he had just strength enough to catch; and how we were both drawn out stiff and senseless.

They told me all this, the sweet dear girls crying with emotion, and scolding me for having given them such a fright; and when I asked, in a low, feeble way,

"And Paul?"

"Oh! Paul is very ill—quite delirious—he is in the next room."

So I got up. The girls said I was mad—that any thing so indelicate could not be thought of—that they would put me to bed by force. But I suppose there was something in my eye which showed them I had made up my mind. I put on some dry clothes which the farmer's wife lent me, and I went straight into Paul's room. I felt awkward at first, being in the same room with a young man in bed; but, dear Mr. Editor, could I act otherwise? [Decidedly, we honor you for the act.—Ed. H. W.]

The doctor was there. He supposed I was Paul's sister.

"Be so good," said he, "as not to leave him till I return. He is in a very dangerous state. Apply the remedies which I have prescribed."

I obeyed. For three days and nights I never left him. My father and his friends came, and besought me to leave him. I said, quietly, that I would stay there till he was able to walk out of the room. Papa groaned in his way, and went home. On the fourth day the doctor pronounced him out of danger. His frost-bites yielded to proper treatment. He was able to walk, and I left him.

So ended our skating adventure.

I don't like to tell secrets; but if, Mr. Editor, you should receive any future communications from Mrs. Paul ——, you may perhaps notice that the handwriting bears a remarkable resemblance to that of Yours truly,

CARRIE B——.

LITERARY.

HARPER & BROTHERS publish this week their third great book of travels for the season. Barth was followed by Livingstone, and now we have Atkinson's ORIENTAL AND WESTERN SIBERIA. The world is well-nigh explored.

Seated one afternoon on the slope of the Giant's Mountain, looking over the Black Sea and straining our eyes to see white sails in the distance, a friend said, "Where shall we go now to find something new?" and after a little thought we replied, "Let us go to Siberia, and endeavor to reach the Pacific Ocean through that desert that lies south of the Russian wastes and north of the Indian and Tartar possessions." The idea was never accomplished, but never abandoned, and had been the subject of discussion only a few days before Atkinson's work was announced.

He has not accomplished it fully, but he has seen those parts of Siberia which no traveler has before penetrated, and has opened the way for future and farther explorations. He is an artist, and wandered into those remote regions in search of subjects for his pencil. He brought away with him 560 sketches of scenery and people, of which we have about one-tenth here, and his admirable account with them.

Mr. Atkinson writes with exceeding simplicity and freshness of style. He is no book-maker. He tells his story precisely as he would if talking aloud, and hence it is a very enjoyable narrative. The character of his seven years' wanderings necessarily made them abound in incident. Under the special protection of the Emperor Nicholas, he was received in all circles and all houses, while his objects and his profession led him into close contact with life in every phase.

Men and women are not precisely the same persons in Siberia that they are elsewhere. Human nature has some variations. We have not found more novelty, more interest, in Livingstone than in Atkinson, nor as much fun.

Lovers of hunting and forest sports will be delighted with his accounts of the game of Siberia. In this respect the book resembles while it is a contrast to the great African Explorer's work.

The greatest bear-hunter he met with was a woman, Anna Petrornaia, who has singly killed sixteen bears! He drove deer with eagles trained like falcons. The eagle struck the deer and brought him down while tearing into his side and liver with her sharp bill. Now he shot wild boars, and now snipe, and now wild goats. Perhaps the most remarkable "day's shooting" which he describes is that of three of his friends, who being upset in their carriage while crossing water, and thoroughly soaked, sent their coachman on horseback for dry clothes while they amused themselves with snipe shooting, their guns being in water-proof cases and dry. Taking off their clothes and pouring the water out of their boots, they replaced the latter, and in the primitive costume of boots and hats only shot for three hours in a mosquito cover, and bagged some dozens of game before their servant returned to their relief.

The book abounds in adventure, and at the same time is manifestly accurate in geographical statements. As a contribution to useful knowledge it possesses the highest character, and as a readable book of travel and adventure it will have thousands of admirers.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

ON Tuesday, 22d February, in the Senate, Senator Bell presented resolutions of the Tennessee Legislature on the Nebraska law, and his course thereon, and accompanied them with a speech defending his course. He was answered by his colleague, Senator Johnson; after which he rejoined, and the Senate went into executive session.——The House having gone into Committee of the Whole on the Indian Appropriation Bill, speeches on Kansas were made by Messrs. Burroughs, Curry, Morris, and Andrews.

On Wednesday, Senator Mallory introduced into the Senate a bill authorizing the construction of a naval dry dock. Senator Bell resumed his personal defense, and, after some remarks from his colleague, consumed the rest of the day in explaining his course.——In the House, a bill was reported by Mr. Campbell changing the present system of relief to disabled seamen. The House then went into Committee on the Indian Appropriation Bill, and speeches on Kansas were made by Messrs. Crawford, Goodwin, Millson, Chaffee, Fenton, Davis, and others.

On Thursday, in the Senate, Senator Mason presented resolutions inquiring as to the condition of the navy and the distribution of prize money during the last war. Senator Crittenden presented a letter from Mr. Shields, of Minnesota, praying that he be allowed to take his seat as United States Senator. He also moved that the prayer be granted. After debate by Senators Pugh, Crittenden, Johnson, and Toombs, and a refusal by vote of 26 to 22 to table the subject, the matter was referred to the Judiciary Committee. An amended substitute for the Army Bill, proposed by Senator Johnson, and providing for the employment of 3000 volunteers, was rejected by 26 against 23. Senator Hunter proposed to add one regiment of dragoons and two of infantry to the army; this was amended by Senator Pugh, so as to read—3000 volunteers to serve as dragoons or infantry for two years, and was adopted by 27 against 25. The bill thus amended was put to the vote, and was lost by 16 to 35. Explanations were made by Senators Bell and Johnson, and the Senate adjourned to Monday.——In the House, Mr. Quitman reported a bill authorizing the employment of a regiment of mounted volunteers in Texas, and the employment of four additional regiments if they should be needed. The case of Mr. Matteson was then taken up, and after discussion, in which Messrs. Harris, Keitt, Seward, Stanton, Taylor, Giddings, Hughes, Smith, Nichols, Jones, Curtis, Morrill, and Grow took part, resolutions to inquire into Mr. Matteson's right to sit in the House were referred to a Select Committee by 93 to 87.

On Friday, in the House—the Senate not being in session—Mr. Grow gave notice of a bill to permit the United States to be sued by their creditors. The House then went into Committee on the Indian Appropriation Bill, and passed it, after remarks on Kansas by Messrs. Smith of Tennessee, Giddings, and Harris. A bill was also passed to enable the President to pay $408,000 for the abolition of the Sound Dues.

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE UTAH EXPEDITION.

Much correspondence between the Government and the commanders of the Utah expedition has been published. A letter from the head-quarters of the army informs General Harney that "So well is the nature of this service appreciated, and so deeply are the honor and interests of the United States involved in its success, that the Government will hesitate at no expense to complete the efficiency of the little army, and insure health and comfort to it as far as attainable." He is told, "The prudence expected of you requires you to anticipate a resistance, general and organized, and to shape your movements as if it were certain, keeping the troops massed and in hand when approaching expected resistance." In a letter to Colonel Johnston, dated 23d of January, General Scott heartily approves of the Colonel's conduct, and unites his sympathy for the difficulties he (Johnston) so manfully conquered; also tendering an expression of his (Scott's) high appreciation of the noble energy, patience, and spirit displayed by the officers and men, adding that in this the War Department concurs. In another letter addressed to Colonel Johnston during the present month General Scott says that it is no longer probable that he will go to the Pacific coast, or that any expedition against or toward Utah will be dispatched from that side.

THE INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE.

The Investigating Committee into the alleged corruption of Congress by the manufacturers of Massachusetts continue to summon witnesses, but seem to gather but little information from them. Matteson and Horace Greeley have both been examined, but both proved perfect Know Nothings. Neither of them knew of the purchase of any member of Congress, or of the use of money in any shape to influence the votes of Congressmen. The Committee was baffled at every point.

THE KANSAS COMMITTEE.

At the last, as at the preceding meetings of the Kansas Committee, the old motions to send for persons and papers were made by Mr. Morrill, Mr. Walbridge, and Mr. Wade, but were voted down by a tie vote. Mr. Stephens, of Georgia, gave notice that, at the next meeting, he should propose a resolution to the effect that the Committee had all the information they needed, and should prepare a majority report.

THE DUELS AT WASHINGTON.

Washington has been in a dueling humor. No less than four "affairs of honor" have been on the tapis during the week. First, Colonel Sumner, who had an old grudge against General Harney, growing out of their professional relations, challenged him; the General handed the challenge to the Secretary of War, who is going to have Colonel Sumner tried by court-martial for the breach of discipline. Next, Lieutenant Rhind, of the Navy, who was "dropped" by the Navy Board in 1855, challenged Commander Boutwell for some offensive remarks contained in a pamphlet published by the latter; the Commander refused to fight, and was duly "posted" as a coward by the Lieutenant. Lieutenant Rhind has since been arrested and held to bail for the breach of the peace. Then, General Cullom, of Tennessee, was challenged by Mr. James B. Clay. It seems that both parties were drinking in a Washington bar-room when General Cullom, irritated at some remarks of Mr. Clay's, observed that he was "the degenerate son of an illustrious sire." Mr. Clay then called General Cullom a "d——d liar;" upon which General Cullom struck him. On the challenge being sent, Hon. W. S. Underwood and A. G. Brown offered to mediate, and succeeded in inducing General Cullom to apologize for the blow, and Mr. Clay to withdraw his remark. So this affair, like the others, ended without bloodshed. The only quarrel which has really led to a duel has been one between two cavalry officers—Lieutenants Bell and Williams. The cause of the quarrel is unknown; but the two parties met in a barber's shop, and Lieutenant Williams broke a cane over Bell's head. They met at Bladensburg; Bell fired and sent a ball through Williams's hat; whereupon the latter discharged his pistol into the snow. So ends the chapter of duels.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

The Kansas Legislature have adjourned. Their most important measure is for the removal of the seat of Government to a paper city, named Minneola, the bulk of the lots in which are said to be owned by members of the Legislature. An immense number of bills have been passed, but very little serious business done. Quiet prevails throughout the Territory. The Judges and Clerks of the election at Shawnee have been arrested, and they have testified under oath before the Investigating Committee that the poll book of Shawnee was taken to Westport and three hundred names added thereto in that place. J. J. Clarkson, Postmaster at Leavenworth, was burned in effigy on the 15th ult., and threats were made to hang him if caught.

BRIGHAM YOUNG'S PROCLAMATION.

We have news from Salt Lake City to 25th December, by way of California, and from Camp Scott, the head-quarters of the military expedition, to 9th of January. The accounts from Camp Scott are highly favorable. The weather was mild for the season, and the troops in good health and spirits. The extemporaneous court organized by Judge Eckels in Green County had found bills of indictment for high treason against Brigham Young and other prominent Mormon leaders.

The Mormon paper contains Governor Young's Message to the Legislature. He says therein: "Has Utah violated the least principle of the Constitution, or so much as broken the most insignificant constitutional enactment? No; nor have we the most distant occasion for so doing, but have ever striven to peacefully enjoy and extend those rights granted to all by a merciful Creator. But so unobtrusive and wise a course does not seem to please those who live and wish to live by office, and those who make and love lies; and since those characters are numerous and also powerful through well-disciplined organization, and since Utah has yielded right after right for the sake of peace, until her policy has emboldened the enemies of our Union, it must needs be that President Buchanan, if he has ordered an army to Utah as reported—for he has not officially notified me of such a movement by his order—has at length succumbed, either of choice or through being overcome, to the cruel and nefarious counsels of those enemies, and is endeavoring to carry out a usurpation of power which of right belongs only to the people, by appointing civil officers known to be justly objectionable to freemen, and sending a so-called army under mere color of law to force those officers upon us at the point of the bayonet, and to form a nucleus for the collection and protection of every gambler, cut-throat, whoremaster, and scoundrel who may choose to follow in their train. Such a treasonable system of operations will never be endured nor even countenanced by any person possessed of the least spark of patriotism and love of constitutional liberty.

* * * * * * * *

THE MORMONS WILL RESIST TO THE LAST.

"Fully aware, as has been justly written, that 'patriotism does not consist in aiding government in every base or stupid act it may perform, but rather in paralyzing its power when it violates vested rights, affronts insulted justice, and assumes undelegated authority,' and knowing that the so-called army, reported to be on its way to Utah, was an undisguised mob, if not sent by the President of the United States, and if sent by him in the manner and for the purpose alleged in all the information permitted to reach us, was no less a mob, though in the latter event acting under color of law—upon learning its near approach, I issued, as in constitutional duty bound, a proclamation expressly forbidding all bodies of armed men, under whatsoever name or by whomsoever sent, to come within the bounds of this Territory. That so-called army, or, more strictly speaking, mob, refused to obey that proclamation, copies of which were officially furnished them, and prosecuted their march to the neighborhood of Forts Bridger and Supply (which were vacated and burned upon their approach), where it is said they intend to winter. Under these circumstances, I respectfully suggest that you take such measures as your enlightened judgment may dictate, to insure public tranquillity, and protect, preserve, and perpetuate inviolate those inalienable constitutional rights which have descended to us a rich legacy from our forefathers. * * *"

PERSONAL.

Hon. John K. Kane, Judge of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, died about nine o'clock on 21st ult., at his residence, Fern Rock, on Green Lane, Twenty-second Ward. He had been suffering for some days from a very severe attack of pneumonia, the fatal termination of which had been anticipated by all who attended him. John Kintzing Kane was born in Philadelphia about the year 1795. He was a son of John Kane, whose father emigrated from Ireland in the year 1756. His mother was a Miss Van Rensselaer, of New York. He was educated at Yale College, and then studied law in Philadelphia. In 1845 he was appointed, by Governor Shunk, Attorney-General of the State. This office he resigned in June, 1846, when, on the decease of Judge Randall of the United States District Court, President Polk appointed him to fill the vacancy. This office he continued to hold up to the time of his death.

Judge Kane was a gentleman of fine abilities, a good lawyer, and a learned Judge. He was also an accomplished belles-lettres scholar, and an adept in the graceful accomplishments of society. Few men of our acquaintance were more courtly in manner, or better calculated to impress upon the observer the idea of a perfect gentleman. Whether at the bar, on the bench, in political life, or in society, he never for an instant lost his self-possession, or was betrayed into a rude word or a display of temper. He was a member of various artistic and scientific societies, such as the Musical Fund Society, the Academy of the Fine Arts, and the American Philosophical Society, and exercised high influence in all of them. However men may have differed from him on political questions, there are none that will deny him the possession of most winning social qualities and of great firmness and tenacity of purpose in every thing that he undertook.

The Times says: "We regret to be called to record the death of Dr. Thomas M. Foote, editor of the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser, which event occurred on Saturday evening. Dr. Foote relinquished, many years ago, the medical for the editorial profession, of which it is not too much to say that he was one of the brightest ornaments. As an elegant, forcible, and pleasant writer he had few equals, and in personal intercourse his gentlemanly bearing was always agreeably conspicuous. Dr. Foote was appointed Chargé to New Granada in 1849 by General Taylor, and Minister to Austria by President Fillmore. Since his return from Europe his health had been poor, and some two or three years ago he disposed of his interest in his paper, with a view to retirement, but circumstances occurred which induced him to resume it. His age was not far from fifty.

Ex-President Comonfort of Mexico is said to be the son of an Englishman, who was a cotton manufacturer at Puebla, and who married a Spanish lady. The Washington Union says: "Comonfort was born in Puebla, received a liberal education, and has traveled extensively in the United States and Europe. He was, not many years ago, a visitor in New York City, where he formed a number of acquaintances. He is said not to resemble a Spaniard in appearance, having a fair complexion, blue eyes, and light hair—marks of the Anglo-Saxon blood inherited from his father."

A correspondent of the Boston Journal says: "The present Cabinet is composed of 'men of weight,' as I noticed to-day on a register of the weight of visitors kept at the Smithsonian Institution. Howell Cobb is set down at 217½ pounds, Governor Brown at 177, Secretary Toucey at 166, Secretary Thompson at 147, and Governor Floyd at 129. I should judge that General Cass will weigh nearly 200 pounds, although he is not as fleshy as he was a few years since. He is very active for one of his age, and walks to the Department of State almost every morning without an overcoat, and with an elastic step."

We find the following notice in the Richmond papers: "Married, on Thursday, February 11, 1858, at Trinity Church, New Orleans, by the Right Rev. Bishop Polk, Philip P. Dandridge, Esq., of Virginia, to Betty Taylor Bliss, daughter of the late General Zachary Taylor, and widow of the late Major Bliss."

The little picture of the "Chess-players," by Meissonier, which was exhibited in the French Gallery in Broadway, has been purchased by Mr. Belmont for his collection. He paid $1000 for it. The painting consists of but two figures, and the canvas is not as large as a child's pocket-handkerchief. As Mr. Belmont's picture by this artist was not a good example of his style, the "Chess-players" will add greatly to the value of the Belmont Gallery.

The Evening Post has the following: "Rev. H. W. B., a distinguished clergyman of Brooklyn, was taken on a stage-sleigh, from the dépôt in W—— (a New England town, where railroad communication then ended) to B——, a place fifty miles distant, where he was to lecture that night. It was a warm February day; the sleighing was splendid. B. was on the box beside a young driver; the teams, of four horses each, were perfection, and the result was that the fifty miles were got over in something like four hours—pretty good railroad time on some tracks. But it didn't do the teams of horses any good; and when, some days after, knowledge of their condition came to the proprietor of the line he called up that particular driver (Sam), and asked how he came to drive his horses that day at such a rate. 'Well,' said Sam, 'I had one of the "boys" on the box with me—he wanted to see 'em go, and I put 'em through!'"

John M. Botts's (of Virginia) book of travels, including his adventures in the Sistine chapel at Rome, will, it is said, soon be published. He is reported to have made a large fortune by his tour. It is also stated that the Emperor of all the Russias held a review of sixty thousand troops for his special honor, gratification, and pleasure.

Parson Brownlow relates the following incident which occurred during his passage from New Orleans to Mobile on the steamboat: "One incident only occurred at the table, worthy of note. An ill-bred and low-flung fellow, indifferently dressed, sat at my left elbow—he had never traveled much. He called for some 'fried perch,' seeing another gentleman opposite to him have a pair of fine lake perch on a plate. They were brought and placed before him on a small dish. I had at the same time, called for a dish of stewed oysters, and the same servant, at the same time, placed them before me in a small, deep dish. This ill-mannered rascal reached over deliberately, lifted my oysters, set them in his plate and went to work on them. I as coolly lifted up his plate of fish, set them before me, and went to work on them. He remarked to me in an under-tone, 'Them's my fish.' 'Yes,' said I, 'and them's my oysters.' Here the matter ended, with this improvement: I called for more oysters, and he for more fish."

It is reported that Mr. Dallas will be offered the Federal judgeship vacated by the death of Judge Kane. This may make the American Minister's prospective recall less disagreeable.

The Boston Traveler hears that the state of health of Mrs. Wolcott (wife of the contumacious witness at Washington), is such that the news of her husband's imprisonment has not been communicated to her.

Dr. Rae, of Hamilton, Canada West, the celebrated Arctic traveler, a few days since accomplished the distance between Hamilton and Toronto, more than forty miles, in snow shoes, in about ten hours.

The Turkish Admiral Mohammed Pasha, so long expected in this country, was at the Naval Arsenal of Ferrol, in Spain, on the 30th of January, superintending the work of repairing the line-of-battle ship Fethie. This is given on the authority of the Madrid España, and it is presumed that his Highness will come over in the Fethie, which is a fine war-ship of the Turkish navy.

MUSICAL LEGISLATION.

The Maine Legislature has instituted the novel and very pleasant feature of morning concerts in Legislative session. The Kennebec Journal says:

"The veteran Messenger of the House, Mr. Thomas, of Newburgh, has a taste for music, and he has discovered an unusual amount and variety of musical talent among the members. This united talent has been brought out in a series of impromptu morning concerts before the hour of calling the House to order, until, at length, morning singing has become a regular institution in the Representatives' Hall, for the fifteen minutes before the Speaker takes his seat. At times the spirit of harmony becomes pervading, when the singing is specially marked by simple melody, and grave Senators, and members of the House in large numbers gather round the centre of the Hall and join the singing of familiar tunes in true Congregational style, and the music rises and floats and echoes through the Hall with fine effect. It partakes, at times, of a truly devotional character, and is regarded as a most acceptable exercise to all in attendance at the State House during the session, and highly satisfactory to strangers who happen to be present."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT.

THE proceedings in Parliament on 10th, 11th, and 12th ult. were unimportant. On the last day in the House of Commons, Sir George Grey, in response to inquiries, said that the evidence offered by the French Government of the complicity of Mazzini, Ledru Rollin, and others, in Pierri's attempt on the Emperor's life, was insufficient to justify proceedings against those parties, and that the British Government had declined to interfere. Lord Palmerston explained that so far from Louis Napoleon having paid the legacy bequeathed by Napoleon the First to Cantillon for an attempt to assassinate the Duke of Wellington, an application for it had been rejected on the ground that the testator must have been in a state of mental aberration when he made the bequest. A part of the bequest was paid under the Bourbon régime. Lord Palmerston moved for leave to bring in his new India bill, to transfer the government of India from the India Company to the Crown. He explained that the bill proposed was confined to changes in the administration and organization of the Company, which it was intended should in future be centred in the Imperial Government. The alterations proposed were to be as little as was consistent with the object the government had in view, namely, to make the advisers of the Crown responsible for the government of India. It was proposed to abolish the Court of Directors, and in lieu thereof to establish a Council to be mainly composed of persons who had been in India, or who knew Indian affairs well—the Council to consist of eight persons, to go out in rotation every two years; the President of the Council would be appointed by the Government; the power of the President would not extend to matters of finance. In such matters the President would have the assistance of four councilors; the President would be one of the Secretaries of State, with a stipend accordingly. Palmerston further explained the provisions of the measure, and urged the House to consent to its introduction. Mr. T. Baring moved as an amendment that it is not at present expedient to legislate for the government of India. The matter was then debated at some length, but without arriving at any result.

THE BILL FOR THE PROTECTION OF NAPOLEON.

In Parliament, Lord Palmerston has moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend the law relating to conspiracy to murder, by making it felony. He said that the proposition was made in consequence of the recent attempt on the life of the Emperor. That attempt was the result of a conspiracy formed in England, and the consequence was that foreign nations had formed the opinion that Parliament ought to take some steps to remove, upon mere suspicion, aliens from Great Britain. The Government, however, had no intention to propose any such measure, although, under the circumstances, they were driven to consider the present state of the law with regard to conspiracy. He explained the appearance of the offensive address in the Moniteur, and the Emperor's regret for the same, and concluded by pointing out the necessity for the amendment on general grounds.

Mr. Kinglake moved a resolution in the shape of an amendment that the House, while anxious upon every proper occasion to consider any defect in the criminal Anglo-Saxon law, deem it inexpedient, in compliance with the demand contained in Count Walewski's dispatch, until further information has been afforded by the production of any communications between the two governments subsequent to the date of that dispatch. He declined to concur in altering the municipal law of the country upon the demand of any power whatever.

Several speeches were made against the proposed measure, including a very sarcastic one by Mr. Roebuck, when the debate was adjourned.

The following evening the debate was resumed, and after speeches by Lord John Russell, Disraeli, and others, in favor of leave being granted to bring in a bill, Lord Palmerston's motion was agreed to by a vote of 299 to 50.

THE RADICAL VIEW OF THE SUBJECT.

In the course of a speech upon the subject Mr. Roebuck said:

"There have appeared in the pages of the Moniteur certain addresses to the Emperor of France from the French army; those addresses, naturally enough, express strong indignation at the attempt at violence on the person of the French Emperor. Now, Sir, if the expressions had rested there, I should have been the first to sympathize with, and give my cordial concurrence to, every sentiment therein expressed; but, Sir, from the French army there came accusations against England, as if England was participant in the attack made on the Emperor of the French; and now, Sir, I will state to the House the immediate object of my question: the Moniteur is not an ordinary paper. It is the gazette of the French Government. Every thing it utters is under the immediate inspiration of the Government. That Government is the Emperor; therefore I may say that what appeared in the paper of the Moniteur is, in fact, a reflex of the opinion of the Emperor of France. Now, Sir, in the Moniteur have appeared attacks on the English people, and one colonel, full I suppose of military ardor, that loyalty for reigning monarchs, which is a part of the army of France, asks the French Emperor to be led against that haunt—that den, that repaire—meaning England, and that is published in the pages of the Moniteur. That is the expression of the opinions of the French Emperor, and I wish now to state my opinions. The French Emperor is the person who directs against England the accusation of being a den of conspirators. Who could speak with greater knowledge than he? Has he not enjoyed the protection and hospitality of England? and has he not, when so enjoying our protection, acted the part of a conspirator? Did he not leave these shores armed with a great name—the great name of his predecessor—I mean the great Napoleon? Did he not, armed with that name, and a tame eagle, go to Boulogne, and there did he not attack the throne of King Philippe, and did he not murder a man, who, in the performance of his duty, opposed his landing? Is this the man who chooses to publish in the pages of the Moniteur accusations against England of being the haunt, the den wherein conspiracies are hatched, and ought, therefore, to be the object of invasion of an infuriate soldiery? It is not confined to that. The brother of the Emperor of France, M. de Morny, has chosen, in the Legislative Chamber of that nation, to accuse England of being participant in this; and not only he, but Count de Persigny, here in England, in the presence of Englishmen, has dared to make the same accusation. Ay, Sir, and in the presence of Englishmen he has not been answered. The only reason I can make for such a proceeding is, that the persons who heard him did not understand French. [Laughter.] I can not believe that any Englishman could hear his country so libeled, no matter by whom, without an answer to the accusation."

WHAT THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT WANT.

A dispatch from the French Minister of Foreign Affairs to the Embassador of France in London, respecting the refugees, is couched in moderate language. After referring to various designs which have been concocted in London, and the facilities afforded for further guilty enterprises, the dispatch concludes as follows: "The Government of Her Britannic Majesty can assist us in averting danger by giving us a guarantee of security, which no State can refuse to a neighboring State, and which we are authorized in expecting from our ally. Full of confidence, moreover, in the exalted reason of the English Cabinet, we abstain from all indication as regards measures which it may be suitable to take to satisfy this wish. We rely in this matter entirely upon the English Cabinet for the care of appreciating decisions, which they shall judge most proper to lead to this end, and we congratulate ourselves in the firm persuasion that we shall not have appealed in vain to their conscience and loyalty."

WHAT THE PRINCESS ROYAL THINKS OF HERSELF.

The correspondent of the Dublin Express writes: "Last week the Prince was unmistakably shy, and was literally pulled forward by the then Princess Royal. He looks a frank, well-made, handsome man—nothing of the German type about him—more, I should say, of the Scandinavian type; light hair and blue eyes, and a good nose and mouth. His portraits do him but scant justice. The Princess has her mother's forehead and mouth, the lips of the latter a little more pouting, and the nose an exaggeration of the Queen's—not in length, but in breadth and retrousseness. It is at once the most impudently bewitching nose to be beheld in woman. Of her own personal charms the Princess holds but a very poor opinion. Just before starting for the wedding last Monday, her portrait was photographed by order of the Queen. If ever a young girl looks well it is in her wedding dress. The Queen approved highly of the portrait, but the Princess, looking over her mother's shoulder, said, 'Ah well, I dare say it is very like, but you can never make any thing else of me than a white nigger.' I am assured by a by-stander that these were the very words used."

HOW SHE BEHAVED AT THE MARRIAGE.

He adds: "At the marriage she displayed none of that emotion so feelingly described by the Times correspondent; on the contrary, the emotion was altogether upon the part of her mother, her sister, the Princess Alice, and the bridesmaids, who had been her friends from childhood. She was perfectly collected as she walked up the aisle, and, turning to one of her bridesmaids, who accidentally trod on her vail, said: 'C., my dear C., do not tread upon my lace; I do not like my lace trodden upon?' On the morning of the marriage the Palace was in as great confusion as any private house upon such occasions."

THE NEW INDIAN LOAN.

The London Times says: "Although authority is to be taken by the East India Company for raising £10,000,000, it appears that the actual deficiency for the year ending April, 1856, is estimated to be limited to seven or eight millions. Whether the £8,000,000 is to be borrowed at once, or in amounts from time to time, has not transpired; but it includes one million pounds to be repaid to the Bank, £1,000,000 to be available as a cash balance, and £653,000 for bonds on which advances have been obtained, or for which the holders have notified they will require to be paid off.

LORD SHAFTESBURY RETRACTS.

The opinion is gaining ground in England that the stories of Indian cruelties, which were so current some time since were, if not generally false, at least greatly exaggerated. Lord Shaftesbury (in a letter to the Times) explains his statement as to cruelties in India: "Some time before I made the speech, I had heard from a person in whom I had entire confidence, that there was a letter 'from the highest lady now in India, describing that day by day ladies were coming into Calcutta, their ears and their noses cut off and their eyes put out.' In the heat of speaking I made reference to that statement. The disclaimer published by your correspondent, 'A Lover of Accuracy' (which I now hear for the first time), is sufficient to prove that my informant was in error; and considering the delicacy of the evidence, I should, I confess, have acted more wisely had I not used it."

DR. LIVINGSTONE'S NEW EXPEDITION.

A dinner has been given to Livingstone, the African traveler, on the occasion of his departure from England for a fresh expedition into the interior of Africa. He is furnished with all requisite assistance from the British government to push his discoveries to a still more successful conclusion than heretofore. A sum of £5000 has been assigned to him for the prosecution of his enterprise. He is to be accompanied by competent assistants, and, in short, every thing appears to have been done which can help him on his way. Dr. Livingstone is to proceed, in the first instance, to the Cape of Good Hope. From that point he and his companions will be conveyed in a Government vessel to the mouth of the River Zambese, and even there the watchfulness of the British Government over the travelers is not withdrawn. Dr. Livingstone and his companions are to be conveyed 300 miles up the river in a steam-launch, and not until they have been landed in safety at a point so far onward in the vast continent which they are about to explore will they be left to themselves. The adventurous spirit which inspires such an enterprise as this will surely meet with the heartiest sympathy in England, and, we doubt not, many persons will be present to bid farewell to Livingstone, the African traveler, and bid him "God speed." May he in due course return again to receive, in the admiration and respect of his countrymen, a due reward!

FRANCE.

MINISTERIAL CHANGES.

Marshal Vaillant, Minister of War, has resigned, and will be succeeded by General Neil. Count Walewski will probably resign the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and go to London as Embassador. Count Persigny has returned to Paris to take his seat in the new Privy Council. The new Foreign Minister will probably be Drouyn de 'l Huys. De Rayneville's death leaves a vacancy for the Embassy to Prussia. General Pelissier, it was expected, would be appointed Commander-in-Chief of the army in Paris, in place of Marshal Magnan, who is spoken of as Embassador to Russia.

ESCAPE OF CAPTAIN DUNHAM.

The following letter from Captain Dunham appears in a foreign paper:

"SPEZIA, January 20, 1858.

"We arrived here on the 18th from Marseilles, after giving the Frenchmen the slip. I went on board the Adriatic at 9 o'clock in the evening of our departure, and, with four men, bent the topsails, then hauled out through the ships down to the mouth of the harbor, and made sail. Before daylight we were out of sight of the city. I was obliged to slip both anchors, and put to sea without them. It was a pretty good night's work, considering the circumstances. I am now safe in regard of being seized by the French authorities, as they can not take me here. The Sardinian Government will not allow me to land, and as I can not get anchors I shall have to come on without them. The United States store-keeper here has furnished me with stores enough to reach the United States. I don't know what sort of a scrape I shall have next. J. B. DUNHAM."

APPOINTMENT OF GENERAL ESPINASSE AS MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR.

General Espinasse has been appointed Minister of the Interior in the room of M. Billault. The correspondent of the London Times remarks upon the subject:

"The appointment is said to have been very suddenly resolved upon; at least it was kept a profound secret till the last moment, and we may well believe that the Ministers themselves, of whom General Espinasse is now the colleague, suspected it as little as the public, and that they have been taken quite as much by surprise. It was at a dinner given by the General to a number of general officers yesterday that the fact was first made known. He was sent for by the Emperor at four o'clock. The audience was long, and the guests were kept waiting considerably beyond the hour of dinner. Public curiosity had been much excited as to the successor of M. Billault. It was the chief topic of conversation with the guests, and when the General made his appearance among them it was concluded that he knew the solution, though none imagined that he was personally interested in it. He was of course asked the news, and he then and there announced that he, General Espinasse, was the successor of M. Billault! The announcement was at first received with incredulity, and, when there no longer appeared any doubt, with great surprise. A personage of high military rank, indeed among the highest, stated yesterday afternoon as positive that M. de Persigny was to be the new Minister. Apparently he was not in the secret.

"I can not say that the effect of this nomination is satisfactory. It is rather the contrary. The conjectures and apprehensions expressed by many people may be exaggerated, but it is certain that the impression is far from favorable. This is, I believe, the first time since any thing like a constitutional system has prevailed in France, that a Minister of the Interior has been taken from the army."

THE LATEST ABOUT THE MEDIUM HUME.

The Paris correspondent of the New York Times says: "The fashionable world continues its support to our medium Hume. His prestige, however, has somewhat diminished with time, and we hear no more of his feats at the Tuileries. He is none the less, however, a mystery and a wonder to many aristocratic circles, where one would look for more intelligence and discernment. On account of the truths which he taught a distinguished lady, until then a skeptic on the immortality of the soul, the lady, just dead, has bequeathed the celebrated medium an annual sum of twelve hundred dollars. Until the arrival of Hume in Paris this lady had remained an obstinate skeptic; she saw the performances of the accomplished trickster; he brought before her the ghost of one of her dead relatives; she touched it, believed, and soon after died, leaving the sum just mentioned as an acknowledgment for the saving of her own peace in the other world. A small recompense for so great a service, and that service the most sublime of charlatanry! But the fact is authenticated as regards the legacy.

"Hume continues his game of not appearing in public, of not being seen even in public; in other words, he refuses to show himself to the 'million.' No matter how much he is caricatured before the public (and his portraits are every where), no matter what may be the character of the anecdotes laid to his account, he refuses, absolutely, to talk, or write, or be seen, outside of the aristocratic circle to which he has thus far clung. Many people are incredulous, and believe Hume a myth; in fact, half the strength of his game lies in the mystery with which he surrounds himself."

IS DUMAS THE AUTHOR OF HIS NOVELS?

The same writer adds: "A suit of M. Maquet against Alexander Dumas, gives the public this week an insight into that mystery of French literary labor, collaboration. On this trial it is shown that M. Auguste Maquet assisted M. Dumas in the production of fifteen or more of his most popular novels and dramatic pieces, among the rest the Mousquetaire and Monte Christo. M. Maquet, although employed as a journeyman by Dumas, a sort of builder to follow out the designs traced by the architect, now sues M. Dumas for one-half of the reputation of those works, and a larger share in the profits. To prove his claim he brings forward mountains of letters from the great novelist, written during the several years that Maquet assisted him, in which the former made observations sufficient to encourage the latter in his attempt at a judicial contestation. These letters form the most curious exposition of the secrets of novel-writing that ever appeared before the public. In one place Dumas tells Maquet that he 'must make Louise come in by a door on the right instead of the left;' in another, that 'Raymond must kiss the governess instead of Rosa's mother;' and again, he laments loudly that they had not brought Julia into the world lame, for that, now that the first volume was published, it was too late for a congenital lameness, and he asks Maquet's advice as to how they could force her to limp. One shudders to think of the excruciating pain the fair Julia escaped at the unsurgical hands of Messrs. Dumas and Maquet, by the difficulties which they encountered in finding for their readers a just cause for the operation.

"The suit of Maquet vs. Dumas was decided in favor of the latter, on the ground that Maquet was merely employed as an assistant. Maquet was condemned to the expenses of the suit, which were considerable."

THE ASSASSINS' COUNSEL.

The Times correspondent says: "I am informed that the Minister of Justice has assigned the bâtonnier of the order of advocates for the defense of Orsini. Some of the most distinguished members of the bar are to defend the others."

THE SUBMARINE TUNNEL TO BE BUILT.

The plan proposed by M. Thomé de Gamond for uniting England and France by a submarine tunnel has been submitted to the examination of an official commission, named by the Minister of Public Works; and the Commissioners have recommended that a sum of 500,000 francs be appropriated to examine the plans already prepared.

REVELATIONS OF NUNNERY LIFE.

A nun has been tried at the Court of Assizes of the Ain for forgery and arson. On being admitted to a convent at Belle, she gave a promissory note, purporting to be signed by her guardian, for 2600 francs, payable in three years. She was requested to obtain payment of the money at the earliest possible period; and, on replying that she could not get it before the time specified, she was told that she would not be permitted to pronounce the final vows as a nun until she had done so. Shortly afterward several mysterious fires burst out at different times in the convent; the gardener of the establishment was arrested; but the conflagrations continued, and, the novice being suspected, she was examined by a magistrate. To him she confessed that it was she who had caused the fires, and also that the promissory note she had given was a forgery. She said she had always wished to lead a religious life; that she had been for a short time in several convents; that she knew a certain sum of money was required, which she had no means of obtaining; and that, therefore, she had forged the note. The defense at the trial was insanity; but she was found guilty, and sentenced to five years' hard labor. One of the witnesses was a nun who had been in the convent ever since 1814, without once going outside its walls. On being conveyed by railway from Belle to Bourg, the assize town, she was astonished at every thing she saw, and especially the railway.

PRUSSIA.

THE KING'S HEALTH.

The Berlin correspondent of the Herald says: The King's health has taken an unfavorable turn lately, and his recovery appears to be remoter than ever. In fact, scarcely any hopes are entertained of his being entirely restored to the possession of his mental faculties: though a lucid interval occasionally breaks through his clouded intellect, these glimpses of light are growing rare and rarer still, and total darkness seems to be gradually closing in. Under these circumstances it becomes absolutely necessary to have the regency question settled as the only means of defining the political position of this country, which has been kept in a state of suspense for the last three or four months. It will then be seen whether the Prince of Prussia is really inclined to inaugurate a new system of government, as his friends profess to believe; and if he does not, their complaints about his hands being tied and his not being able to carry out his good intentions, will cease of themselves. I hardly know which of these two events is more to be desiderated.

RUSSIA.

THE ABOLITION OF SERFDOM.

A very remarkable banquet was held at Moscow on the 9th of January to commemorate the Emperor's measures for the emancipation of the serfs.

Among others M. Babst, Professor of Political Economy at the University at Moscow, spoke as follows: "Gentlemen, after the eloquent speeches which have been made in honor of our meeting to celebrate a great event in our economical existence, I hope you will allow me to say a few words as an expression of my deep gratitude to him whose thoughts and acts, during the few years we have passed under his reign, have always responded to the real wants of the people. We have met here to celebrate an event which will be an epoch in the annals of our history, and upon which future historians will dwell with pleasure. Already, at the commencement of this century, one of our first manufacturers said to Storch that trade could never flourish under our system of compulsory labor, or, in other words, of serfage; already, in 1819, the Free Economical Society proved by facts the inconvenience of serfage as regards agriculture. The development of national wealth has ever gone hand-in-hand with the regular organization of popular labor, which, as it gradually emancipates itself from stringent conditions, becomes more active, more progressive, and consequently more productive. In proportion as national labor gradually issues forth free from such disadvantageous conditions, the love of work increases among the people. Emulation and competition arouse the sleeping energies of the nation; they will not allow them to rust, but excite them to healthy activity and continual progress. The day of the primitive forms of the economical condition of the people has now left us forever. The wants of a great nation increase daily, and can not be satisfied with the coarse conditions, contrary to all progress of primitive economy founded on compulsory labor—a labor, the limits of which are as restricted as its nature is unproductive. Our task is not to double, but to increase ten-fold, our productive power, our labor, our wealth, unless we wish to see taken away from us by nations more advanced than ourselves the markets which are ours by tradition and by our geographical position. And we can not increase our productive power except by a regular organization of national labor, which will then boldly take in hand and work the treasures now hidden in our land." The learned Professor concluded with an appeal to all honest men to support the Emperor in this great social reform.

INDIA.

THE LATEST NEWS.

Our dates are from Calcutta to the 9th of January, and from Bombay to the 18th of January. Sir Colin Campbell has taken possession of Furuckabad, which was abandoned by the enemy on the 2d of January, and Goruckpore was taken on the 6th of January by the forces under Maharagab Jung Bahador. Seven guns were taken from the enemy, and 200 of the enemy killed. British loss only two Ghorkas killed and seven wounded. The intelligence is generally of a cheering character. The direct roads between Delhi and Calcutta are now open. General Outram's forces, 4000 strong, continued safely posted at Alumbagh. The peasantry were beginning to bring supplies into the camp. A bill has been introduced for uniting the Meerut and Delhi divisions to the Punjab. The Lieutenant-governorship is to be given to Sir John Lawrence.

HOW GENERAL NEILL WAS KILLED.

The Calcutta correspondent of the Daily News thus describes the manner in which the gallant Neill met his death: "He was riding through a narrow street, urging on the troops, when he halted for a moment under a portico to listen to the shout of the 78th Highlanders as they gained the Residency. At this moment an officer passed by faint with his exertions. Neill pulled out a flask and handed it to him. While he was thus engaged an eunuch, leaning over from the portico, discharged his matchlock into the gallant hero's skull; he fell dead at once, the most daring, dashing spirit in the army."

A LADY'S SUFFERINGS AT LUCKNOW.

A Calcutta correspondent writes on the 23d December: "I have just seen a letter from a lady delicately born and nurtured, accustomed to the highest society of England, who, with her children, endured the frightful time in Lucknow. She writes: 'It was very hard work. I often lay down feeling as if nothing could rouse me again. We were literally starving—sometimes to make the others eat who could not swallow the nauseous food set before them. Our family allowance latterly was a tea-cup full of rice, a few pounds of wheat, a little salt, and six ounces of gun-bullock. Nothing was allowed for the children. I lost all sense of fear—death was so familiar—it was such rest to many weary souls. It was sad to see the poor children pining and dying, sometimes seven or eight buried in a single night.'"

CHINA.

BOMBARDMENT OF CANTON.

The following dispatch is from Mr. Green, British Consul at Alexandria, and dated February 6:

"The Allied forces landed at Canton, December 28, consisting of 4600 British, and 900 French. On the 29th the walls were escaladed, and the heights within the town in our possession by 9 A.M. The advance within the city was but feebly contested. The damage to the town was very small. Captain Bate, of H. M. S. Acteon, was killed. This telegram was received in Malta by the Euxine, from Alexandria, February 9, at 9.55 P.M."

The following dispatch is from the Times:

"The bombardment of Canton commenced at daylight on the 28th of December, and was continued during the whole of the day and night. The assault, in three divisions, two English and one French, was given at 6 o'clock in the morning. Gough's Fort was taken at 2 o'clock, and blown up. The Chinese continued their fire from the houses, but the troops were restrained from entering the city."

CANADA.

THE OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

The Governor-General's opening speech was delivered on 26th ult. In it he alludes to the Indian rebellion, and anticipates the success of the British arms and the re-establishment of British rule in India. He congratulates the country on the prudence of its commercial men, and on the good position of the banks; recommends improvement in commercial legislation, and the assimilation of the commercial laws of Upper and Lower Canada, and the consideration of the law of insolvency and imprisonment for debt and fraudulent assignments. He notices a measure for the amendment of the whole system of management of public lands. He recommends attention to the fisheries, and congratulates on the success of the Canadian line of ocean steamers, and the proposed establishment of a weekly line next summer. He recommends notice of the increasing value of lake commerce, and the trade with Chicago and the Western States. He says that a correspondence has taken place between the Imperial Government and the authorities of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick in reference to an intercolonial railway and military road to Halifax. He confidently anticipates an early completion of the Grand Trunk Railway, without further aid from the province. He gives notice that correspondence relative to the Hudson's Bay Territory and the selection of a permanent seat of government will be laid before the Legislature.

MEXICO.

PROSPECT OF MORE TROUBLES.

We have Vera Cruz dates to the 21st inst. Little political change has yet occurred, although the Government was violently opposed by General Mejia, who was also committing terrible outrages upon the people of Sierra Blancha. They had applied to the Constitutional Government at Guanajuato for aid against him. It was reported that the States of Vera Cruz, Oajaca, and Puebla had sent 8500 men and 40 pieces of artillery against General Zuloaga. The troubles in Campeachy had been settled. The whole State of Yucatan was united against Zuloaga. Zuloaga had issued a decree making the duties on goods imported via Vera Cruz and Tampico payable in the capital; and payment otherwise would not be recognized.

THE MAMMOTH STEAMSHIP LEVIAT

N BEING TOWED TO HER MOORINGS.

THE LEVIATHAN.

At last the monster ship is launched, and so far as mere floating uprightly goes, the experiment is a success. She drew, when launched, 16½ feet of water aft, and 14 feet 11 inches forward; which is within 6 inches of what her builder had calculated—as close an approximation as one could desire.

In No. 49 of this journal we gave, at some length, the particulars of the Leviathan's size, construction, rig, and capacity. The picture on the preceding pages represents her as she was towed to Deptford by four large and powerful tugs, on the morning after her launch. We will add here a few facts concerning her general plan which, we believe, are not generally known.

Her builder, Mr. Scott Russell, states that he is an advocate for small ships; and asserts that so far from being the monster she is generally supposed to be, the Leviathan is in fact the smallest vessel that could be built capable of doing the work for which she is intended. Experience has shown that a steamship can not be profitably worked which is of less size than one ton for every mile of the voyage she is to perform, carrying her own coal. The voyage from London to Sydney and back is 25,000 miles. The Leviathan's tonnage is but 22,000. She is, therefore, actually smaller than she should be.

Again, her length seems to have been accurately calculated for the rate per hour she is expected to make. In 1835 Mr. Russell first brought into practice what he calls his "wave system" of construction, a new form for vessels, possessing the quality of uniting the greatest bulk with the least resistance. According to this system, when a vessel is about to be built intended to attain a certain speed, from 10 miles per hour upward, reference to the tables of the wave principle informs the builder of the requisite length of bows and stern and other peculiarities of construction necessary to produce the required result. Now the exact rate proposed for the Leviathan is known only to her builders and owners; but it required that her length of bow should be 330 feet, length of stern 250 feet, of midship 120 feet; and this, with 10 feet for the screw propeller, gives a total of 680 feet, the exact length of the ship.

In conclusion, we will give the comparative dimensions of the Leviathan and other large steamers:

	Length.	Breadth.
Great Western, 1838 (first Atlantic steamer)	236	36
Great Britain, 1844 (first ocean screw steamer)	322	51
Himalaya, 1853 (largest screw steamer)	370	44
Persia, 1856 (paddle steamer)	390	45
Adriatic, 1857 (paddle steamer, next in tonnage to the Leviathan)	354	50
Leviathan, 1858 (screw and paddle)	680	83

The Leviathan is to be rigged and fitted for sea with all possible expedition; but this operation will probably require between four and five months longer, so that it will be late in the fall before we may hope to see with our own eyes, and in our own harbors, this monster vessel.

ROUNDELAY OF THE HOOP.

A song for the Hoop!
Montespan's great invention! in whose cells
So much undulation dwells,
As the silken fabric swells
To the graceful pacing tread
Of our lovely Broadway belles,
Whom the beaux are mad to wed!

A song for the Hoop!
'Tis trundled by queen bees from beauty's hives;
Lifting skirts in walks and drives,
Giving ankles better lives:
For the clumsy folds have fled
From our sweet-hearts and our wives,
And the Hoop doth swing instead!

Hurrah for Crinoline!
That mid imperial boudoirs rustled first!—
The secret, for a season nurs'd,
Soon from Fashion's temple burst
In the fullness of its pride.
But the sires and sighers cursed
Whene'er called to take a ride!

Hurrah for both at once!
Crinoline and Hoop, and all of mysterious
Springs that fall when delirious
With grace, and imperious
Of space, swell the skirts
Potent over all the serious
Papas of laughing flirts.

Whoop, whoop for the Hoop!
Roll the whoop to the salons of Versailles,
Or the Boulevards, where hie
Duchess and grisette to buy
Steel and horse-hair graces cheap!
But, pray, never ask us why—
'Tis a secret we must keep.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER II.

Truly saith the proverb, "Much corn lies under the straw that is not seen."

Meanwhile George Morley followed the long shady walk—very handsome walk, full of prize roses and rare exotics—artificially winding, too—walk so well kept that it took thirty-four men to keep it—noble walk, tiresome walk—till it brought him to the great piece of water, which, perhaps, four times in the year was visited by the great folks in the Great House. And being thus out of the immediate patronage of fashion, the great piece of water really looked natural—companionable, refreshing—you began to breathe—to unbutton your waistcoat, loosen your neckcloth—quote Chaucer, if you could recollect him, or Cowper, or Shakspeare, or Thomson's Seasons; in short, any scraps of verse that came into your head—as your feet grew joyously entangled with fern—as the trees grouped forest-like before and round you—trees which there being out of sight, were allowed to grow too old to be worth five shillings apiece, moss-grown, hollow-trunked, some pollarded—trees invaluable! Ha! the hare! how she scuds! See, the deer marching down to the water-side. What groves of bulrushes—islands of water-lily! And to throw a Gothic bridge there, bring a great gravel road over the bridge! Oh, shame! shame!

So would have said the scholar, for he had a true sentiment for nature, if the bridge had not clean gone out of his head.

Wandering alone, he came at last to the most umbrageous and sequestered bank of the wide water, closed round on every side by brushwood, or still patriarchal trees.

Suddenly he arrested his steps—an idea struck him—one of those odd, whimsical, grotesque ideas which often when we are alone come across us, even in our quietest or most anxious moods. Was his infirmity really incurable? Elocution masters had said "Certainly not;" but they had done him no good. Yet had not the greatest orator the world ever knew a defect in utterance? He too, Demosthenes, had, no doubt, paid fees to elocution masters, the best in Athens, where elocution masters must have studied their art ad unguem, and the defect had baffled them. But did Demosthenes despair? No, he resolved to cure himself—How? Was it not one of his methods to fill his mouth with pebbles, and practice manfully to the roaring sea? George Morley had never tried the effect of pebbles. Was there any virtue in them? Why not try? No sea there, it is true; but a sea was only useful as representing the noise of a stormy democratic audience. To represent a peaceful congregation that still sheet of water would do as well. Pebbles there were in plenty just by that gravelly cove, near which a young pike lay sunning his green back. Half in jest, half in earnest, the scholar picked up a handful of pebbles, wiped them from sand and mould, inserted them between his teeth cautiously, and, looking round to assure himself that none were by, began an extempore discourse. So interested did he become in that classical experiment, that he might have tortured the air and astonished the magpies (three of whom from a neighboring thicket listened perfectly spell-bound) for more than half an hour, when, seized with shame at the ludicrous impotence of his exertions—with despair that so wretched a barrier should stand between his mind and its expression—he flung away the pebbles, and, sinking on the ground, he fairly wept—wept like a baffled child.

The fact was, that Morley had really the temperament of an orator; he had the orator's gifts in warmth of passion, rush of thought, logical arrangement; there was in him the genius of a great preacher. He felt it—he knew it; and in that despair which only Genius knows, when some pitiful cause obstructs its energies and strikes down its powers—making a confidant of Solitude—he wept loud and freely.

"Do not despond, Sir; I undertake to cure you," said a voice behind.

George started up in confusion. A man, elderly, but fresh and vigorous, stood beside him, in a light fustian jacket, a blue apron, and with rushes in his hands, which he continued to plait together nimbly and deftly as he bowed to the startled scholar.

"I was in the shade of the thicket yonder, Sir; pardon me, I could not help hearing you."

The Oxonian rubbed his eyes, and stared at the man with a vague impression that he had seen him before—When? Where?

"You can cure me," he stuttered out; "what of?—the folly of trying to speak in public. Thank you, I am cured."

"Nay, Sir, you see before you a man who can make you a very good speaker. Your voice is naturally fine. I repeat I can cure a defect which is not in the organ, but in the management."

"You can! you—who and what are you?"

"A basket-maker, Sir; I hope for your custom."

"Surely this is not the first time I have seen you?"

"True; you once kindly suffered me to borrow a resting-place on your father's land. One good turn deserves another."

At that moment Sir Isaac peered through the brambles, and, restored to his original whiteness, and relieved from his false, horned ears, marched gravely toward the water, sniffed at the scholar, slightly wagged his tail, and buried himself among the reeds in search of a water-rat he had therein disturbed a week before, and always expected to find again.

The sight of the dog immediately cleared up the cloud in the scholar's memory; but with recognition came back a keen curiosity and a sharp pang of remorse.

"And your little girl?" he asked, looking down abashed.

"Better than she was when we last met. Providence is so kind to us."

Poor Waife, he never guessed that to the person he thus revealed himself he owed the grief for Sophy's abduction. He divined no reason for the scholar's flushing cheek and embarrassed manner.

"Yes, Sir, we have just settled in this neighborhood. I have a pretty cottage yonder at the outskirts of the village, and near the park-pales. I recognized you at once; and as I heard you just now, I called to mind that when we met before, you said your calling should be the Church, were it not for your difficulty in utterance; and I said to myself, 'No bad things those pebbles, if his utterance were thick, which it is not;' and I have not a doubt, Sir, that the true fault of Demosthenes, whom I presume you were imitating, was that he spoke through his nose."

"Eh!" said the scholar, "through his nose? I never knew that!—and I—"

"And you are trying to speak without lungs; that is, without air in them. You don't smoke, I presume?"

"No—certainly not."

"You must learn—speak between each slow puff of your pipe. All you want is time, time to quiet the nerves, time to think, time to breathe. The moment you begin to stammer—stop—fill the lungs thus, then try again! It is only a clever man who can learn to write—that is, to compose; but any fool can be taught to speak—Courage!"

"If you really can teach me," cried the learned man, forgetting all self-reproach for his betrayal of Waife to Mrs. Crane in the absorbing interest of the hope that sprang up within him—"If you can teach me—if I can but con—con—con—conq—"

"Slowly—slowly—breath and time; take a whiff from my pipe—that's right. Yes, you can conquer the impediment."

"Then I will be the best friend to you that man ever had. There's my hand on it."

"I take it, but I ask leave to change the parties in the contract. I don't want a friend—I don't deserve one. You'll be a friend to my little girl instead; and if ever I ask you to help me in aught for her welfare and happiness—"

"I will help, heart and soul. Slight, indeed, any service to her or to you compared with such service to me. Free this wretched tongue from its stammer, and thought and zeal will not stammer whenever you say, 'Keep your promise.' I am so glad your little girl is still with you!"

Waife looked surprised—"Is still with me—why not?"

The scholar bit his tongue. That was not the moment to confess; it might destroy all Waife's confidence in him. He would do so later.

"When shall I begin my lesson?"

"Now, if you like. But have you a book in your pocket?"

"I always have."

"Not Greek, I hope, Sir."

"No, a volume of Barrow's Sermons. Lord Chatham recommended those sermons to his great son as a study for eloquence."

"Good! Will you lend me the volume, Sir, and now for it; listen to me: one sentence at a time—draw your breath when I do."

The three magpies pricked up their ears again, and, as they listened, marveled much.

CHAPTER III.

Could we know by what strange circumstances a man's genius became prepared for practical success, we should discover that the most serviceable items in his education were never entered in the bills which his father paid for it.

At the end of the very first lesson George Morley saw that all the elocution-masters to whose skill he had been consigned were blunderers in comparison to the basket-maker.

Waife did not puzzle him with scientific theories. All that the great comedian required of him was to observe and to imitate. Observation, imitation, lo! the ground-work of all art! the primal elements of all genius! Not there, indeed, to halt, but there ever to commence. What remains to carry on the intellect to mastery? Two steps—to reflect, to reproduce. Observation, imitation, reflection, reproduction. In these stands a mind complete and consummate, fit to cope with all labor, achieve all success.

At the end of the first lesson George Morley felt that his cure was possible. Making an appointment for the next day at the same place, he came thither stealthily, and so on day by day. At the end of a week he felt that the cure was nearly sure; at the end of a month the cure was self-evident. He should live to preach the Word. True, that he practiced incessantly in private. Not a moment in his waking hours that the one thought, one object, were absent from his mind; true, that with all his patience, all his toil, the obstacle was yet serious, might never be entirely overcome. Nervous hurry—rapidity of action—vehemence of feeling brought back, might, at unguarded moments, always bring back the gasping breath—the emptied lungs—the struggling utterance. But the relapse—rarer and rarer now with each trial—would be at last scarce a drawback. "Nay," quoth Waife, "instead of a drawback, become but an orator, and you will convert a defect into a beauty."

Thus justly sanguine of the accomplishment of his life's chosen object, the scholar's gratitude to Waife was unspeakable. And seeing the man daily at last in his own cottage—Sophy's health restored to her cheeks, smiles to her lip, and cheered at her light fancy-work beside her grandsire's elbow-chair, with fairy legends instilling perhaps golden truths—seeing Waife thus, the scholar mingled with gratitude a strange tenderness of respect. He knew naught of the vagrant's past—his reason might admit that in a position of life so at variance with the gifts natural and acquired of the singular basket-maker, there was something mysterious and suspicious. But he blushed to think that he had ever ascribed to a flawed or wandering intellect the eccentricities of glorious Humor—abetted an attempt to separate an old age so innocent and genial from a childhood so fostered and so fostering. And sure I am that if the whole world had risen up to point the finger of scorn at the one-eyed cripple, George Morley, the well-born gentleman—the refined scholar—the spotless Churchman—would have given him his arm to lean upon, and walked by his side unashamed.

CHAPTER IV.

To judge human character rightly, a man may sometimes have very small experience, provided he has a very large heart.

Numa Pompilius did not more conceal from notice the lessons he received from Egeria than did George Morley those which he received from the basket-maker. Natural, indeed, must be his wish for secrecy—pretty story it would be for Humberston, its future rector learning how to preach a sermon from an old basket-maker! But he had a nobler and more imperious motive for discretion—his honor was engaged to it. Waife exacted a promise that he would regard the intercourse between them as strictly private and confidential.

"It is for my sake I ask this," said Waife, frankly, "though I might say it was for yours." The Oxonian promised, and was bound. Fortunately, Lady Montfort quitting the Great House the very day after George had first encountered the basket-maker, and writing word that she should not return to it for some weeks—George was at liberty to avail himself of her lord's general invitation to make use of Montfort Court as his lodgings when in the neighborhood, which the proprieties of the world would not have allowed him to do while Lady Montfort was there without either host or female guests. Accordingly, he took up his abode in a corner of the vast palace, and was easily enabled, when he pleased, to traverse unobserved the solitudes of the park, gain the water-side, or stroll thence through the thick copse leading to Waife's cottage, which bordered the park-pales, solitary, sequestered, beyond sight of the neighboring village. The great house all to himself, George was brought in contact with no one to whom, in unguarded moments, he could even have let out a hint of his new acquaintance, except the clergyman of the parish, a worthy man, who lived in strict retirement upon a scanty stipend. For the Marquis was the lay impropriator; the living was therefore but a very poor vicarage, below the acceptance of a Vipont or a Vipont's tutor—sure to go to a quiet worthy man forced to live in strict retirement. George saw too little of this clergyman either to let out secrets or pick up information. From him, however, George did incidentally learn that Waife had some months previously visited the village, and proposed to the bailiff to take the cottage and osier land, which he now rented—that he represented himself as having known an old basket-maker who had dwelt there many years ago, and had learned the basket craft of that long deceased operative. As he offered a higher rent than the bailiff could elsewhere obtain, and as the bailiff was desirous to get credit with Mr. Carr Vipont for improving the property, by reviving thereon an art which had fallen into desuetude, the bargain was struck, provided the candidate, being a stranger to the place, could furnish the bailiff with any satisfactory reference. Waife had gone away, saying he should shortly return with the requisite testimonial. In fact, poor man, as we know, he was then counting on a good word from Mr. Hartopp. He had not, however, returned for some months. The cottage having been meanwhile wanted for the temporary occupation of an under gamekeeper, while his own was under repair, fortunately remained unlet. Waife, on returning, accompanied by his little girl, had referred the bailiff to a respectable house-agent and collector of street rents in Bloomsbury, who wrote word that a lady, then abroad, had authorized him, as the agent employed in the management of a house property from which much of her income was derived, not only to state that Waife was a very intelligent man, likely to do well whatever he undertook, but also to guarantee, if required, the punctual payment of the rent for any holding of which he became the occupier. On this the agreement was concluded—the basket-maker installed. In the immediate neighborhood there was no custom for basket-work, but Waife's performances were so neat, and some so elegant and fanciful, that he had no difficulty in contracting with a large tradesman (not at Humberston, but a more distant and yet more thriving town about twenty miles off), for as much of such work as he could supply. Each week the carrier took his goods and brought back the payments; the profits amply sufficed for Waife's and Sophy's daily bread, with even more than the surplus set aside for the rent. For the rest, the basket-maker's cottage being at the farthest outskirts of the straggling village inhabited but by a laboring peasantry, his way of life was not much known, nor much inquired into. He seemed a harmless hard-working man—never seen at the beer-house, always seen with his neatly-dressed little grandchild in his quiet corner at church on Sundays—a civil, well-behaved man too, who touched his hat to the bailiff, and took it off to the vicar.

An idea prevailed that the basket-maker had spent much of his life in foreign parts, favored partly by a sobriety of habits which is not altogether national, partly by something in his appearance, which, without being above his lowly calling, did not seem quite in keeping with it—outlandish in short—but principally by the fact that he had received since his arrival two letters with a foreign postmark. The idea befriended the old man; allowing it to be inferred that he had probably outlived the friends he had formerly left behind him in England, and on his return, been sufficiently fatigued with his rambles to drop contented in any corner of his native soil, wherein he could find a quiet home, and earn by light toil a decent livelihood.

George, though naturally curious to know what had been the result of his communication to Mrs. Crane—whether it had led to Waife's discovery or caused him annoyance, had hitherto, however, shrunk from touching upon a topic which subjected himself to an awkward confes-

tion of officious intermeddling, and might appear an indirect and indelicate mode of prying into painful family affairs. But one day he received a letter from his father which distressed him greatly, and induced him to break ground and speak to his preceptor frankly. In this letter the elder Mr. Morley mentioned incidentally, among other scraps of local news, that he had seen Mr. Hartopp, who was rather out of sorts, his good heart not having recovered the shock of having been dismissed "in that" by an impostor for whom he had conceived a great fancy, and to whose discovery George himself had providentially led. (In the father referring back to what George had told him of his first meeting with Waife, and his visit to Mrs. Crane, the impostor, it seemed, from what Mr. Hartopp let fall, not being a little queer in the head—a remark which George had set down as cynical—was a very bad character. "In fact," added the elder Morley, "a sentence or two that Mr. Hartopp let fall gave me to understand that he thought you were a very good fellow, whom the man appointed to guard you had contrived to get rid of, and I suspect from what Mr. Hartopp said, though he does not like to own that he was taken in to so gross a decree, that he had been actually entrapping to his fellow-townsfolk, and conferring familiarity, with a regular jail-bird and common burglar. How lucky for that poor, self-heeded, excellent Jno Hartopp—whom it is positively unfortunate to be as ill he ever is not natural—that the lady you saw arrived in time to expose the snares laid for his benes tolent credulity! But for that, Jno might have taken the fellow into his own house—just like him!)—and been robbed by this time—perhaps murdered. Heav'n knows!"

Incredulous and indignant, and longing to be unprovoked to vindicate his friend's fair name, George seized his hat, and strode quick along, the short cut to the basket-maker's cottage. As he gained the water-side he perceived Waife himself, seated on a mossy bank, under a gnarled fantastic thorn-tree, smoking a short pipe, and to drink, and whistling a soft mellow tune—the tune of an old English border-song. The dear lifted its antlers from the water, and turned its large bright eyes toward the opposite bank, whence the new comer listening and wafted. As George's step crushed the wild thyme, which the fawn's delicate hoof spared—"Hah, Jack Waife," said he, "and mark how the rudest musical combination can affect the brute creation!" He resumed the whistle—a clear, simple, wilder tune—that of a lively hunting-song. The deer turned quickly round—uneasy, restless, tossed its head, and bounded through the fern. Waife again changed the key of his primitive music—a melancholy, bellow tune, like the wailing itself as melancholy hart, but more modulated into sweetness. The deer approached. Waife, charmed by the mimic sound, returned toward the water-side slow and stately.

"I don't think the story of Orpheus charming the beasts was a fable—do you, Sir?" said Waife. "The rabbits should have known my quality, and if I had but a fiddle I would undertake to make friends with that reserved and unsocial race of animals, who seem to have no vein endeavors to present to fore his acquaintance. Man contrasts a great deal, but not sufficiently. Nature intimate and amicable relation with the other branches of earth's great family. Few of those not more nearly allied to we—naturally, for they have not our cares. And such variety of character, too, where you would suppose all!"

GEORGE MORLEY. "Very true: Cowper noticed marked differences of character in his fellow tuvin hares."

WAIFE. "Hares! I am sure that there are not two house-flies on a window-pane but mo nows in that water, that would not present to me interesting points of contrast as to temper and disposition. If human life and manners could but coin money, or set up a manufacture—coo rive something, in short, of real use or attractive to Anglo-Saxon enterprise and intelligence—of course we should soon have diplomatic relations with them; and our geographies and newspapers would instruct us to a T in the characters and propensities of their leading personages. But where man has no pecuniary nor ambitious interests at stake in his communications with any order of his fellow-creatures, his information about them is extremely confused and superficial. The best naturalists are mere collectors, and think they have done a vast deal when they classify a species. What should we know about mankind if we had only a naturalist's definition of man? We only know mankind by knocking against each other, head, and sticking out for man as a class in himself. Compare Buffon with Shakspeare! Ah, Sir! Shall you ever see with Shakspeare! Ah, Sir! Shall you ever have a Shakspeare for house-flies and mosnows?"

GEORGE MORLEY. "With all respect for mi nows and house-flies, if we found another Shakspeare, he might be better employed than in the profession in selecting individualities from the classifications of man."

WAIFE. "Begin yourself a man, you think so —a house-fly might be of a different opinion. But permit me, at least, to avoid intrusion on an investigation which would be better employed in reference to his own happiness, though I grant that he would be so in reference to the scientific intellectual amusement and social interests. Poor Shakspeare! How much he must have suffered!"

GEORGE MORLEY. "You mean that he must have been racked by the passions he describes —bruised by collision with the hosts he depicts. That is not necessary to genius. The judge on his bench, summing up evidence, and charging the jury, has no need to have shared the temptations, or known prior to the acts, of the prisoner at the bar. Yet how consummate may be his analysis!"

"No," cried Waife, roughly, "No. Your illustration destroys your argument. The judge knows nothing of the prisoner! There are the circumstances—there is the law. By these he generalizes—by these he judges—right or wrong. But of the individual at the bar—of the world —the tremendous world within that individual heart—I repeat—he knows nothing. Did he know, law and circumstance might vanish—human justice would be paralyzed. Ho, there, place that sweet-visaged, ill-looking foreigner in the witness-box! Usher, bring that slave—here the witnesses depose! Oh, horrible wretch!—a murderer—cruelest murderer! He poisoned the woman smothered by cruelest hands! Hang him up—hang him up! 'Softly,' whispers the Poet; 'softly, lest he hear.' Hang him—hang him! 'Lo! it is Othello the Moor!' What jury now dare find that crime—that prisoner guilty? Who now will put on the black cap? Who now says 'Hang him up—hang him up?'"

With such vehemence did the Comelian vent this passionate outburst that he thrilled his listener with an awe which, when he had ended his convicted Moor gathers round himself at the close of the sublime drama. Even Sir Isaac, more startled, and more deeply pursued myriads of the water-rat, uttered a low bark, came to his master, and looked into his face with solemn curiosity.

WAIFE (relapsing into colloquial accent). "Why do we differ against me, deemed me with more than with those below? why with the sorrows of a human being, and not a beggar? why does Sir Isaac sympathize with me more than (let that wicket-cat yes him over so much) with the gentleman with him? Whatever be the cause, see at least, Mr. Morley, one reason why it would be more like mockery than kindness for employment to cultivate the intimacy of brutes than to prosecute the study of men. Among men, you may look to your reputation, as me; but I have known two friends who never injured nor betrayed each other. Those are Wamba was another. Wamba, Sir, the native of a remote district of the globe (two friends who never betrayed each other are not looked for by any one man)—Wamba, Sir, was less gifted by Providence than Sir Isaac Newton can Sir Isaac, but he was a safe and trustworthy companion. Wamba, Sir, was—an opossum."

GEORGE MORLEY. "Excuse dear Mr. Waife, I fear that mean must have behaved very ill to you."

WAIFE. "I have no right to complain. I have behaved very ill to myself. When a man is his own enemy, he has no reasonable right to it his expect other men to be his benefactors."

GEORGE MORLEY (emotion). "Listen! I have a confession to make to you. I fear I have done you an injury—where, officiously, I meant to do you a service. I have been hurried on to narrate the particulars of his visit to Mrs. Crane. Mr. Hartopp has told me all you told him."

"When again I met you here and learned that your Sophy was with you, I felt increpressible curiosity to see her. I knew that this young grandchild had been left to your care unprotected, either that she was a relative or the child of some of whom the parties were in search, or family affairs had been so explained and reconciled, as to make your possession of her innocent and harm. But to-day I have a letter from my father which destroys that hope. He writes that the persons in question did visit Gatesboro' and have maligned you to Mr. Hartopp. Under the shock of what he so painfully, I fondly you to believe, he may be unwilling to give; but if you will rem me with the power to vindicate your character from aspersions which I need not your assurance to hold unjust and false, I will not rest till I have done justice to your unmerited wrongs."

WAIFE (in a tone calm but dejected). "I thank you, Sir—I thank you. But it is not a thing to be done. I am glad that the subject did not start up between us until such little time before we parted for ever. Mr. Morley, it is pretty well over. It would have been a pity if you had become involved in any vindictive contention with a man of attainted character before you had learned how to manage the powers that you have inherited over a more docile animal than I have been. Hush, Sir! you feel that, at least now, I am not to be trusted with the rearing for a humble livelihood. You will not repeat here what you may have heard, or yet hear, to the disadvantage of my Sophy. She will not send me and my grandchild forth from the observance you have confided to me with which we have no strength to cope? And, believing this, it only remains for me to say Farewell, Mr. Morley!"

"I should deserve to lose spe—spe—speech altogether," cried Waife, after a moment's stammering fearfully as he caught Waife firmly by the arm, "if I suffered—suff—suff—such

"One, two! Sophy, Sir! Until the Comedian, softly. And with a sweet patience he resumed himself on the bank.

The Oxonian threw himself at length by the outcast's side; and with the noble tenderness of youth, and the delicacy of a gentleman, which ever gave to priest, he rested his folded hands on his knees, looked down, and spoke low and close in the face, and thus, slowly, deliberately, not a stammer.

"Sir, you do not guess what you have done for me; you have recurred to me a home and a career—the only career and home which could have inspired—the divine vocation on which all my earthly hopes were set, and which I was on the eve of renouncing—do not think these are objections which can be lightly shaken off. If there are circumstances which forbid me to disclose others of impressions which wrong you, imagine not that their false notions will affect my own estimate of your respect for you?"

"Nay, Sir! they ought—they must. Perhaps not your respect—but gratitude for what I have done for you, would not, however, measure by its effects on yourself, but by the slightness of the trouble it gave to me; not perhaps your gratitude—but your respect, yes."

"I tell you no! Do you fancy that I can not judge of a man's nature without calling on him to tell me his will all the secrets—all the errors, if you will, of his past life? Will not the calling to which I may now hold myself destined give me power and commandment to absolve all those who truly repent and unfeignedly believe? Sir, I repeat, if in earlier days you have sinned, do you not repent? and how often, in many a lowly cottage, have I received assurance from your lips, have I had cause to know that you unfeignedly believe! Were I now clothed in those sacred vestments, could I not absolve you as a priest? Think you that, in the mean while, I have ceased to be a man? I should be a base, guilt, guarded hinherto from temptation by careful pursuits and favoring fortune—I presume to judge, and with the lawless, the gray-bloated vice, wearied by the march, wounded in the battle!"

"You are a noble-hearted human being," said Waife, greatly affected. "And—mark my words, Mr. Morley—there is no large you will find in your career as a robe of honor. But hear me, Sir! Mr. Hartopp, as I said, is a man unfortunately kind, benevolent, kindly, and, through all his simplicity, acutely shrewd. Mr. Hartopp, on hearing my story, spoke to me, deemed me worth to retain my grandchild, resigned the trust I had confided to me, and has since written a letter which, no doubt, hint I asked them, but not his hand. Take your hands, Sir, from my shoulder, lest the tremble!"

George did take his hands from the vagrant's shoulder, but not to press the hand that waived them off, and struggled to escape the pressure. "You are innocent, you are innocent of all that can stain you in the sight of mankind, if you had been guilty. I repeat, I should have loved it by your side, and rejoiced in the power to defy you to say that you are guilty of what has been laid to your charge, of what has darkened the fame of your name. Mr. Hartopp believed to your prejudice. Look me in the face and say, 'I am not innocent, I have not been belied!'"

Waife remained voiceless—motionless.

The young man, in whose nature he yet unproved all those great qualities of heart, with our which the world has no parallel—nature, a great preacher—qualities which compare the souls of sergeant, and arrive at the end of elaborate wonder and sublime impulse—now reversed Waife's hand, rose to his feet, and, facing Waife, with all man can with love ever accord, eyes dovercast, breast heaving, said, softly,

"Forget that I may soon be the Christian minister—forget even how his ear to the lips of shame and guilt—whose hand, when it points you any heavenward, may be guilty—whose sublimest post is by the sinner's side. Look on me but as man and gentleman. Sen, I now you, Mr. Waife, to you. If, as man and gentleman, you have done that which, could all hearts be read, the secrets known—human judgment reversed by Divine omniscience—forbids you to take this hand—does reject it—go hence in your turn! But if no such act be on your conscience—however you submit to its imputation—I offer you my hand, as to a man and gentleman to man and gentleman, I command you to take this right hand, and in the name of God I bid you shake it, on pain of your palsying, I forbid you to disobey."

Waife's vagabond rose, like the dead at the spell of a magician—took, as if irresistibly, the hand held out to him. And the scholar, overjoyed at the act, pressed it warmly, long as a sense.

"You know," said George, in trembling accents, "that I am not a man to be moved with ordinary—never desert; but it—is—it is really powerless to raise and to restore you to your place!"

"Powerless among your kind for that indeed, powerful with God. In accents still more tremulous. "All the kings of the earth are not strong enough to raise a penny that has been lost. Powerless—powerless! Learn that it is not only impossible for me to clear myself, but that I have no desire to clear me to confide to moral being a single plea in defence of I am innocent, in extenuation if I am guilty. And my child—him, and mother—I pray you to hold it more merciful to condemn than to question me—to condemn and to punish. I can not reject your pity but it would be mockery to offer me respect!"

"What! are you so much wedded to such an enmy can not crush? Would that fortitude be possible if you were not calm in the knowledge that no human judgment can mislead the Eternal Judge? Respect you! yes—because I have such joy happy in the depths of pain, and therefore I have that the cloud around you is not the frown of Heaven."

"Oh," cried Waife, the tears rolling down his cheeks, "and not an hour ago I was jesting at human friendship—naming ourselves pitiful to my fellow-men! And now—now—Ah! Sir! Providence is so kind to me! And," said he, suddenly, and with a look in which all arch smile began to play round the corner of his mouth—"and kind to me in the very quarter in which unkindness had most sorely smitten me. True, you directed toward me the woman who took away my grandchild—who destroyed all I had the esteem of good Mr. Hartopp. Well, you see, I have my sweet Sophy back again; we are in the home of all others I most longed for; and that woman—yes, I can, at least thus far, confide to you my secrets, so that you may not blame yourself for sending her to Gatesboro'—that woman has provided me a shelter—furnished me with the very reference necessary to obtain it; has freed my grandchild from the thraldom which would, if I could not have legally resisted; and should new persecutions chase us, will watch, and warn, and help us. And if you ask me how this change in her was effected—how, when we had abandoned all hope of green fields, and deemed that only in the crowd of a city we could escape those who pursued us when discovered there, though I fancied myself an adept in disguise, and the child and the dog were never seen but as if they were part vails in which I hid them; if you ask me, I say, to explain how that very woman was suddenly converted from a remorseless foe to a friend, I can only say that the only answer, by no, no device, no persuasive art of human influence softened her heart, and made it kind, just at the moment when the agency on earth could have rescued us from—from—"

"Say no more—good Sir! Say no more! No man showed me was a legal form authorizing your poor little Sophy to be given up to the care of a father. I guess! of this last fact we would not speak til me; yet from that father you would have received grandchild. No more. And you quiet home—your humble employment, reright quotes you?"

"Oh, if such a life can but last! Sophy is so well, so cheerful, so happy! Did not you hear her sing from the other side? Since need to sing! But we had not been here a week when song, tired down from her nursegirl, as from a bird. But if any ill report of me travel hither from Gatesboro', or elsewhere, we should be sent away, and the kind would be sure in my thoroughness—Sophy would sing no more."

"Do not fear that should drive you hence. Lady Montfort, you know, is my cousin, but you know not—few do—how thoroughly generous and gentle-hearted she is. I will myself, of you to how—Oh, do not look alarmed. She will take no step without I tell her: that is a good man;' and if she ask more, it will be enough to say, 'those who have known better days are not to be judged by strangers of the hour.'"

"I thank you earnestly, sincerely," said Waife, hastily, standing up, "and you—and—if you saw in the formal document shown to you, or retain on your memory, the name of—of the woman who refused to claim Sophy, you can you not guess how I long—how I yearn to view that child under the roof of that woman. Perhaps if Lady Montfort saw my pretty Sophy she might take a fancy to her. Oh, if she did but—but—but—" he added Wholly, inarticulately, "to see a right to respect. She is not like my self-heeded enough to be judged by her fear —Do you know that I conceived that hope—that the hope helped to lend me back here when, in my folly, I was at Hammerton, indeed upon rescuing Sophy; and saw, though," observed Waife, with a blind still arch smile round his mouth, "I had no right at that precise moment to be seeing any thing—Lady Montfort's child under the care of the village church, I again saw that face—wonderfully altered—but as the for and—fair as moonlight and as melancholy. Indeed it is, Sir, that I, naturally a boisterous, mirthful man, and now a shy, skulking fugitive—should have been so drawn toward a countenance, in proportion as I read there the trace of sadness. I feel less abashed to lay my own sadness before a gentleman used to approach and say, 'Not so far apart from me; you, too, have suffered.' Why else this?"

GEORGE MORLEY. "The fool hath said in his heart that there is no God;' but the fool hath not said in his heart that there is no sorrow—pithy and most profound sentence; intimating the interchangeable chain that runs into the Father. And where the chain tightens the children are closer drawn together. But to your child. You will remember if—there are young cousins else shall see your Sophy."

ANECDOTES OF RACHEL.

SINCE the death of the great tragedienne the Parisian papers are filled with reminiscences of various parts of her career, and anecdotes characteristic of her who so long delighted the French stage.

Her parents, as is known, were poor Jews. The mother kept a small shop in the Rue Richelieu, and the two sisters, Elisa Rachel and Rebecca, contributed their share to the family support—Elisa singing in the streets, when M. Choron, an old gentleman, formerly director of the Opera, but then teacher of singing and declamation, was induced to give the girls instructions in singing. After being a short time under his care, he persuaded her to make them useful. Choron writes his opinion of the merits of the two children: "Elisa (Rachel) has decidedly the more voice, but she has a worse memory and works less than her sister, who is constantly more thoughtful, and understands with greater facility."

Her genius for tragedy being discovered, she was sent to a school of declamation, and having, at a trial declamation, elicited the approval of some of the first critics, she was placed for further instruction under Samson, the celebrated professor. It is stated that only with the greatest difficulty could she be induced to give up her predilection for comedy—another instance of the errors in self-judgment so general amongst talented people.

At length came an engagement at the Gymnase. "That name, Elisa, will not suit the bill at all," said the director to her, when the arrangement was made. "Have you no other?"

"My name is Elizabeth Rachel."

"Come, that is better! Rachel is a name which will be remembered, and which is not borne by every body. Call yourself in future Rachel. The selection of a name is of more consequence than you may imagine."

So she came to be Rachel. She made her début on the 16th of April, 1837, in a poor play, La Vendeuse, written expressly for her. But few of the critics recognized her marvelous power. Jules Janin on the 18th of May was behind in proper terms the rising star. He takes to himself the credit of being the Rachel discoverer. "Mademoiselle Rachel, ever, was rapid. It may be estimated by her income. She began with a salary of fifteen per year. The next year the authorities of the theatre to which she was then attached voluntarily raised her stipend from 4000 to 6000 francs. And now, by, when acting independently, her income was estimated at 60,000 francs, or $60,000, per annum.

Mademoiselle Mars appears to have been one of the first to recognize her great genius. One who with her witnessed Rachel's début, says:

"When Camille appeared on the stage Mademoiselle Mars followed her attentively; then rising to me, she said, with a half nod and a sigh of hearty satisfaction, 'She walks well!' These acquainted with the theatre will know what praise was contained in these simple words, especially from the lips of Mars. Subsequently applied the words to Camille at the moment when the latter appears on the stage. Mademoiselle Rachel had not yet quitted the wings, when Mars turned to me again, and regarding me with an air of personal triumph, said, 'And she listens!' That listening well is the height of art which few actors possess —an art as difficult, more difficult, perhaps, than that of speaking well. Mademoiselle Mars was profoundly, too delicately artistic not to seize with delight the slightest semblance of talent when it came to her. She had scarcely uttered half a dozen lines when Mars exclaimed, with a satisfaction I shall never forget, and which no double-bolted door could 'Ah! she does not declaim; she speaks!'"

In 1838 she left the Gymnase, and entered M. Lockay reduces the circulation which led her to the attempt:

"One evening I was in Rachel's box, when she suddenly said, 'I have dreamed of something extraordinary, which will dare all the world. I will play the Marseillaise.' 'But I did not know you could sing.' 'No matter, I will make a solfeje of it. You shall come and hear me.' I went to Rachel's only three or four of you present.' Then I am to announce that Mademoiselle Rachel will sing the Marseillaise at the Théâtre Français?' 'Certainly. Don't you think it will bring in money at a period when the theatres are deserted?' 'I do, indeed; I must hear it first.' In short, when the performance was over we attended her to her carriage. With her family collected around her, and the stricter duke of Orleans, she began to sing, restrained song, which she had stealthily studied, verses by verse, note by note. All the world knows what she made of it. It was singing, declaiming, declaimed, but a recitation, in which the strength of accentuation and the power of expression avoided the want of melody. It made the hearers tremble and shudder. The success was as great as the conception was daring. Mademoiselle Rachel was for a much money as an entire tragedy."

There exists in her singing the same mixture of genuine liberality and benevolence, and Israelitish meanness. A young author, very poor, and yet enjoying a certain degree of reputation, recently completed a three-act comedy in verse. He presented it to the Théâtre Français, and it was rejected. The poet was in despair, when Rachel took him on one ride. "I know an Englishman who has a mania for unpublished plays. I will ask him;' 'will you let him have yours for 100 francs?' The poet gladly consented, and the Englishman him the money and kept him to dinner. A week later the MS. was magnificently bound and placed in his private library.

During the coup d'état, a critic, who had not always been kind to her, was arrested and imprisoned. She heard of it, and never rested for two whole days until she had restored him to liberty—not to write as must her still.

One day Rachel had a grand dinner party, and determined to have the whole. She sent a note to a critic of her acquaintance to aid her in choosing her dessert. They went to Chevet's, where Rachel demanded all the finest fruit in season out of season. Just as she was going away, Chevet suggested that madame should have a splendid pine. She had not but the price was too high; she agreed to hire it. The dinner was gay; for she did things right royally. Still, in a corner of her heart, there was always a trace of that parsimony peculiar to her race. When the dessert was served, and the fine, fine-apple looked magnificent, and the critic maliciously suggested to the Duc de Guiche that he should cut it. The Duc leaned over the table and thrust a sharp knife into the forbidden fruit, which he tore off in triumph. Mademoiselle Rachel saw the deed. She was struck by it as if a tragedy dagger had been suddenly drawn on the stage. She uttered a dolorous cry, and cast a fith-act glance on the Duc. "Mademoiselle Rachel has, then, a pineapple for a soul." Rachel's face, while she was thinking could restore her good-humor that evening. It could not be avoided, for the cost was only 2500 francs. It was rather an attack of the nerves.

Rachel received 500 francs pension for each occasion she thought proper to play Phèdre or twice a week. When this "Malade Imaginaire" was given, with the procession in which all the company deliles before the audience, she walked at the head to receive the applause of the public—and the 500 francs. The amount being at last dispensed, she never appeared in the procession again; not even on the night of Molière.

One of her companions at the Théâtre Français, a blonde with an angelic face, but tormenting diabolorably in enormous hands and feet, said one day before her in the green-room, "I adore Meudon—I have there a little pied-à-terre." "Yes!" Rachel exclaimed, with an indescribable air of mockery, which gained her three rounds of applause.

Among the letters of Mademoiselle Rachel, which are now seeing the light, is this one to a well-known Hebrew banker:

"Monsieur,—My friend M. asserts that I need only write me owed to you to obtain for him fifty shares in the Asiatic railways. If you will be kind enough to add fifty more for each extra word, the surplus will be for your devoted

"RACHEL."

On one occasion she had to write a letter of thanks to the Duke of Devonshire. Before sending it, she showed it to Arsene Houssaye, who advised her to recopy it, and correct some orthographical errors. "Why?" she asked. "Why? Because, Rachel, you are a duchess!"

Rachel was superstitious, and had an especial horror of dining thirteen at table. She herself told of such a party, which the men have to the privilege of returning. This license gives rise to a great deal of harmless merriment, particularly among the young women, who, armed with large syringes and flagons, endeavor to wet every man they meet about the street, and in their way receive a wetting with perfect good-humor. Nor is the smaller efficiency ever manifested than by any other of their sports. Dirty water is never cast."

THE JEWS OF MOROCCO.

The Revue Contemporaine contains a second paper by M. Cherbuliez on the social state of Morocco, from which we condense the following harrowing picture of the condition of the Israelites in that unhappy country. The Jews are considered by the Mussulmans of Morocco in the light of unclean animals, the enemies of God, and if they do not exterminate them it is only because they are useful, and because true believers have a right to turn their money to profit. Indeed, were the Jewish population suddenly removed from the country, with an army of Mussulmans to replace them, the calculable magnitude; for it is the Jew alone who can mend a lock, build a house, make gold and silver trinkets, keep money, discount a note, or receive silk, all such handicrafts being regarded by the Mussulman as degrading occupations. Even the Sultan himself is obliged to have recourse to them for the collection of taxes or negotiations with Christians. Under oppression, the Jew's position is reality all that power which superior talent and cunning give to the weak. The Jews of Fez are shut up in a particular quarter inclosed with a wall, and it is only after sunrise they are allowed to visit the Mussulman towns, where they have their shops. The Jewish quarter is called 'Mellah,' which means a place of damnation. Its population has none, because that town is already 'defiled' by the presence of the Christian consuls. The Jews live in narrow black shelters, that cost them being the emblem of misfortune and malediction. Their dress is distinguished from that of Moors, or if he meet a holy man, a marabout, or a sheriff, he must take off his shoes and carry them in his hand until he has passed them. They are not allowed to cross a Mussulman cemetery, and their corpses must be dragged on the slightest pretense by a Mussulman woman, specially designed for this function, and who will ask bounty. If a Mussulman strike a Jew, the latter is not permitted to defend himself otherwise than by flight or supplication. Assassinations are more than eight or ten years old, may sometimes be seen wandering about the streets at vigorous young Jews twice their size and age; they bite them, box their ears, scratch them; and yet the unfortunate victims, with agony depicted on their faces, dare not retaliate, and limit all their defense to cadaverous grins and piteous contortions. When the Sultan passes through a town the Jews of the place are obliged to offer him rich and magnificent presents. He, with all the burden of servitude upon them, they never abjure their faith; they are, on the contrary, enthusiastic adepts of it, zeal, is repulsed with the grossest ignorance and superstition. The creed they are taught is this—that God has created them for a time, and that they must bend under his wrath until all the nations of the globe, from the rising to the setting sun, the day will come when they shall all be reassembled in the land of their fathers, and be powerful and happy. Meanwhile, all that the other nations possess they have been unjustly deprived of, and they therefore have a right to get possession of it again by any stratagem they can devise. They hate the Christians quite as much as the Mussulmans, because the little protection they enjoy at Tangier is due to the Christian consuls. When a Christian enters a Jew's house, he knows that he is received with every mark of hospitality; but no sooner is his back turned than the glass out of which he drank is broken into pieces, and every thing he has touched is subjected to a rigorous purification, performed with many complicated ceremonies. A Jewish servant will not eat the meat she has cooked for a Christian, although she will eat a Jewish butcher's, because it has been cooked in Christian vessels.

FAMILY PORTRAITS.

I remember, when a boy, walking with an elderly gentleman, and passing a broker's stall; there was the portrait of a fine florid gentleman in resplendents. "Look at it—he might be a prince, I thought it for a few shillings. After we had gone long—"Dad," said I, "is the portrait of my wife's uncle—member for the county, and colonel of militia; you see how he is degraded to them stop!" "Why do you not rescue him?" said I. "Because he left me nothing," was the reply. A friend of his showed me a fine picture of his grandfather; the example is worth following. Her husband was the last of his race, for she had no children. She bought family portraits out of broken frames, rolled up all the pictures, and put them in the coffin with the deceased.

Miscellany.

FEMALE ACCOMPLISHMENTS.

Every school for young ladies rejoices in its teacher of drawing, painting, etc., as well as its teacher of music; and under the heads of these two individuals, the whole school, as a general thing, is content to pay for teachers and parents. French is studied as an accomplishment. The result usually is, that when a young lady is "finished," she can play the tunes on the piano; has executed three pieces of drawing or painting; which pays Longfellow's line, "Art is long and life is short for exhibition to visitor; has done a little portfolio of sketches from the life, or otherwise; and is frequently visible; has learned to dance; and has achieved a free run of nineteen French phrases, by the aid of which she can manage to get along in her life. So far there is nothing but show. Principles have not been inculcated, habits have not been in her hands nothing, not even the instruments for winning the accomplishments which she and her parents consider her own. Can any one examine an sketch from nature? How many are taught to draw from life? How many can paint from life? How many can take a simple piece of music and play or sing it at sight? These are the points on the foothill they have achieved and become mistresses of the delightful art, something the husband and wife may and will find entertaining his friend when they call upon him? How many read a French book aloud with ease? How many could shoot one in fifty. Their accomplishments are a gilded cheat. The money spent to obtain them is all but thrown into the fire. Every one of them should have been devoted to more solid studies, in which three-fourths are now deficient. Many a man feel that their time has been so unprofitably occupied.

MARRIAGE.

A PLEA for marriage, if it required any, is to be found in the following from Dr. Hawker's Life and Journal of Health: "That the relation of marriage is the more natural condition of man, and, in the highest degree, happiest and best for his well-being, attested in the double fact, that unmarried adults do not live so long as married ones, and are not so good people, and that there are more insane single persons in our asylums, in proportion, than of married."

DRESS.

Do not fear being surrounded on all sides by wise and good books; fear only lest you slight or misemploy the wisdom which they contain. Remember that the savage Australian ran for centuries by the gold dust, the diamonds, the pearls, that, unfortunately believe, than that in itself a good library is a good thing, although in some cases it may be injurious to the possessor. The habit is obvious, and may be avoided. If, by the acquisition of books, you have once delivered your mind, you may think for yourself; if you are tempted to roam from subject to subject, glancing at it in a superficial way, you may remember that you have been bend upon it, your large library will become, when you have done it, a mere literary nuisance. But you have chosen a branch of study, convinced that for you it is the most appropriate, then oftentimes a single volume will be broken into pieces, and by bear upon it. One author may awaken suggestions which, though insignificant in his own mind, your own mental territory, may bring you back to it at last enriched and benefited. Another author may confirm your views, and, by doing so, and a third the impulses and inducements without which your labors would be unfruitful, and may not at all. One may brace you for mental conflict, another may soothe and refresh your spirit; and so, if not wearied by satiety, each may be auxiliary to the end you have in view.

YOUNG WASHINGTON.

Herself of the most unbounded generosity and good breeding, in his communication with other folks he appears to exact, or, at any rate, to receive, the same behavior. His nature was above levity and jokes; they seemed out of place when addressed to him. He was slow of comprehending; from which they shrunk as it were abashed out of his society. In 1754 Washington was in his 22d year. Governor Warrington, in one of his letters many years after the date of which we are writing; "and I never thought of him otherwise than of a hero. When he came over to Camlewood and taught us boxer horseplay, to see him striking to bounds was as if he was charging an army. If he fired a shot I thought the bird must come down, and if he flung a net the largest fish in the river were sure to be in it. His words were always few, but they were to the way into; they were not idle, no one words are; they were grave, sober, and strong, and ready on occasion to the their duty. In spite of his antipathy to him, my brother respected and admired the General as much as I did—that is to say, more than any mortal man."—The Virginians, by Thackeray.

CURIOUS CUSTOM IN BURMAH.

"On the 15th of April, the last day of the Burman year, we were invited by the Mayween (i. e., Viceroy of Pegu) to bear a part ourselves in a sport that is universally practised throughout the Burman dominions on the concluding day of their annual cycle, to wash away the impurities of the past, and commence the new year free from stain; women on this day are accustomed to throw water on every man they meet, which the men have the privilege of returning. This license gives rise to a great deal of harmless merriment, particularly among the young women, who, armed with large syringes and flagons, endeavor to wet every man they meet about the street, and in their way receive a wetting with perfect good-humor. Nor is the smaller efficiency ever manifested than by any other of their sports. Dirty water is never cast."

THE JEWS OF MOROCCO.

The Revue Contemporaine contains a second paper by M. Cherbuliez on the social state of Morocco, from which we condense the following harrowing picture of the condition of the Israelites in that unhappy country. The Jews are considered by the Mussulmans of Morocco in the light of unclean animals, the enemies of God, and if they do not exterminate them it is only because they are useful, and because true believers have a right to turn their money to profit. Indeed, were the Jewish population suddenly removed from the country, with an army of Mussulmans to replace them, the calculable magnitude; for it is the Jew alone who can mend a lock, build a house, make gold and silver trinkets, keep money, discount a note, or receive silk, all such handicrafts being regarded by the Mussulman as degrading occupations. Even the Sultan himself is obliged to have recourse to them for the collection of taxes or negotiations with Christians. Under oppression, the Jew's position is reality all that power which superior talent and cunning give to the weak. The Jews of Fez are shut up in a particular quarter inclosed with a wall, and it is only after sunrise they are allowed to visit the Mussulman towns, where they have their shops. The Jewish quarter is called 'Mellah,' which means a place of damnation. Its population has none, because that town is already 'defiled' by the presence of the Christian consuls. The Jews live in narrow black shelters, that cost them being the emblem of misfortune and malediction. Their dress is distinguished from that of Moors, or if he meet a holy man, a marabout, or a sheriff, he must take off his shoes and carry them in his hand until he has passed them. They are not allowed to cross a Mussulman cemetery, and their corpses must be dragged on the slightest pretense by a Mussulman woman, specially designed for this function, and who will ask bounty. If a Mussulman strike a Jew, the latter is not permitted to defend himself otherwise than by flight or supplication. Assassinations are more than eight or ten years old, may sometimes be seen wandering about the streets at vigorous young Jews twice their size and age; they bite them, box their ears, scratch them; and yet the unfortunate victims, with agony depicted on their faces, dare not retaliate, and limit all their defense to cadaverous grins and piteous contortions. When the Sultan passes through a town the Jews of the place are obliged to offer him rich and magnificent presents. He, with all the burden of servitude upon them, they never abjure their faith; they are, on the contrary, enthusiastic adepts of it, zeal, is repulsed with the grossest ignorance and superstition. The creed they are taught is this—that God has created them for a time, and that they must bend under his wrath until all the nations of the globe, from the rising to the setting sun, the day will come when they shall all be reassembled in the land of their fathers, and be powerful and happy. Meanwhile, all that the other nations possess they have been unjustly deprived of, and they therefore have a right to get possession of it again by any stratagem they can devise. They hate the Christians quite as much as the Mussulmans, because the little protection they enjoy at Tangier is due to the Christian consuls. When a Christian enters a Jew's house, he knows that he is received with every mark of hospitality; but no sooner is his back turned than the glass out of which he drank is broken into pieces, and every thing he has touched is subjected to a rigorous purification, performed with many complicated ceremonies. A Jewish servant will not eat the meat she has cooked for a Christian, although she will eat a Jewish butcher's, because it has been cooked in Christian vessels.

FAMILY PORTRAITS.

I remember, when a boy, walking with an elderly gentleman, and passing a broker's stall; there was the portrait of a fine florid gentleman in resplendents. "Look at it—he might be a prince, I thought it for a few shillings. After we had gone long—"Dad," said I, "is the portrait of my wife's uncle—member for the county, and colonel of militia; you see how he is degraded to them stop!" "Why do you not rescue him?" said I. "Because he left me nothing," was the reply. A friend of his showed me a fine picture of his grandfather; the example is worth following. Her husband was the last of his race, for she had no children. She bought family portraits out of broken frames, rolled up all the pictures, and put them in the coffin with the deceased.

GOLDSMITH AND GRAY.

Sweet odor and bright eyed, swiftly passing,
Swiftly as breath upon a looking-glass,
Byron, the school-girl's pet, has lived his day,
And the tall May-pole scarce remembers Moore.
Then, Nature, blossomed in personal youth—
Two only men stand—Goldsmith and Tennyson,
Who walks not with their thro' the dim church-yard
To Nature not with Eton's wandering boy,
Who sits not down with Auburn's pastor mild
To take upon himself the woes of land
These in all hearts will find a kindred place,
And live the last of our poetic race.

WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.

LAND THOU.

Attachments between friends and lovers can not be secured strongly, and perpetually augmenting, except by the intervention of some interest which is not personal to them—which is common to both, and toward which their attentions and passions are directed. Love is the most impassioned of friendship, and friendship is love without sexual intercourse. In either case, will be reduced to the condition of a vanishing animal's stomach, the opposite sides of which, for want of pabulum, meet and digest and consume each other. Attachment must burn in oxygen, or it will go out; and by oxygen is meant a mutual admiration and pursuit of virtue, improvement, utility, the pleasures of taste, or other similar ostensible concern, which shall be the element of their commerce, and make them love each other, not only for each other, but as devotees to some idol or object which they both adore. The affections of the soul will feed a dissatisfaction, a mood, if, as has been said, they are simply interrupted and stopped by any object that is not shared; they wish rather to be like rays of light glancing off in all directions, and yet for ever meeting and passing away; they wish the power of elongation, through a series of interesting media, on toward infinity. Human society is a vast circle of beings on a plain, in the midst of which stands the shrine of goodness and happiness, inviting all to approach. Now the attached pairs in this circle should not be continually looking in the centre, but should turn their faces very often toward this central object, and as they advance they will, like radii from the circumference to the centre, necessarily approach closer to each other as they approximate to their mutual and ultimate object.

POVERTY AND GENIUS.

The history of those who, by their genius and untiring energy, have taken the sting from poverty, and placed themselves a place in the catalogue of the illustrious, must ever be interesting to the last of the last. The generous heart worth belongs to such characters; apart from high birth and proudly-swelling titles, from the splendor of wealth and its fame, and frequently without the advantages of early education, the children of penury have marveled and won their high position, struggling over the obstacles which impeded their progress. The working man may well glory in the new and bright example which his path presents—at the loom, the plow, and the anvil have helped to establish, and may be stimulated by their example to show himself worthy of the fraternity to which he belongs.

COMPENSATION FOR GROWING OLD.

It is said that we suffer less as we grow older—that pain, like joy, becomes dulled by repetition, and that the weariness that comes with years. In one sense this is true. If there is no joy like the joy of youth, the pangs of it are not, on the whole of a first ambition, God's great mercy has also granted that there is no anguish like youth's pain: to betak, to hopeless, letting out of hearts and hearts, falling down upon the whole being like a stone. Every one who passes it after-life, knows the sufferer, if he or she have lived to any purpose at all, has learned that God never meant any human being to be what neither any calamity like a blood worm under a stone.

COURAGE AND PATIENCE.

Life is a task, because it is a work to Death, because we know it not;
But we do not feel it, because we
Every man must bear his lot.
Coward hearts, who shrink and sigh,
Are not fit to live or die!

Knowing Life, we should not fear it,
Neither Death, for what is death?
Courage, Patience—these are virtues
Which will bear us through the breath
Who has these—and have not I—
He is fit to live and die!

THE SPIDER.

The worst thing about this poor animal is that it is so ugly. In fact, it is a nature so sacrificed every thing to the formation of the industrial machine necessary to capture its prey. A circular form, furnished with eight legs, and eight vigilant eyes, it astonishes (and disgusts) us by the mechanical and automatic regularity of its operations. Is it an instinctive and superficial observer will find nothing but a type of gluttony. Alas! it is quite the contrary. This abdomen is its workshop, its magazine, the pocket in which the rope-maker keeps his stock, but as he fills this pocket with nothing but his own substance, he can not replenish it but at the expense by means of a rigid sobriety. True type of the artisan. "If I fast to-day," he says, "I shall, perhaps, get something to-morrow, and if my manufactures be stopped, every thing is lost, and my stomach will have to fast forever." In character the spider is watchful and cunning, in disposition timid, uneasy, and nervous, being endowed with a more sensitive nature than is possessed by any other insect. These characteristics are the natural result, M. Michelet believes, of its miserable condition, which is a state of constant, passive, weary waiting. To be forever watching the ceaseless, joyous, careless dances of the fly, which pays no attention to the greedy desires of its enemy, or the gentle whispers of, "Will you walk into my parlor, will you, will you?" it is to be in a state of constant torment, to be continually undergoing a succession of hopes and mortifications. The fatal question, "Shall I get my dinner?" is an unusually interesting itself to the dweller in the web, followed by the still more sinister reflection, "If I have neither to-day, then no more bread, and still less hope of dining to-morrow." The male spider often makes a meal of his progeny, while the female loves them so tenderly that if she can not save them in circumstances of peril, she prefers to perish with them. The love which she bears to her little ones, she does not extend toward her male associations, after having in vain attempted to prevent him devouring their offspring, the idea appears suddenly to present itself to her mind that the cannibal is himself prey for food, on which she instantly falls upon him and eats him up.

PARISIAN SUPERSTITION.

A CURIOUS piece of statistics is furnished by some of the Paris papers. It is observed that on a Friday the omnibus circulation of Paris diminishes in a proportion of twenty-five per cent.—proving how strong is the superstitious avoidance of doing any thing that can be helped on that day. It is also further remarked that when the Friday happens to fall on the 13th day of the month the omnibus receipts decrease at the rate of fifty per cent.

THIRST WORSE THAN HUNGER.

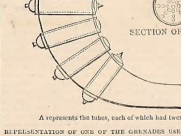
THAT disturbance of the general system which is known under the name of Raging Thirst is far more terrible than that of starvation, and for this reason: During abstinence from food the organism can still live upon its own substance, which furnishes all the necessary material; but during abstinence from liquid, the organism has no such source of supply within itself. Men have been known to endure absolute privation of food for some weeks, but three days of absolute privation of drink (unless in a moist atmosphere) is perhaps the limit of endurance. Thirst is the most atrocious torture ever invented by Oriental torturers. It is that which most effectually tames animals. Mr. Astley, when he had a refractory horse, always used thirst as the most effective power of coercion, giving a little water as the reward for every act of obedience. The histories of shipwreck paint fearful pictures of the sufferings endured from thirst: and one of the most appalling cases known is the celebrated imprisonment of one hundred and forty-six men in the Black Hole at Calcutta.

MAN THE DESTROYER OF MAN'S WORKS.

"FANCY what we should have had around us now," says Ruskin, "if, instead of quarreling and fighting over their work, the nations had aided each other in their work, or if, even in their conquests, instead of effacing the memorials of those they succeeded and subdued, they had guarded the spoils of their victories! Fancy what Europe would be now, if the delicate statues and temples of the Greeks —if the broad roads and massy walls of the Romans—if the noble and patriotic architecture of the Middle Ages had not been ground to dust by mere human rage! You talk of the scythe of Time, and the tooth of Time—well you, Time is not the scythe and toothless; it is we who gnaw like the worm, we who make like the scythe. It is ourselves who abolish; ourselves who consume: we are the milldew and the flame—and the soul of man is to its own work as the moth fruit from which it is not fly, and as the hidden flame that blasts where it can not illumine. All these lost treasures of human intellect have been wholly destroyed by human industry of destruction; the marble would have stood its two thousand years as well in the polished statue as in the Parian cliff; but we men have ground it to powder and mixed it with our own ashes. The walls and the ways would have stood —it is we who have left not one stone upon another, and restored its pathlessness to the desert: the great cathedrals of old religion would have stood —it is we who have hacked down the carved work with axes and hammers, and bid the mountain grass bloom upon the pavement, and the sea-winds chant in the galleries!"

REMEMBER PROSPERITY!

"WE write," said good Bishop Hall, "our mercies in the dust, but our afflictions we engrave in marble; our memories serve us too well to remember the latter, but we are strangely forgetful of the former." Many a page would seem to have a singular preference for misery.



THE FRENCH ASSASSINS.

As the trial of the persons who attempted to assassinate the Emperor of the French will be reported in the papers by the time this journal sees the light, we have thought our readers would like to see portraits of the two leaders—Orsini and Pierri. We have therefore procured a sketch of the instrument by which it was intended to destroy the Emperor.

For the benefit of those readers who have not followed the history of the affair with attention we may say, briefly, that on the evening of 14th January, as the Emperor and Empress were driving through the Rue Lepellatier, Paris, to the Academy of Music, a sudden explosion was heard. The Imperial coachman, suspecting the truth, whipped up his horses, and the carriage rolled on without injury. A second explosion, occurring almost immediately afterward, killed one of the horses, and checked the progress of the vehicle. And a third, which followed at an interval of a few seconds,

ORSINI.

SECTION OF TUBES.

A represents the tubes, each of which had twenty-five bullets filled with explosive materials.

REPRESENTATION OF ONE OF THE GRENADES USED IN THE ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE THE FRENCH EMPEROR.

PIERRI.

burst directly under the carriage, and wounded every body in it except the person whom it was designed to kill. From fifty to sixty persons were wounded by these various explosions, seven or eight of whom are either dead or dying. Exact figures can not be had; it is the policy of the French Government to conceal facts.

Four persons have been arrested on the charge of having discharged the projectiles which were intended to kill the Emperor. These are Felice Orsini, Pierri, Rudio, and Gomez. The accounts in the French papers are so suspicious and conflicting that it is not easy to compile an exact statement of the facts. It appears, however, that Gomez was the servant of Orsini; that Rudio, who is quite a young man, has turned State's evidence against his comrades, and revealed the plot; and that the two others, Orsini and Pierri, were the life and soul of it.

The life of Felice Orsini was told in Harper's Magazine for March, 1857. He seems to belong to that singular class of Europeans who are the progeny of despotic institutions. From the time he began to think and act he was a conspirator. He conspired against the Grand Duke of Tuscany; He conspired against the Pope, was imprisoned over an many years for his pains, and finally regained his liberty under cover of some general amnesty. He conspired against the Austrian Government, was caught, imprisoned in the fortress of Mantua, and sentenced to death. His companion and friend, Calvi, who was incarcerated with him, was executed. He was more fortunate. By dint of unusual good fortune, ingenuity, and hard labor, he contrived to work his way out of his prison, and though he sprained his ankle so severely by falling into the ditch of the fortress, in making his escape, that when he regained his freedom he could hardly make use of it, he still managed, somehow, to make his way to England. There he published one or two books about himself and his wonderful adventures; and for a time he was a lion in revolutionary circles.

Poverty seems to have been his trouble. In London he lived out a livelihood by writing his books and translating for the papers; but, if common report is true, his funds were very low when he fell in with Pierri at Birmingham.

Pierri, like Orsini, was a born conspirator. The earlier years of his manhood he spent obscurely; the only thing that can be safely said of him is that he did not follow any honest occupation. In 1848 he donned up as a republican and a soldier; his military aptitude and his fame as a demagogue procured him a commission as Colonel in the Italian Legion. The French authorities assert that during his stay in his native country he committed several murders; that he killed, among other persons, an unfortunate priest who had evinced a fatherly affection for a lady with whom he was acquainted. However this be, there can be little doubt but that, like Orsini, was, in his exile at Birmingham, extremely embarrassed in his circumstances, and ready for any change in the political affairs in the Continent.

It was in the peaceful manufacturing town of Birmingham that the plot was matured. Rudio, another of the culprits, had married an English girl, and resided there when living at Nottingham upon her wages at the time he was admitted to the confidence of Pierri and Orsini. The three conspired together, and laid their plans after the true Italian method. No one of them, it seems, had sufficient common sense or reliance upon himself to provide himself with a reliable ride and to undertake to do the deed singly. They agreed to share the peril and to divide the blow in such a way as to have the largest room for failure in their immediate aim, and the best room for their own escape.

They provided themselves with projectiles of cast iron, pear shaped, and from four to five inches in diameter at the widest part. Our engraving will give a better idea of these implements than any description could. At the lower part seven tubes will be seen, each perforated by fifteen barrels; each of which was filled with explosive materials. Thus each explosion may have thrown out nearly one score of death enough to kill fifty persons.

The rest is easily told. We have given in former numbers of the Weekly the account of the tragic affair; we have described how the Emperor, when his horses were lying dead, and every one around him was wounded, quietly remarked to the police-agent who opened his carriage door—"Mon cher, if you want me to get out you had better let down the steps"; how the Empress preserved her equanimity and sat in the front row at the Opera, applauding the singers and entering into the spirit of the music as though nothing had happened; how the Chief of Police had so thoroughly taken his measures (too late, as usual), that when a high functionary exhorted him to clear the street of "that crowd of by-standers," he was able to reply sarcastically, "Monsieur, all those are my people, i. e. police-agents in disguise; how Pierri, who enthusiastic simpleton, had merely been an interested spectator, exclaimed to the police-sergeant when he heard the first bomb go off—"Now you may take me where you please; the blow is struck!" how Orsini's detention was caused by the officiousness of his faithful servant Gomez, whose anxiety slowed his master aroused the suspicions of the police; finally, how the soldiers of the French army swelled themselves of the accident to give expression to their cry for vengeance—not against the assassins, but against England; while Monsieur de Morny and his friends took the same opportunity of screwing a little tighter the imperial yoke round the neck of the press and people of France. All this the attentive reader of the news department of the Weekly has heard already.

One thing—which may lead to some curious developments when the case comes on for trial—is the abundance of money found on the persons and in the possession of the prisoners. Orsini had over a thousand dollars in gold and bank-notes; Pierri was equally well provided. How came they by this money? It would really seem as though they had accomplices who agreed to supply the funds for their criminal enterprize.

A WOMAN'S QUESTION.

Before I trust my fate to thee,
Or place my hand in thine,
Before I let thy future give
Color and form to mine—
Before I peril all for thee, question thy soul to-night, for me.

I break all slighter bonds, nor feel
One shadow of regret:
Is there one link within the past
That holds thy spirit yet?
Or is thy faith as clear and free as that which I can pledge to thee?

Does there within thy dimmest dreams
A possible future shine,
Wherein thy life could henceforth breathe,
Untouched, unshared by mine?
If so, at any pain or cost, O tell me before all is lost!

Look deeper still. If thou canst feel
Within thy inmost soul
That thou hast kept a portion back,
While I have staked the whole,
Let no false pity spare the blow, but, in true mercy, tell me so.

Is there within thy heart a need
That mine can not fulfill?
One chord that any other hand
Could better wake or still?
Speak now, lest at some future day my whole life wither and decay.

Lives there, within thy nature hid,
The demon-spirit, Change,
Shedding a passing glory still
On all things new and strange?
It may not be thy fault alone, but shield my heart against thy own.

Couldst thou withdraw thy hand one day,
And answer to my claim
That fate, and that to-day's mistake,
Not thou, had been to blame?
Some soothe their conscience thus; but thou—
Oh, surely thou, wilt warn me now!

PADDY AND I.

When I heard a grave gentleman-like man, at the Ballybrogue Station of the Great Punster Railway, say to a friend, who asked him how he should spend the half-hour he would have to wait, that he should spend it thinking of all the kind things he (the friend) had been saying to him, I said, "The Irish are a polite people."

When I saw, at a Dublin theatre, the whole house to a man get on their legs, and howl at the manager because he wouldn't introduce a national jig in the Middle of La Sonnambula, I said, "The Irish are an excitable people."

When a Killarney guide swore to me on the tomb of his grandmother that there was a small lake up in Mullacap, county Kerry, which contained a giant eel, that swam twice round the inclosure every day at two o'clock, with a pan of old gould tied to his tail, I said, "The Irish are a superstitious people."

When a Tipperary landlord, in a Galway railway carriage, told me he was surnamed "the Woodcock," because he had been shot at so often by the "noblest tinantry" and missed, I said, "The Irish are a revengeful people."

When I saw my friend Mike Rooney's best blue breeches stuffed into his window to keep out the rain, I said, "The Irish are a thoughtless people."

And, lastly, when I refused the beggar-woman at Castlebar a half-penny, and she ironically hoped "the Lord would make my bed that night in heaven," I said, "The Irish are a witty people."

But this is nothing to do with my story; for what I want to say is, that I got into Westport on the fair-day and the sessions-day, and found the coffee-room full of bagmen and sessions people, just hot from a case in which an action had been brought against the owners of a steamer for putting a cargo of eggs with which they had been intrusted too near the funnel, in consequence of which half the eggs had been hatched and half addled. I first threw myself heart and soul among the bagmen; those whom I chiefly valued were a big-headed elephantine Smith, in the hardware way, and Fitzgibbons, an invalid—a neat-featured droll Dublin man—very full of anecdote. Thus we began:

"Why, what's the matter, Smith?" said Fitzgibbons, the Dublin bagman, to the big-headed gentleman in the hardware line.

Smith had thrust his hands in his pocket, shut up with a bang the order-book, in which he was making memoranda of the day's work, stretched out his shapely legs, and seemed entirely intent in staring with a Quaker-like concentration at the tips of his boots.

"I tell you what it is," said Smith, moodily, "I can't get on without my claret."

"The house is going to rack and ruin since Proger's death," said a neat bandbox man in the floor-cloth line.

"Oh, you shouldn't be hard on the house. They do their best," said the full-whiskered neat-featured Fitzgibbons. "Have you ever heard, Smith, that story of Dwyer, the Dublin 'beak?'"

"No," said Smith, not yet rallying from the effect of the absence of his favorite wine, but wishing to be amused.

I was somewhat tired of the endless ceremonial of "Mr. President, may I be permitted," "Mr. Vice, I am intruding, I fear, on your province," and bridled up to hear the story which the eccentric dispenser of justice had himself told Fitzgibbons.

"Fill your tumbler, old fellow, before you begin," said Smith.

"Thank you, old boy," said Fitz, twisting his mouth into an elongated tube adapted for probationship in "screeching" hot whisky and aqua.

"I'll tell you the story, boys, as the ould jintleman himself told it me. 'The other day,' said he, in his own mealy brogue, 'as I was sitting for the administration of justice on my judgment-sate in Ormond Street, a little boy was brought up before me charged with robbing an orchard out somewhere by Donnybrook. The case was clearly proved; and the keeper of the nursery-garden deposed that the boy was an old offender, and that he had visited the place so often that he had cleared it of every sort of fruit. Having no pity on such villainous young marauders found guilty upon the clearest possible evidence, I sentenced him to three months' imprisonment, not forgetting to add the usual whipping—the peculiar prerogative of juvenile offenders. Just as I had delivered this sentence with a solemn air, I looked in a dignified way round the court, and to my surprise observed the old gardener, who lingered in the witness-box, standing there still, and pulling down his forelock as if he wanted to speak to me, and had something on his mind. "If you plase—" he said. "What are you wanting, fellow?" said I. "If you plase," said the man, "I've got a peculiar favor to ask." "What is it?" said I. "Why," said he, "if it plase your honor's worship, that I may see the little boy receive his sentence." "What, be whipped?" said I. "Yes; be whipped," said he. Well, as soon as the business of the day was over, I went down into the back-court, feeling anxious to know what sort of morbid curiosity impelled the man. When I got there, the little boy was receiving his first lash, and I saw him, all in a shivering heap, cramming his dirty knuckle into the extreme corner of his left eye; and there, in the corner, stood the prosecutor looking on and rubbing his hands as if it was, 'pon my sowl, the Royal Theatre he had got a dress-box in. Well, I watched him; and before the whip could come down again on the poor little divil's dirty hide, he goes up to the urchin, and giving him a dig in his very small ribs, cries out, "There's a Mogul plum for ye;" and the next time the whip came down, he goes up on the other side, and cries, "There's a jargonelle for ye;" and the third time it was, "There's a Kerry pippin for ye;" and so the cruel villain went on, till, I'll be bail, there wasn't a fruit or vegetable known in Paradise, much more in Ireland, that he did not mention to the poor boy.'" (Loud laughter, etc.)

Smith. It's a good story now, ain't it?

Fitzgibbons. Why, you never heard it before.

Smith. Och, haven't I? Weren't we all half kilt with it the other week at Derry?

Fitzgibbons. Bad luck to the big head of ye, so I did. Well, it's a good story, ain't it? Yet, hang it, I towld it the other day to a man who couldn't for the life see the point of it. "Why did he say, 'There's a Mogul plum for ye?'" he kept repeating; "'Ah, there's a jargonelle.' Now why did he say 'jargonelle?'" I could have laid hold of the boiled leg of mutton, and beaten him into capers with it.

After this, the neat little man in the floor-cloth way volunteered a long and pointless story, all about "a clock" running up a wall. Now, I could imagine a clock on a wall, or a man running away over a wall with a clock; but what was this?

It was a new hotel, and he had just gone to bed, when he heard a mysterious noise, and presently saw "a clock" run up the wall.

"A clock?" said I, unable to contain my amazement.

Smith. Oh, they call them in England beetles.

Well, the clock did not end the story; for the small neat man went on to say, that in all his circuit he had never seen such a place. All night he was kept awake with the gnawings of something sharper than even conscience. Day broke, and yet no sleep. He could not stand it; he leaped out of bed, and rang a yawning peal that made night hideous and roused the whole house. Soon at his door came the half-dressed indignant landlord. Our friend grew tranquil; he asked if they'd any toast-and-water ready made? The landlord was furious. "Look here," said I, drawing him to the bedside; and flinging back the clothes, I showed him the white sheets spotted with black. "Lord!" says the landlord, with an expression of mingled astonishment, pity, and indignation, "why it's only a parcel of bed-bugs;" and he went shuffling off, grumbling at being rung up at such an hour about so mere a trifle.

Fitzgibbons. That's a neat little mare you drive in your trap, Grady; but where's the cob gone?

Grady. Gone? why, where the good niggers go—to the knacker's.

Fitzgibbons. Well, I hope you sent him to our ingenious friend at Sandymount. You have heard his way of doing business, haven't you? No? Well, I'll tell you. When a man takes his horse there, he generally leaves him in the yard, panting and wheezing, while he goes into Geoghean, in the little box of a counting-house, where he finds him, pen behind his ear, running his finger down a ledger, and sharper than a Tipperary fox. They can not come to terms at all. Our friend asks £3; Geoghean won't give more than £2 2*s*., and wants the harness in besides. At last, in a tiff, off goes the owner to get up in his cart and whip home again. In the mean time, however, Geoghean has slyly sent out one of his men to knock the beast on the head, and there he lies stone-dead between the shafts. The owner does not know what to do. He won't take the price; but he can not get the carcass home, and when he does, it won't keep. While he is trying to flog his brains for a plan, out comes Geoghean in a burning storming rage, threatens him with prosecution, orders him directly with his own hand to remove that carrion from his yard, or he will charge five shillings for every hour it is kept there. In despair, the mortified owner reopens the negotiation; but Geoghean, stern and obdurate, will not now give more than £1 15*s*., and at that miserable and insufficient price the bargain is closed.

Smith. "And mighty ingenious too. The coup-de-grace most judiciously applied. (Seriously.) This house isn't as it used to be in Rooney's time: there was no talk of a gentleman wanting claret then."

Fitzgibbons. "Och, man, never mind the claret; tell us the story of how you took in the Dublin carman."

Smith. Oh, it's not worth the telling. It was last year I was coming home from my circuit, and I arrived by the seven o'clock train at the Drogheda station in Dublin. I thought I would have some fun, for I had a white hat on at the time, and looked mighty like a tracker (pedestrian); so I went staring about the station, and called for a jaunting-car. Three men ran up, whip in hand: one would drive me for nothing, and give me a dram besides; another had a horse that would make the tay-kettle's steam-boiler burst; a third would go bail that his horse could drive all the rest before him. I hired one, clung on the side-seat like a stranger, and told him to drive to the Gresham. "The Gresham, is it?" Away he went—such a drive! round by the Quays, and the Phœnix, and Grafton Street, and the Liberty, and back to Sackville Street. Then he pulls up at the lamp with a start, leaps off as if he had done the thing well, and waits for his fare, expecting a crown or so. I handed him the statute sixpence. "What's this?" said he, looking at it as if it was a bad one. "Is it bad?" said I. "No," said he, "but I want four-and-tinpence." "For one set down within the municipalities," said I, "fare, sixpence." "Oh, by Jabers," said he, "the mealy-mouthed rascal! To the ould Harry with your municipalities! Sorra to your big head, if I didn't take ye for a rowler (tourist)!" (Laughter.)

I. They tell a story in Dublin of a magistrate there who has a peculiar mission for putting down carmen. His object in life is to check extortion; he lives to suppress carmen. One day he sent his little girls to school in a car, putting them in at the turnpike to save over-fare, and directing them with many precautions to get out this side the municipal boundary. When they get out, they hand the carman, who had prepared himself to pluck his young fare, sixpence. The carman looked at it first, and then at them. "What's this dirtying my hands?" says he. "It's your sixpence." "Is it sixpence?" says he. "It's your proper fare," they said, "and we shall not give any more." "You'll not give any more?" "No; it's what papaw told us to give." "And who is your papaw?" (with a voice of drawling disgust). "Mr. Flannigan, the police magistrate." "Mr. Flannigan!" (with a look of discomfiture rising to terror, regaining his seat, and whipping off). "Och! then, good-morning to ye, my little darlints, and remember me to your papaw."

Smith. There are two magistrates, Flannigan and Flaherty, of whom many good stories are told. One is peculiarly hard on people who are found incapable of taking care of themselves or of any one else, and who, because they have been generally already robbed, are also fined. The other is equally forgiving. I heard a drunken fellow once, lying in the gutter and talking with his wife, who was swearing at him for not coming home. "Where's your manners, ye dirty baste!" she said, pushing him with her foot, "bringing disgrace on the ould name and the ould blood! Och! you big baste, to leave your poor neglected wife and childer—get up with you!" "Biddy," said the drunken vagabond from the kennel, "for the love of the Virgin and St. Patrick, just rowl me over to Flannigan's side of the street, and I'll be all right in the morning."

Fitzgibbons. He's the magistrate who examined the man of straw as to the value of his property. "Will you swear," he said, "that your holdings are worth twenty pounds?" "Bedad," said the bail, who was holding his nose as if he was rubbing it, "I swear that I wouldn't part with my holdings for twice twenty pounds." So he was admitted.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

"I am thy father's spirit," as the bottle said to the boy when he found it hid in the wood pile and wondered what it was.

A man who fancies himself funny, says that Iago's description of Roderigo is the first instance on record of the manufacture of a Venetian blind.

Old Deacon Biggs is as remarkable for his closeness as was Dickens's man, Barkis. His name has come to be a proverb in our region for such an economy as ever makes a man the subject of ridicule and contempt. One bitter cold morning, a few falls ago, he bade the boys drive together all the pigs that were to be fatted for the market into the little yard just at the corner of the house. A pig was caught by one of the youngsters; the Deacon, with a pair of pincers in one hand and a sharp knife in the other, seized the unfortunate by the tail, and cut it off, close up. So on through the whole herd, leaving not a pig with even a stump of a tail. Cort, who worked for his grandfather, stood by in amazement—his hands in his pockets, his toes turned in, his old fur cap over his ears, his body warped into a crescent by the cold, and his teeth jawing against the outrage with a prodigious clatter. At last he stuttered out, "Grandpa! what you cuttin' off those tails for?"

Sober and solemn was Deacon Biggs as he replied, "You never will be a rich man, for you do not know what it is to be savin'. You ought to know, my child, that it takes a bushel of corn to fatten an inch of tail."

Cort has gone to the West, and, in the corn-growing bottoms of Michigan, has taken to the raising of tailless porkers.

A contemporary inquires if the young ladies of the present day are fitted for wives? We think it a much more important inquiry whether they are fitted for husbands.

The nerve which never relaxes, the eye which never blanches, the thought which never wanders—these are the masters of victory.

In a restaurant in Philadelphia, about a week ago, a man entered a stall and ordered sausages for one. This was during the horse-beef excitement. On the appearance of the smoking sausages, careful of his stomach, he addressed them thus: "Art thou pork and hog meat?" And the sausages replied "Neigh." The customer whinnied a little, and left abruptly.

"Thank God," exclaimed Rabelais, with an honest pride, as his friends were weeping around his death-bed; "if I were to die ten times over, I should never make you cry half so much as I have made you laugh."

Jenkins was noted for his courage and his vixen of a wife. He was not afraid of man or of his wife either. His friends had often tried to scare him but had always failed. His wife's brother tried one night, fixed himself up in the most ghostly style possible, and stationed himself in a lonely piece of wood through which Jenkins had to pass on his way home. The pretended ghost had scarcely settled himself in his position, when Jenkins hove in sight, and came whistling along unconcerned as usual. Suddenly the ghostly figure confronted him, and in a sepulchral voice commanded him to stop. Jenkins did so, and after regarding his companion for a moment, said, with the utmost coolness:

"I can't stop, friend; if you are a man, I must request you to get out of the way and let me pass; if you are the devil, come along and take supper with me—I married your sister."

A young farmer, not over well-stocked with brains, nor overrich in this world's goods, had come to that crisis in life when he was sure he must commence "a double-barreled" existence, or "spile." Having made the necessary preliminary arrangements, in the shape of a rough board cabin, and a "Barkis who was willin," he borrowed a horse and wagon, and took a bag of corn and the expectant bride to the mill and the minister's. The corn being left to be ground, the twain who wished to be made one flesh waited upon the minister, and the swain, explaining the necessities of his case, demanded to know "How much the swindle would be?" The minister replied that the fee was usually measured by the generosity of the gentleman, but one dollar was the smallest sum considered orthodox. This was beyond "the pile" of the farmer, but, nothing discouraged, he said: "Now see here, old fellow! I hain't got but fifty cents, and you must marry us as much as that will come to, and we'll come again for the balance." The minister could not resist the entreaty, and married the parties so effectually that they never returned for the other fifty cents' worth.

There is a new town out in the Northwest called Barton (contract of Beartown). At this point a post-office has been established; the route extends some distance beyond, and there are several offices farther on. Soon after the establishment of the office at Barton, the postmasters beyond began to be troubled by a strange irregularity in the mails. This week, one thing would be missing; the next, some other package would be non est; and quite often letters for B. would have to be sent back. This state of affairs became unendurable; and Agent Hall was sent on to investigate the matter. He went straight to Barton, where he found the post-office in the back room of a little grocery. It was about time for the mail to arrive, and he took a seat in the grocery, where a plump and good-natured woman, well in years, and possessed of a "rich brogue," attended behind the counter, dealing out small quantities of beer, cheese, cakes, peanuts, etc., etc., to a company of loungers, who seemed to wait for some event.

Hall bought a quantity of pea-nuts, and treated the crowd to beer, by which course he succeeded in removing all suspicions which his decent garb had created against him. Soon the stage drove up, the mail-bag was thrown out; the lady picked it up, and retreated to the back room, followed by the crowd—including Hall, who blocked up the door.

After opening the bag, and turning its contents on the floor, the postmistress produced a box, and deliberately proceeded to measure out a peck of miscellaneous matter from the pile on the floor. Having done this, she commenced returning the rest, when Hall found his tongue.

"Why, what are you doing there?" he contrived to stammer out.

"Indade," said the postmistress, looking up, "it's changing the mail that I am."

"But how do you know that you get the right matter? Why don't you look it over and select your own?"

"Faith an' it's a fool's job you'd be afther havin' me do," replied her "leddyship." "I can't read niver a blessed bit of ritin', an' when my son Jem (he's had school larnin') isn't here, I jest measures out about our sheer, an' we divides 'em."

We lately heard a vulgar politician boast upon the stump that he and Daniel Webster once staid over night at the same public house. It must have been a house of "entertainment for man and beast."

Said old Mrs. Philanthropy, the other day, accosting a precocious urchin in the street with a wardrobe remarkable for its ventilating advantages, "Bubby, why don't you go home and have your mother sew up that awful hole in your trowsers?" "Oh, you git eout, old 'oman," was the respectful reply, "our folks is economizing, and a hole will last longer than a patch any day." The old lady's honest sympathy was wasted, while youngster beat a retreat round the corner.

"I love to look upon a young man. There is a hidden potency concealed within his breast which charms and pains me."

The daughter of a clergyman happened to find the above sentence at the close of a piece of her father's manuscript, as he had left it in his study, sat down and added:

"Them's my sentiments exactly—all but the pains."

The Washington correspondent of the Boston Post writes the following amusing apple feat:

"I can not help telling you a little incident of Secretary Toucey's reception. One of the guests, a gentleman, having a lady on his arm, took from the table a large, fine apple probably for the little ones at home, and his coat sleeves being large, he secreted it in the sleeve of his right arm. Unfortunately he forgot the circumstance just at the very moment he should not, for in making his retiring bow he gave a flourish of his arm and pitched the apple almost in the Secretary's face! It bounded and rolled away till it lodged under some lady's crinoline, while the poor gentleman looked as much mortified and astonished as if he had accidentally fired a bomb-shell in the parlor. This incident was too ludicrous for gravity, and even the grave and dignified Secretary was forced into a broad smile, which expanded into a grin all around the parlor. Some wag scrambled to get the apple, and restored it to the discomfited gentleman, who then incontinently took himself off."

There is no grave so desolate that flowers will not at least spring on it.

"There now!" cried a little niece of ours, while rummaging a drawer in a bureau, "there now, grandpa has gone to Heaven without his spectacles. What will he do?" And shortly afterward, when another aged relative was supposed to be sick unto death, in the house, she came running to his bedside, with the glasses in her hand, and an errand on her lips—

"You goin' to die?"
"They tell me so."
"Goin' to Heaven?"
"I hope so."
"Well, here are grandpa's spectacles. Won't you take them to him?"

The following epitaph, found on a tombstone in Oxford, New Hampshire, may not be superlatively ludicrous, but it certainly is "some:"

"To all my friends I bid adieu,
A more sudden death you never knew,
As I was leading the old mare to drink,
She kicked and killed me quicker'n a wink."

An old Dutchman undertook to wallop his son, but Jake turned upon him and walloped him. The old man consoled himself for his defeat by rejoicing at his son's superior manhood. He said: "Vell, Jake ish a shmart fellow. He can vip his own taddy."

Marriageable young women are in great demand out West. A Yankee writing from that section to his father, says: "Suppose you get our girls some new teeth, and send them out."

Good manners—the art of making those people easy with whom we converse. Whoever makes the fewest persons uneasy is the best bred in the company.

A lady writes us a communication in which she says that most who are constantly regretting that women are not better educated for the discharge of household duties ought to reflect on their own shortcomings, and avers that not one man in ten can carve a turkey gracefully, and not one carving knife in a dozen is drawn a duke. She wants a carving school established. As this would be a place for "gander parties," we should suppose the gander would be the first victim to be given a thorough cut and look of fowl that may be supplied at short notice.

Flintarch speaks of the long white beard of an old Lacedæmonian, which only he who has put away childish sports, replied, "It is that having my white beard constantly before my eyes I may do nothing unworthy of its whiteness."

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, March 1, 1858.

The foreign trade of last year for the principal ports is as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Feb. 27, 1858	$8,111,474	$614,187
Corresponding week, 1857	8,859,025	1,637,305
Decrease	$3,093,551	$1,023,118

Money grows, if possible, easier and easier. Financier brokers are stimulated a bit per cent., and the Banks are much embarrassed to use their surplus. The Custom-House receipts have received yesterday $1,240,000, which, considering that the direct export of the week only slightly exceeded $600,000, will probably swell the aggregate in the Banks to thirty-three millions.

The effect of this upon trade is to a certainundation of specie there also. The Bank of England has reduced the rate of discount to 3 per cent., and the Bank of France and the Imperial Bank of Germany are said to be receiving specie during the month.

Trade has not yet begun to feel the effect of the ease in the money market. Stocks, which were depressed during the early part of the week, recovered on Saturday; the market closed very buoyant and animated. It is the opinion of the street that the bull movement in the securities and State stocks will rule much higher before the summer is over.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, March 1, 1858.

The Wholesale Produce Trade during the past week were less active for Breadstuffs, of which, however, the receipts were large, and prices lower. Cotton, though toward the middle of the week it ruled somewhat dull, was more sought after, and closed firmer. Groceries were steady, and the demand fair. Provisions were unchanged. Hops, Hides and Leather were moderately active in figures. ... Rains were active and dearer. ... Hides and Leather were moderately active in figures. ... Naval Stores were pretty inquiring for at former rates, though closing quietly, and the demand for Petroleum, Rosin, Rosin Oil, and Spirits of Turpentine was about former quotations. ... The demand for Dry Goods has been more regular, and most staple descriptions, both from country dealers, during the past week, and prices of most kinds of Staple Dry Goods have been fully maintained, while Cotton fabrics have favored factors. The week's import of Dry Goods amounts to $1,240,000, against $2,265,491 the corresponding week in 1857. The imports since January 1st, 1858, amount to $8,111,474, against $23,816,697 same time in 1857. ... The movement in Ocean freights has been quiet, and the charters during the week unremarkable. ... We append a revised list of the closing quotations for the week, as follows:

Ordinary to extra State Flour, per bbl. $4 20 @ $4 60
Superfine to fancy Western do. ... 4 65 @ 5 00
Extra Western Flour, per barrel ... 4 40 @ 5 00
Fancy to extra Genesee, per barrel ... 5 00 @ 5 50
Super to Extra Canadian, per barrel ... 4 30 @ 5 50
Mixed to Extra Southern, per barrel ... 4 30 @ 5 50
Fine to Superfine Rye Flour, per bbl. ... 3 60 @ 3 75
Corn Meal, per barrel ... 3 00 @ 3 25
White Wheat, per bushel ... 1 10 @ 1 47½
Red Wheat, per bushel ... 1 10 @ 1 40
New Crop Corn, per bushel ... 66 @ 71
Rye, per bushel ... 68 @ 70
Barley, per bushel ... 65 @ 70
Oats, per bushel ... 45 @ 46
Malt Corn, per bushel ... 65 @ 70
Jersey and Penn. Oats, per bushel ... 45 @ 46
Southern Oats, per bushel ... 40 @ 42
Cotton, middlings, per pound ... 12 @ 12
Mess Pork, per barrel ... 15 75 @ 16 00
Prime Pork, per barrel ... 12 00 @ 13 50
Prime Mess Beef, per barrel ... 10 00 @ 11 00
Country Prime Beef, per barrel ... 6 25 @ 8 00
Prime Mess Beef, per tierce ... 11 00 @ 13 00
Beef Hams, per barrel ... 18 00 @ 18 50
Lard, in bbls., per pound ... 9½ @ 10
Lard, per pound ... 9½ @ 9½
Western Butter, per pound ... 14 @ 17
Western Dairy, per pound ... 12 @ 14
Cheese, per pound ... 8½ @ 9
Rice, per 100 pounds ... 3 50 @ 4 50
Rio Coffee, per pound ... 11 @ 11½
Java, ditto, per pound ... 16 @ 17
Cuba Molasses, per gallon ... 29 @ 32
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon ... 32 @ 36
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon ... 37 @ 39
Syrup Teas, per pound ... 30 @ 50
Oolong Teas, per pound ... 28 @ 50
Hyson Teas, per pound ... 30 @ 50
Hay, per 100 pounds ... 65 @ 75
Hops, per pound ... 20 @ 25
Kentucky Tobacco, per pound ... 7 @ 10
Seed Leaf Tobacco, per pound ... 9 @ 15
American Flaxseed, per bushel ... 1 67 @ 1 67
American pulled Wool, per pound ... 20 @ 23
Dry Cod, Boneless, per cwt. ... 3 75 @ 4 00
Mass. Mackerel, No. 1, small, per barrel 10 25 @ 10 37½
" No. 2, ditto ... 8 00 @ 8 00
" No. 3, medium, " 6 00 @ 6 00
Dutch Bolsters, per box ... 3 00 @ 3 00
Crude Turpentine, per 280 pounds ... 3 75 @ 3 87½
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon ... 44 @ 44
Rosin, per 280 pounds ... 1 67½ @ 1 50

Freights were quite dependant, and closed very firm. For Liverpool, Cotton, 13-64. @ 3-16d. per pound; Flour, 2s. 6d. per barrel; Wheat, 10d. per bushel; Corn, 5½d. per bushel; Pork, 2s. 6d. per barrel, Beef, 2s. 6d. per barrel; Cheese, 50s. per ton. For Cork for orders, 2s. 6d. per barrel.

The other ports present no feature of importance. The vessels, of all classes, in port, are 1,000.

The Live Stock Markets last Wednesday were somewhat more firm for Beeves, but closed heavily at about the previous week's quotations. The supply was of a good average quality. The finer kinds are now most in demand as most of them are fed with a view especially to supplying the abstinence peculiar to Lent. ... Milch Cows have been receiving more attention of late, and Fine Cattle sell in fair supply and moderate request at unchanged figures. Sheep and Lambs were in moderate supply and fair demand, and prices rather inquiring for at former prices. ... Swine arrived, and supply acquired for at former prices. ... Veal quotations, but they close heavily. ... The receipts of cattle at Live Stock during each of the last weeks compare thus:

	Week ending Feb. 22.	Week ending Feb. 29.
Beeves	2,600	2,351
Milch Cows	141	150
Veal Calves	511	552
Sheep and Lambs	6,953	5,300

Of the Forty-fourth Street Market supply of Beeves last Wednesday there were received from

Ohio	775 Indiana	79
Kentucky	200 Pennsylvania	1,297
Illinois	404 Michigan	31

The prices of prime according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the leading Yards, for the past fortnight, were as follows:

Pure to premium Beeves, per pound ... $ 7½ @ $ 7½
Common to fair Beeves, per head ... 55 00 @ 60 00
Veal Calves, per pound ... 6 @ 6
Sheep and Lambs, per head ... 5 00 @ 6 00
" per pound ... 6 @ 6
Swine, per pound ... 6 @ 6
Dressed " ... 6½ @ 6½

The Country Produce Markets have been less freely supplied during the week with the leading articles, and have been in good demand at but little advance, prices have favored sellers.

PRICES CURRENT FOR COUNTRY PRODUCE AT WARD

Apples, per barrel	$2 00 @ 00
Apples, dried, per pound	3@ 5
Peaches, dried	12 @ 14
Plums, dried, per pound	15 @ 16
Cherries, dried, per pound	7 @ 8
Chestnuts, per bushel	1 00 @ 2 00
Walnuts, per bushel	1 00 @ 1 50
Cranberries, per barrel	10 00 @ 14 00
Potatoes, per barrel	2 00 @ 2 50
" per bushel	1 00 @ 1 50
Onions, per barrel	3 00 @ 3 50
" per bushel	1 50 @ 2 00
Turnips, per bushel	50 @ 00
Beets, per bushel	50 @ 00
Cabbages, per 100	3 00 @ 4 00
" per dozen	25 @ 00
Parsnips, per barrel	1 12 @ 1 25
Carrots, per bushel	50 @ 00
Leeks, per 100 bunches	4 00 @ 5 00
Celery, per bunch	6 @ 12
Garlic, per lb	8 @ 10
Eggs, fresh, per dozen	11 @ 12
Eggs, Fresh, per dozen	17 @ 17
Lambs, per carcass	4 00 @ 5 00
Guinea Fowl, per pair	50 @ 00
Ducks, per pound	10 @ 12
" per pair	75 @ 1 25
Geese, per pound	10 @ 12
" per pair	1 50 @ 2 00
Turkeys, per pound	12 @ 14
Prairie Hens, per pair	1 12 @ 1 50
Partridges, per pair	1 12 @ 1 50
Quail, per dozen	3 00 @ 3 50
Rabbits, per dozen	1 50 @ 2 00
Rabbits, each	12 @ 15
Hares, each	25 @ 31
Squirrels, each	6 @ 8
Venison, per pound	11 @ 12

ANOTHER GREAT TRAVEL BOOK.

UNIFORM WITH LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS.

ATKINSON'S SIBERIA.

ORIENTAL AND WESTERN SIBERIA: A Narrative of Seven Years' Explorations and Adventures in Siberia, Mongolia, the Kirghiz Steppes, Chinese Tartary, and part of Central Asia. By THOMAS WILLAM ATKINSON. With 50 Illustrations and Maps, and Portrait from Drawings by the Author. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00.

Mr. T. W. Atkinson, an artist of extraordinary merit, in addition to his profession, has ventured into regions which, probably, no European has seen, but has ever been a traveler. He has made travels through the Kirghiz Steppes, Chinese Tartary, the Mongolian Deserts, the Kirghiz Steppes, Chinese Tartary, and part of Central Asia, and recently has, for the space of seven years—during which he has turned to splendid account. It argues no slight courage for a man to have undertaken the task of giving to civilized Europe a transcript of what is at once the grandest and most wonderful in nature, in customs or remains, or difficult of access, and, in many instances, to the most of us, unknown. Mr. Atkinson may really feel grateful to Mr. ATKINSON for thus widely extending the knowledge of this hitherto unknown and interesting part of the globe.

Mr. Atkinson has evidently made by copious permission of the late Emperor of Russia, a long journey through hunting, sketching, and traveling in the plains and mountains of Siberia and West of Siberia, through the Kirghiz Steppes, Chinese Tartary, and Central Asia. Perhaps no land of wild sea ever before straddled into this enchanted land of history, or provided with the ballast and cargo of a general prosperity; and well has Mr. Atkinson availed himself of the privileges. Mr. Atkinson's narrative is full of interest, and his pages, proper of descriptions, where the hunter shakes the ground and the Tartar's tent is pitched, and the wandering Kirghiz tends his flocks—the Tartar cover is their fat hut, and the fate-stricken, fugitive Polish exile, who has fled from ruin, tyranny, and pain, because title to adventurous traveler, who has brought us records of places never, perhaps, before visited, save by an Englishman, nor heretofore—no Russian traveler has written of them. — London Athenæum.

To the geographer, the geologist, the ethnographer, the sportsman, and to those who read only for amusement, this will be an acceptable volume. Mr. Atkinson has had many and adventurous travels, both Oriental and as sporting writer.—London Literary Gazette.

Of the many books of Siberian travel, and Asiatic exploration also, that have appeared of late years, Mr. Atkinson's book is most readable. The geographer finds in it notes of ground heretofore unvisited—the ethnologist, geologist, and botanist find notes, and gossips, most of which they know the value—the sportsman's taste is gratified by chronicles of sport—the lover of adventure finds in it a long and varied panorama to hang over, and the lover of a fresh, good-humored way of speech will find the book a pleasant one in every page. Seven years of wandering, thirty-nine thousand two hundred miles of passing to and fro in the wilderness unknown country should yield a book worth reading, and they do.—London Examiner.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid to any part of the United States, on receipt of Three Dollars.

SEE ADVERTISEMENT elsewhere headed "STILL A CHANCE!"

HOW TO DO GOOD AND GET "PAID FOR IT."—Agents in every locality for the most popular Subscription Book ever published, where can be no possibility of loss. For particulars, address, J. E. POTTER & CO., Publishers, Philadelphia.

FOWLER AND WELLS, 308 Broadway, N. Y.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.—"As for genuine Sarsaparilla, I have used it in my apothecary, and recommending agent, it is unequaled; the only really valuable grandsire since from its combining, in a highly concentrated form, all the medicinal virtues of the best Sarsaparillas."

Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, No. 100 Fulton street, New York.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

STILL A CHANCE!—THE COSMOPOLITAN ART ASSOCIATION having purchased the Steel-plate and copyright of the Picture, "The Last Look," subscriptions will be received up to that date. For $3 they will give a superb steel engraving, entitled "The Last Look Daguerreotype," and also the Art Journal one year, a free ticket to the Gallery of Art, and a chance for a splendid premium. Agents wanted. For the celebrated GEM, the Art Journal, and several hundred magnificent Paintings, costing from $100 to $500. Send 25 cents in Post Stamps for a specimen of the beautiful ART JOURNAL, which contains full particulars. Address

C. L. DERBY, Actuary C. A. A.,
364 Broadway, New York.

INDISPENSABLE — NO CORRESPONDENT, no Young Gentleman or Lady, no Public Speaker, no Professional Man or Author should be without the following Books for Home Improvement—by Mail.

HOW TO WRITE; a Pocket Manual of Composition and Letter-Writing. Price, Paper, 30 cents.

HOW TO TALK; on Hints toward a Grammatical Use of Words and Sentences in Conversation. Price, 30 cents.

HOW TO BEHAVE; A Manual of Etiquette and Guide to Correct Personal Habits, with Rules for Debating Societies, Lectures, Public Meetings, &c. Price, 30 cents. Muslin, 50 cents.

HOW TO DO BUSINESS; A Guide to Success in Practical Life, and Hand-Book of Legal and Commercial Information. Price, 30 cents.

All 30 cent books for four works in one volume, in Muslin. Sent free by mail.

FOWLER AND WELLS, 308 Broadway, N. Y.

A NEW AND EXTENSIVE CATALOGUE of Books & Binding Twine of Canada, is now ready for distribution, and may be obtained on application to the Publishers, by letter (post paid), or by letter inclosing SIX CENTS in Postage Stamps.

It has attached to it a comprehensive table of contents, designed to form Libraries or enrich their literary collections, containing a selection of the best books which can be found to comprise a large proportion of the standard and most extensively useful works in the English language, COMPRISING MORE THAN TWO THOUSAND VOLUMES — and the Catalogue will be found to be worthy the attention of the book purchasers in England.

The Catalogue has been carefully amended with Colleges, Schools, &c., and every endeavor will be made to render it in forming the true estimate of every publication, as to its merits, and thereby to give every purchaser the benefit of a manual of reference.

The Catalogue is prefaced, it is suggested that, wherever books can not be obtained through any bookseller in the country, a remittance addressed to the Publishers, as deemed direct to the Publishers, which will be promptly attended to.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, New York.

SEE ADVERTISEMENT elsewhere headed "STILL A CHANCE!"

THE REAL FRANGIPANNI PERFUME is the favorite with the Nobility of the Courts of Europe, of London, and they take this opportunity to caution the unsuspecting against the many base imitations and counterfeits now offered, and to say degree the exquisite fragrance as made by E. & L.

Sole Agents for the United States, E. DUPUY, 6:0 Broadway, late Depot.

THE REVEALING COMPLAINT, INFLUENZA, is to almost every human. It can be soon cured by BRANDRETH'S PILLS. While the headache and fever continue they should be used daily, so as to produce full effects. When the fever is better use them every other day. Then should be used a course prescribed in forty-eight hours by adopting this course. And the greatest benefit will be found in the use of Pills, it contains full instructions. Principal office of Brandreth Pills, Brandreth House, 274 Hudson street, and 241 Broadway, corner of Read street, 155 Third Avenue, 66 Houston Street, corner of Sullivan, 106 Fulton street, 423 Myrtle Avenue, Brooklyn. Price 25 cents a box, with full directions.

DR. LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS.
100th THOUSAND.

A fresh Delivery of Dr. Livingstone's Africa is now ready, and the work may be obtained of the Booksellers generally throughout the United States and Canada; or,

LP HARPER & BROTHERS will send it by Mail, postpaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of Three Dollars.

MISSIONARY TRAVELS AND RESEARCHES IN SOUTH AFRICA; including Sketches of Sixteen Years' Residence in the Interior of Africa, and a Journey from the Cape of Good Hope to Loanda on the West Coast; thence across the Continent, down the River Zambesi to the Eastern Ocean. By DAVID LIVINGSTONE, LL.D., D.C.L. Two Maps by ARROWSMITH, a Portrait on Steel, and Numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00.

CAUTION!

Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS publish this spectacularly of continuing the Public against several spurious publications, and to direct attention to the Advertisement of a genuine as though emanation from Dr. Livingstone. They are authorized to say that the only Complete Narrative, then entirely, and wishes it to be generally known that the genuine is the only.

ONLY AUTHENTIC NARRATIVE OF HIS ADVENTURES AND TRAVELS IN AFRICA.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

SEE ADVERTISEMENT elsewhere headed "STILL A CHANCE!"

DUPUY'S NEW PERFUME FOR THE SEASON.

KISS-ME-QUICK.

Distilled from Flagellum Tejus.

E. DUPUY, Chemist, 449 Broadway.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1858, by Dupuy, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the U.S. for the Southern District of New York.

THE FIRST VOLUME
OF
HARPER'S WEEKLY,
Handsomely bound in Cloth and Half Morocco, may be had of the following Booksellers:

In New York.
A. WILLIAMS & CO.,
JOHN F. TROW & CO.,
FEDERIEN & CO.

In Philadelphia.
J. T. LIPPINCOTT.
W. R. ZIEBER.

In Pittsburgh.
HUNT & MINER.

In New Orleans.
J. C. MORGAN,
J. M. WILSON.
GEO. ELLIS.

In St. Louis.
JAMES R. YEOMAN,
E. K. WOODWARD.

In Cincinnati.
H. W. DERBY.

And of Booksellers generally throughout the United States and Canada.

FUN!!!

HARPER'S COMICALITIES.

Selected from Diamond by LEECH, DOYLE, ALFRED CROWQUILL,
CONTAINING
THREE HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS.

FIRST SERIES.
PRICE TWENTY-FIVE CENTS.

For Sale by all Booksellers and Periodical Dealers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

MR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL, "THE VIRGINIANS," will be commenced in the number for August, now considered in the DECEMBER Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. Early copies of the first chapters are received from the author in advance of publication in England—for which the publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE FIRST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER: $3 50 A YEAR.

BULWER'S BRILLIANT ROMANCE, entitled "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT," commenced in print by the masterpiece of this polished, witty, and learned author, is now in progress of publication with the Author, appears in HARPER'S WEEKLY simultaneously with its publication in England.

TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

One Copy for One Year $2 00
Two Copies for One Year 3 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) . 2 00
And an Extra Copy will be given to every Club of Five Subscribers.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Two Weeks $1 00
One Copy for One Year 3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Five Copies for One Year 6 00
Ten Copies for One Year 30 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year . . . 40 00
An Extra Copy will be given to every Club of Twenty-five Subscribers.

Volume I. of HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $2 50, is now ready.

Muslin Covers for binding Volumes, to suit with their Numbers bound, at Fifty Cents each. TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT. discount to Booksellers and Postmasters to whom the Trade.

"HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" will be supplied to one address for THREE DOLLARS a year.

Numbers from the commencement of both the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY can still be supplied. Specimen copies for distribution gratuitously. Clergymen and Teachers supplied at half price.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" must be paid at the office where they are received. When prepaid quarterly in advance, the Postage upon HARPER'S MAGAZINE is Twenty cents, and Twenty-five Cents a year on the WEEKLY.

Persons may commence taking the British Edition with, in addition to their Subscription, Thirty-six Cents on the Magazine, and Fifty-two Cents on the WEEKLY, for the American postage.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

RICH CLOTH COVERS
FOR
VOLUME I. OF HARPER'S WEEKLY
NOW READY.
PRICE FIFTY CENTS.

The Trade and Booksellers will be supplied at TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT. DISCOUNT.

EUROPEAN ACQUAINTANCE. Being Sketches of People in Europe. By J. W. DE FOREST. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

"Mr. De Forest has the rare tact and judgment to let the guide-books alone, and write only of what he actually saw and heard. Hence his unpretending volume affords the most life-like, animated, and charming pictures of European society."—N. Y. Com. Advertiser.

One of the most readable and interesting books of travel that we have received for many months.—Phila. Christian Observer.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid to any part of the United States, on receipt of Seventy-five Cents.

THE DISAPPOINTED ONE.

LOVER. "What a Bore! Just as I was going to Pop the Question to Jenny Jones, here's my Nurse come for me!"

Brutal and inhuman Conduct of BUGGINS, whose Mother-in-law insists on his taking her out to walk in Broadway every fine afternoon.

A WHOLESOME CONCLUSION.

LADY CHESOLINE. "Yes, Love—a very Pretty Church, but the Door is certainly very Narrow!"

HOOPS AT THE OPERA.

USHER. "No. 99, Sir? There it is: a Good Seat, too, Sir!"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

1858.—SPRING MANTILLAS.

Great inducements
To cash and short time buyers,
At wholesale.

The subscriber has now opened, and is manufacturing daily, a large and varied stock of the above goods, from the lowest priced to the most costly article, which he offers for sale on short credit, at

THE SMALLEST SHADE OF PROFIT.

Also, a line of imported skrifs sheets, differing from any in the market. GEO. BULPIN, 161 Broadway.

GIFTS! GIFTS! GIFTS! GIFTS! GIFTS!

D. EVANS & CO'S
ORIGINAL GIFT BOOK STORE,
417 BROADWAY, NEW YORK CITY.

Our Catalogue of Books embraces all the standard and recent publications of the day, consisting of HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, TALES OF FICTION, ADVENTURES, TALES, TRAVELS, VOYAGES, ALBUMS, ANNUALS, ILLUSTRATED BOOKS, besides an assortment of FAMILY, PRAYER, and POCKET BIBLES, in every style of binding.

☞ With every Book sold, the purchaser receives, at the time of sale, one of the following

LIST OF PRESENTS:

Gold Watches,	worth from $20 00 to	$100 00
Silver Watches,	" 12 00 "	40 00
Miniature Lockets,	" 2 50 "	12 00
Cameo, Gold Stone, & Mosaic Sets Fine Gilt Drops,	" 2 50 "	15 00
Florentine & Painted Pins	" 4 00 "	15 00
Gold Brooch and Ladies' Neck Guard and Chatelaines,	" 10 00 "	50 00
Gents' Vest & Fob Chains,	" 10 00 "	50 00
Gold, Cameo, and Painted Sleeve-Buttons & Studs,	" 2 50 "	12 00
Gold Pencils and Pens,	" 2 50 "	12 00
Silk Dress Patterns,	" 12 00 "	30 00

Besides a large assortment of Rings, Coral Pins, Gold Tooth Picks, Gold Thimbles, Opera Glasses, Match Boxes, Watch Keys, etc., etc., for particulars of which see OUR NEW AND DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE, with inducements to Agents, which will be mailed FREE to any Address. No Partiality. Every Book receives a Present. Agents wanted in all parts of the United States, to whom liberal commissions will be given. Persons ordering Books from the Country will have the same chance as if they were in our store themselves. Gifts in all cases will accompany the Books, with a written certificate to the person sending us the order.

COUNTRY ORDERS SOLICITED.
SEND FOR A CATALOGUE.
ADDRESS
D. EVANS & CO.,
417 BROADWAY,
New York City.

SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE. The Sad Fortunes of the Rev. Amos Barton.—Mr. Gilfil's Love-Story.—Janet's Repentance. By GEORGE ELIOT. (Originally published in Blackwood's Magazine.) 8vo, Paper, 50 cts.

These quiet and original sketches, in the delicate insight into character displayed, the tender and subtle pathos of the story, have already acquired for Mr. Eliot a considerable, and not a common reputation.—Leader (London).

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid to any part of the United States, on receipt of 50 cts.

D. W. EVANS, }
J. H. FRESTON, } New York City.

WHEELER & WILSON M'F'G CO'S
SEWING MACHINES,
OFFICE 343 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
Agencies throughout the Union.

Send for a Circular.

PHONOGRAPHY; or, PHONETIC SHORTHAND. For Alphabet, Specimen Pages of the Phonographic Magazine for 1858, and List of Works, direct to ISAAC PITMAN, Cincinnati, O.

GROVER & BAKER'S
CELEBRATED
FAMILY SEWING MACHINES,
495 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
18 SUMMER STREET, BOSTON,
730 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

☞ These Machines are justly admitted to be the best in the market for family sewing.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES. For all manufacturing purposes HINDER'S SEWING MACHINE is the most valuable. The public have long known the merits of SINGER'S FAMILY SEWING MACHINE in the Manufacture of Garments, and being stronged with the knowledge of the defects of other machines for similar purposes, has avoided or remedied them all. It is the Most Genuine Sewing Machine ever made, and the cheapest to operate. Long one of those machines is an elegant amusement. Price $100, with iron table complete.
I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway, New York.

$150 WILL PAY FOR BOARD AND TUITION in the FLUSHING FEMALE COLLEGE, one year. Address Mrs. WILLIAM H. GILDER, A.M., President, at Flushing, Long Island.

MYSTIC HALL SEMINARY for Young Ladies, 5 miles from Boston. A Catalogue may be obtained of the Principal,
Mrs. T. F. SMITH, Box, Boston, Mass.

POSTAGE STAMPS FOR SALE, IN ANY QUANTITY, AT HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE

VOL. I. OF HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in CLOTH EXTRA, Ready. Price $3 50.

N.B. This Volume can not be sent by Mail on account of its weight. It will be sent by Express, if so desired, freight to be paid by the Purchaser.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. II.—No. 63.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 13, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

CONTENTS.

I. FRENCH COURT FASHIONS, WITH AN ILLUSTRATION.
II. EDITORIALS.
III. THE LOUNGER.
IV. TRAVEL. NOTES IN DISTANT LANDS, WITH TWO FINE ILLUSTRATIONS.
V. THE APPROACH TO CANTON, WITH A PORTRAIT OF YEH AND A MAP.
VI. LITERARY.
VII. DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.
VIII. FOREIGN NEWS.
IX. SCENES AT THE WHITE HOUSE, WITH TWO SPLENDID ILLUSTRATIONS.
X. TEA-PARTY POLITICS.
XI. DELWYN'S STORY. "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?"—Continued.
XII. THE TEXT.
XIII. THE STORY OF AN OLD MAID'S LIFE.
XIV. THE LATE COMPOUND PRIZE, WITH PORTRAIT.
XV. THE DEVENUE CUTTER "HARRIET LANE," WITH A FINE ILLUSTRATION.
XVI. MISCELLANY.
XVII. THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.
XVIII. MARKET AND FINANCIAL REPORTS.
XIX. CONSOLIDATED.

FRENCH COURT FASHIONS.

THE picture given below represents two grand ladies of the Court of France in the costume which they are now obliged to wear on great occasions. The most prominent figure, it will be noticed, wears a court train.

So far as can be ascertained with certainty, the train or cloak came into fashion as an article of court dress after the hoop, some hundred and fifty years ago. The hooped skirt was considered so becoming that the ladies were quite willing to adventure further novelties in the same direction; and accordingly the skirt was made much longer behind than in front, and dragged for some length on the floor. The satirists of the day, who had broken many a lance with the hoops, naturally fell foul of trains. One of them says (A.D. 1761): "A lady's quality and fashion are now reckoned not by the circumference of her hoop, but by the length of her tail." Some of the "tails," he adds, should be carried in a wheel-barrow. It is not stated that any lady adopted this benevolent suggestion, and was followed by a wheel-barrow into the royal presence; but the length of fashionable trains and the weight of their material soon became an insupportable burden, and pages were employed to carry them. We have all seen pictures of noble ladies followed by one or two pages bearing the hinder portion of their skirts. In muddy weather, the fashion might be beneficially adopted in our New York streets.

Under the first French empire the train was brought into fashion, together with other usages of the old monarchical court. Napoleon's court was famous for its trains and for the expense which they involved. His nephew, who copies him wherever it can safely be done, has resuscitated the fashion, and trains once more sweep the floors of the reception-rooms at the Tuileries.

They are no longer, however, mere appendages to the skirt. They form part of a mantle which hangs from the shoulders, and does not interfere with the rest of the dress. They are of different material from the bodice and skirt proper, and in contrast with them. The lady whose dress is depictured below wore, at the last reception at the Tuileries, a mantle or train of light blue velvet, with a border of pearls and white feathers. Her skirt was white moire antique, with a colour of the finest point d'Alençon; the body of the dress and the sleeves were of blue velvet, like the train, trimmed with tiny pearls and feathers. Her head-dress was a diadem of fine pearls and turquoises, with what a rather small coal ornaments of lace. The lateral chief was of the finest lace, and the fan a chef d'œuvre of workmanship—seemingly a frame of light lace and white plumes.

COSTUMES OF THE COURT OF THE EMPEROR OF THE FRENCH.

Another lady on the same occasion wore a train of satin antique, green and gold; it was trimmed with "bouillonné" of white satin gathered together with green and gold silk. The skirt was white tulle illusion with gold "stars;" and the berthe was likewise white and gold. This lady, who is the wife of a Russian ambassador, wore a splendid set of diamonds.

A third, a very young lady, the Countess of ——, wore a train of crimson satin, wholly covered with the richest lace, and trimmed with a garland of fleurs de grenade. Her dress was white tulle, with lace volants; she wore no jewels but rubies.

From these few details none idea may be formed of the magnificent show which the French Imperial Court must make. At the reception of which we have been speaking there were no less than three hundred ladies present, all in trains.

The expense of these gorgeous toilets is, of course, enormous. From facts elicited in the course of a recent lawsuit at Paris, it would appear that a lady who goes to the Imperial Court can hardly dress herself on less than twenty thousand dollars a year, and this presumes a stock of jewels already on hand. At a recent ball at the Tuileries the wife of a prominent banker wore $140,000 of jewels; and her husband's costume, including lace, dirk, etc., not little short of $175,000. The interest of the money spent on her dress would have exceeded $10,000 a year. When the French Court goes to the country we are informed that each lady is expected to appear in three toilets each day, and that never during her stay at Court is she to wear the same dress twice. It is a proof of fortune to be dun. The greater the extravagance of the Court, the more the work for the mechanic; if the workers can not pay their bills, so much the worse for them. To encourage sumptuous living and extravagance is, indeed, Louis Napoleon's avowed purpose. He recently appointed one of the most learned men of France to be senator. On his calling at the Tuileries a few days afterward, the Emperor noticed from the window that he had actually walked to the palace.

"Mon cher," said he, "where is your carriage?"

"Your Majesty's eye assures that I am poor; I can not afford to keep a carriage."

"Then you had better make money and keep one. If you can not keep a carriage, I fear that you will find the Senate too expensive for you."

The honest man instantly tendered his resignation, which was duly accepted.

Not much pleasure since, the darling aim of a countryman of ours—the object on which his hopes had been set up for years—was realized. He was presented at the French Court. His wife had been as ardent as he; and now that their wishes were to be gratified, she, artistically resolved to be present the ladies of the United States in a manner worthy of them. The diet of some days together she obtained some inkling of the costume to be worn by the leading belles of the Court. With the aid of the most experienced dressmaker of Paris she composed a toilet more brilliant and dazzling than ever. How many poor women were worked to death on it, and what it cost, no one knows; but it is generally understood that the lady's husband spent for that ball so much money that, from being a wealthy man, he has now a bare maintenance, and has been obliged to quit the city. His wife carried her point, however; all accounts concur in stating that she was the best-dressed woman at the palace.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 13, 1858.

OUGHT THE UNITED STATES TO INTERVENE IN KANSAS?

EX-PRESIDENT COMONFORT, whose portrait we gave in a late number of this journal, has arrived at Washington, and is freely discussing with his friends in that country the events which have led to his temporary exile from Mexico. The flagrant injustice of which he opinions are committing, both to their own countrymen and to foreigners, has supplied him already with an attractive and sympathetic audience. And many are inquiring already whether we can not do something more than merely look on and wonder?

The doctrine of non-intervention, which has only formed part of European political systems within the past quarter of a century, is now recognized by the United States from the origin of the confederacy. There never has been a party in this country that has claimed that we had a right to interfere in the local affairs of our neighbors, or even to pronounce opinions upon the policy they choose to pursue in the administration of their public business. Despotism in Cuba, negro democracy in Hayti, emancipation in Jamaica, have never been classed among the subjects which fell within the scope of our official utterance. It has been the policy of the United States to recognize whatever de facto governments were established in the various states of this continent, and to hold no further intercourse with any of them than our own immediate interests required.

At the same time, it can not be disguised that we can, and ought, as the leading power in the Western World, to exercise a commanding influence, by the force of our example and public sentiment, over the affairs of all the states of the continent of America. For more than a quarter of a century we have held that no European government should be suffered to colonize or acquire new territory in America, simply because a wise foresight warned us against the danger of permitting that influence, or risking the commanding position which accident had conferred upon us. The question now arises—is this a crisis which calls for a display of our influence? and, how should that influence be exerted?

It seems to be pretty well understood that President Comonfort was overthrown by the clergy of Mexico. He, in common with his predecessors, had tried to govern independently of the Church. Finding that impossible, from the ancient and powerful wealth of the Church, he pursued the next best course; he undertook to reduce the clergy to submission by the confiscation of their revenues. Here he was met by ecclesiastical intrigue, fomenting sedition, and hiring conspirators; and is himself compelled to succumb. Religion is to have headed his adversaries wherever they have made successful demonstrations. The first movements for the counter-revolution were supplied by a loan of a million of dollars from the revenues of the Church. The non-compliance of the population to us are, increased insecurity of life and property in Mexico; the suspension, for a time, of all negotiations and projects for an interoceanic route across that country; the re-establishment, on our borders, of anarchy, confusion, and civil war.

We have a direct, tangible interest in the establishment of stable government in Mexico. So long as revolutions succeed each other in that country our commercial relations with the Mexicans must be unduly depressed, the money which the citizens of the United States have invested there in various enterprises must be jeopardized, and an unwholesome example of rebellion and anarchy must be set to our Southern people. We are, moreover, deprived, by these political disturbances, of the use of the shortest interoceanic route to California.

Clearly, therefore, this is an occasion on which a plain duty confronts us. If the United States on the side of peace and order would be beneficial to ourselves as well as helpful to Mexico. How could we do it? Not by the sending of a crusading army of volunteers to restore Comonfort seems to have met with but little favor. Is the executive without power to take a move in the matter? Have we no rights which Mr. Forsyth might be directed to enforce? Are the British and Spanish the only powers which can dictate to Mexico?

THE DEFEAT OF THE BRITISH MINISTRY.

On 19th ult. Lord Palmerston's bill asserted by the Opposition in the British Parliament on an incidental question growing out of the recent demand of the French government for the extradition in the law of England on the subject of murder. The actual point raised, and, for the moment of that, Lord Palmerston's bill itself, were practically of but little consequence, and had but slight connection with it. The Queen, the Lords of the House of Commons was, that the Emperor of the French was attempting to dictate to Parliament, and the Ministry were not submitting to his dictation. His Imperial Majesty will learn from the vote that there is still one country in Europe which he can not subject to his despotism.

The event does honor to the English. It proves that, clearly as they are afraid of the French, and much as they must value peace, they are still more closely allied with manhood, and they value their independence more. It proves that the time has not yet come when the United States shall be the only country in the world where England can find a friend in a sailor. It administers to the Emperor a wholesome rebuke for the unserious and flippant way in which he has lately been guilty, and for the discretion with which he has suffered the officers of his marine to act.

It is likely that the vote may be followed by some talk of hostilities, or at least of angry feelings between the two countries. There is no apprehension of serious trouble need be entertained. The Emperor of the French knows well that a struggle with Great Britain would be as fatal to him as it was to his uncle; that he could not avert a revolution for thirty days after a declaration of war against England; and that, whatever the upshot of such a war might be, so far as national interests were concerned, it is impossible that it would be followed by security. Whatever vaporing among the noisy placemen or the ambitious soldiery of the empire may follow the unexpected defeat of the vote in Parliament, it may be taken for granted that reflection will convince the Emperor of the wisdom of accepting the rebuff with becoming placidity and resignation. The arrest of Bernard, and the reward offered for the stock-broker Allsop, are very fair evidence of the sincerity of the English professions of regard for his government; he will content himself with them, and the Moniteur will probably not hear of the vote of the 19th February.

There is another point of view in which that vote deserves to be regarded. Though the actual question at issue involved none of the party doctrines which divide British politicians, it will be noticed that the leaders of the opposition to the Ministry were the chiefs of the Radical party—Sir Bulwer Lytton, Kinglake, etc. This is the second occasion within twelve months on which the Radicals have defeated the Government. They seem to have gained power since they broke down Lord Palmerston's former administration on the Chinese question. They can now carry, it seems, upon a workday majority in Parliament. Under the circumstances, it would be only natural for them to expect and to claim, in return for the proper fruits of their success—the resignation of Lord Palmerston, and the installation of a Radical cabinet in his place.

England has never been governed by Radicals. The Radical theory, indeed, is as thoroughly republican, that a government of Radicals would be almost tantamount to a constructive abolition of the existing monarchy. A Radical government would, at least, endeavor to establish universal suffrage, vote by ballot, biennial parliaments, and other democratic institutions. How the aristocratic system of England would stand such enormities, remains to be seen.

THE NEW BANKRUPT LAW.

SENATOR TOOMBS, from the Judiciary Committee in Congress, is about to report a bill to carry out the President's suggestion for a general compulsory bankrupt law. Under such a law the unsolicited creditor of an individual or a corporation would be enabled to force his debtor into bankruptcy and call for a sale of his property. Mr. Buchanan only suggested such a law for the case of railway and banking corporations; but the latitude seem to think that individuals ought not to be exempted from its scope.

It is not likely that Congress will adopt any such law. The general tenor of our legislation with regard to debt may be described as favoring the debtor rather than the creditor, especially, but few laws for the collection of debts. A case can hardly be imagined in which a hundred debtors may not, if he chooses, defraud his creditor. A man may incur any amount of debt, may live in Fifth Avenue in the very best style, and may set his creditors utterly at defiance. It is so well understood that a recourse to law for the collection of debts is uncertain and unreliable that many of our shrewdest men of business make a rule rather to submit to loss than engage in litigation.

The principle which underlies this apparent failure of the law is very simple. It is that, while the security of the law of debt is to be calculated to suggest caution and prudence in the extension of credit, the license granted to debtors is likely to lead to reckless trade. It is nicely agreed that those who choose to trust their neighbors must rely on their honor and self-interest for protection. And, as a general rule, the plan must be admitted to work well.

Nor is it easy to perceive any remarkable gain in the law of bankruptcy law for for corporations. What benefit the country would derive from breaking banks or railways one is at a loss to imagine. No one is obliged to trust these concerns. When they are in danger of insolvency the public are not left in ignorance of the fact. It is notorious that they can not obtain money at any thing like the price at which it is within the reach of individuals. Those who lend to them do so with a full knowledge of the risk, and charge accordingly. Why should the law interfere to their protection? And, indeed, in should we be gainers if all our banks to-day were in the hands of receivers, as they would have been if the banking Act had been strictly carried out in October last?

A HIGHER LAW.

By the written law of this State it is murder to shoot a man; but in fact one may shoot one's neighbor under certain circumstances without incurring any penalty. Last week a father and son were indicted for shooting (it was understood) which of the two fired the shot) an individual who had seduced the daughter of the one and the sister of the other; the jury found a verdict of guilty of assault only, and the judge suspended judgment.

This is strictly in accordance with the old testament of our New England law. The old common law justified the homicide of the adulterer by the injured husband, if the parties were detected in the act of criminality. Modern enactment has assigned the license of husbands and fathers. It is perfectly well settled that any man that the seducer of an innocent girl or the paramour of a wife may be shot by the relatives of the one or the other. Grand juries will seldom find bills against the avengers of female wrongs; and petty juries will invariably contrive to screen them, if arraigned, from the consequences of the act.

In a certain point of view it is to be regretted that so fearful a power should be granted to angry men. The theory of civilized society is that the law monopolizes the duty of vengeance, and that no man shall take the law into his own hands.

But the uncertainties of the law, and its glaring maladministration in these latter days, have tended to discredit this ancient principle. In this State, for example, the man who trusts to the avenging arm of the law is very likely to be disappointed. Therefore it is that, without any legislative action and without any general expression of opinion, public sentiment has quietly settled the point that seduction will justify homicide by the best friend of the party seduced.

If the fact is to be regretted in one point of view, in any other it has its advantages. No one has lived in any of our large cities but without remarking the dangers to which a large portion of the female population are exposed. There is no country in the world where the rules of society expose young girls to so much risk as in this enormous city. What is to be understood by our gay young men that they can not give the rein to their passions save at the risk of their lives, female honor can not fail to be safer.

THE STOCK-JOBBING EXCITEMENT.

THERE is a movement at Albany to bring some laws to bear on the prevailing excitement in stocks in Wall Street. Our Legislature must be in a bad way if it can find no better use than this to make of the few remaining days of its corporate existence. More laws against stock-jobbing would merely add to the long list of dead-letter statutes without doing any good to any body.

There are certain practices and propensities which may be regulated but which can not be repressed altogether. One of these is stock-jobbing. When men money can not be had in any quantity at over five per cent., and stocks paying six, and eight, and ten per cent. dividend can be bought under par—as they are at the present time in New York—you might just as well attempt to legislate people out of eating or drinking as try to prevent capitalists from using their money in the purchase of stocks. It is gambling, no doubt; in one sense; just as time, purchases of breadstuffs, cotton, sugar, and dry goods are gambling; but all the laws in the world will not prevent men from buying stocks. the Legislature spends in discussing the subject a time lost.

There is, perhaps, one sensible change which might be made in the law. Once or twice in almost every year, the abundance of money and the temporary dullness of trade throw such men into the stock market, and a stock-jobbing excitement is created. On these occasions an average of from 20,000 shares per week of sock, representing a money value of say $1,000,000 to $1,500,600 changes hands, or is supposed to change hands, every day. Now in ordinary times, the aggregate daily contracts will amount to one-half these sums. There is no reason why a hundred times this should be laid on these operations. As it is, this stock-jobbing business is almost the only trade which does not pay its share to the support of the State government. Abroad, stock-jobbing yields a handsome revenue to the government under which it exists; why should it not be made to do so here?

REOPENING OF THE SLAVE-TRADE.

IT seems that while the eyes of Northern politicians have been steadily fixed on Kansas the practical men of the South have been quietly increasing their stock of negroes by vigorous importations from Africa. At least such is the statement of the New Orleans Delta, which journal avers that the plantations of Mississippi and other southern sea-board States are plentifully supplied with negroes from that source. The story derives a plausibility from the bill which has just passed the Assembly of Louisiana for the importation of free negroes from Africa, and from the agitation which has existed for two or three years in South Carolina, Tennessee, and one or two other Southern States, in favor of the reopening of the slave-trade. It is a pity that some one does not urge some intelligent mem to write, while the difficulties which now impede the acquisition of labor by the South could be overcome. All admit, and the steady increase in the value of negroes proves, that the great want of the South is labor. If in the North our supply of foreign labor were suddenly cut off, the country would receive a shock in comparison with which the late revulsion would seem utterly insignificant. Yet the natural increase of our laboring population is greater than that of the negroes.

THE LOUNGER.

LENT.

"Is this a fast to keep The larder clean?"

asked the Reverend Robert Herrick, whose works, both dirty and divine, are not unfamiliar to many readers. The reverend gentleman lends off in a lyric of delightful defiance, as if he were himself the willing victim of an eternal Lent, and carnal morsels had lost all relish for him. Let us hope they had, and that his fare belied him, or that his portrait belied his face. English literature owed him some of its loveliest verses.

It is fortunate he did not live a couple of centories or so later, for to what use would he have put his censure now? Let, at least, the dead rest in peace, and however Herrick may have found it in the England of his day, has set in with great rigor. Balls are now limited to one hundred and fifty invitations, three pieces of music, and a general understanding that people are to go away as soon after supper as practicable. Nor is this, by any means all. They are not called balls, but a "fete d'etude," or "pas de evening," or some other equally Lenten term. Besides these observances there are already speculations about the next season, and the future of flounces—that ever-interesting question to the fair.

The Opera, too, lends its solemnity to the season. The lugubrious La Grange and pensive Formes continue to deepen the blackness of Meyerbeer's sad, gray toilet, to the scene. The other evening an instance of profound and pathetic sympathy and devotion was witnessed. A young gentleman who, having, in common with many of the race at the North, nothing to say, undertook to say it in the face of his neighbor audibly, during one of the sweetest cavatinas of the prima donna. And a dull gentleman sitting near, who was truly fond of music and was extremely annoyed by the talk, turned suddenly upon the buzzing youth and said, with pathos, "Sir, if you can't drink, it is any reason you should dirty the water in this manner!" and he did.

It was a very Lenten moment for the youth, who, after a moment's confusion, surveyed his elderly neighbor through his lorgnette. But the accident that he was wondering why any body who wished to hear music should come to the Opera. But although he was a downy-chinned "man of the world," and smiled with a tolerably successful contempt upon the old gentleman, he felt that for the time until his check was scarlet.

Besides the Opera and the musical balls, fish on Fridays with egg sauce, previous to the mutton, is another marked characteristic in the observance of Lent. It is, moreover, the time for oysters, to be followed by Champagne and a cigar at proper intervals.

In truth, the reality of the fast, the sincere contrition with which the city is walking in sackcloth and sitting in ashes for the pitiful, pitiful self-abasement with which we all go about our business, or idleness, and fold our hands, and sigh, as Nelly Lancer writes to say that she is out every day at church by half past eight, and confessing that she does not fully go to sleep in "service" during the evening," until three o'clock on the morning, the Lounger can readily believe in the universal repentance. But it is not so much of a penance, perhaps, to her revered uncle, who, reading home from the fish mart, and asking in a kind of despair, after dinner, "My dear, are we going any where to-night?" hears from his wife, "Why, no, my love, not every night in the week. Last night we were at Mrs. Bobs, and to-morrow Mr. Bobs, you know; and we have our religious duties, for it's Lent, you know. "Is it?" replies the revered uncle, as he opens his bulk before the newspaper, and leans back with a sigh of satisfaction, "Thank Goly, it's Lent!"

IN REPLY TO KATE'S BASKET OF FLOWERS.

BY WILLIS.

Wonder to one's thoughts resemblance bear
Of shadows to the silvery clouds,
Which only in the moonbeam-day
When sailing through the vault of air.

But clouds dissolve, in shadows hues,
In dew descending from the skies,
To moisten with its purity tears
The plants and fragrant lips of flowers.

Not in the jewel wealth of mines,
Nor wealth of the silver flight of stairs—
In simplest things the tender thought
Its simplest, fitting emblem finds.

Bless, then, the soft, mysterious power,
Breathing in blossoms words of love;
That fragrant in its nothold,
But blooms a fragrant milk-white flower!

GRATIFYING INTELLIGENCE.

It is a matter of great satisfaction to the Lounger, as it will be to every patriotic person, (if any reader derives) of well-regulated mind, to know that the eminent banker, Solomon Gumpwright, having cleared a million hundred and fifty thousand dollars by a fortunate operation at the Stock Exchange, cherishes the intention of retiring from business at once, upon the remembrance of a well-spent life, and has accepted the honorary Presidency of the Gilmanton Anti-Gaming Society. It is an interesting fact that his contribution of five dollars to the funds of the Society was from the first payment in the operation above mentioned.

As a matter of private interest, also, to all who know Gumpwright—for it is a shining example to all patriots—the Lounger is permitted to state that Mr. Gumpwright has forbidden his wife to visit Saratoga—and—Broadway, known as gaming-houses, under penalty of his severe displeasure. It is therefore gratifying to know that, despite his remarkable pecuniary success, Mr. Gumpwright still regards the claims of religion; and every day, to the expiration of the hour at the Stock Exchange, leaves his business relations entirely behind, and hastens to offer a prayer in some one of the churches in his daily open.

The value of such an example can not be overestimated. It is computed that he was already worth half a million. Such facts make us proud of our common nature.

"A NEGLECTED AUTHOR" UPON WOMAN.

A CORRESPONDENT, as above, writes to the Lounger that he constantly observes "silly complexions" in this department of the Weekly, and therefore concludes that the Lounger is just the man for his purposes, and so sends him an article. The correspondent observes that he does not regard his own efforts as "silly," but publishes probably do, for he can never get them printed; adding that when he receives the rejected manuscript back again, "I read Addison and Goldsmith, and then my own effusions, and instantly and dispassionately decide that mine are the best." He is pleased to say that he "considers" the Lounger's articles as good as his own; and insists upon seeing either his letter or his "production" in print.

Nobody will object to it, if it does not annoy the writer nor wisdom. People like to see human nature under all aspects.

People shall be satisfied, then, for once, and see what it is that publishers will not print.

Vast Audito, whoever fails.

ON WOMAN.

"I recollect to have seen, in some slang dictionary, the definition of woman as 'a nuisance.' I don't think it the best definition that can be given. The artist-lover is apt to call her a divinity, and the sentimental blessing that has survived the fall; if you tell him that, in the same manner as the earth, alone that enlarging brings forth only briars and thistles, without the labor of man, so the human nature, without woman, only evil seeds, he will tell you of his flowers, away in the forest where the foot of man never trod; of the disinterested fruits of the Torrid zone, that are brought to maturity by a grateful apple-bough—but he forgets that, after all the care of man can not make to grow in the Temperate zone and delicious fruit, without the aid of the sunbeam later.

"So the favored lover will talk, while the jilted suitor declares that since Eve was tempted by Satan and Adam by Eve, the curse upon womankind is that it is the instrument of his wooers, which he avers to be the ruination of the depravity that has always obtained in the world. And then what a misanthrope a woman is, according to him. I agree with the first, that woman may sometimes prove a curse. It is true that she is sometimes the cause of a junction—often a line for a love—when a pretty woman is the opposite of it. On the other hand, she seems to inherit something of the nature of the serpent, whose deceitful coils and sliding, hissing tongue, have been cated to avoid.

"It has frequently been denied that a woman has a heart, but it is probable that as it is generally some cruel and barbarous act that is charged upon her, these advocates opinion more from the fact that he has been all his life a lifeless in search of a sympathetic feeling, than any thing else. We have no right to consider ourselves a soul and woman a machine. The human soul and is a connection wherever we are pleased to cause signs to be given; but we have no right to demand to be, nor moved by some mysterious and inscrutable wind to make that assurance of some human heart to be received not upon these unfeeling favor. A peculiar quaintness, chilling sensation is produced in the mind of the subject of youth when the pretty lips that have just been wreathed up to a bewitching smile utter some cruel jest as an expression, and the child that he has just been pressing waves his departure. The poor fellow certainly deserves some pity; but he is not to be compared with the revolving the commonplace levels of life at one bound by the aid of a single effort.

"A good-humored friend of mine, who had often been jilted, used to compare woman to a bird, which is all bright and sparkling, and did it not burn when we thrust our fingers in it? Woman is compared to a flower also, but they might be bound and thrown in to their advantage. A thoughtful author has compared woman to the sea. To my friend, but many will confess a wife frequently makes her home too much so. I do not think woman is to blame the sentiment that 'a good wife is the best gift of God;' and I would sincerely advise all who have not found her, to forbear her great value from her rarity. It has never been so great as now, and it is the part of every man to seek and realize this sparkling glass of Champagne, a wife, the ultimate object of existence, and the only effectual strength of mind to resist the temptation.

"I have always had a very high spirit of prophecy, that must have inspired the first man, when his mate stood before him in all her loveliness, and said to her, 'I am Adam.' She replied, 'I am a vo to man—the fine of his Paradisical day. Such was the first woman; and what is she now? A thing of nothing, that is all she can be to a man who is capable of appreciating her. She has been called an angel without wings. I say that she is a woman without angel's wings that are ever ready to help a man fly into a position. I have known her to be every thing in all its aspects, and she is indeed a 'mystery,' yes, an unsolvable creation. I have known her to be a creature as long as earth but is of some benefit; but she is 'evil, and that continually.' The most pitiable situation imaginable for which I can come is, that she is a man-trap set by the devil in the most unfrequented middle. It is a device worthy of the Prince of Darkness himself; the bait is so tempting, and the fall so sudden, that very few get in are as likely to kill themselves of despair as those who are caught, from the unspeakable nature of their misfortune.

"The following is the history of the foregoing Essay: I obtained it from a lady friend of mine, a woman who informed me that it was the production of a very quiet young man, who lived in the country, was very eyed, and extremely nervous lady, bounded with him a short time, and then suddenly disappeared. He was described by a terrible square in the quiet gentleman's and nervous lady's room, and found the noise was caused by the lady, who was giving her husband a terrible caudgeling. The husband was a quiet man, and took his cane, and was then with one hand hold of his men and the other in his pocket, and was sneering, and tearing like two mad bears, like a very fury. Our host attempted to interfere, but was instantly knocked down and was severely hurt for the two belligerents. When he recovered his consciousness, the husband and wife had taken from hold of them; but their skeleton was still shaking his; every bone in his body was sore, and he was in bed for a week he sufficiently spotted to be buried. Soon after this he came upon several poems of mine, and wrote me that he could never be made to acknowledge any other cause for his misfortune than a woman's rage. He concluded that she was shaking her husband's bones in the other world. I have written to him this terrible fray that made his mind was the preceding Essay, which was found on the table, weighed and torn by the lady before she had turned to finish her rage upon its unfortunate author. My wife remarks that it served him right."

JESTICS.

SOMEBODY in Allegheny, Pennsylvania, writes to know something about the author of "Festus".

Mr. Philip James Bailey—saying, "I am an admirer of the poetry in 'Festus,' the irreverent bombast and the attempted profundities of portions of that remarkable production can not be called poetry."

Well, there are poems and poems. Parts of "Festus" seem irreverent and shallow to the Lounger's correspondent; while to the Lounger they seem the shallowest kind of Lilliputienne poem in the language is Mr. Robert Pollok's "Course of Time;" a poem generally held in fair repute, and not forbidden to youth. The truth is, that it is such as finding a letter "Festus" and exited "The Course of Time," which is a very favorite fashion, as it is to denounce "Tom Jones" and devour "Paul Clifford."

There is very little to say personally about the author of "Festus." His name is Philip James Bailey, son of the proprietor of the Nottingham Mercury, in England, and he was born in 1816. In 1839 he published "Festus," and some years afterward "The Angel World;" and in 1853, "The Mystic," which was the last.

"Who holds not life more fearful than the hours
Since first into this world he wept his way, Knows not life."

and continues even "more so," as the jeerer saith. Mr. Bailey is, no doubt, but never practiced, and now receives a pension of £50 a year from the English Government.

THE HOGENS.

THE Lounger's affection for a genus that large class of his fellow-citizens, the Hogs, to a sense of decency, are rewarded by the smiles of the Muses. Let us not accuse them of well-doing. Let us continue to make a great effort to extort a "Thank you!" out of the female mouth when a seat is not rendered, and to shame the male who occupies two seats when he has paid for but one, and while others go passengers are standing, scathes, in the aisles. So long, therefore, as any are scathes,

"Once more we sing of Hogens, once more!"

A delicate hand sends us a poem to help on the happy day.

THE HOGENS.

We reach another station,
The car is full of men,
When lo! a lady enters
About as big as ten.

Without a seat whatever
We rise upon our feet,
And each politely proffers
To give her up his seat.

But with majestic motion,
As if Cleopatra's barge
She sinks upon my cushion
Without a "Thank you, sir!"

Now, "by the great Eternal!"
If it should ever hap
That I must seat another,
I'll hold her in my lap!

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—MR. RICHARD TUCK GRAY writes from Pearl Street that he can not quite sure whether he should say Mr. or Mrs Lounger, "so soft as you seem to be," and compliments the writer on his skill as a letter to beg. He begs them to stay away.

"I am bored to death with these charity-mongers. One woman I will not name, but she is the wife of a prominent business out of her husband's drawing-room and carriage (I keep my carriage) that the least he comes to me say another day—I am tending the truth, you know—and ask me to subscribe to every thing. Now, I don't like to be rich! And she didn't think so! but looked so innocent and smiling at me, you know. But I gave her not one sever. I chuckled over it the whole afternoon. "Make me," says I, "a present of a thing I don't want." I have not heard that he has become insolvent, and I hold that a man who has no shame should have one that will her up when she got my sweet. "Good-day, Sir," she to angry, for that I was not bored up with work. But you are aware, dear Lounger, that I am much younger than you, and young persons are sometimes very enthusiastic; you will observe also that I have been provoked to school which, I suppose, is a cause fail of subject and a pallet of strong and brilliant colors. Now I am not to be over-fly gaudy pallet, walk my brushes, and take up the soft gray tints of the Lounger School, and with your permission, trust I may be enabled to paint, occasionally, a pleasing, simple picture. Before closing with a parting friend, however, I will spend a passage from one of the poets whose productions I've been reading of late with much pleasure, wherein I am persuaded there is some simplicity. He says:

"If you find your task is hard,
Try again;
Time will bring you your reward,
Try, try again;
All that other folks can do,
Why with patience may not you?
Only keep the rain in view,
Try again!"

Then we an old gentleman, Y. or Y., who had many young friends, and who loved them all. They constantly brought new ones into the old gentleman's room, and if he noticed that the new friend thought he knew any thing especially well, he gave him very earnest advice upon that point. Generally the youths were wrathy; and "hoped if they wanted instruction it was not any that subject." Whenever any one of them listened attentively and confessed that there might be something in what the old man said, he smiled and answered, "My dear, that may or may not be—but you'll come to something because you can take advice."

—LOSSING, Jr., writes from Nashville, Tennessee, to "strengthen the hands" of the Lounger in speaking of Thackeray's Washington, and another friend, J. B. K., also from Tennessee, writes about the same matter. For the present, however, there is nothing further to say upon the subject. But there is certainly something exquisitely ludicrous in the idea that we have been made to the portrait, if we except the dueling. Let it be so.

Thackeray can take good care of himself and his heroes and his critics.

—NELLIE writes from the "City of Hogs," as she says some profane poet calls Cincinnati, and declares she, as a quotation from the same source, the following lines:

"Though fish be thinly lips
Are the tender pigs,
And the Philadelphia porkers;
But Ohio swine
Are far more divine
Than the pigs of New Yorkers."

—EMMA LOTHROP'S "bunch of wild flowers" is sweet, but hardly enough so to ask the public to smell them.

—MR. ARTHUR HOPEHILL is emboldened by Mr. Tom Desperate's success in laying his communication before the public to hope he may be heard a praise of his Dulcinea, his Leonora. But he must remember that condescension is not argument. People are glad to know you are happy—spite of the witty Frenchman—but they don't want to hear about it. There is one picture in his letter which is worth hanging in the chambers of reflection to which all young ladies retire at this Lenten season:

"The other day, as I was walking in the upper part of the city, my attention was suddenly arrested by an awful sneeze at incidence—I was attracted by the singing of children into a neighboring school. Upon entering Mr. Lounger, a hundred little ones ensisted from nice and not very much to be feed clad, their heads uncovered, and their voices trained—now when they can be trained—to sweetness and purity. As I looked around upon the delightful eyes—though I felt that I, whose life had been so fruitless, had no right to stand in the presence of these angels of mercy, whose daily life is 'a sermon on the mount'—I was impressed with the awful sweetness in a center, with a desire of little ones clustered affectionately around a kind face, a delicate little creature was seated on her knee. What a world of kindness, of sympathy, of Christian love, did I see in those her eyes—bestowing on the faces of the happy children, which reflected at brightly as the lovely light! I never felt deeper before how utterly unworthy I was of her. The students of my past life were looked at me from their desks, I was able to keep the vow I then silently and solemnly made."

—"If there ever did lull 'Bonaparte' was brought up a pet, for his unexpressed emotions, being dressed in a remarkable garb of a suit almost white, bordering on a blue cross. On the end of one of the tassels of his prepossitive, but no boy in mischief as a monkey. He does all the line of tricks an entertainer was making about 1200 pounds. I had frequently found my gentlemen up in the back and story of my friend, Bonaparte, in remarkable, which was accessible by a stairway, very steep two and a half feet wide, and fastened to the floor on the ground, which he would travel up and down with as much ease as a boy of his age, and he had a good deal of sympathy to climbing.

"It did, I am confidential one morning when I came into the barn-yard and found Bonny mounted in a large, unfashioned wagon, which set forward into the middle of the ground, the top of the box a very little short of the cross; the old fashioned was up, and had not been comfortably, and may casting some loose corn, as we had been feeding every morning to the fowls and pigeons. My friendman appeared to be about his usual work, talking to nobody in particular any more than he had to talk to himself. But upon questioning Pat shortly, I found that Bonny had spent the most of the morning in the shortest possible way and time, and being in a great hurry when Pat, whom he had been walking up and down the premises, he sprang by him, and as the wagon sprinkled most of the corn-way, he jumped into it; when he rapidly sweep down to the old barrel, and inserted my gentleman into the middle of the yard, in distance, to await a conference decision which was to forward into his apartment. Bonny, after surveying and learning the state of things, like a thoroughgoer improved the intervening moments to enjoy the luxuries of the corn. When I come to the ground, I found Bonny in the wagon, seated with pitchfork in hand, which fact Bonny contrived into an instant to exercise his penalty, when, in a short manner, he leaped from the wagon and made a hasty escape.

"A fact in the experience of a Long Island Farmer."

—LILLY lives "out of the world into Canada." But the cold of Canada could not keep out her heart, and she sings like little birds under the Lounger's window:

TO DEAR MR. LOUNGER:

"I wish I were a little bird
That could flee with wintry weather,
I know where I would fly just now,
And wait and watch together.

"I'd fly, with all my might and main,
Straight off to your great city,
And light on your window-sill,
And sing my sweetest ditty.

"And then, when you would turn around
To say the sassy minx,
I'd take a sly peep in your face—
This artful little finger.

"And when I'd looked about enough,
Back to my forest home I'd flee,
I'd fly, and to my woodland mates
Such tales as I'd be telling!"

—N. Y. Z. inquires, from Ridgely, Missouri, "Why do Mr. Lounger and Mr. Broad indulge in fits of brown timber, make a ton?" Upon this grave question the Lounger, properly entertaining his own skill in the matter, has taken the silent advice, and the result he is most happy to impart to his correspondent. The ton in question is not a matter of weight, but of measurement, as in the tonnage of ships. A ton measurement is always forty cubic feet, and you can get, of course, more of lower than of round timber into the same space, because the lower straw closer than the round. This has a very wise sound, and the Lounger humbly hopes it will satisfy the intelligent curiosity of his correspondent.

TRAVEL NOTES IN BIBLE LANDS.

No. XXIX.

Holding in the Horses.—The Sea of Cilicia and Pamphylia.—Harbor of Rhodes.—Street of the Knights.—Turkish Ladies.—Steenburgen's Gallantry again gets him into Trouble.—The Isles of Greece.—Samos.—Scio.—Approach to Smyrna.—A Beef-steak at Salvo's.

THE process of hoisting in the horses was safely accomplished, though with no little difficulty, for the wind was fresh from the south, and a heavy sea was rolling in toward Mersina. Our good animals, however, have by this time become accustomed to the thing, and were not so astonished as might be expected at finding themselves swinging in a box between wind and water.

Under ordinary circumstances we should have found it much better to leave our horses at this point, and trust to purchasing others in Smyrna; but I had too strong an attachment to my desert bird to be willing to part with her while I was in the East, and the additional expense of carrying her with me from place to place was nothing when compared with the entire confidence I had in the horse, and in my being able with her to do whatever I wished. In going to Smyrna, with the idea of visiting the sites of the Seven Churches, and exploring the interior of Asia Minor, I wished to be perfectly certain that I could do a day's travel in any given direction; and I knew the ability of this animal quite as well as you know the power of a steamer or the speed of a railway train.

Sir Charles sold his horses at Mersina, determining to buy again at Smyrna. John Steenburgen retained his own good steed; and we took them in together in the afternoon, got away just before sunset, and went all night rolling along the coast to the westward.

In the morning we were in the broad strait between Cyprus and the main land, which is the Sea of Cilicia and Pamphylia, through which Paul so frequently sailed. Both coasts were at times dimly visible; but, for the most part, we saw only the northern shore, and we discussed, as well as we were able, the probable names of the headlands and bays that here and there opened on our view. The second day, or after the second night, we woke and were on deck early. The morning was delicious beyond description. The sky was golden and pure, the air balmy and soft—neither hot nor too cold. We were running rapidly up to a coast that was rising out of the mist a distance before us, and at length, about nine o'clock, were in the harbor of Rhodes, surrounded by a fleet of shore-boats of all sorts and sizes.

Twenty of the third-class passengers chartered one boat to take them ashore. That you may have an idea of the prices paid in this part of the world, I give you the charter price of this boat, which carried twenty vagabonds about a fourth of a mile. It was just two paras per passenger—a little less than half a cent!

The harbor of Rhodes is one of the most stately places in the world to one who loves the memory of old glories. That harbor where the Colossus once stood is long since filled up with sand. The spot pointed out as the entrance which he once bestrode is dry earth now, nor does it look as if Greek galley ever could have sailed there. But the harbor of the Knights of Saint John, with its tottering towers and grand old bastions, is here, and no traveler enters it without a thrill of pleasure not unmingled with pain. The city is one vast fortification, sadly decayed and ruinous now, but a splendid relic. The landing-place is crowded with Smyrniote boatmen, Greek sponge dealers, Arabs of various descriptions, and the usual Levant crowd that I have so frequently described. From the landing-place, by a little winding passage through the fortifications, the stranger enters the street of the Knights, a mournful silent street, leading up a steep hill to an archway at the top, where stood till last year the grand old Cathedral of Saint John. Grass grows among the stones of the pavement, and wall-flowers hang from the desolate-looking houses. These houses are small but some of them very beautiful. They were the habitations of brave men of a brave order. The armorial bearings of some of them are yet on the fronts of the houses, whose architectural beauty is, to our eyes, most delicious after our long wanderings among Eastern blank walls. Never was city so surrounded by graves as Rhodes. It would seem as if all the Greek and Latin and Turkish dead of all the centuries lay in separate graves around the walls.

AN ARAB CAMP.

We strolled all day among the cemeteries around the city. You of course know all about the terrible explosion of last year which demolished the old church and nearly demolished Rhodes. Between the gunpowder and the earthquake the city came well-nigh being wiped out of existence.

I have no personal incidents to record of this stop. We simply walked around as very respectable travelers should do, and we behaved ourselves in approved Eastern style. Had we been there a day longer we might have scraped an acquaintance with some of the inhabitants, but eight hours was hardly enough time to see the city and the people both, and at five we were away from the harbor and again on our voyage.

On the steamer, after we left Rhodes, was quite a crowd of Turkish gentlemen and ladies. That is to say, there were four or five of the former, and fifteen or twenty of the latter. Miss Grandison had up to this time occupied the ladies' cabin of the ship alone; but this addition made it intolerable for her, and, by a special arrangement with the officers, we secured a sort of tent on deck—that is to say, a division of the canvas covering, which we subdivided into two rooms—and that night, along the coast of Samos, we slept again as we were accustomed to sleep under canvas, and enjoyed the rush of the sea and the breath of the wind.

LANDING AT SMYRNA.

For now we were in musical seas. Every round of this water was full of old melody, full of ancient song. One was tempted to plunge over into it, so deep and divine was its blue beauty. This was the Ægean Sea, this the first of men, this the sea of the Isles of Greece. The water that dashed around us had washed the shores of Somothrace and Tenedos, and Lesbos and Scio and Patmos—had dashed itself in white foam against the base of "Samian's marble days"—had rushed rejoicing down by the Cyanean Symplegades, through the Propontis, by the coasts of Troy, and was at last ready to join the Ionian bride of Venice.

I tell you frankly it shakes a man's stability to find himself in the Grecian Archipelago. It wakes him up, and if he has any old Greek in him it brings it out.

If he hasn't that, then he usually sports Byron, especially if he happens to have one of Murray's Red-Books with him, which gives the proper quotation at the proper place.

The next morning was of the dirty sort. We had a head-sea, and the Turkish ladies were wailing about deck in various stages of sea-sickness. It was utterly out of rule to keep out of their way. When you least expected it down would come three hundred weight of tenacity and silk before the wind, and bring up against you with an exclamation of horror, and you involuntarily threw your arms around her, and then came a sea-sick Turk to "pitch into you" for daring to clasp his property in our infidel grasp. We had the prettiest little row, growing out of an affair of this sort, that I have ever seen. John Steenburger was standing at the weather-rail looking at Scio. Miss Grandison was by his side, and they were chatting gayly [illegible], when a Georgian girl, wholly oblivious of [illegible], dashed across to the rail directly between the two, threw back her yasmak (or veil), and exhibited not only her face but the bottom of her throat—yes, the very depths of her stomach, to the astonished vision of the two Franks. After one or two vain efforts to bring something out of those depths which seemed to trouble her, she sank back suddenly, and fell on the deck in a dead faint.

John seized her instantly and carried her across the deck to a settee, where he had hardly deposited her when her indignant lord rushed on my friend with drawn sword in his hand, and I verily believe would have made an end of my long Virginian friend there and then, but for a sudden leap which the latter made over the settee and sick lady, thus avoiding the blow and giving himself time to reflect, if he needed it.

But John is not the man to reflect. He only touched the deck, raised a steel that was occupied by a Greek merchant from Smyrna, jerked it out from under the astonished shop-keeper, and aimed it at the head of his assailant. It flew like a cannon-ball; but the Turk dodged and the steel went overboard, passing within a foot of my head, where I stood at the lee-rail looking at Scio.

I turned in time to see the Greek seizing John, and the Turk advancing. Nothing was left for me but to collar the Turk; and, as he had no collar, I throttled him. So we went down on deck together, and at the same moment John and the Greek pitched into the weather-scuppers, out of which they rolled as the ship went down again. We polished those two gentlemen off in very quick order; and all the while Miss Grandison stood shouting with laughter, and holding in her hand the sword of the Turk, which had escaped his grasp as he fell. Peace was restored in a few minutes, and our enemies were really too sea-sick to entertain or renew their enmity.

That night we ran down the Gulf of Smyrna, and as the clock ought to have struck twelve, if there had been a clock in any of the minarets of the city, we let go an anchor just at the moment that we smashed a Greek ship down to the very water's edge. In fact the anchoring was an afterthought; but I make no doubt, when the matter comes to be settled between the Greek and the French consul in the port, it will appear that both ships were at anchor ten minutes before the collision took place.

Next morning, beautiful exceedingly, Smyrna lay before us. I know no city whose appearance from the water is more picturesque and striking. We were more than a mile from the city. I know not what possessed the captain to anchor there, unless it was the collision aforenamed.

Before breakfasting we hastened into a shore-boat and pulled away for the city. You can hardly imagine the anxiety of one who has been for a few days on a Mediterranean steamer to get on shore and eat a respectable meal. I had been in Smyrna before. I remembered that, on the very water's edge, there was a little shop, kept by one Salvo, who supplied American and English ship-masters with provisions, and who could make a good cup of coffee and cook an egg just to the point of deliciousness. We pulled up to the little landing-place in the rear of his house, and took possession forthwith of his little breezy room.

"What have you?"

"Beef-steak—if it would suit."

"Beef-steak! Ye gods, it is seven—eight—ten—months since I have seen the article of beef!"

How we did breakfast! Sir Charles, who came ashore after us, found the second steak nearly gone and ordered a third, and we helped him finish that, and then we sallied out to the Hotel of the Two Augustuses—two French brothers of a few years ago who have left their names on their hotel, which is abominably kept, at exorbitant prices, but in which we are at present located, one of the Augustes being the present landlord.

THE APPROACH TO CANTON.

THE city of Canton, whose bombardment by the English and French troops has been announced, lies upon the north bank of the Pearl, or Choo-Keang River, some seventy miles from the sea. The river is one difficult of navigation, and large vessels of war do not generally find their way above the Bocca Tigris, or Bogue, which is properly its entrance. Here are some rude Chinese forts, and just above these, in a narrow passage, the Chinese, during the English opium war, sunk a number of large junks, with a view to preventing the passage upward of the English devils. The wrecks were blown to pieces shortly afterward, and the passage made sufficiently deep for vessels of moderate draught; but the rapid current had already accumulated a bar sufficient to prevent the passage of first-class vessels. Merchant ships commonly anchor opposite Whampoa Island, fifteen miles below the city of Canton. Our plan shows the devious course of the river, which forms, between Whampoa and Canton and opposite the city, a number of islands, on whose fertile soil great quantities of rice and vegetables are grown. Canton Proper is surrounded by a wall, said to be sixty feet high, and a deep ditch; the wall also, in several places, defended by guns. When the English and French "devils" have crossed this ditch and scaled this wall, they will, it is supposed, have to contend with an infuriated crowd of low-class Chinese, who will form another and rather stubborn wall between the aforesaid foreign devils and his Excellency Governor Yeh—whose portrait, by a Chinese artist, is given on this page.

Governor Yeh, some time famous for his obstinate diplomatic resistance to Barbarian aggression, is a mandarin of the highest rank, a cultivated man—from a Chinese point of view—and a most faithful servant of the Celestial brother of the sun, moon, and stars. In China all political offices are held by literary men, and all preferment in the State is for literary excellence. Whether Yeh's preeminence is as novelist, essayist, or pamphleteer, contemporary history does not inform us. Sure it is, that he was once a poor boy, much given to reading, and, it is to be supposed, regarded by his Celestial parents as incorrigibly idle. Having applied himself diligently to the studies prescribed in the Imperial course, he was, when twenty-three, ready to pass an examination. But, unfortunately, he could not raise sufficient money to bribe the judges to a hearing. So he was forced to the ignominious alternative of, for a certain sum of money, taking the name and place of a wealthy young idler, who desired a certificate without the trouble of cramming for it; a mode of swindling the State, openly and shamelessly practiced in China, where the theory of life is wise as it is odd, but the practice has long since degenerated.

With the sum which the future Governor of Quang-tong gained by this means he emigrated to another province, and at the succeeding session of the Imperial Examiners, having duly blinded those worthy men to his poverty, he succeeded in astonishing them by his thorough scholarship. Whether it was a political squib or a satirical novel which first attracted the Imperial attention to poor Yeh we are not told. Certain it is that, instead of becoming one of the class of well-educated, shiftless Bohemians common in the Chinese cities—and whose counterparts are not unknown even in our own country—he shortly obtained office—and office in China means wealth, more or less honestly gotten.

Having proven himself one of the Emperor's most trusty adherents, Yeh was, on the breaking out of the rebellion, made Governor of the populous province of Quang-tong. How he has here held parley with the Barbarians—how he has argued with them, implored them to peace, and done all he could to restrain the fury of the lion-hearted soldiers of the Celestial Emperor, and save the worthless lives of the wretched foreign devils—is it not written in the dispatches of Yeh to his Imperial master—and has it not been printed in Harper's Weekly?

The population of Canton is reckoned at about 400,000, while it is calculated that 60,000 persons live in the boats and schamps, and about 200,000 in the immediate vicinity. The number of Europeans settled here is about 200. The goods in the shops are exposed for sale either in large open boxes or on tables, behind which the shop-keepers sit and work. In the corner of the shop a narrow staircase leads up into the dwelling-house above. Here, as in Turkish towns, the same regulation is observed of each trade or calling having its especial street—in one nothing but crockery and glass is to be seen, in another silks, and so on. In the physicians' street are situated all the apothecaries' shops as well, the two professions being united in one and the same person. The provisions, which are very tastily arranged, have also their separate streets. Between the houses are frequently small temples, not differing the least, however, in style from the surrounding buildings. The gods, too, merely occupy the ground-floor, the upper stories being inhabited by simple mortals.

GOVERNOR YEH.—[FROM A PORTRAIT BY A CHINESE ARTIST.]

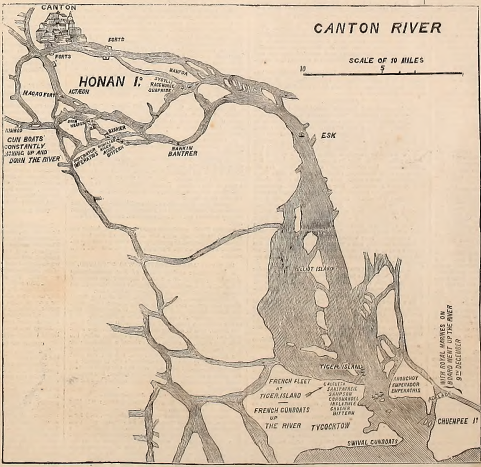

CHART OF PEARL RIVER, SHOWING THE POSITION, AT LAST ACCOUNTS, OF THE BRITISH AND FRENCH ATTACKING FORCES.

LITERARY.

FROM G. P. Putnam & Co. we have received a work entitled THE APPLICATION OF ART TO MANUFACTURES, by George C. Mason, which we were at first disposed to pass by as a book of the "manufactured" sort, but which on examination we find to be of unusual value. It is a very thorough account of art-manufactures, and we suppose there is no one who will not find instruction and interest in reading how bronze statues are cast, how gilding is placed on metallic ornaments, how porcelain is made and painted, how iron, steel, terra cotta, plaster, china, silver, and all the metals and earths are turned by the hands of workmen into the graceful, beautiful, and magnificent works which cover our tables, or ornament our public squares. The accounts of the process of making porcelain alone are worth all the price of the volume, and the illustrations, of which there are a large number, although not new, add much to its value. We are always glad to commend a work of permanent value united to intrinsic interest like this before us.

A. S. Barnes & Co., who are indefatigable in publishing school books, have issued the FIRST BOOK OF NATURAL PHILOSOPHY AND ASTRONOMY, by Professor Norton, of Yale College. The names of the author and publishers are sufficient to direct the attention of teachers to this elementary work. Barnes & Co. also publish THE LITTLE SINGER, OR PRIMARY SCHOOL VOCALIST, by George Henry Curtis, which contains glees and songs as well as an oratorio for the young.

The Third and (for the present) last volume of GIESELER'S CHURCH HISTORY, edited by Professor Henry B. Smith, of New York, now makes its appearance, published by Harper & Brothers.

We have heretofore spoken of the peculiar value of this work to theological and other students. It is exhaustive as a book of reference. It is a mine of authorities and condensed extracts. The amount of labor devoted to its preparation by the author and the American editor has been enormous. Instead of being the work of one or two men this mass of authorities would seem to be the result of the studies of a body of the clergy.

The character of the work is of course known to all theologians. It is eminently evangelical in tone, while of its orthodoxy there is no question. To a clergyman who does not possess a large library we should suppose this work would be the equivalent of a pile of old Fathers' and other works. Many volumes are condensed into the foot notes of these pages, and every line of history has its authorities, and all the authorities, not only referred to by line, page, and edition, but in most instances quoted in full or succinctly stated. The work will, of course, be adopted largely as a text-book in seminaries, and perhaps in colleges, where its worth will be found to be vastly greater than any extant Church History.

Harper & Brothers publish THE WORKS OF TACITUS, the Oxford translation, revised, with notes. Without reference to the value which this new and thorough edition of Tacitus will have to students who use translations judiciously, we may especially commend it to the general reader as an agreeable companion. We know of nothing more refreshing, in these days of new books, than it is to take up one of the old writers. Tacitus is particularly readable. His style is easy and winning, and is well preserved in this translation. We have heretofore remarked on the use of translations by students in school. We believe all teachers agree that the boy who uses it with care and judgment will be benefited by it, and that the boy who uses it as a substitute for study and labor will not be apt to gain much from his ordinary studies without it. Every school library should contain this entire series of classical works issued by Harper & Brothers.

AN ENGLISH GRAMMAR, or rather, an elementary work on the English Language, by Professor William C. Fowler, is a valuable contribution to the school books of the day, and will probably take precedence of all other grammars. It is an admirable work, philosophical in plan, and clear and definite in arrangement. As a book to teach the English language, its history, development, theory, and use, we know of none equal to it, and we recommend it to the examination of teachers and others interested in this class of works. It is a new plan, in teaching grammar, to teach the derivation of the language we speak, but the plan is certainly most excellent and commendable. 12mo. Harper & Brothers.

The present number in the household Waverley series of Ticknor & Fields is THE PIRATE. The illustrations of this number are particularly good, especially the visit of Norna to Minna and Brenda. The series sustains its high reputation for simple elegance and beauty.

Grave-yard poetry is often curious and interesting. We know of one cemetery in which the stones form a published volume of poetry of all kinds by one person. We are reminded of this by a pleasant little pamphlet containing a poem on the new cemetery at Bristol, Rhode Island, which has been laid out with much taste, and which is well celebrated in these lines. The cemetery itself is a memorial of the late Levi de Wolf, one of the excellent fathers who has gone to his reward.

Carter & Brothers publish another of Dr. Macduff's admirable and delightful volumes, Memories of Gennesaret, in which, with his well-known grace and delicacy, he recalls the scenes in the life of Christ which are located on the shores of that lake of lakes. There, indeed, occurred more of the incidents in His life on earth than ordinary readers of the Bible are apt to remember. Mount Hermon looks down on it from the north, Tabor from the west, Gilboa from the southwest, and Lebanon from the northwest. Nazareth is near it. Nain is yet nearer. Capernaum and Bethsaida were on its shores. The lake is there yet, but around it linger only these holy memories to sanctify it. Lonesome, solitary, and beautiful, it is of all lakes the most holy, and its associations the most thrilling. Few readers will fail to appreciate and enjoy this volume.

Dr. Barclay's new work on Jerusalem, published by James Challen & Sons, Philadelphia, of which we have before spoken favorably, is attracting the attention of the learned and of all who are interested in the Holy Land, and, as we predicted, has revived many of the discussions concerning the holy places.

Among the new works of art which this age has produced we have been most gratified by an exquisite set of photographs of views in Egypt and the Holy Land, now in process of publication in London. We do not know that they are imported by any New York house, but they are worth sending to England for. They are importations of the very ruins and hills themselves.

Much attention has of late been called to the East, and in another part of our paper this week is advertised an Excursion to the Holy Land, which is one of the great things of the day. This will afford many who have but brief time to travel a grand opportunity of seeing spots to which all hearts turn with the utmost affection.

The friends of Dr. Livingstone have had him meet them at dinner at the Freemasons' Tavern, to receive their farewell. Dr. Livingstone has been appointed H. B. M. Consul for Quillimane, Senna, and Tete, on the east coast of Africa—an official position which will be of important advantage in carrying out his plans for opening up the commerce with the interior from the Zambesi River coasts. The iron steamer in which the expedition will ascend the river is to be taken out in pieces on board the African packet of next month, and prepared at Quillimane for the voyage.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, 1st March, in the Senate, Senator Henderson, of Texas, qualified and took his seat. Memorials were presented from Iowa asking for land for railroad purposes. Senator King reported a bill granting the Rome Arsenal to the State of New York. Senator Green called up the bill for the admission of Kansas, and in spite of the opposition of Senators Broderick and Gwyn, who claimed priority for the Pacific Railroad Bill, it was taken up, and speeches were made by Senators Green and Collamer.——In the House, a special committee was appointed to report upon the case of Matteson. Resolutions approving Governor Stevens's course were received from Washington Territory. Mr. Sherman presented a resolution inquiring whether any moneys had been paid to defray the expenses of the Legislature of Kansas. Mr. Florence presented a memorial from the marine underwriters of Philadelphia against any alteration of the Light-house Law.

On Tuesday, 2d, in the Senate, the House Appropriation to commute the Sound Dues was passed. Bills were introduced by Senator Seward to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels; by Senator Evans, to amend the Patent Laws; by Senator Houston, authorizing the raising of volunteer regiments in Texas. Senator Douglas's resolution on Kansas affairs was taken up, and the bill for the admission of that State; speeches were made by Senators Douglas, Collamer, and Pugh.——In the House, after some debate as to the pay of employés of the House, the question of the reference of the Senate Bill reinstating the naval officers dropped by the Retiring Board was taken up, and speeches were made by Messrs. Davis, Miles, Chapman, Sherman, and Wilson. No vote was taken.

On Wednesday, 3d March, Senator Hammond introduced into the Senate a resolution authorizing the payment of the officers and men of Captain Hartstein's expedition at the same rate as those of Lieutenant De Haven's. The Kansas question being taken up, long speeches were made by Senators Seward and Thompson.——In the House, the resolution authorizing the President to reverse the action of the Naval Retiring Board was passed by 71 majority, after speeches from Messrs. Whiteley, Bocock, Winslow, and Seward.

On Thursday, 4th, in the Senate, Senator Stuart reported against amending the Bounty Land Act. The Kansas Bill was then taken up, and speeches were made by Senators Hammond and Doolittle.——In the House, Mr. Hoard's resolution to inquire whether or no the President had used his executive patronage in aid of the Lecompton Constitution, and notably in the case of Mr. Burns, of Ohio, was taken up; but after speeches by Messrs. Hoard, Humphrey Marshall, Burnett, Blair, Nichols, and Giddings, the question was tabled by 92 to 80. Mr. Quitman called up his bill for a regiment of mounted volunteers in Texas, and spoke in favor of it.

On Friday, 5th (the Senate not being in session), the House was engaged all day with the private calendar, and adjourned at the close to Monday.

THE KANSAS COMMITTEE.

The House Kansas Investigating Committee met on Wednesday, 3d. All the members were present. General Calhoun sent in a statement, but it was decided that it should not be considered as evidence. Mr. Stephens read a report expressive of the views of the majority, setting forth, with other things, that as the authority was legally conferred on the delegates to the Convention to frame a Constitution, those who had an opportunity, but who declined to vote, were debarred from finding fault with the action of the Convention. The report also reviews the past positions of Messrs. Douglas, Stanton, and Walker, maintaining that they are inconsistent with their present course. Resolutions were passed with the view of obtaining information relative to the census and other documentary evidence, which it was agreed should accompany the report. A motion was made to adjourn until to-morrow night, but it was voted down by the usual 8 to 7, when the Committee adjourned sine die.

It is understood that the statement of General Calhoun, above referred to, avers that at the January election for members of the Legislature of Kansas, 7050 Free-State votes were cast, of which 631 were illegal, while the legal Democratic vote was 6581; thus giving a nominal Pro-Slavery majority, according to this test, of 153.

It is said that Senator Toombs will insist upon amending the Lecompton Constitution so as to allow the people to alter it when they please, which may defeat it in the Senate.

THE CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATING COMMITTEES.

The correspondent of the Herald says: "The Congressional Investigating Committees now in session, with perhaps a single exception, are not accomplishing much. There are six at work:

"1. The Fort Snelling Purchase Committee.

"2. The Tariff Bribery Committee—the Lawrence, Stone, and Co. case.

"3. The Willett's Point Purchase.

"4. The Committee on Clerk Cullom's Accounts.

"5. Committee on the conduct, etc., of the late and present Door-keepers.

"6. To investigate the present system of public printing.

"There is another demanded, I believe, by Mr. Florence, of Philadelphia, relative to the charge that some one got $25,000 for aid rendered in the purchase of the Pennsylvania Bank building for a Post-office."

THE NEW BANKRUPTCY BILL.

Senator Toombs, from the Committee on the Judiciary, has given notice of a bill for a general and uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, for the protection of creditors, the relief of insolvent debtors, and to regulate the commercial intercourse of the citizens of different States, including banks and all corporations; it will regulate both voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy, and will compel both individuals and corporations to pay their debts or become bankrupt under it. There can be no more suspension of specie payments by the banks. It will provide with care against all frauds or preferences, and compel an honest division of all the bankrupt's property among the creditors. The measure is decidedly popular at Washington.

THE TERRITORY OF ARIZONA.

The Senate Committee on Territories are about to report a bill for the organization of the Territory of Arizona. It has been delayed by a difficulty in reference to the boundaries—Mr. Mowry, the Arizona delegate, proposing to connect Arizona with Texas on the east—thus including in Arizona the lower Rio Grande, which properly belongs to it, being separated from New Mexico proper by the Ernada del Muerto (Dead Man's Journey), a desert of ninety miles. This desert Mr. Mowry claims (and he is supported by the views of his constituents), is a natural boundary between the two Territories.

NEWS FROM THE UTAH EXPEDITION.

Advices have been received from the Utah Expedition to 4th January. Colonel Johnston, in his letters to General Scott, says that no incident of any military importance has transpired since his last communication, and that the troops are in excellent health and spirits. He expresses fears that he has not sufficient draught animals. The greater number of the soldiers who have been on the sick list were rendered unfit for duty by being frost-bitten. For this reason Colonel Johnston recommends that each man be supplied with a pair of buffalo-overshoes. Colonel Johnson calls attention to the great length of the line of communication to the army, and the necessity of providing the means for defending the supplies which must be sent forward early in the spring, more especially that portion liable to be attacked by the Mormons. Colonel Johnston commends highly the field-works thrown up around Fort Bridger, and has sent the drawing of them to the War Department.

Colonel Cook, writing from Henry's Fork on the 31st of December, says, that he found little grass and shelter at that place. The weather was moderating, and he had no doubt he would be able to remain there six weeks.

REOPENING OF THE SLAVE-TRADE IN THE SOUTH.

The New Orleans Delta has a singular article, in which it says that "Southerners have taken into their own hand the law, and opened the African slave-trade with the South; that Africans are now imported into Mississippi and other sea-shore States; that in Mississippi there is a market for African slaves, and that on plantations in that great and intrepid State negroes recently imported from Africa are at their daily work. The authority on which we make this announcement is indisputable. We even have advices that, in Mississippi, Henry Hughes and some of his party now privately urge the Labor Immigration movement, not to open the supply of Africans, but to legitimate, moralize, regulate, and equalize the supply already opened and impossible to be closed. We have some further details. Some negroes are disembarked on the Atlantic coast, and brought overland to the Mississippi cotton fields; but the Mississippi sea-coast's peculiar facilities for landing and secreting cargoes, and the conveniences of Pearl River as a channel for distribution, are not overlooked."

The lower branch of the Louisiana Legislature has passed a bill authorizing the importation of 2500 free blacks from the coast of Africa, to be indentured for not less than fifteen years.

PERSONAL.

The long-expected Turkish Rear-Admiral arrived at this city in the Europa. The Herald describes him as a man of "portly appearance and considerable hauteur in his manner. He is a man of about five feet ten inches in height, rather stoutly made, with broad shoulders, and an intelligent countenance. He has a smooth, pleasing face, peculiarly Oriental large dark eyes and round visage. His cheeks have a tendency to redness, and his face is plump. His nose is long, and somewhat of the Roman form. His mouth small, and lips thin. On his upper lip is a mustache, which appears to have been trimmed with much care. His forehead is high, broad, and without a wrinkle. His hair, mustache, eyebrows, etc., are brown or auburn, and he does not wear his hair longer than it is usually worn by Americans. His dress is in no way remarkable. A loose brown frock overcoat covers a dark cloth frock coat, inside of which is a brown velvet vest and colored shirt. His pants were of black cloth, and his boots were rather heavy in material, of the kind commonly known as short boots. Around his neck was a muffler of gray woolen cloth, and around his head, in Turkish fashion, was a red-and-blue turban. All his apparel was of a very fine material; and were it not for the turban nothing extraordinary would be about his appearance."

The Grand Jury of the City of Washington have, under the law of Congress to punish contempt of the authority of either House, found a presentment against John W. Wolcott, the recusant witness. He has moved for a habeas corpus, but refuses to disclose.

On a recent public occasion in Lisbon, at which a great many Roman Catholic priests of various nationalities were present, Mr. O'Sullivan, our Minister to Portugal, replied to an allusion to his country, first in English, then in Portuguese, and finally, for the benefit of some who did not understand either language, in Latin.

The Episcopal Recorder says that the health of Bishop Alonzo Potter has much improved, and that he intends soon to leave for Europe to recruit.

Rev. Bishop Simpson, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, returned in the Europa from an extended tour in Europe. He visited England and Ireland during last summer with Rev. Dr. M'Clintock, as delegate to the Wesleyan Conferences in those countries; subsequently visited the Methodist Missions in France, Germany, and Norway; was present at the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance at Berlin; and traveled, during the winter, in Turkey, Palestine, Egypt, and Greece. He was for some time dangerously ill, at Beyroot, and has scarcely yet recovered his usual good health. He proceeds, at once, on his Conference rounds. It is hoped the Bishop will give the results of his travels to the public in book form. From his shrewd observation and racy style we may expect a volume of unusual value and interest.

A private letter from Mr. Bryant, dated Naples, February 1, and published in the Post, says: "The weather here has been unusually cold. Night after night ice forms in still water, and the ground is frozen hard. This is quite a phenomenon in Naples. How the orange-trees stand it I can not imagine, but the degree of cold does not seem to be quite severe enough to kill them yet. One effect of this extreme cold is the prevalence of rheumatic fevers, which are so general that whole families are down with them at once. Mrs. Bryant has not escaped, and has been confined almost ever since she arrived at Naples."

Admiral Zerman, whose movements on the west coast of Mexico have made him well known, has been in town. He came from Vera Cruz to New Orleans with President Comonfort. The statements in several of the papers that he is in this country to obtain men and money for General Comonfort is entirely incorrect. He is here on no such mission. He belongs to the liberal party of Mexico, and hopes for the moral support of the country for that party—nothing more.

The body of an aged negro named Redman was found last week in one of the sub-cellars of the large tenement-house, rear of No. 9 Mulberry Street. It was terribly mutilated, a portion of the head having been eaten off by rats. The deceased, it appears, was literally starved to death. Notice of the affair was sent to the coroner, and an inquest will be held to-day.

The New Orleans Picayune of the 23d ult. says: "Mr. Charles Mackay, the poet-lecturer and editor of the London Illustrated News, who has for some days past been in our city, and has delivered one of his excellent lectures on 'Poetry and Song' to a large and highly-appreciative audience, left town yesterday for Mobile, where also he is to lecture. He was accompanied by Colonel H. Fuller, of New York, his friend and traveling companion; and our fair correspondent, 'Belle Brittan,' we understand, has availed herself of their joint escort on this her first visit to our sister city over the lake."

The House of Assembly of Nova Scotia has voted an address and £100 to purchase a sword to be presented to Major-General Sir John Inglis, for his heroic conduct in the defense of Lucknow. Sir John is a native of Nova Scotia.

Judge Bowden, our new Commissioner to the Sandwich Islands, left in the Moses Taylor for Aspinwall, en route for Honolulu.

Mr. Joseph H. Harris, formerly of Richmond, Virginia, was recently murdered at New Providence, Tennessee, by a slave of Wm. Gray. Mr. H. was sitting in his office reading, when the fellow approached and buried an axe in his head. After repeating the blow and thrusting his victim's head into the fire, he set fire to the office, but the flames were soon discovered and suppressed. The murderer was arrested by the Sheriff, from whom he was immediately taken by the citizens of Clarksville. A committee of twelve having been appointed to try him, found him guilty, and he was hung on the spot after confessing his guilt.

The New York correspondent of the Syracuse Standard says: "John Dean, the coachman who married Boker's daughter, is more fortunate than Dillaye, as he is secure in a place as marker in the Public Store, to which he was recently appointed by Collector Schell. This brings up the question of Dean's whereabouts since his marriage. Where has he been? Some say at school, others at home, and others still that he has been under private instruction. But wherever he has been, it is evident he has not improved, as the appointment of marker is always given to those whose talents and acquirements are of an inferior grade. It may be that the highly educated and accomplished Mrs. Dean has already found that marrying a coachman is not so romantic after all."

A New Haven correspondent of the Boston Traveler says of the case of the mail robber Tuckerman: "His Honor said that there were three cases to come before the jury—Tuckerman's, also one for counterfeiting, and one for assault and battery upon the high seas. He said that if the jury were satisfied that an offense had been committed, no matter if the locality could not be proved, no matter whether the evidence was direct or circumstantial, they were to find true bills. Under this, Tuckerman will most assuredly be indicted; but, as has been said before, that will not necessarily bring conviction. I understand that the defense will make its great point on the locality, and unless more definite testimony than was given before the commissioners is presented, there will be a large loop-hole."

A lad of seventeen, who had acquired some reputation as a theatrical performer, was recently converted during a revival in the Baptist Church at Lagrange, Missouri, and has been licensed as a preacher. He is said to be another Spurgeon, swaying his audiences with remarkable power.

The following incident of family history is told by the Baltimore Sun: "The late Wm. Bodman of this city dictated a will, bequeathing over $100,000. When the will was opened, it was found that after providing for his immediate family to the extent of $10,000, the testator had left the balance, $65,000, to a nephew, Mr. Charles Bodman, of Cincinnati, Inspector of the Tobacco Inspection Warehouses of that city. The slaves, five in number, he also bequeathed to him, making him sole residuary heir. The contents of the will being communicated to Mr. Bodman, he immediately came to Baltimore, and on Tuesday made over the whole bequest to two female members of the family, who had been overlooked by the testator, reserving only for himself Gano, the body servant of his uncle. Such acts of generous disinterestedness are seldom met with."

Ex-President Fillmore has purchased the house of James Hollister on Delaware Street, Buffalo, with a view of making it his future residence.

Freeman Hunt, the founder and editor of the Merchants' Magazine, died in Brooklyn last week. He has been unfit to attend to his business for some months past. He has been a useful man. He was about fifty years of age.

A Virginia paper, in the course of a complimentary article on Governor Seward, describes one of that gentleman's peculiarities: "The most elegant, chaste, and strong passages of Governor Seward's speeches are spoken with his arms resting on the railing and his fingers playing with his spectacles, as if he was in easy conversation with somebody. We never saw or heard of such a man in this respect. It is no trouble to him to talk intelligence, terseness, beauty, elegance, strength—as it all appears to be in print."

Captain Robert Bayley and wife celebrated their golden wedding at Newburyport on Thursday evening. Captain Bayley is one of the old and successful merchants of that city.

Senator Davis continues quite an invalid, being yet confined to his bed with the affection of the throat. Senator Fitzpatrick is gradually recovering from the attack of neuralgia with which he has been afflicted for a month.

HOW THE ADMINISTRATION WAS DEFEATED.

A Washington correspondent of The Mississippian gives the daughter of a Cabinet Minister the credit of defeating the Administration Kansas Committee in the House the other day. It happened in this wise:

"It is whispered in social circles here that the defeat of the Committee of Thirteen on the Kansas Bill, which the Administration lost by one vote, is attributable to a lady, a daughter of one of our Cabinet Ministers. One of her victims, a prominent but 'doubtful member' from the North, who is sighing himself into premature wrinkles and ugliness, conceiving, on the evening before the vote was taken, that Miss —— evinced a preference for a rival member, would have his revenge by voting against the Administration; the result was, the bill was lost! (A word in your ear.) That member's fate is sealed; for we saw Miss —— an hour ago, and had she swallowed all the pickles of her father's last state dinner, her feelings could not have been more acidulated against him for his recreancy."

THE STORY OF A JACK-KNIFE.

The Boston Ledger tells the following story: "In 1786 a youth, then residing in Maine, owned a jack-knife which he, being of a somewhat trading disposition, sold for a gallon of West India rum. This he retailed, and with the proceeds purchased two gallons, and eventually a barrel, which was followed in due time with a large stock. In a word, he got rich, and became the Squire of the district through the possession and sale of the jack-knife and an indomitable trading industry. He died worth property in real estate and money value for $80,000. This was divided by testament among four children—three boys and a girl. Luck, which seemed to have been the guardian angel of the father, deserted the children; for every folly and extravagance they could engage in seemed to occupy their exclusive attention and cultivation. The daughter married unfortunately, and her patrimony was soon thrown away by her spendthrift of a husband. The sons were no more fortunate, and two of them died of dissipation and in poverty. The daughter also died. The last of the family, for many years past, has lived on the kindness of those who knew him in the days of prosperity, as pride would not allow him to go to the poor-farm. A few days ago he died, suddenly and unattended, in a barn where he had laid himself down to take a drunken sleep. On his pockets being examined all that was found in them was a small piece of string and a jack-knife! So the fortune that began with the implement of that kind left its simple duplicate. We leave the moral to be drawn in whatever fashion it may suggest itself to the reader, simply stating that the story is a true one, and all the facts well known to many whom this relation will doubtless reach."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT.

On Monday, the 15th of February, in the House of Lords, the Duke of Cambridge announced the receipt of dispatches from Sir Colin Campbell, exonerating General Windham from all blame in regard to the defeat at Cawnpore, lauding the gallantry of the General, and stating that he was inclined to recommend him to a higher and more important command.

On the following days but little business of importance was transacted till 19th, when Lord Palmerston, in moving the second reading of the Conspiracy to Murder Bill, described its character at length, and repelled the notion that it was an alien bill, although he admitted that it had arisen out of the late attack in Paris.

Mr. Milner Gibson moved, by way of amendment—

"That this House hears with much concern that it is alleged that recent attempts upon the life of the Emperor of the French had been devised in England, and expresses its detestation of such guilty enterprises; that this House is ready at all times to assist in remedying any defects in the criminal law which, after due investigation, are proved to exist; yet it can not but regret that her Majesty's Government, previously to inviting the House to amend the law of conspiracy at the present time, had not felt it to be their duty to make some reply to the important dispatch received from the French Government, dated Paris, January 20, 1858, and which has been laid before Parliament."

Spirited speeches were made in favor of the amendment by Mr. Gibson, Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Disraeli, and others; while the course of Government was sustained by Mr. Baines, Sir George Grey, Lord Palmerston, and others.

Upon a division, there were for Mr. Gibson's amendment	234
For the second reading of the bill	215
Majority against the Government	19

The result was greeted with loud cheering by the Opposition.

ARREST OF A FRENCH REFUGEE.

On 14th ult. a M. Barnard, a French political refugee, was arrested on a warrant at the instance of the Home Office, on a charge of being concerned with Orsini and Pierri in the recent attempt made on the lives of the Emperor and the Empress of the French. The arrest was effected in the morning at the lodgings of M. Barnard, Bayswater, by Sergeant Williamson, a detective officer, and police-constable Tinnaci, who had been charged with the execution of the warrant. The latter officer, a young man of Italian descent, was specially selected for his skill as a linguist to aid in the arrest of the prisoner, of whom he had been in search for some days past. On making application to see M. Barnard at his lodgings they were admitted to an interview with him without any difficulty. They stated the object of their errand, and Tinnaci produced and read to him the warrant authorizing his arrest. He treated the matter in a good-natured way, and offered no serious resistance. Being somewhat in deshabille, however, he asked permission to go up stairs to his bedroom for the purpose of changing part of his dress, but the officers expressed their regret that they could not, consistently with the duty imposed upon them, allow him to do so; and, though he repeatedly urged them to comply with his request, they still refused, and removed him from the house in the dress in which he stood. On going afterward to the room in which he had slept on the previous night the officers found two revolver pistols, loaded, and an instrument called a "knuckle duster"—a formidable article, and made of brass, which slips easily on to the four fingers of a man's hand, and, having a projecting surface across the knuckles, is calculated, in a pugilistic encounter, to inflict serious injury on the person against whom it is directed. In a subsequent conversation which the prisoner had with his captors he stated that, had they been French instead of English officers, he would have shot them.

A MILLIONAIRE'S WILL.

The will of the late Mr. Morrisen, sometime M.P. for the Inverness burghs, has just been administered to in Doctors' Commons; it is among the longest upon record. Upon its production were engaged conveyancers and barristers of eminence, and during its progress to completion the testator evinced much anxiety. The estate exceeding £4,000,000 is, in such cases, sworn to as of upper value. Basildon park cost £126,000; the furniture there alone has been valued at £90,000. This mansion is to be the residence of his widow, with an annuity of £10,000 a year. The estate of Basildon is left to his son Charles, as well as the Islay estate in Scotland, which latter cost £452,000; and, from its extent and vastness, may be termed a principality. This is let to numerous tenants. Mr. Charles is also bequeathed a round sum of £1,000,000 under the will. Mr. Morrison was possessed of Fonthill Abbey; Hove Park, Sussex; a town residence [illegible] Harley Street; shares amounting to £80,000 in the Victoria Docks; and vast acquisitions in the United States.

THE ENGLISH ACCOMPLICE OF ORSINI AND PIERRI.

It seems that one of the accomplices in the late attempt to murder was an Englishman. His name is Thomas Allsop, an ex-member of the Stock Exchange. The instruments of the crime were all made to order in England, and the whole scheme and conspiracy was hatched and matured in that country. He was always a warm-headed and crotchety man; a friend and associate of the late Samuel Taylor Coleridge, whose "Table Talk" he edited. He was also an intimate friend of Robert Owen. An extreme Republican, he was always a gentle-hearted man, and had no guilty knowledge, but was probably used as a tool. His wife, who is a perfect lady, kept for several years a Magazin des Modes at 250 Regent Street, London, and her business connections lay among the most aristocratic circles in London. Coleridge dined every Sunday for years with Allsop.

Allsop has been advertised by the police, and is believed to have escaped to this country.

CHARLES DICKENS ON POOR CHILDREN.

At a festival held in London on 9th ultimo, in aid of the funds of the Hospital for Sick Children, Mr. Charles Dickens took the Chair, and delivered a speech in his peculiar vein. In the course of it he said:

"Those two grim nurses, Poverty and Sickness, which brought these poor children before them that day, breathed the breath of fever over their wretched cradles, nailed up their little coffins, and piled up the earth upon their graves. Of the annual deaths in this great town the unnatural ones formed more than one-third of the whole number. He should not ask his audience, as in the case of other spoiled children, to observe how good or how pretty they were. No; he was about to ask the charitable to observe how weak they were, how like death they were, and he should implore them by the remembrance of every thing that was happy in their own infancy, to extend to these spoiled children of the poor their patronage, their succor, and their compassion. Some time since, being in Scotland, he went with a humane member of that most humane medical profession to visit some of the poor inhabitants of the old town of Edinburgh. In a close wynd, a most picturesque place—he was sorry to say that the picturesque and typhus were often very nearly allied—he saw more poverty and sickness than he had ever seen within a similar space. In one wretched dwelling he saw a poor sick child cradled in an egg-box which its mother had begged from the shop, and that little wan child, with his fevered countenance, his wasted hand, and his bright, wakeful eye, was ever before his sight. He could see him at that moment, and fancied he heard him say, 'Why am I lying here, shut in from the light of day, and from the play with other children?' That case was only a type of thousands occurring in London every day; and if the company he saw around him, which formed a drop of the life-blood of the great public heart of the country, would only come forward, three-fourths of these melancholy cases might be annually saved."

FRANCE.

THE APPROACHING TRIALS.

The Paris correspondent of the Manchester Guardian says: "The approaching trial embarrasses the Government more and more each day. It is true that the plot of Orsini and the others was a purely Italian and Carbonaro one, framed in order to punish the Emperor, as an ex-Carbonaro, for having betrayed his oaths; but, had it succeeded, the ramifications of all the secret societies in France would have vibrated at the instant, from one end of the land to the other, and, backed by the general discontent, and the force of the dissident monarchical parties, there might have been a great commotion. Here is the dilemma now—how to conduct the trial? Whether publicly or not? If not publicly, how to account for this? If publicly, how to prevent such things from coming out that it would be frightful even the sitting magistrate should hear? For instance, here is a fact that some ten people in all Paris know (certainly not more), and that on no account would it be advisable to spread abroad; ten days before the attentat the man Allsop appeared in Paris, and offered the four chief conspirators four tickets for the ball of the Wednesday night at the Tuileries! They all drew back, saying they preferred the combination of the visit to the Opera. Allsop replied to this, 'If that is the case, go your own way—one man only is certain of escaping from your Rue Lepelletier plot, and that is the Emperor. I wash my hands of you;' and thereupon he disappeared, and most people believe he is now in America. This is a fact that it is unsafe to reveal here, because it shows a fresh means of practicing assassination. It is certain that nothing was easier than to be present at the Imperial balls without being invited; and I could name many persons, both male and female, who have assisted at these fêtes under other names, by procuring the tickets of individuals who were prevented from attending. This has long been so notorious that it has often been said that the scene of Gustavus of Sweden might easily be enacted with Louis Napoleon for the victim. I presume care will be taken in future to prevent any such danger, which results principally from the tickets of such persons as have been prevented going to the balls not being returned. They are left lying about, and form an object of traffic for valets and ladies' maids."

OTHER ATTEMPTS ON THE EMPEROR'S LIFE.

The Paris correspondent of the Herald says: "That the fears of repeated attempts on the Emperor's life are not merely chimerical some of the circumstances which attended the event of the 14th sufficiently attest. The instant it was known that the attempt had proved abortive a long, low whistle was distinctly heard by many persons, taken up and carried on throughout the whole line of the Boulevards up to the column in the Place St. Antoine. No efforts of the police have as yet been successful in tracing the authors concerned; but it is of itself an evidence of a fearful system of organization. Again, when, ten days afterward, the Emperor and Empress paid their visit to the English Embassador, on account of the marriage of the Princess Royal with the Prince of Prussia, it is whispered that on their quitting the hotel, about two o'clock in the morning, just as they had entered the carriage, a man fired a shot straight at the Emperor from a revolver. In an instant the short swords flashed from the scabbards of a hundred police who were on duty; and the Empress seeing the fact, and forgetting the nature of the body that surrounded the carriage, and believing a band of desperate assassins were present, ready to complete the work which the pistol-shot had missed, flung herself on the bosom of the Emperor, exclaiming, 'Mourons ensemble!' I do not answer for the truth of this, because I was not present, but my informant was one of the immediate entourage of the nearest relative of the Emperor's."

THE BALL AT THE BRITISH EMBASSY.

He adds: "As to the British Embassy itself, such was the state of terror lest any thing should occur, that the Embassador declared he would be responsible for their Majesties' reception and safety on condition that the house should be placed several days before in the hands of the police. Only one or two of the ordinary domestics were retained on duty, and the hotel was accordingly fairly invested by the agents of M. Pietri. The very serving-men, arrayed in gorgeous state liveries, with powdered perukes, white kerseymeres, and long silk stockings, were these gentry in disguise, and probably accounted for the incompleteness of their waiting, which was complained of, notwithstanding the vast number of attendants. Not a day passes without fresh arrests being made; and the number in prison, directly or indirectly accused of implication in this crime, is enormous."

WHY THE AMERICANS DID NOT GO TO LADY COWLEY'S BALL.

The scarcity of Americans present at Lady Cowley's ball—which attracted, of course, various ill-natured remarks from the French journalists—was entirely owing to the order, emanating at the eleventh hour, for all gentlemen to appear in full court dress, knee-breeches, and court collar. The Americans have always resisted this injunction, and in this case preferred abstaining altogether from making their appearance. One Yankee wit answered the summons by declaring that "Never having possessed but one of those unmentionable garments, which his wife had seized upon the very day of his marriage, and had worn ever since, he had not dared ask her for the loan upon this occasion."

THE CARNIVAL AT PARIS.

A Paris letter dated Sunday evening, the 14th, says: "The Carnival which has been rendered triste by the grippe and the comparative absence of foreigners, is now, in its expiring, but always most brilliant moments, gay. Pierrots are numerous. Crinoline is the favorite theme for caricature in dress. I have seen on the Boulevards to-day men dressed up as women, with hoops which must have been stolen from the great barrel of Heidelberg, and who took up as much room as half a dozen ordinary individuals. They were followed by laughing crowds."

LIBERTY'S LAST FRIEND.

M. Emile Olivier, in speaking against the Safety Bill in the Legislature, is reported to have made use of the following strong language: "No liberty exists. The greatest of all, that of the press, is annihilated, and yet you come to ask for laws of public safety. Do you not fear that the country may say, I have sacrificed to you my liberty, my franchises, my traditions, the conquests of my blood—all that has made me glorious among nations—for the sake of a little tranquillity, and now you ask for more. Where will you stop?"

WHAT IT COSTS TO GET TIPSY AND TALK.

The following conviction for the use of disaffected language appears in Galignani: "A lawyer's clerk, named Dain, of Laon, Aisne, was tried two days ago by the correctional police of that town, for having been guilty of disaffected language against the Emperor. The prisoner had, it appeared, expressed to a fellow-clerk his sorrow that the attempt of the 14th of January should have failed, and had declared that he would have given ten francs to have heard of the Emperor's death. Portraits of Ledru Rollin and other Montagnards were found in his room. Dain admitted having used the expressions attributed to him, but with tears declared that he was intoxicated at the time. The court condemned him to seven months' imprisonment, to a fine of 700 francs, and to pay the costs."

FURTHER ANTI-BRITISH DEMONSTRATIONS.

One of the Paris correspondents of Le Nord says that the military addresses in the Moniteur have not been the only manifestations of feeling against England on the part of the French Colonels—some of those honored with the Order of the Bath having expressed a desire to return their decorations. The Minister of War, according to Le Nord, speedily put a stop to these demonstrations.

IS ORSINI A JESUIT?

A writer in the Standard says: "Orsini is a Jesuit. The words he used, 'My name is a legion,' have always been the motto of the Jesuits. He has been brought up in a Jesuit school, he has been saved in Mantua by Jesuits, and formerly in Switzerland by Jesuits, who are so powerful there. He was arrested in Genoa, because the Jesuits wanted him to do something against the hostile Piedmont. He made the attempt of the 14th ult. in obedience to the orders of the Jesuits, being dissatisfied with Napoleon, who becomes daily more independent of them."

BELGIUM.

ANOTHER JOURNAL PROSECUTED.

It is understood that the prosecution which has been instituted against the Drapeau, of Belgium, for libel on the French Emperor, will be sustained by the whole force of the Government, and that both the Drapeau and M. Labarre, the editor, will be ruined. The following is the article complained of:

"Yesterday evening, as M. Bonaparte was going to the Opera, some projectiles were thrown at his carriage. Several persons were wounded. He himself had only his hat struck. The journals crowd upon this piece of news all the epithets they can collect—terrible, execrable, etc. Without disputing their right to designate the attempt in any way they think proper, and without discussing the sincerity of their indignation, we state to these journals that, for our part, we know of no attempt more terrible, more execrable, than the one which was committed successfully on the night of December 2, 1851, against the liberty and life of the French people. Yes, it is frightful to think that, at the present day, a people, in order to get back its liberty stolen from it by a highway robbery, should be reduced to the last mode, that of assassinating a man. But what is more frightful than to have seen a people morally and materially assassinated for the advantage of this same man? Before making ourselves the cursers of the murderers, let us be informed who is the greatest murderer, and who is the most worthy of our curses. Until then we can only see in attempts similar to that of Thursday evening that which is called the return of things here below, with a warning to the 'Elect of Providence' to have always present to his mind this expression of Scripture, 'He who makes use of the sword shall perish by the sword.'"

PRUSSIA.

THE ARRIVAL OF PRINCE FREDERICK WILLIAM AND HIS BRIDE.

The correspondent of the Times thus describes the meeting of the King and Queen and the young couple:

"The reception of the Prince and Princess Frederick William by the King and Queen at Bellevue Palace, where the young couple stopped to make their final preparations before commencing their public entry into Berlin, was a surprise, and a most agreeable one, to almost every body. The King's state, although a great and constantly progressing improvement on what it was some months back, is nevertheless too variable to admit of any settled plans being formed in connection with it; the meeting, therefore, was an event not provided for in any official programme, and one that was only to take place if, when the moment came, his Majesty's strength would admit of it. This was happily the case; and the meeting gained an additional value in the eyes of the Princess from its very unexpected, unceremonious, and affectionate manner. The King and Queen came for the purpose from Charlottenburg to Bellevue, and, as soon as the near approach of the young couple was announced, the King left the apartments where they were waiting, and went to meet his niece at the bottom of the staircase. The Princess, who was most pleasingly surprised at this unexpected meeting, stooped to kiss his Majesty's hand, but the King anticipated her by taking her in his arms and kissing her, exclaiming at the same time, with joyful emotion, 'How delightful that is! Here you are at last!' He hereupon led her up into the palace, where the Queen received her also very affectionately. When the young couple left there in the festal procession the King returned to Charlottenburg, while the Queen hastened by a détour to arrive at the Schloss in Berlin in time to receive her niece in common with the rest of the royal family; this also was not prearranged or expected, and therefore the more gratifying."

THE STATE ENTRY INTO BERLIN.

He adds: "After devoting the necessary time to the assumption of the festal apparel appropriate to the bridal nature of the Princess's first visit to Berlin, the cortège left Bellevue palace at one o'clock in the grand State carriage, and preceded by a military escort. The State carriage in Prussia is one of those highly-gilded and uncomfortable vehicles that one sees portrayed in Old-World engravings, all angles and allegory, uncouth figures, and inconvenient shapes, and is, if possible, more ugly than our own, but possessing, like it, the one good quality that its ample glazed sides admit of the occupants being thoroughly seen. Thanks to this circumstance, I am enabled to report that the Princess wore a white satin or silk dress, with an ermine tippet over her shoulders and close up round her throat, and a diadem of brilliants in her hair. The Prince wore a Prussian General's uniform, with the broad band of the Order of the Black Eagle. The Prussian State carriage differs, however, from ours in possessing on the centre of its roof a gilt helmet with a fierce-looking plume and open visor, which, surrounded by other military trophies, throws the balance of ugliness, as compared with our own, rather in favor of the Prussian one; but, drawn by eight horses with highly-decorated, old-fashioned trappings, it, nevertheless, seemed more appropriate to the occasion than a modern and more comfortable vehicle would have been."

The entry was, of course, magnificent; du reste, like all such ceremonials.

THE STATE BALL.

Of the State Ball, given in honor of the Prince and Princess, the same writer remarks: "Of the numerous ladies present, and who for the most part occupied estrades round the saloon or sofas advanced on to the floor, it was remarked that, with almost no exception, all wore a white silk or satin jupe, with a pink or blue robe and train. Thus, accidentally or otherwise, the English colors (red, blue, and white, as found in the union-jack) were constantly being combined. The Princess wore a white silk or moire dress, embroidered down the front with silver in a pattern representing the twigs or branches of a rose-tree, and at each point where the bud might be supposed to form in nature a rose of pink crape, as it appeared to me to be, grew out of the dress. The same with the rich pink robe and train, the greater part of which was thickly set with pink roses, and was carried by two pages, and held out at its full extent, apparently about twelve feet long. The pearl necklace I have already described as the present of the illustrious bridegroom, consisting of 32 large pearls, and a tiara of diamonds, tallying with the description of that given to her by the Princess of Prussia, composed the entire ornaments the Princess wore, as far as I could see. Appended to the left shoulder, however, was an order, consisting of a medal suspended from a bow of black and white ribbon, which I presume to have been the Louisa Order, and, if so, must have been conferred on her by the Queen either that day or the day before."

ITALY.

HOW TO ROB A RAILWAY.

It would seem, says a letter from Rome, that the brigands of Italy are by no means disposed to give up their profession in consequence of the introduction of railways. A railroad, not more than nine miles in length, connects Rome with Frascati. On the 28th ultimo an unusually large number of passengers, chiefly of the better class, had taken the train for the latter place; a circumstance, it appears, which the bandits of the neighborhood were well aware of, for in the interval they surprised one of the signalmen on the most deserted spot of the line, and then hoisted a red flag as a signal of danger. The engine-driver, on approaching, saw the signal, and stopped the train; immediately two men sprang upon him and secured him, while their confederates leisurely opened the doors of the railway carriages, and rifled the pockets of all within, without the slightest opposition. After this operation the train was allowed to continue its route.

THE TRIAL OF THE SALERNO CONSPIRATORS.

The Salerno trial was resumed on the 1st ult., but Watt, the English engineer, whose mind appears to be broken down by suffering and imprisonment, again refused to appear, and violence was not used, as it would evidently have driven him into positive frenzy. Signor D. Francesca, one of the advocates of the crew of the Cagliari, wished that a diary of events, kept on board from the day of the departure from Genoa till the landing at Sapri should be produced, in order that Baron Nicotera might be questioned as to the authorship. The diary, it is said, was written by Pisacane, the leader of the expedition, and contained an exculpation of the crew; but, though other documents found on board had been used against the prisoners, this was not allowed to be used on their behalf. "Thus," says the reporter, "another gross illegality has been committed." Some of the accused complained bitterly of the treatment they had received, and of having been robbed of all their clothes and money, and one declared they had been buffeted and knocked down with hatchets. They also stated that many of their companions had been massacred in cold blood after surrender; that thirty-five had been murdered in this way at Padula, and twenty-seven at Sanza; that the bodies of the wounded were rolled over the cliffs, and their existence thus finished; and that it happened thus with Pisacane and Falcone. Others complained that, though brought to the prison in carriages, to create the impression that they were well treated, they were dying of cold in the prison, for want of bed or covering. All, too, united in exculpating the captain and crew of the Cagliari from all part in the conspiracy. There was a manifest eagerness on the part of all to do this, from Baron Nicotera downward. Their declarations were clear, precise, and repeated by several of them many times in such words as these; "We alone are guilty; we compelled the captain and the crew to act under our orders; we put them down below and kept watch over them."

TURKEY.

A CIRCASSIAN SLAVE-DEALER IN TROUBLE.

A letter from Trebisond, of the 18th, gives some details of the disturbance caused there by the Circassian slave merchants: "Our city has just been in great confusion in consequence of the conduct of some Circassians who bring slaves from the eastern coast of the Black Sea to be sold at Constantinople. About a hundred of these men have been here for some time with a number of young women and children, whom they wished to convey to the Turkish capital, but their embarkation was opposed by M. Machnine, the Russian consul. He, on the contrary, wished that they should return to Circassia, and offered them passports for that purpose. The Circassians refused, and attempted this day to embark on board the steam-packet, but were refused. Highly irritated at this, they assembled in the public square, fully armed, and thence sent message after message to the Russian consul, urging him to give them passports for Constantinople, and threatening to kill him and burn his house unless he complied. All the town was soon in commotion, and a great number of people assembled out of doors. During this time all the other consuls hastened, completely armed, to the assistance of their colleague of Russia, and several Russians in the place also went to the consulate for the same purpose. More than 300 persons had assembled under the windows of the consulate, all determined to support the consul, when it was announced by a message from the Pasha that the Circassians had decided on returning home, and the governer himself shortly after came, and said that all apprehension of a riot might be considered at an end."

AFRICA.

FEARFUL ENCOUNTER WITH A TIGRESS.

In October last, near the Cape of Good Hope, Whitboy Swart, residing in the Zwarte Ruggens, went out at daylight one morning in search of a horse, and while strolling about the neighborhood in which he resides, his attention was attracted toward a bush by the yelping of three young dogs that had followed him from his home. On approaching the spot, he was startled by finding that his canine companions had joined a beautifully spotted tigress, that was lying on its back, with which they appeared to be enjoying a very satisfactory romp. Upon perceiving the man, the animal sprang to its feet, and Whitboy, though a noted hunter, and an athletic, bold, and active man, retreated, being unarmed, except with a small switch or stick; the tigress pursued him, and finding that he lost ground, he resolved on wheeling about and facing the animal, which, with one blow of its paw, tore away part of his cheek, and would, with the violence of the concussion, have knocked him to the ground had it not been for the support which he received from a small bush near him, which prevented him from falling on his back; probably to this circumstance he is indebted for his life, for with the tiger above him he would have been perfectly powerless. Whitboy struck at the savage beast with the switch in his possession, but this also fell from his hand; to preserve his face he now assumed a pugilistic attitude, when the tigress seized hold of his arm; with his other hand he then picked up a stone, which he placed in the jaws of the enraged brute to prevent his arm from being bitten in two. This done, he next seized his opponent by the throat, and by his great strength threw her down, and placed his knee on her neck; fortunately the dogs, though young, now harassed the enraged animal, and thus kept its paws engaged. The man then drew his arm out of the jaws of the animal, but when he had almost extricated it, the stone fell out, and the animal seized his hand, which was so severely bitten as to be disabled. With the other he now took the stone, and battered the tigress's nose and teeth. In this position, and in the greatest agony, he was two hours contending with his enemy. He had a knife in his pocket, but the other hand having been rendered helpless, he could not open the blade; he now contrived by main strength to move himself and the tigress to the spot where his switch lay, about six yards off. The struggling of the two combatants became quite terrific—the ground was trampled quite hard, and the spot covered with blood. Reduced to the last extremity, and believing the animal to be in a similar state, he resolved on encouraging the dogs to attack her while he jumped up and ran off. After running for about 300 yards, he looked round, and found the dogs coming on alone. He then hastened to a farmer's house to request assistance; they visited the spot and curiously examined the small clumps of trees, but having no dogs on which they could depend, the search was soon given up, and the wounded man conveyed to his home; his wounds were dressed, and he lay in a very precarious state for four weeks, having been twice attacked with lock-jaw; his sufferings were intense, one arm being entirely disabled, and the lower parts of his body severely lacerated. He was engaged altogether for two hours and a half. Hopes were, however, indulged that a sound constitution and powerful nerves would sustain him, and that he would ultimately recover from injuries which must have proved inevitably fatal to one of less physical power.

INDIA.

THE LATEST NEWS.

We have news from India dated at Bombay on the 24th of January. The capture of Furruckabad and Futtyghur by Sir Colin Campbell is confirmed. The Nawab fled across the Ganges into Rohilcund, whither Sir Colin was about to follow him; and after the subjugation of Rohilcund, the Commander-in-Chief was to advance again upon Lucknow. On the 12th and 16th of January, Sir James Outram, at the Alumbagh, was attacked by the rebels, who on both occasions were driven back with great slaughter. In the last engagement the leader of the rebels was taken prisoner. The Indian papers state that the country all over was being tranquilized by degrees, but that a vast amount of work had still to be performed. The "Lucknow heroines" had arrived at Calcutta, and were received with great enthusiasm and a salute from the fort. There are no authentic accounts of the enemy in and around Lucknow, but it was considered not unlikely that they numbered 100,000 men.

THE TRIAL OF THE KING OF DELHI.

The trial of the ex-King of Delhi had been fixed for the 9th of January, but the prisoner being indisposed it was postponed until the 13th. The charges preferred against him by the Government prosecutor, Major Harriott, of the Judge-Advocate General's department, are for encouraging mutiny and rebellion against the State, while a pensioner of the British Government in India; for having declared himself Sovereign of India. And the last charge is that he did feloniously cause and become accessory to the murder of 49 persons, chiefly women and children, of European and mixed European descent, and did, moreover, encourage and abet divers soldiers and others in murdering European officers and other English subjects, including women and children, both by giving and promising such murderers service, advancement, and distinctions. And further, that he issued orders to different native rulers, having local authority in India, to slay and murder Christians and English people wherever and whenever found in their territories. If these charges are proved, the Court can not but sentence the prisoner to death; but the general supposition is that his life will be spared, having been guaranteed to him at the time of his capture, though by whom, or by whose authority, we are as much in the dark as ever.

DID THE SEPOYS MUTILATE ENGLISH LADIES?

An English paper says: "The allegation that the rebels and natives of India had not been guilty of any acts of mutilation can not apparently be sustained. A correspondent of the Times asserts that he knows two ladies and one child now in England—one lady having lost her nose and ears; the other, nose, ears, and lower lip; while the child is minus feet and hands. He can not believe that these are the only sufferers, and thinks it must be evident to every one that all who have been thus brutally used should wish to live in private. A police magistrate in London is also personally acquainted with a lady residing in the neighborhood of the metropolis who has come home from India in a dreadfully mutilated condition, and who has brought with her a child whose feet and hands have been cut off by the Sepoys. A medical man in London authorizes the Morning Advertiser to say that he attends another lady who is so frightfully disfigured by the mutilations made on her by the mutineers that she refuses to see any body but her nearest relations. Moreover, says that journal, we are only stating what is known to many persons in private, that Mr. Vernon Smith, President of the Board of Control, makes no secret of the fact that he knows individual cases of ladies who were maltreated by the Sepoys in a way so gross as that no reference can be made to the circumstances in a public journal.

THE NIGHTINGALE OF LUCKNOW.

A letter from a Lieutenant in the 32d regiment, to his father, who was in the residency at Lucknow, and who, being wounded, on his return to England mentions the case of a Christian heroine, who appears to have acted all the part of a Miss Nightingale to the unfortunate wounded. Unfortunately, however, for her deification, she has a most unromantic name. The writer says: "I can not close my letter without expressing the deep and heartfelt sense of gratitude I feel for the kindness shown to me by Mr. and Mrs. Gubbins, of the civil service, during my time of sickness and suffering in hospital. Mrs. Gubbins was truly 'The Nightingale of Lucknow;' she never ceased in her visits of kindness and mercy to the sick and wounded, dressing their wounds, watching them in weakness, and supplying their wants, and this at the imminent peril of her own life, not merely from contagion, but from the bullets of the enemy. When General Havelock's force came in and we had an interval of comparative rest, she seized the opportunity, and took over to her own house the worst cases in the hospital; she fed them out of her own scanty stores, and gave them her own wine. I was one of the fortunate number, and never shall I forget the Christian kindness and devoted attention of 'the Gubbinses.'"

CHINA.

BOMBARDMENT OF CANTON.

There is nothing late from China; but the correspondence from Canton gives ample details of the bombardment of that place.

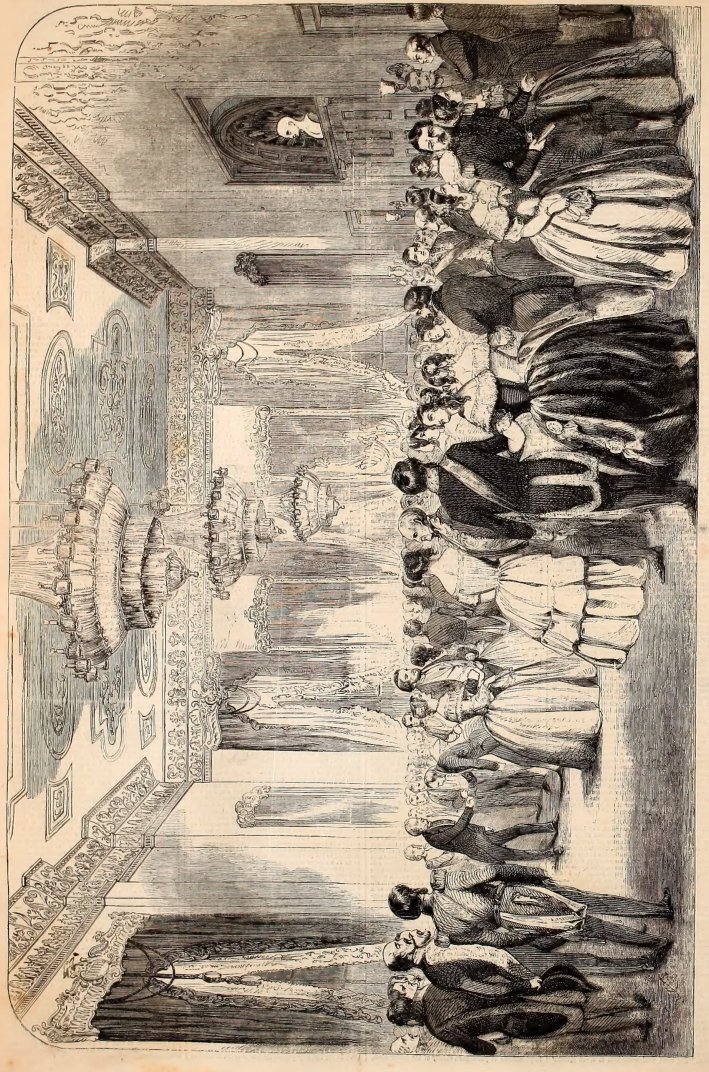
The assault and capture of Gough's Fort took place just as the mail was leaving, so that no particulars are received. All the hill-defenses of the city were in possession of the English and French. The whole of the operations had been concluded with a view to occasion the smallest possible sacrifice of life. At the last moment the Chinese showed no signs of surrendering, but continued to fire at their adversaries from the tops of houses. The position of the allies was such that they could entirely destroy the city in case of continued obstinacy.

The official dispatches from the naval and military commanders-in-chief report that the city was escaladed and captured with trifling loss on the morning of the 29th of December.

MEXICO.

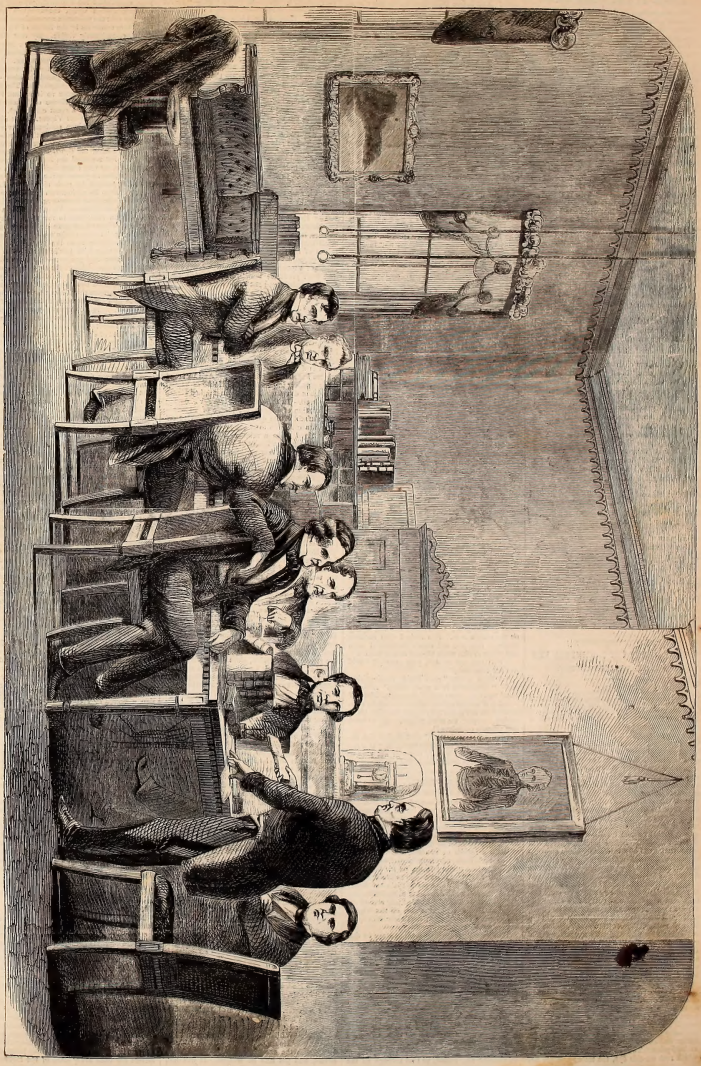
STATE OF AFFAIRS IN THE CITY.

The correspondent of the Herald says: "Thirty days have now rolled quietly by since the Comonfort Juarez government fell amidst the roar of cannon, the rattle of artillery, the bursting of shells, the whiz and crash of balls, etc. Exciting and horrid at times as was the appearance of this city during the bombardment, which set the yuros to flight and drove Comonfort out of the country, I have failed to learn of much bloodshed. A good election knock-down in the Sixth ward of your city would have furnished a longer list of mortality. This circumstance of so small a number of killed is wonderful even to us here, and must be still more so when it is known that for about eighteen hours, on the last day of the fight, firing was continuous, and for about seven hours of this time shells fell like hail for hundreds of yards around all the points held by the contending forces. These points being within musket-shot range of each other throughout the city, there was scarcely a house that was not exposed to catch the reckless fire of both parties. The tactics of Mexican gunners is peculiar to themselves. If a gun was holding a good position it was sure not to be used; if it was required to be used it immediately was removed from its commanding position. The course of the Mexicans is doubtless the most humane known. A tremendous noise is made, houses are destroyed, every donkey, cat, dog, or other animal that may happen in line is shot down, commerce is closed, women and children are scared out of their wits for days, while the roar of the cannon and the tingling whistle of the Minie rifle-ball give evidence that a great and bloodless battle is waging between two forces, scattered over house tops and secured behind sand bags and parapets. The first spasmodic or accidental exhibition of valor ends the day."



BRITISH PROVINCES.

A PROPOSED BRITISH CONFEDERATION.



The Hon. James W. Johnston, Attorney-General, and Adams G. Archibald, Esq., Commissioners of Nova Scotia, to London, were instructed, on the 16th June last, to confer with the Imperial Government on the subject of a union of the British North American provinces. They give, in a letter to the Provincial Secretary under date of February 8, the following as the result of their interview with Mr. Labouchere:

"He informed us that her Majesty's government had no desire to interfere with the determination to which the Colonies themselves might come on a point so immediately affecting their own interests; and that if they should be of opinion that union would advance their prosperity, the government would oppose no obstacle to their wishes."

In pursuance of this, the government of Nova Scotia has opened negotiations with the other provinces for such confederation.

A PRESIDENTIAL RECEPTION AT THE WHITE HOUSE, WASHINGTON.

THE CABINET COUNCIL.

SCENES AT THE WHITE HOUSE.

THE illustrations on the preceding pages, which represent a Reception at the White House and a Cabinet Council, will, we think, be admired throughout the country.

It will be remembered that during the last Presidential contest one of the objections most frequently urged against Mr. Buchanan was his unfortunate bachelorhood. It was said that were he elected the White House would be a dull, gloomy bachelor-hall, destitute of the charm of female society, and stupid masculine enjoyments; whereas the accomplished wife of his rival, Colonel Fremont, would do the honors of the Presidential mansion with infinite grace and tact. These cavaliers forgot that, if Mr. Buchanan was not blessed with a wife, he had a niece, the charming and amiable Miss Lane; and that she would take the place which has been filled by Mrs. Buchanan, had there existed such a lady. It is universally acknowledged that the White House has become more brilliant and refined since the advent of which Miss Lane has done the honors. Visitors to Washington are not likely to forget the social gatherings which the White House has contained under our bachelor President.

Our picture of the Cabinet will do to begin. It will be noticed that the portraits of the President and Secretaries are faithful and correct. They do great credit to the artist.

TEA-PARTY POLITICS.

I am glad you are getting acquainted;
I know you'll be struck by her clothes;
But that's what I told you she "painted;"
We're on such very intimate terms.

She's led sweet-hearts, of course, by the dozen;
"Engagements," some dozens of crosses;
But one can't say many things of one's cousin
We're on such very intimate terms.

Of course you are charmed with "the Heiress,"
Whose "grace" is all wriggle and squirms;
They say she was engaged to young Spoker
They're on such very intimate terms!

Her smile 'twould bewilder a matador,
Or break ten poetical trees;
But I know it is all artificious—
We're on such very intimate terms.

There's that snaky-eyed belle from the city,
Whose "dash" deals in blubber and sperma,
You'll think her both pretty and witty
Til you get upon intimate terms.

And that widow-bewitched, who will weave all
Her weeds into barn-catching foams!
But then we are sisters (in Eve) all,
And such are its intimate terms.

—And thus the "inquiring" stranger
Gets "crammed" by these gossiping rims,
B. Biting and D—g-in-the-Manger,
Who will keep his intimate terms.

But one soon puts em "down" if one chooses;
I've a rule to dispel all their "charms:"
Cut each jade, and with those she abuses
Grow at once upon intimate terms!

J. S. T.

HOCKANONG VALLEY, 1859.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER V.

MR. Waife, being by nature wrinkety, resident, that is, proportion as between beings who grow old and who convert it into bad. He suffers Mr. George Morley to get away in his debt, and Sophy fears that he will be dott in consequence.

GARNOCK MARKET, a few weeks after the conversation last recorded, took his departure from Montfort Court, prepared, without a scruple, to present himself for ordination to the priestly bishop. From Waife he derived more than the sum of a shilling's intimacy; he received those hints which, to a man who has the natural temperament of an orator, so rarely united with that of the scholar, expedite the mastery of the art which makes the fleeting human voice an abiding, inexhaustible power. The practical teacher exhausted all his love upon the pupil whose genius he had fired—whose heart had imbued himself before. Before leaving, he was much perplexed how to offer to Waife any effectual remuneration for that which, in the legislature, had already overpaid all the benefits he had received—viz., augmenting friendship and pledged protection. It need scarcely be said that George thought the man to whom he owed fortune and happiness was entitled to something beyond that moral recompense. But he found, at the first delicate hint, that Waife would not hear of money, though the ex-Comedian did not affect any very Quixotic notions on that practical subject. "To tell you the truth, Sir, I have rather a superstition against having more money in my pocket than I have need to part with. It has always brought me bad luck. And what is very hard—the bad luck stays, but the money goes. There was that splendid sum I made at Gainsboro'. You should have seen me counting it over. I could not have had a prouder or more swelling heart if I had been that great man Mr. Elwes the miser. And what bad luck it brought me, and how it all frittered itself away! Nothing to show for it but a silk ladder and an old hunting-gown, and a debt to an half-price. Then, when I had the accident which cost me this eye, the railway people behaved so generously, gave me £120—think of that! And before three days the money was all gone!"

"How was that?" said George, half amused, half pained; "stolen, perhaps?"

"Not so," answered Waife, somewhat gloomily, "but restored. A poor dear old man, who thought very ill of me—and I don't wonder at it—was reduced from great wealth to great poverty. While I was laid up my landlady read a newspaper to me, and in that newspaper was an account of the old man's misfortunes. He was accountable to him for the balance of an old debt, and also, as the executor's bills, quite exceeded my £120. I hope he does not think quite so ill of me now. But the money burned my pocket like a traitor than to be. . . . Well, Sir, if you were now to give me money I should be on the hovel or some respectable common lodging. Gold is not natural to me. Some day, however, by-and-by, when you are thinking of settling down for good and have a renowned preacher, and have plenty to spare, with an idea that you would feel more comfortable in your mind if you had done something royal for the basket-maker, I will ask you to give me a number on a train which I am going by decrees to save—an enormous sum—as much as I paid away from my railway compensation—I can tell you. But who lent it to release Sophy from an engagement which I—certainly without any remorse whatever—made the child break."

"Oh yes! What is the amount? Let me at once relieve your mind."

"Not yet. The lady can wait—and she would be pleased to wait, but only on condition that I—as would be unkind to her to pay it off at once. But in the mean while, if you could send me a very good book for Sophy I—certainly not for not very, very dry. And a French dictionary—I am teach her French when the winter days close in. You see I am not above being paid, Sir. But, Mr. Morley, there is a great favor you can do me."

"What is it? Speak."

"Caution Sophy from doing me a great disservice! You are going back to your friends and relations. Never speak of me to them. Never describe me and my child. Name not the lady, nor—nor—her—the man who chained Sophy. Your friends might not use me, others might. Talk travels. The Hare is not long in its form when it has a friend to hound that gives tongue. Promise what I ask. Promise it as 'man and gentleman.'"

"Certainly. Yet I have one condition to whom I should like, with your permission, to speak of you, with whom I could wish you might meet. He is so sincere a man of the world that he might suggest some method to clear your good name. I should like a second opinion." "Not under, Colonel Morley—"

"On an account," cried Waife, almost fiercely, and he evinced so much anger and uneasiness that it was long before George could persuade him by the most earnest assurances that his secret should be inviolably kept, and his injunctions faithfully obeyed. No more could he be consulted how to force him back to the world at men that he fled from! No colonels to scan him with narrowed eyes, and bow him to decay a tanskit! Waife's apprehensions gradually allayed, his confidence returned, and before morning George took leave of his eccentric benefactor.

Waife and Sophy stood gazing after him from their garden-gate; the cripple leaning lightly on the child. Sophy, who strongly suspected fondness into the old man's thoughtful face, and clung to him more closely as she looked.

"Will you be dull, poor dear?" "Will you not miss him?"

"A little at first," said Waife, rousing himself. "Education is a great thing. An educated mind, provided that it does us no mischief—which is not always the case—can never be withdrawn from our existences without leaving a blank behind. Sophy, you are strongly urged to read and educate ourselves!"

"We will, grandfather dear," said Sophy, with decision; and a few minutes afterward, "I I can become very, very clever, you will not miss so much after that gentleman—will you, grandy?"

CHAPTER VI.

Being a chapter that comes in on untimely end.

WESTERN was for advanced when Montfort Court was again brightened by the presence of its lady. A letter from Lord Lyndhurst had reached her before leaving Windsor, suggesting how much it would be for the advantage of the Queen's interest if she would consent to visit for a month or two the seat in Ireland, which the Earl had lately purchased, and to which my lord would join her on his departure from his Hibernian duties. The letter was from Lady Montfort. My lord did not join her there; but Mr. Curr Vyvent deemed it desirable for the interests of the world that she should join her unite at Montfort Court, where all the Vyvent family were invited to witness their felicity and mitigate their ennui.

But, before proceeding another stage in this history, it becomes our tribute of respect to the great House of Vyvent to pause and place in past events a brief chronological table, a fuller display before the reverential reader. The House of Vyvent! What am I about? The House of Vyvent requires a chapter to itself.

CHAPTER VII.

THE HOUSE OF VYVENT.—Majora canamus.

THE House of Vyvent! Looking back through ages, it seems as if the House of Vyvent were always prosperous, living illustrious lives, and its progressive development a connected unity of thought and action, so that through all the changes of its outward form it had been moved and guided by the same single spirit—"Le roi est mort—vive le roi!"—A Vyvent dies—live the Vyvent! Despite its high-sounding Norman name, the House of Vyvent was no House at all for some generations after the Conquest. The first Vyvent who emerged from the obscurity of time was a rude soldier, of Saxon origin, in the reign of Henry I., one of the thousand stalwart men who sailed from Milford Haven with Fitz Stephen and Fitz Gerald, on that miserable expedition which ended in the conquest of Ireland. This gallant man obtained large grants of land in that fatal island—some Mores of it vanished, and the House of Vyvent rose.

Henry the Second Richard I., Princes of Vyvent, though recalled to England (leaving its Irish acquisitions in charge of a fierce cadet, who founded a race of warlike kerned itself from the Crusade, and, by marriage with a rich goldsmith's daughter, added wealth to land property), those who indulged in that exciting but costly pilgrimage. In the reign of Henry III. the Vyvents succeeded in mortgages on lands thus pledged, and became possessed of a very fair property in Kent, as well as its fiefs in the sister isle.

The House of Vyvent took no part in the troublesome politics of that day. Discreetly obscure, it attended to its own fortunes, and felt small interest in Magna Charta. During the reigns of the Plantagenet Edwards, who were more conscious of unrecognized literature, the House of Vyvent, shunning Crecy, Bannockburn, and such profitless brawls, intermarried with London citizens, and got many a good thing out of the Geocese. In the reign of Henry IV. the House of Vyvent began to feel the benefit of its past forbearance and modesty. Now, for the first time, the Vyvents appear as lusted knights—not a town but figures on them—they buy Lancaster to the back-bone—they are exceedingly indignant against the Percies—they back the Bolbads—they have places in the household of Queen Joan, who was called a witch, but a witch is a very good friend when she holds a sceptre instead of a broomstick. And in proof of its growing importance, the House of Vyvent marries a daughter of the then high House of Darrell. In the reign of Henry V., during the invasion of France, the House of Vyvent, being afraid of the dysentery which carried off the greatest heroes of that reign, and of Agincourt—contrived to be a minor. The Wars of the Roses puzzled the House of Vyvent sadly. It was a toss through that perilous ordeal with singular tact and success. The manner in which it changed sides, and made change safe, and many changes lucrative, is beyond all praise.

On the whole, it preferred the Yorkists; it was impossible to avowedly Lancasterism, with Henry VI. of Lancaster always in prison. And then, as the Earls of Edward IV., the House of Vyvent was Baron Vyvent of Vyvent, with twenty manors, and in Henry VII. counted on the favor of Vyvent, when he left London to meet Richmond at Bosworth—he counted without his host. The House of Vyvent was decidedly Lancasterian, and was among the first to crowd Henry VII. on his return to the throne of the metropolis. In that reign it married a relation of Empson's—did the great House of Vyvent? and in the reign of Henry VIII. existed by burning Lollards, the House of Vyvent was all for the Reformation, and obtained the lands of two priories and one abbey. Gorged with that prey, the House of Vyvent, like anacondas in the process of digestion, slept long. But no, it slept not. Though it kept itself still as a means during the reign of Edward VI., Queen Mary (only letting it be known at court that the House of Vyvent had never wavered—never could waver), during the reigns of Elizabeth and James it made no noise, the House of Vyvent was silently by fitting its habits and improving its constitution. Slept, indeed! it was wide awake. Then it was that it began to contract those wise alliances and alliances; then was it sedulously grafting its olive branches on the stems of those of the New Houses that had sprung up with the Tudors; then, alive to the spirit of the day, perceived that the time for the movers, and the length and breadth of the land it wove the intricate web of those family connections which, step by step, began to build palaces, to inclose parks —it traveled, too, a little—did the House of Vyvent. In the reign of Charles I. it received a state; a very elegant House became the House of Vyvent. At the Queen's reign, for the first time, the House of Vyvent got the Garter. The Civil Wars broke out—England was rent. Peer and Knight, Baron and Squire, took side or declined. The House of Vyvent was again perplexed. Certainly not for the Roundheads, but for the King Charles. But when King Charles took to fighting the House of Vyvent shook its sagacious head, and went about, like Lord Falkland, saying "Peace, peace!" Finally it remembered its relationship to Irish cousins, and transplanted itself to Dublin. To Ireland it went, discreetly said, and, marrying a kinswoman of Lord Strafford's, became popular and quite constitutional. Returned to England with Charles II., and, by the Restoration, found itself a peer. Not a very high—I cannot say a lofty—title, but a peerage. Lord Vyvent of Vyvent was a very elegant House to be—the House of Vyvent got the Garter. The Civil Wars broke out—England was rent. Peer and Knight, Baron and Squire, took side or declined. The House of Vyvent was again perplexed. Certainly not for the Roundheads, but for the King Charles. But when King Charles took to fighting the House of Vyvent shook its sagacious head, went about, like Lord Falkland, saying "Peace, peace!" Finally it remembered its relationship to Irish cousins, and transplanted itself to Dublin. To Ireland it went, discreetly said, and, marrying a kinswoman of Lord Strafford's, became popular and quite constitutional. Returned to England with Charles II., and, by the Restoration, found itself a peer. Not a very high—I cannot say a lofty—title, but a peerage. Lord Vyvent of Vyvent was a very elegant House to be—the House of Vyvent got the Garter.

The House of Vyvent had long generations been an energetic race. Whatever their defects, they had evidently inherited great vigor. The late Vyvents (grandfather to the present) had been, perhaps, the ablest (that is, done most for the House of Vyvent) of their race. Of a grandiose and superb mode of living—of a majestic deportment—of princely manners—of remarkable talent for the management of all business, whether private or public—a perfect enthusiast for the House of Vyvent, and aided by a marchioness in all respects worthy of him, he might be said to be the culminating flower of the venerable stem. But the present lord, succeeding to the title as a mere child, was a melancholy example of heredity to his grandson, but to the general character of his progenitors. Before his time every head of the House had done something for it—even the most frivolous had contributed one line collected in a picture, another the statues, a third the medals, a fourth had amassed the famous Vipont library; while others had at least married heiresses, or augmented, through ducal lines, the splendor of the interminable escutcheon. The present marquis was literally sui. The pith of the Viponts was not in him. He looked well, he dressed well; if life were only the dumb show of a tableau, he would have been a paragon of a Marquis. But he was like no watches we pass daily in the cities, with a pretty gilt dial-plate, and no works in them. He was thoroughly inert—there was no winding him up; he could not improve his fair property—he could not answer his letters—very few of them could be even read through. He was, in fact, not interested, nor literature, nor field-sports. He was shot, it is true, but mechanically—wondering, perhaps, why he did shoot. He attended races, because the House of Vipont kept a racing stud. He bet on his own horses, but if they lost showed no vexation. Admirers (no Marquis of Montfort could be without them) said, "What fine temper! what good-breeding!" it was nothing but constitutional apathy. No one could call him a bad man—he was not a profligate, an oppressor, a miser, a spendthrift; he would not have taken the bones to be a bed man on any account. Those who beheld his character as a distance would have called him an exemplary man. He owed conspicuous duties of his station, subscriptions, charities, the maintenance of great establishments, the encouragement of the fine arts, were virtues admirably performed for him by others. But the sphere or nullity of his being was not, after all, so complete as I have made it, perhaps, appear. He had one susceptibility—which is more common with women than with men—the susceptibility to pique. His answer proper was unforgiveness—to say that, and he said it—was a trifling, a foolish thing, a spiteful thing—pique that, surely, he could! He watch over, as the care of a rooted pique against his marchioness. Apparently he had conceived this pique from the very first. He showed it passively by extreme negligence; he showed it actively by removing her from all the spheres of power which naturally fell to the wife when the husband shuns the details of business. Evidently he had a dread lest any one should say, "Lady Montfort influences my land." Accordingly, not only the management of the estate, but all that fell to her own, of his gardens, his household, his domestic arrangements. It was Curr Vipont or Lady Selina who said to Lady Montfort, "Do this," and "Do that," "You should ask so and so to dinner." Montfort was much hurt to see the Duchess at the Twickenham Villa broken up by those new footsteps. True, it is settled on you as a jointure house, but for that very reason Montfort is a treasure-house, etc. etc. In fact, they were virtually as separated, my lord and my lady, as if they were disunited, and as if Curr Vipont and Lady Selina were trustees or intermediaries in my public approach to each other. But, on the other hand, it is fair to say that where Lady Montfort's tokens of esteem did not happen to suit her husband's plans, habits, likings, dislikings, jealous apprehensions, that she should be supposed to have any ascendency over what would have belonged to himself as Rex faineant of the Vipont's, and to which he was by his sex and his masculine control or conjugal advice. At her disposal was wealth without stint—every luxury the soft could desire—every gewgaw that vain could covet. Had her pin-money, which was in itself the revenue of an ordinary nobleman, been used to satisfy her wants—had she grown tired of wearing the family diamonds—had one of the new gems from Golconda—a single word to Curr Vipont or Lady Selina would have been answered by a carte blanche on the Bank of England. But Lady Montfort had the misfortune not to be extravagant in her taste. Strange as it is in the world Lord Montfort's marriage was called a love match; he had married a portionless girl, daughter to one of his poorest and remotest cousins, against the uniform policy of the House of Vipont, which did all it could to prevent marriages except marrying them to its chief. But Lady Montfort's conduct in these trying circumstances was admirable and rare. For three years her humiliation was unless we resent them—and in vain. Lady Montfort had had exquisite susceptibility, and gives to submission the grace of cheerful equanimity. That in the gay world Bettvers should gather round a young wife so conspicuously neglected, and so wholly left by her husband to her own guidance, was inevitable. There was the first insinuated compliment or pathetic confidence, Lady Montfort, so meek in her household, was haughty enough to keep admirers at a distance. She was thus very early felt to be beyond temptation, and the loudest gossip was constrained to tempt. She was unpopular; called "proud and freezing;" she did not extend the influence of her House; she did not keep up the fashion—fashion which necessitates social ease, and which we rank, no wealth, as we may give themselves suffice to give. And this failure on her part was a great offense in the eyes of the House of Vipont. "She does absolutely nothing for us," said Lady Selina; but Lady Selina in her heart was very pleased that the Duchess's credit thus fell, almost without a rival, the female representation, in the great world, of the Vipont honors. Lady Selina was fashion itself.

Lady Montfort's social peculiarity was in the eagerness with which she sought the society of persons who enjoyed a reputation for superior intellect, whether statesmen, lawyers, authors, philosophers, artists. Intellectual intercourse seemed as if it was her native atmosphere, from which she was habitually banished, to which she returned with an instinctive yearning and a new zest of life; yet was she styled, even here, but seemingly without justice—capricious and unsteady in her likings. These clever personages, after a little while, all seemed to disappoint her expectations of them; she sought the acquaintance of each with ordinal earnestness; slid from the acquaintance with weary languor; never, after all, less a cone than when alone.

And so wondrous lovely! Looking so rare as beauty of the high type; genius and beauty, indeed, are both rare; genius, which is the beauty of the mind—beauty, which is the genius of the body. But, of the two, beauty is the rarer. All of us can remember, in the course of forty to fifty persons of undoubted and illustrious genius, including those famous in action, letters, art, not one say of us remembers more than more than four or five specimens of first-rate ideal beauty." Montfort and Lady Montfort would have ranked her among such four or five in his recollection. There was in her face that lustrous dazzle to which the Latin poet, perhaps, refers when he speaks of the > Splendentis Pariæ marmore purius . . .

> Et vultus, nimium lubricus aspici, and which an English poet, with the less sensuous but more spiritual imagination of northern genius, has described in lines that an English reader may be pleased to see rescued from oblivion :

> "Her face was like the milky way i' the sky,
> A meeting of gentle lights without a name."

The eyes so purely bright, the impalpable harmony of coloring between the dark (not too dark) hair, and the delicate skin, the soft, yet vivid radiance in the lip when it broke into a smile. And it was said that in her maiden day, before Caroline Lindsay became Marchioness of Montfort, that smile was the most joyous thing imaginable. Montfort, who could not think of it, but that stately lady had been a wild, frolicsome girl, with the merriest laugh and the quickest foot, filling the air to-day with April-weather shine. Certainly, no being ever yet lived the Life Nature intended her to lead. She was a play for heart and mind, who contrived, by hook or by crook—to marry the wrong person!

THE TEST.

THE room was old; the walls were gray;
The floor was honeycombed with age;
On arras eaten with decay,
Sad portraits shone of knight and sage.
Beneath a window which the sun
Clove with a sword of crimson light,
There stood, as day was just begun,
Old Abbas and his neophyte.

Then Abbas, the magician, said,
Breaking the young one's golden hair,
"The vigil's past; the charm is bred;
I hear the demons in the air.
They float in on the mystic line.
The mystic vapor yields thy breath.
Art thou prepared to give the sign
That tests you arm of Life or Death?

"Young Asriel, peace! Bethink thee well.
That should thy courage fail to be free,
Sweet is the potence of the spell,
And endless knowledge blooms for thee!
But if one base or foul desire
Within its secret cell hath harm,
Thou'rt victim of the demon's fire!
Thou know'st the pact. There lies the urn!"

Young Asriel raised his scornful head,
Proud as young eagle dares the sun,
"I fear nor God nor fiend!" he said.

"Old Magus, see! the deed is done!"
He seized the alabaster vase
That near him on the tripod stood;
He quaffed—a thunder-clap—a blaze!
And Abbas' feet were bathed in blood!

THE STORY OF AN OLD MAID'S LIFE.

WELL, then (began my aunt), I am going to tell the history of an old maid's life. You have listened to my heroine, and she is but a poor heroine, I must speak of her as a girl. I will not tell you her real name, but it is the same as that of three good, and might-do-harm; call her Caroline or Carrie. She lived with her father's sister, in a pretty little cottage in Devonshire that I have seen, and which in a most lovable place—many miles from here where speaking comes to an end—was anxiety and her father's was the well-being of the only son of their house, who was also their darling way. He was supposed to be doing very well and steadily, but his father and sister in the little Devonshire cottage were often uneasy about him.

Carrie's life was a very peaceful and honest one; she helped the servants in their work, and that finished, made her garden smart. Carrie was not beauty; she was fairly good-looking, and fairly good-tempered, and with large notions of honor and candor implanted in her by her father. She was about twenty when the history of her life—if I may so term it—began. She was plucking the dead leaves of a geranium, when the distant and slow clatter of a horse's hoofs became very rapid and near. In another moment a horse and rider tore past, the animal's eyes starting from its head, and the rider vainly trying to hold him in. He was young and fairly handsome; of course, Carrie did not mark these qualities as he was carried past, but she had opportunities of doing so after, poor girl!

* Suckling.

Attracted by the clatter, a man-servant came out from a room into the road, his head streaming behind him, and shading his eyes from the sun with one hand. Suddenly he started, and ran, as the clattering stopped for a moment and then began more loudly than before.

The girl ran out into the road, and, looking down it, she saw a gentleman lying insensible, while the riderless horse was disappearing in the distance. She called to another man-servant and then herself ran down the road. Stooping, she saw that he was insensible. She put back some hair from his forehead, which was quite cold, and then, seeing the servants standing about her, she asked them if they knew the gentleman up and carried him to the house. Her own bedroom being on the ground-floor, Carrie's was not really a gentleman being nearest, she directed the men to carry the sufferer into it, and he was laid upon her bed. He soon came to, and looked wildly about him, but he quickly comprehended his position, for he smiled on the girl as he closed his eyes—it was then he opened them that Carrie saw that they were blue.

Soon the village doctor was at hand; there was no great harm done, the gentleman's shoulder was slightly injured—a few days' rest where he was and all would be well.

When Carrie's father came home, the tramp of his sure-footed horse was heard a long way down the road. Carrie was very strange of his daughter's work, but he round and she had had the stranger taken into her own room; who could have been a visitor's room?—there were several spare rooms.

The girl said, "It was the nearest room."

"Well, well," said the father, "let him stay there!"

In the case was more troublesome than the village doctor thought; so said the physician from the town near at hand. The patient "must not be disturbed" some weeks instead of days. When he recovered from the shock of the fall sufficiently to converse, he told Carrie about him in a perfectly kind manner, and yet with a sense of superiority upon him, as though he spoke to familiarly was a condescension. This mood lasted for three days, during which Carrie chiefly attended on him, for the women-servants of the house had enough to attend to, it being harvest-time.

It was the end of the third day, and Carrie had just taken a tea-tray from the table beside which the injured young fellow was lying, when he said—

"Miss Carrie, I do not know your other name—you and your father seem very superior people to live in such a place as this—you will not be sure, but what the place is pleasant enough, but still, it is small, is not it?"

Carrie said, "Yes," and smiled. She added, "But only my father and I live in it; we would sooner have it so than—"

"Your father is a farmer, I presume, Miss Carrie?"

"Well—yes—Sir."

"You only seem to give your answer with half submission."

"I mean to say my father is a farmer, but that there is no absolute need for him to be so."

"Oh, indeed!" said the patient, with increasing interest; "a gentleman farmer."

"Yes; just so."

"May I ask your father's name?"

"Mr. —"

"Any relation to the Taunton F——s?"

"My father is one of the grandsons of the late Sir Thomas Carrie, younger son of a younger son."

"I'm glad to hear that," said he, heartily, "most glad. And now, I suppose you would like to hear my name?"

His listener smiled.

"Or perhaps you would not like to hear my name?"

"Indeed, Sir, I have no right to expect to hear it; we were so fortunate as to be near you when you were thrown, and more fortunate to receive you here."

"It is I who have been fortunate."

"We should be most fortunate to help any one in such a strait as you were."

"Oh! my one."

"Yes, indeed; surely."

"Ah! then you don't care to hear my name?"

"Perhaps you do not care to tell it." (A long, long pause.) "Well, perhaps not; have you found it on from my card-case?"

"No, indeed."

"I beg your pardon; my inquiry was most vulgar. I assume that I suppose you might have opened the case in order to communicate with my friends."

"Nay, Sir; you came to yourself so quickly that we were not able to see any thing of the kind."

"Ah; you have no wish, I see, to hear my name. Indeed, Miss Carrie, it is the same as that of those vulgar people to whom I sent the letter on the night of the accident."

"Do you know they have not sent to inquire after you?"

"I begged them not to send."

"And they have obeyed?"

The gentleman looked up, surprised for a moment; then smiling gayly again, he said, "I will call me Mr. Frederic—"

"Very well, Mr. Frederic," said Carrie; and then, having handed him some refreshment, she was about to leave the room.

"Are you going, Miss Carrie?"

"Yes; can I do any thing more for you before I leave you?"

"No, no; good-night, good-night."

"Good-night, Mr. Frederic."

And she was gone.

He did not read the papers; he smiled; dreamed awake; bit his nails; sighed; he said he "sighed" a week after that evening.

Two or three days more went on; then the following conversation took place, at the same hour as the first:

"Miss Carrie, do you believe in love at first sight?"

Laughing, because she was frank, honestly, and possibly not vain, she said, "Hardly."

"You don't think that you could love at first sight?"

"No."

"Ah!"

"Ah what?"

"But why should not you as well as any other young lady?"

"I don't know that any young lady ever did love at first sight."

"Ah! Do you think a man could love at first sight?"

"I can't say, Mr. Frederic."

"Do you think I could, I mean?"

"How should I know, Mr. Frederic?"

"I ask a question whether she did or did not; surely any girl can tell an admirer.

"Do you know, Miss Carrie, I am going to write to my father?"

"Oh! you have a father?"

"Yes; I don't think I need write to him for permission to act. I'm of age, Miss Carrie."

"Yes; I'm twenty-four."

"Indeed!"

"May I ask how old you are?"

"I, Mr. Frederic! I'm twenty, nearly."

"I'm going to speak about you in the letter."

"And—and about my father?"

"Oh! I'm going to speak of you all; even Sir Thomas."

There really is no need to report any more of these short-sentenced conversations; let me say shortly that, a fortnight from the date of his fall, Mr. Frederic had his arm round Carrie's waist just before he left her on the sofa to his wife if she wished his surprises; and I suppose she did, for, under conditions, she was. She married him.

She did not fall in love at first sight, as he had done; but she grew to love him day by day and hour by hour, and when she had married him, she had grown to love him with a strong, earnest, undemonstrative affection—an affection which, once fostered, can never be destroyed, is never jealous—a wholly different affection to that love at first sight, which is most distrustful, and most alternately jealous.

Then he told her his name; I will not tell it here; but it was one of the greatest of English names. He was but a younger son, yet he was very rich.

Then Carrie, in all her new confidence, told of her brother, younger than he by two years, told how they were anxious about him, how he was always wanting money, how he was the best of boys, only extravagantly and foolishly led away.

Said Mr. Frederic, "We will look after him when we get home." And then the gentleman showed her a letter from his father, and pointed out a sentence where the writer said he was sure his son was not dead, because he had lately seen a marrying Carrie. "So you see," he added, "I have already made up my mind to like you a great deal before I got your."

Said Carrie, "And now you must talk to my father. He did speak to her father and then there, and showed him his father's letter.

"Let me think of all that," said the gentleman; "let me have a night to think it all over."

Then the night came.

If I were to tell the tale as it next touched Carrie, the whole matter would appear as mysterious to you as it did to her. I will tell it in the clearest manner.

That same night the lover had fallen asleep full of happy thoughts, when he was awoke by a slight tap on the glass of the slightly-opened window. It was a French window opening on the lawn.

It was moonlight. He started, and sat up in bed. He could see nothing at the window; so, assuring himself that he was still suffering from the slight fever that supervened upon the accident, he lay down again, and turned away his head from the light.

Another moment, and again he heard the tapping. Again he started; and there, standing in the moonlight, near the window, was a slightly-made young fellow, with a black mustache, and long, thick hair, shadowed with a broad, slouching hat.

He trembled, poor fellow, as he looked; for he felt sure the man was no house-thief, no robber; he trembled, for he suffered from his illness, and was weak, and with great effort only he stood upon the floor. He had but to see the man in the nightvisitor looking through the glass, and then he heard a young, boyish voice say, "Carrie, dear Carrie?"

He raised his hand, meaning to run to the window and shut the sash, but he could not open the searching face; but again his weakness prevailed, and he could only see a few more faces in the graveward enough to show his white figure to the searching, eager eyes.

"Dear Carrie, don't be afraid; it is I; it is I. Rush! don't make a noise, or they might hear us. Come to me, Carrie; open the window." As he spoke he kissed the window near his lips.

The sound maddened the man; he rushed forward to the window; he saw the visitor was still looking through, when he felt he was falling, and he fell with a crash to the ground outside the glass. The stranger then, uttering a faint cry, started back, and fled over the grass, and through a gap in the hedge.

When he came back to a knowledge of his trouble, the next day, he was steadily conscious. As he wearily climbed to his feet, and staggeringly leaned against the window-seat, he asked himself "Could it be true? Not any one been there? Had not his fever been brought back by the events of the night? Was she not honest?"

Then he thought, if he could only have a proof. He opened the door; and there before him, at his feet, was a proof indeed—a rare, certain proof—a boot-mark in the narrow bed between the door and the window-sash. He made the mark with his own—a mark that crushed his heart down, as it told him of the reality of the night.

He dressed himself, and after setting his bed upon the mark, and crushing it out, he turned to the morning-dresses for a little consolation. As he turned he looked upon the grass; another proof lying there was a half-smoked cigar, bitten through and through. Then he remembered that as he left the man crept through a gap in the hedge; he went to the hedge and marked that near the opening, through which a slight man could easily creep, the earth had been broken down.

How should he act? Should he pass as the blind had passed, and be his ward? Should he leave her to guess the truth? He would go! But he would not; to be worn back to the room—put on—sat down, and wept bitterly for the life which had left him. At last a servant tapped at the door; but he gave no faint an answer that the girl asked if he had grown worse during the night.

He said No; and that he would come to the breakfast-parlor at once.

He opened the parlor-door. She was there, and met him with a smile. He stood irresolutely. She wonderingly looked at him.

"Sir," he said, and said the word so harshly that she flinched back as though she had been struck. "So you can look at me?"

"Look at me?"

"Oh! it's a just return for the life I have led. I should feel what I do feel."

"What do you mean?"

"I thought that if I married you—if I left the people of my station in life, I should find a simple, honest girl, whose heart should be wholly mine. I did not think to find a smiling hypocrite."

"Great God!"

"Oh, you may act; but I can see behind the fair curtain of your breast, and mark well the blackness there."

"He is mad!"

"Mad! Oh, no. I may be, perhaps, in time. Look me in the face. You can't steadily? She is able! Well, what do you say now? Am I mad?"

"No; quite sane."

"Will you believe what I am going to say?"

"Of me?"

"No; of myself."

"Speak."

"I would sooner die than marry you, you monster. I would sooner tear you to pieces, though I should have to come near you, to touch you, to do so."

"Do not come near me. Do not touch me."

"I need no bibliance. Good-by! I abhor you; but I say good-by, not your hand, but my own! Good-by to our lives' happiness. You are worthless."

"Our lives' happiness. Ah! then you do not say good-by to your love alone, but will put all my hopes; took them in your arms, and laid your forehead on them, and today me trample on your face, I could not forgive you now. You have made me proud and harsh: but presently, presently, when you are away, I will forgive you. As a proof, if ever you want a great friend in great need, come to me. You will be sorry soon, I fear, for what you now say and do; though I hope not, for your sake. I will not ask to know what your troubles be; I do not care to know when you have condemned me unheard. So, I say good-by now, good-by: yet always remember, in your great need I am your great friend."

Then he went.

Carrie's father soon came in, and saw his child sitting alone. She told him her young husband was dead to her henceforth, and prayed her father never to name him more; and her father, who had known early trouble, respected her wish.

The day had half gone when Carrie missed her Carrie a mysterious note. Opening it, she started, took a heavy purse from her desk, and left the house.

She walked on quickly till she came near the village, and then, turning down a lane, took a gap on till she came to a poor house. She raised the latch, when the youth who had stood near the window ran forward, and catching her in his arms, said, as he kissed her tearfully, "Carrie! my own dear Carrie; come to us at last!"

And this scene the poor lover saw from the wood across the road; for after leaving Carrie's house he ought to have questioned her; he was returning to the house when he saw her coming down the road; he watched her, and he saw her go through what was confirmation of his suspicions. He heard the boy speak, and the music of her voice as he kissed her mother from both? Then he said they were not worth a thought; and, with a curse, he fled through the wood, rapidly.

And what said the girl when inside the poor cottage? "Mary, my brother! Oh, my dear brother!"

The boy, a medical student, had angered his father, through requests for repeated sums of money, and he had come down to his sister, being pressed by his creditors, to borrow of her. And what money of her own.

Carrie gave him her money, and he went back to town, happy. He did not think to tell her that he had tapped at her window on the past night.

The girl went home to begin her woman's life of grief—quiet, unconplaining, hopelessly sad.

She had led this life for some months when her father, hoping to dissipate her sadness, asked a relative in London to invite his child to town. Carrie wearily accepted the invitation, and went to town. Her relative, a thorough Londoner, knew her business perfectly well, and left the melancholy girl half over London in no time. She introduced Carrie to several gentlemen; but Carrie didn't care about the gentlemen, nor the gentlemen about Carrie; for though she tried to please them, she never did. Perhaps they were all of one pattern.

One night, about a week after Carrie had been in town, her relative took her to the Opera. They had not been long in the house, when the relative, Mrs. Mytheon, remarked upon the arrival of a most beautiful lady into a box on the grand tier. They had not sat much longer, when one of the gentlemen of whose acquaintance Mrs. Mytheon was so proud came to the door, and, upon being permitted to enter, volunteered small scandal.

Said he, "That is Lady ——. She is a lady in her own right. She's married to a commoner of good birth—Mr. Frederic ——."

Carrie turned pale as she heard the name, for it was that of the man who had asked her to be his wife.

"And they do say," said the small scandalizer, "that she thirts a great deal too much for a married woman, for she husband, he is very seldom with her; he goes his way, and she goes hers. They have only been married a month; and there is a pretty life for you!"

"Who is that bending to her now?"

"That? That is Sir Germain Roi, a dissipated young guardsman. They do say she once had a liking for him."

"Dear me! dear me!"

"Ah! it's a way they have in the upper world," said the gentleman, coolly.

"Dear me! dear me!"

And the curtain rose on the second act.

After that night the gentlemen found Carrie much more pleasant; nay, a week or so, and one she seemed to like. She refused him at one sad crash.

Mrs. Mytheon was disgusted. "A man," she said, "that any girl might have been proud to marry; her best friend."

Carrie, after that, went home to her father; and she fell into her quiet, useful, monotonous life. At the end of six months more a letter came from the son in town, saying he had been severely struck by a medman, and that he must come down in the country to get right again.

THE LATE COMMODORE M. C. PERRY, U. S. N.

He came down by coach, and Carrie met him, with the little family chaise, at the setting-down place.

Seated in the chaise, and driving home, he told his sister of the encounter, which had led to the fracture of one of his ribs.

Said he: "God! he was down on me like a shot. I was in Regent Street, with a drop; he started from the other side, seized me, said, 'So I do see you at last!' and, without more ado, he crashed me on the pavement. Of course my friend gave him into custody, and he was locked up. As for me, I was carried straight to my hospital. Next day a magistrate came and took my examination; and I heard from Harry, the chap who was with me, that when the queer customer heard my name he screamed so as to frighten the magistrate, who, I hear, behaved very politely to him. They let the poor fellow go; he was mad, it seems. And he was taken away by his wife—a lady, by Jove!—a lady by birth."

"Edmund, what was his name? Do you know?"

And Carrie's brother, knowing, told her. It was her old lover who had beaten her brother so.

"There's the old house," said the youth, as the hoss came in sight; "there's the old house, and there's your bedroom window, at which I stood that night."

"At which you stood?"

"Yes, when I came down for that money."

"At which you stood?"

"Yes; it used to be your bedroom, used it not? 'God, when I tapped at the window, and a man's face—a visitor's, I suppose—came toward me, instead of your own pleasant little one, I turned, and was off through the gap in the hedge like a shot."

"Oh, Edmund, if you only knew what you have done! Oh, Edmund! oh, Edmund!"

"Why, Carrie, Carrie!"

For the poor girl was weeping bitterly.

She then told him the whole sad truth, which she had but just learned; and Carrie's sorrows then did some good, for it made her brother more considerate for her, and made him, perhaps, a great deal better than he was before.

So she remained, unwedded, in her father's house—kind to all who sought her kindness, unobtrusive, thoughtful, almost unselfish. So she lived for five years, and rather better, when she had a trust put upon her—a trust which she very joyfully undertook.

One night she was waiting for her father's return from dinner at a neighbor's, when a carriage was heard to stop, and thinking it was he, she stepped at the door; and there, on the step, was a lady, who came to the hall-door, and opened it herself; and before her stood a haggard-looking man, carrying a fair young child, wrapped in a great white shawl.

"Carrie, do you know me?"

"You—my—my—"

He stooped down on one knee, bearing the sleeping child to the other.

"Let my little girl plead for me. I for I dare not plead for myself. Let us come in, Carrie."

"Come in—oh, pray come in?"

As he rose his head drooped forward; then he stepped on, the lesson of the house which he had so madly left those years before. She took him by the hand, and led him into the very room at the window of which he had seen the eager face—the very room which she had had turned into a sitting-room, and in which she passed almost all her time.

He shaded his eyes from the window, and sat down, still with his child in his arms.

"This is your letter, Carrie?" he said, taking a paper from the bosom of his dress.

"Yes, I sent it you a long while ago, and after her brother told me what he did. Ah me! how could you have been so rash?"

"Poor! no, richer than she ever has been; for she has a mother's care now, and that she has never had. No, no—not poor. Carrie, let her bear your name, and let her lose the one she has. Oh, let her bear your name, and let me think her yours as well as mine!"

"Think as you will, for I do will as you."

"And you will never undeceive her?"

"What do you ask?"

"I ask you, never call her yours."

"I ever will."

Carrie, kissed her lips."

She did; then the father kissed them.

"I will not say good-by: I said it once before. No, Carrie, I will not say it. I will come to see you, and let me go."

She turned away from him, still holding the child, and then waited a little. She thought she felt the long hanging sleeve of her dress touched for a moment, and she thought she felt a warm breath upon her arm; but she was never sure of this. Her excitement, and she heard the rattle of carriage-wheels; she turned then, and saw that he was gone. In exchange for the child he had given her, he had carried off the flowers she had been arranging when he came to the house.

The little child awoke, and after a very little fear at finding herself in a strange place, fell asleep again upon her new mother's breast, and whilst she placed one of her tiny arms. So she sat, with the child, till her father came home.

The aged gentleman started at the sight he saw upon entering his house; but his daughter's smile reassured him.

I have gained a pleasant cure since you left the house, father."

"Indeed!"

"Yes; you remember the day whose history I prayed you never to talk of more, father?"

"Yes."

"Ah well, this child grew out of that sad day—he married, this is his child; he has brought her to me. You can guess the rest, dear father."

So from that time the child was reared in the same name as Carrie's. It was given out that she was a dead sister's child; and the child called her Mamma, and believed her so until she died—for the little thing died, died with her arm round her new mother's neck—died with her arm in a link lain on that first night of her coming home, when her child's fear passed into confidence in the newly-found friend.

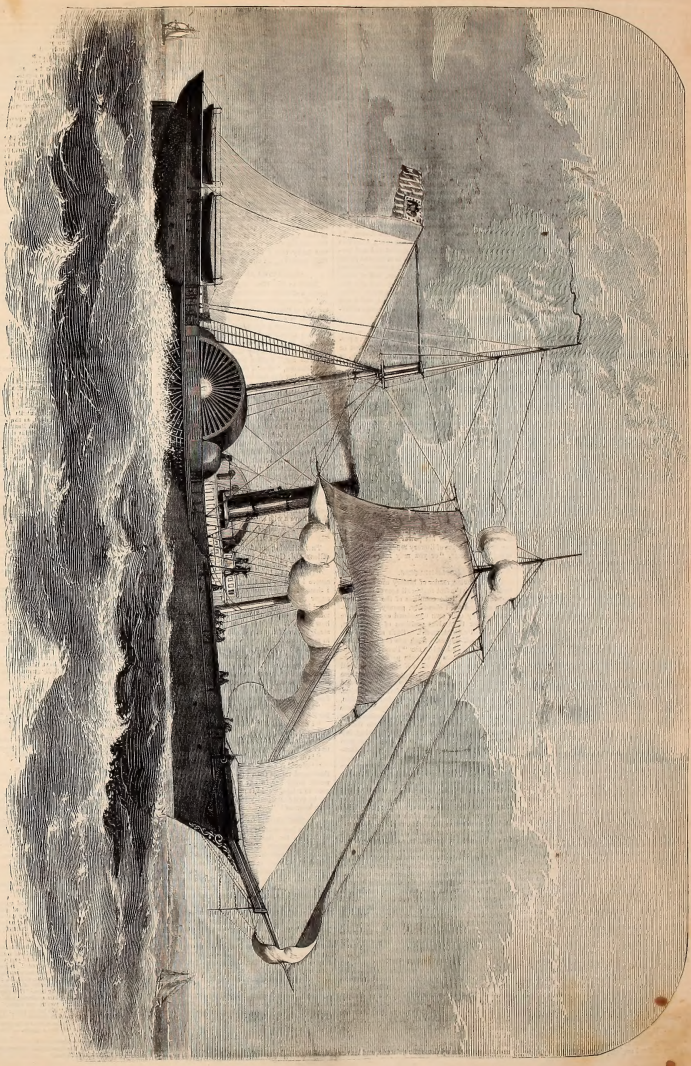
As for the child's father, he, poor fellow! was dead. Carrie went on the Continent to see his grave—it is well kept to this day.

THE LATE COMMODORE PERRY, U.S.N.

WE present our readers above with a portrait of the late MATTHEW CALBRAITH PERRY, Commodore in the United States Navy, who died at his residence in this city on 4th instant, at the age of sixty-three years.

Commodore Perry was born in 1796, at South Kingston, Rhode Island. His father became an officer of the navy in 1798; and his four sons followed his example. Of these, one became famous as the hero of the Erie—Oliver H. Perry; the others have left no historical name. Matthew entered the navy in 1809, and made his first cruise in the schooner Revenge. It is believed that, though he was subsequently attached to the President, under Commodore Rogers, he served with his brother on Lake Erie, and during the terrible fight which won the latter his high fame, he passed through the squadron in a small boat after the Lawrence was disabled, and aided his brother in hoisting his flag on the Niagara.

He joined the President in 1814, and after a brief service on board the Chippewa was stationed at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, where he remained a couple of years and won his rank as lieutenant.



In August, 1819, he was ordered to the ship Cyane, which was sent to the coast of Africa to aid the efforts of the Colonization Society in the attempt to found a settlement of free blacks upon the island of Sherbro, near Sierra Leone. The mortality at Sherbro was so great that it became evident no colony could be planted there; and Lieutenant Perry selected Messurado as a more suitable locality for a town. He therefore fixed the location of the first settlement of Liberia. In May, 1821, Lieutenant Perry was put in command of the schooner Shark, in which vessel he twice visited the colony of Liberia. In the latter period he also cruised the waters of the West Indies, and captured several pirates.

On his return he was again attached to the Brooklyn Navy Yard, where he remained until 1824, when he was ordered to the ship Fredonia, in which vessel, under Commodore Rogers, he served as First Lieutenant, and Captain of the Fleet, during the war with the Seminole Indians. He was then promoted to the rank of Commander, and took charge of the training service at Boston, where he continued until 1830, when he took command of the corvette John Adams, in which he conveyed John Randolph as United States Minister to St. Petersburg.

The next important service of Commodore Perry was a tour of inspection through Europe to visit the dock-yards and establishments, from which he made personal inspection such facts as might be useful in improving those departments of the United States service. Early in 1837 he submitted his report to the Government, and resumed his duties as Superintendent of the Brooklyn Yard, in preparing plans for the construction and equipment of the Missouri and the Mississippi, the first large ocean-steamers in our navy.

In 1846 he sailed in the squadron that was to operate against Mexico, and on the retirement of Captain Conner took the chief command. He directed the bombardment of Vera Cruz, and General Scott gratefully recognized his valuable aid and co-operation in his dispatches.

The services which he has done the most for Commodore Perry's fame was the Japan Expedition.

THE UNITED STATES REVENUE CUTTER "HARRIET LANE."

He sailed from New York on 24th November, 1852, and negotiated his treaty on 31st March, 1854.

The events and results of that expedition are fresh in the minds of our readers. Various opinions have been entertained as to the value of that undertaking; but the Administration, at least, were satisfied that Commodore Perry had carried out every thing the Government expected from him, and Mr. Fillmore is known to have so expressed himself. It is true that he did not succeed in negotiating a treaty of commerce with the Japanese, but perhaps they were not prepared for such a progressive measure at that time. The late Commodore was one of the Naval Board of fifteen at Washington whose action has been the occasion of so much animadversion. But no officer of that board regretted more than he did having any thing to do with it.

Commodore Perry leaves a widow and six children—three sons and three daughters. One of the sons is now Consul at Hong Kong. Of the daughters, two are married (Mrs. John Hone and Mrs. Auguste Belmont).

He was an able officer, of fine appearance, courteous, open manner, and genial disposition.

THE UNITED STATES REVENUE CUTTER "HARRIET LANE."

Mr. Secretary Spencer, when at the head of the Treasury Department of the United States in the Administration of President Tyler, seeing the defective provision for enforcing the revenue laws by means of the small cutters—which had the duty not only of preventing smuggling but of coercing the filibustering or other refractory vessels in American ports, and also of affording succor to the distressed and shipwrecked—conceived the idea of creating steam-vessels as a substitute for the small sailing schooners until then universally used. At the time of their first establishment, in fleetness as sea-boats and in facility of management, they were unsurpassed; but by the introduction of steam their prestige vanished. They could no longer rule the seas; for a steam-vessel, disregarding winds, could enter or escape from port while they were either becalmed or headed off.

Excellent as were the views of Mr. Spencer, they were rendered nugatory by the miserable character of the vessels (six in number) built for this purpose, which were all ultimately condemned; and since this time the Department has suffered things to gradually slide back with the failure of each steamer, till the old cutter schooner was again the only arm of power wielded by the Secretary of the Treasury.

During the last year the Underwriters of New York, supported by the Chamber of Commerce, strongly represented to Congress that the commerce of this country demanded more efficient protection. The arguments were not without avail, and, despite the opposition of the Treasury Department, a bill providing for the building of a suitable vessel was passed, and under the direction of the successor of Mr. Guthrie the plan was cordially forwarded.

In the spring of 1857 propositions were invited by Secretary Cobb, from the builders of the United States, for models, plans, and specifications of such a vessel as they should deem suitable for the proposed object, and without any limitation of price. A number of the most eminent men of the country was also convened to decide upon their respective merits.

As might have been expected, numerous propositions were made. It was justly considered that the man to whom the contract was awarded, by a board of impartial officers, would be considered as the first man in his profession—one which in loftiness ranks with that of the heaven-inspired sculptor, and, when considered by its utility, is far superior.

Thirteen plans were presented from the most eminent builders in this country, no one of any note failing to enter the concours.

As this was the first time in the history of the American marine that an opportunity was afforded to the ship-builders of the country to present models and plans for comparison, every effort was made by the competitors to secure the contract. The decision was made after a prolonged and careful study of the various models, plans, and specifications, and a unanimous recommendation was made by this scientific committee of the model of Mr. William H. Webb, and, in accordance with this decision, the contract was awarded to him by Secretary Cobb.

This decision of the Committee was very satisfactory to the New York Chamber of Commerce and Underwriters. To them William H. Webb was known as the builder of more tons of vessels than any other man that has ever lived in any age; that his vessels have no superiors either at the insurance offices or with practical sea-captains and sailors. He is also the son and successor in business of the late Isaac Webb, Esq., who was a pupil and for many years a partner of Eckford, the celebrated constructor of a great number of American vessels, including part of Commodore Perry's fleet on Lake Erie, and of a great number of vessels in the Turkish navy. The inheritance, education, and practical experience of Mr. Webb were thus guarantees of his success in this new undertaking. The public can now judge for themselves whether grace or power is wanting. A drawing can but feebly show the lines of beauty in a ship, yet from the cut presented our readers on another page some idea may be formed of her exquisite symmetry. She is indeed a model of sea loveliness, capable of charming even so accomplished a connoisseur as Neptune himself.

At the instance of Mr. Cobb she is named the Harriet Lane, in honor of the niece of President Buchanan, the accomplished lady who now so gracefully does the honors of the White House.

She is a side-wheel vessel of 650 tons, propelled by two inclined engines, each of 42-inch cylinder, seven feet stroke, and brig rigged. She has three cabins, finished with neatness and taste, for the use of the captain and other officers, and room in the steerage for a crew of sixty to eighty men; especial reference being made for the accommodation of the rescued officers, passengers, and crews of wrecked vessels. She is pierced for ten guns.

The vessel, as delivered to the Government by Mr. Webb, is not only fully provided with the usual necessary equipments, but also with spare supplies for the aid and relief of vessels in distress and danger.

Her cost is $150,000. She is to be stationed in New York, and is commanded by Captain John Faunce, for many years an able captain in the United States Revenue Service.

Miscellany.

AMERICANIZATION OF THE WORLD.

Thomas Moore, in his Diary of the year 1838, records a breakfast-table remark of Lord John Russell, which some future Macaulay, dwelling on this era, may expand with curious and felicitous illustration. "Lord John spoke of the tendency of the world now to Americanize in every thing; in the form of government, in literature, in the tone of society, etc. The remark," adds Moore, "I fear, is but too just." Does not every American reader at home and traveler abroad feel and perceive that the future of Europe is to be read in the present of America? The doubts and aspirations of English legislation, for instance, and of many purely social questions, have long been the truisms and realities of America. But when Europe attains our present standard of personal, social, and political freedom, at what period of progress or revolution shall we be?

A TASTE FOR LITERATURE.

A great epicure having bought a library, a person was remarking, in Foote's company, that he wondered what the purchaser could do with it, as it was well known that he preferred a good table to all the books in the world. "It may be partly for that reason," neatly replied Foote; "for the Table of Contents." This is wit which is something more than a pun. It might be a pun without a sting; but in this case, apart from the play upon the word, it would be a just and severe remark on the buyer of books which he can not use, or, at the best, use unfairly as an index-hunter. But the pun comes in and adds the grace of wit to a sensible, cutting observation.

Foote's literary thrusts have never been surpassed—not even by Sydney Smith. The prolific author, the Irishman in London, dramatist and what not—Hugh Kelley—who filled the town with his publications, once visiting Foote, noticed the smallness of his library. "Why," says he, "I have got almost as many books myself!" "Perhaps you may have," said Foote; "but consider, you read all you write."

Kelley, who was also a journalist, at another time was boasting of his power as a reviewer in the free distribution of literary reputation. "Take care," said Foote, "or you may leave none for yourself."

SELF-HELPERS.

The observant reader of history can not fail to be struck with the fact that in all ages of the world, and in almost all the countries of the globe, men have emerged from obscurity, penury, and ignorance, and by their own unassisted exertions have attained for themselves positions of distinction, wealth, and enlightenment. Such men are emphatically self-helpers. Such are the men whose lives are briefly related in our "Poverty and Genius." While others have been patiently occupying their original positions as if some ban or spell prevented them from occupying any others, these men have pushed onward, and by their energy and enterprise arrived at the goal of their ambition. While others have been deploring their condition, and sighing over their limited advantages, these men have set to work and bravely achieved for themselves those privileges which birth denied them. While others have been idly waiting, Micawber-like, for something to turn up, these men have labored hard to turn it up, and up it has turned to reward their honorable exertions.

In looking back on the lives of great men, we are taught that man by his unaided exertions may perform more wonderful achievements than were ever wrought by the imagined hero of an Oriental fabulist. They have called light out of darkness; they have made fortunes out of nothing; they have attained positions such as birth could not bestow and the proudest noble might envy.

And they have done this in all sorts of positions, in every branch of occupation, and in spite of every description of disadvantage.

They came forth from the work-shop, the carpenter's shed, the smithy, the factory; they came from the field, the mine, and the sheep-cote; they laid aside the hammer, the saw, the chisel, the harrow, the plow, the spade, the crook, the needle, the awl; they left the forecastle, and the barrack, and the servants' hall; no matter what position they occupied at first, they came out of it, left it far behind, rose to a new life, moved in a new world, were elevated to an altitude which they never anticipated, and were blessed with an immortality for which they had never dared to hope.

DOMESTIC QUIETUDE.

Let fathers and mothers ponder over the following: "Indeed, where the life of the home is neglected there is no true manliness. Fathers! whose sons are growing up miserable shoots of dissipation, what nourishment have their best faculties received at home? Mothers! whose daughters are happy only in the whirl of vanity and extravagance, what has been their example? Members of fashionable society! there is not only excess, but inexpressible evil, in any method of amusement that breaks up domestic quietude, and leaves no time for domestic responsibility, and no delight in domestic pleasures."

TREE-FROGS.

Mr. Buckland, son of the late Dean, tells the following amusing story: "Returning from the University of Giessen, I brought with me about a dozen green tree-frogs, which I had caught in the woods near the town. I started at night on my homeward journey by the diligence, and I put the bottle containing the frogs into the pocket inside the diligence. My fellow-passengers were sleepy, old, smoke-dried Germans; very little conversation took place, and, after the first mile, every one settled himself to sleep, and soon all were snoring. I suddenly awoke with a start, and found all the sleepers had been roused at the same moment. On their sleepy faces were depicted fear and anger. What had woke us all up so suddenly? The morning was just breaking, and my frogs, though in the dark pocket of the coach, had found it out; and with one accord all twelve of them had begun their morning song. As if at a given signal, they one and all of them began to croak as loud as ever they could. The noise their united concert made seemed, in the closed compartment of the coach, quite deafening. Well might the Germans look angry; they wanted to throw the frogs, bottle and all, out of the window, but I gave the bottle a good shaking, and made the frogs keep quiet. The Germans all went to sleep again, but I was obliged to remain awake to shake the frogs when they began to croak. It was lucky that I did so, for they tried to begin their concert again two or three times."

CHARACTER AT A WATER CURE.

Next to our Hamburg friend sat a tolerably pretty and intolerably haughty Prussian lady, the wife of some government official, and therefore, according to German etiquette, always addressed by the title of her august husband. She sometimes made use of our grave neighbor as an interpreter between herself and our Georgian; and once she signified, in a jesting way, that when she came to America she should pay him a visit.

"Tell her," replied Burroughs, with Oriental magnificence, "that if she will come and see me I will give her five hundred negroes to wait on her."

The old Hamburger, incapable of suspecting a joke, opened his eyes to an unaccustomed extent at such an extravagance of hospitality. "I think," said he, after a moment's reflection, "that five would be better than five hundred."

They told us of a Mexican who came there a year or two before us, for the sake of trying the cure on his dyspepsia. He went through his first packing with great indignation, and was then taken down stairs into that horrible abyss of plunge-baths. Priessnitz pointed to the cistern, and bade him get into it. "Never!" he thundered; and, marching up stairs, he dressed himself, and went straight back to Mexico. Another man in the same situation is said to have fallen on his knees before Priessnitz, exclaiming, "Oh Sir, remember that I have a wife and children!"—De Forest's European Acquaintance.

EVIL-SPEAKING.

The following anecdote is related of the late excellent J. J. Gurney, by one who, as a child, was often one of his family circle:

"One night—I remember it well—I received a severe lesson on the sin of evil-speaking. Severe I thought it then, and my heart rose in childish anger against him who gave it; but I had not lived long enough in this world to know how much mischief a child's thoughtless talk may do, and how often it happens that talkers run off the straight line of truth. S. did not stand very high in my esteem, and I was about to speak further of her failings of temper. In a few moments my eye caught a look of such calm and steady displeasure that I stopped short. There was no mistaking the meaning of that dark, speaking eye. It brought the color to my face, and confusion and shame to my heart. I was silent for a few moments, when Joseph John Gurney asked, very gravely,

"'Dost thou know any good thing to tell us of her?'

"I did not answer; and the question was more seriously asked,

"'Think; is there nothing good thou canst tell us of her?'

"'Oh yes, I know some good things; but—'

"'Would it not have been better, then, to relate those good things than to have told us that which would lower her in our esteem? Since there is good to relate, would it not be kinder to be silent on the evil? "Charity rejoiceth not in iniquity," thou knowest?'"

THE TRIBES OF NORTH AFRICA.

At the last meeting of the Royal Asiatic Society in London Dr. Barth delivered a lecture on the tribes of Northern Africa, in their relations to the ancient Phœnicians. The portion of Africa to which he directed the attention of his audience extends from the Southern limits of Algeria and Tripoli to the banks of the Niger, and is occupied by a variety of tribes, of whom the Tawareks are predominant. That tribe is far more warlike than the others, whom it has subjugated. Dr. Barth said the Tawareks are so hostile to Europeans generally that he was the first who had dwelt among them and returned alive. During his residence in that portion of the country he had been enabled to trace, by a variety of indications, their Asiatic origin, and to arrive at the conclusion that they were the descendants of Ham. Dr. Barth conceives that the first emigration of these tribes of Northern Africa took place two thousand five hundred years before Christ; and he referred to Genesis x. to show that his recent researches confirmed the statements there made respecting the emigration of the first families of man. A very remarkable custom of the Tawareks is the observance of monogamy, in opposition to the practice of polygamy common among the other tribes of Africa. Another peculiarity of the tribe is the silence they observe respecting their dead.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

The ladies of the congregation of Dr. Peddie, Edinburgh, lately determined to present the Doctor with a pulpit gown. The Doctor, on the Sunday after it was presented, intimated to the people in the church: "The ladies have been kind enough to present me with a pulpit gown; but lest any member should object to my wearing it, I sha'n't put it on yet, and will hear objections on Thursday night." Nobody came to object but an old lady. The Doctor said, "Well, Janet, what objections have you to the pulpit gown?" "Aweel, Sir," said Janet, "we never read of the Apostle Paul wearing a gown!" The Doctor said (and there was a significancy in the reply), "You are quite right, Janet; but we never read of St. Paul wearing breeks (trowsers)!" That satisfied the old lady.

"Now, then," exclaimed an enraged creditor, "when are we going to have a settlement, Sir?"

"We have had a settlement," coolly responded the debtor, as he crossed his legs on the table, and knocked the ashes from his cigar."

"It is false, Sir. I have never been able to get a settlement out of you; but now I'm determined to have it."

"My good Sir, you are mistaken. I called on you last week for the purpose of closing the affair. I then meant to settle, and of course that was a settle meant."

The Philadelphia Gazette, speaking of a new prima donna, says: "Her voice is as soft as a roll of velvet, and as tender as a pair of slop-shop pantaloons."

Quoth Smith to Jones, it really is a sin
You do not get your pretty house fenced in;
Quoth Jones, you're wrong; the place is fenced, confound it,
My wife is all the time a railing round it.

It is an extraordinary fact, that when people come to what is commonly called high words they generally use low language.

A correspondent of the Vicksburg Sun, writing from Bolivar County, tells of a chap at Napoleon, Arkansas, who was drinking at a counter, and withal being tolerably tight, after several ineffectual attempts to raise the glass to his lips, succeeded in getting it high enough to pour the contents down his shirt, set the glass down with the exclamation, "That's good, but a little too much ice, Mr. Bar-keeper."

PROCRASTINATION.

If Fortune, with a smiling face,
Strew roses in our way,
When shall we stoop to pick them up?
To-day, my love, to-day.

But should she frown with face of care,
Or talk of coming sorrow,
When shall we grieve, if grieve we must?
To-morrow, love, to-morrow!

What did the cat say, as she looked out of the window when the ark got aground?
"Is that 'ar a rat?"

Ex-Governor Morton, of Massachusetts, and his son, are both members of the Legislature, as they were of the Constitutional Convention of 1855. A Boston paper has the following incident connected with the election of the Sergeant-at-Arms: the Clerk was calling the roll—"Marcus Morton." "Yes," responded the ex-Governor, clearly, but rather feebly, near the chair. "Marcus Morton, Jun.," called the clerk. "No," was the vigorous response of the member from Andover, from the centre of the hall.

During the session of a county court in the interior a witness was asked if he was not a husbandman, when he coolly replied, amidst the laughter of the court, "No, Sir, I'se not married."

Mr. Pepper's house was on fire. A large crowd was soon on the spot, when one of them remarked, "We've muster'd enough to save Pepper." So it proved.

The wife of Dr. Bentham was a woman of disposition congenial with that of her husband. She asked a person who applied for the place of a footman in her family "if he could whistle?" "Why is that necessary?" said the man. "Because," said the lady, "I expect my footman to whistle all the time he is in the cellar, to be certain that he is not drinking while he is there."

A St. Louis friend writes: "One of our newsboys was crying his papers in the street the other day, and meeting a man, said, "Have a paper, Sir?" "No!" said the man, laughingly, "I can't read!" "Well, I didn't think you could," said the boy; "thought maybe might want to look at the picters! Here's Harper's Weekly."

A gentleman presented a lace collar to his wife, and in a jocular way said, "Do not let any one else rumple it!" "No, dear," said the lady, "I will take it off."

"I took you, deceiver, 'for better for worse,'
Submitting to wedlock's hard fetter;
While your worse part has daily grown worse and still worse,
I have not discovered your better."

A hospitable man is never ashamed of his dinner when you come to dine with him.

"I have lived to know," says Adam Clarke, "that the greatest secret of human happiness is this: Never suffer your energies to stagnate."

A gentleman wrote as follows to a female relative:
"How comes it, this delightful weather,
That U and I can't dine together?"
To which she replied:
"My worthy coz, it can not B,
U can not come till after T."

"What's fashionable, I'll maintain,
Is always right," cries sprightly Jane;
"Ah, would to Heaven," says graver Sue,
"What's right were fashionable too!"

Don't meet troubles half way, for they are not worth the compliment.

Turn a deaf ear to tale bearers, and turn them neck and crop out of your company at the same time.

Nonsense.—Sense that differs from your own.

What is the lightest ship that man ever embarked in? Courtship.

The man who carried out his moral resolutions did not bring them back again.

A young merchant's clerk, whose good conduct had fallen into disuse through his patronage of spirits, was lately engaged in one of his idle hours by a former employer to take a check to a bank. Being asked by the teller how he would have it, he replied instantly, "Cold, if you please, and without sugar."

An old gentleman in the city, who was remarkable for his prosing powers, had got into a habit of talking continually of his "gray pony;" say what you would, do what you would, in came the gray pony. A gentleman who prided himself on his conversational powers, one day made a wager that he would converse with the old fellow without allowing him an opportunity of "mounting his gray pony," or even introducing him. One day he met him at a tavern, and observing him at dinner, said, "That's a very fine piece of salmon you've got there." "Yes, Sir," said the octogenarian, "it's pretty good; but whenever I wish to enjoy salmon in perfection I mount my little gray pony, and—" "Hang your little gray pony!" said the other; "he has cost me a dozen of wine and a supper of oysters for six."

A lady advertises in the Herald that she wants a gentleman for "breakfast and tea."

THE WITNESSES DEAD.—A gentleman once boasted that he had drunk, two, three, or four bottles of wine every day for five years, and was as hearty as ever. "I have smoked a hogshead," where are your bon compagnons?" All! and he, "that's another affair; if the truth may be told, I have buried three entire generations of them."

HUMAN affections are the leaves, the foliage of our being. They catch every breath, and in the buds and roots of the day they make music and motion in a sultry world. Stripped of that foliage, how unsightly is human nature.

THE reason Jenny carried his father with such ease was because he had Dropsy upright upon his feet when he could not bend without last week." "Didn't you, mamma?" asked Dumpy. "I believe I did, my dear."

A lover should be treated with the same gentleness as a new glove. The young lady should pull him on with the utmost tenderness at first, and, making the smallest advances at a time, till she gradually gains upon him, and he thinks himself quite easy in the matter. Then, and not before, the young lady who is hasty, and in too great a hurry, will never get a lover to her mind. Love is a thing that nothing but her will at her fingers' ends.

A lady just married, was dressed on the degree of fortitude to be attached to her uncle's rolling on orchard, "Indeed," said Johnson, "it all depends on the size of the boy. I remember my school-fellow, David Garrick —he was always a sensible fellow—when he was going to church with impunity; but the very first time I climbed up an apple-tree—for I was always a lover of fruit—he brought brake with me, and it was called judgment. I suppose that is why justice is represented as blind and lame!"

It not achieved of a humble parentage or a humble occupation: be not ashamed of poverty, or even of a small amount of natural deformity. Many have already reproach the King of kings; but be ashamed of unchaste and misdirected thoughts, and of unrighteousness. A wicked man can not be truly brave or noble.

Let the windows of thy soul, like the windows of a house, set down every thing that comes in, and let the foul stench notices of every thing from without.—John Foster.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, March 8, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets during the week have been more active for Flour, which has been in good demand chiefly for home use, and large sales reported. Wheat has been scarce, and held above the figures current a week since. Corn has been in steady to mild request, and closes firmer than last week. Pork has been active, and prices tended downward. Cotton has attracted more attention, and, later, exercises manifested to realize, prices have declined. Sugar, Molasses, and Coffee have been active and held with more firmness, while Coffee and Teas exhibited less activity and are lower. Naval Stores were in fair request, and prices closed with an upward tendency. The movement in Hides, Leather, and Wool Stocks were more extensive than for the previous week. The Metal Markets were quiet for desirable kinds of Domestic and Foreign Dry Goods, especially woolens and fabrics, is very pretty brisk, and with the moderate supplies available, prices are acquiring more firmness and buoyancy. The week's import of Dry Goods amounted to $1,087,479 against $378,345 the previous corresponding week in 1857. The imports since the 1st of January have been $6,811,126 against $3,633,433 same period in 1857. The movements in other commodities were moderate, and independent of any remarkable circumstances. We append a revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

Ordinary to extra State Flour, per bbl. $4 70 @ 5 45
Superfine to fancy Western do. 4 70 @ 5 10
Extra Western Flour, per barrel 4 80 @ 7 00
Fancy to extra Genesee, per barrel 5 15 @ 5 50
Super to Extra Canadian, per barrel 4 85 @ 5 50
Mixed to Extra Southern, per barrel 4 70 @ 6 50
Fine to Superfine Rye Flour, per bbl. 3 90 @ 4 35
Corn Meal, per barrel 3 00 @ 3 75
Wheat, per bushel 1 30 @ 1 40
Red Wheat, per bushel 1 09 @ 1 25
New Crop Corn, per bushel 57 @ 60
Rye, per bushel 82 @ 84
Barley, per bushel 90 @ 95
Western Oats, per bushel 48 @ 46
State Oats, per bushel 44 @ 46
Jersey and Penn. Oats, per bushel 34 @ 38
Southern Oats, per bushel 32 @ 36
Cotton, middlings, per pound 11 @ 11¼
Mess Pork, per barrel 10 50 @ 11 00
Prime Pork, per barrel 9 50 @ 10 00
Mess Beef, per barrel 11 00 @ 11 00
Prime Mess Beef, per barrel 8 75 @ 9 00
Prime Mess Beef, per tierce 21 00 @ 23 00
Beef Hams, per barrel 17 00 @ 18 00
Cut Meats, per pound 6½ @ 7½
Lard, per pound 10 @ 10½
Butter, per pound 16 @ 20
Western Butter, per pound 15 @ 19
Cheese, per pound 8 @ 10
Rice, per 100 pounds 3 00 @ 4 00
Tallow, per pound 6 @ 7½
Candles, Sperm, per pound 22 @ 23
Oils, Whale and Lard, per gallon 70 @ 75
New Orleans Sugar, per pound 5 @ 7½
Porto Rico Sugar, per pound 6 @ 7½
Havana Sugar, per pound 6 @ 7½
Brown Teas, per pound 18 @ 60
Oolong Teas, per pound 30 @ 60
Domestic Whisky, per gallon 28 @ 29½
Hay, per load, per 100 pounds 75 @ 90
Hops, Crop of 1857, per pound 8 @ 12
Crude Turpentine, per 280 pounds 3 75 @ 4 00
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon 61 @ 63
Common Rosin, per 310 pounds 1 20 @ 1 25

Stock of several Articles on hand, in New York, about March 1.

	1857.	1858.
Ashes, barrels	1,500	1,500
Coffee, packages	101,485	59,977
Cotton, bales	84,333	53,993
Hemp, tons	50	500
Hides, number	15,000	20,000
Hides, number	98,483	287,884
Leather, Sole, sides	6,000	5,000
Molasses, hogsheads	6,000	7,000
Potatoes, bushels	1,723	4,273
Tar, barrels	15,768	14,757
Beef, tierces and barrels	12,500	12,000
Rice, tierces	6,623	11,026
Rice, bags	2,700	5,878
Tobacco, hogsheads	13,073	16,151
Sugars, boxes	15,000	5,759
Sugars, bags	9000	3,854
Sugars, Crude, hogsheads	4,015	3,359
Sugars, Refined, barrels	2,000	1,000
Tobacco, Manufactured, packages	30,000	21,282
Turpentine, Crude, barrels	2,000	2,000
Turpentine, Spirits, barrels	5,000	4,000

Freights were dull and heavy. For Liverpool, Cotton, 5-64 @ 9-32d. per pound; Flour, 1s 3d. per barrel; Wheat, 6d. per bushel; Corn, 5d. per bushel; Beef, 2s. 6d. per barrel; Pork, 2s. 6d. per barrel; Lard, 6s. per cwt.; Cheese, 6s. per cwt. For Glasgow, Cotton, ¼d. per pound. Intermediate figures. The number of vessels, of all classes, in port on Saturday was 653.

The Live Stock Markets last Wednesday were fewer in number, and the quality was inferior, while the trade was dull and dragging. Milch Cows were plentiful, and were in slow request and unchanged rates. Veal Calves were in better supply and were more sought after at rather higher quotations. Sheep and Lambs were more freely offered, with a very good demand, prices were supported, while attracted rather less attention, and closed heavily at the following quotations. The Receipts of Live Stock during the last two weeks compare thus:

	Week ending Feb. 22.	Week ending March 1.
Beeves	2,652	2,500
Milch Cows	114	108
Veal Calves	339	445
Sheep and Lambs	7,254	7,400

Of the Forty-fourth Street Market supply of Beeves last Wednesday there were from

Illinois	123	Texas 46
Indiana	120	Kentucky 51
Ohio	431	Michigan 15
Missouri	20	New Jersey 15

The range of prices according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday and this week:

	Last Week.	This Week.
Poor to first class Beeves, per pound	5 @ 9	11
Poor to first class Cows, per head	20 @ 50	55
Veal Calves, per pound	5 @ 7	8
Sheep and Lambs, per head	5 00 @	6 00
Lambs, per pound	7 @	8
Live Swine, per pound	5½ @	6½
Dressed Hogs, per pound	7 @	8

The Country Produce Markets continue to be somewhat sparingly supplied, with the exception of Potatoes, Onions, and dairy produce. The demand is good, and prices generally firm. Apples, Potatoes, Onions, and Turnips are heavier, and, with a moderate inquiry, buyers have the advantage.

WHOLESALE PRICES OF PRODUCE AT WASHINGTON MARKET.

Apples, per barrel	$3 00	@ 6 00
Apples, dried, per pound	6	@ 6
Peaches, dried, per pound	18	@ 20
Cherries, dried, per pound	18	@ 20
Hickory Nuts, per bushel	3 25	@ 3 50
Chestnuts, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 75
Peanuts, per bushel	60	@ 75
Potatoes, per barrel	1 00	@ 1 50
Potatoes, per barrel	3 25	@ 4 00
Onions, per barrel	3 00	@ 3 50
Onions, per barrel	1 50	@ 3 00
Turnips, per bushel	50	@ 75
Beets, per barrel	1 50	@ 2 00
Cabbages, per dozen	50	@ 1 00
Parsnips, per barrel	1 12	@ 1 75
Carrots, per barrel	1 25	@ 1 50
Leeks, per 100 bunches	4 00	@ 5
Celery, per dozen roots	1 00	@ 1 75
Garlic, per 100	5 00	@ 6 00
Eggs, packed, per dozen		9 @ 10
Eggs, Fresh, per dozen		14 @ 16
Poultry, per pound		10 @ 12
Poultry, per pound		12 @ 14
Guinea Fowls, per pair	42	@ 50
Ducks, per pound	10	@ 12
per pair	1 00	@ 1 25
Turkeys, per pound	11	@ 13
Geese, per pound		11 @ 13
Butter, per pound	21	@ 25
Prairie Hens, per pair	75	@ 1 00
Quails, per pair	1 00	@ 1 50
Quail, per dozen	5 00	@ 6 00
Venison, per pound	15	@ 18
Rabbits, each	18	@ 25
Squirrels, each	12	@ 18
Hares, each	25	@ 37½
Venison, per pound	8	@ 13

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, March 8, 1858.

The foreign trade of the port for the past week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Mar. 6, 1858	$3,857,199	$311,344
Corresponding week, 1857	3,710,455	1,509,747
Decrease this year	$153,817	$737,403

The export of specie fell short of $200,000; so that, on this probability, the week's statement this evening but little less than thirty-three millions of specie. Money continues to be more than abundant, and it is very difficult to place any considerable amounts at any thing like the legal rate. Foreign Exchange continues very dull, with no specie shipping point.

The advices from Europe by the Europa are highly satisfactory. Though the Bank of England had not reduced the rate of interest, a reduction was fully indicated near a million sterling, and money was freely obtained out of doors at 2½ @ 3. Speculation in Domestic and Foreign Stocks was quiet, with considerable activity. American bonds and stocks were much inquired for at advanced rates. The London brokers seem to anticipate quite a decided expansion.

In the market, during the week active, though the closing prices on Saturday were hardly as high as those of the previous Monday. An unfavorable weekly return set in, which lasted throughout the week. The persistent opposition, however, had nothing can arrest the upward tendencies of the market.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

LECTURES IN THE FRENCH LANGUAGE.

THE SPINGLER INSTITUTE,
UNION SQUARE.

A COURSE OF TWELVE LECTURES
WILL BE DELIVERED ON THURSDAY OF EACH WEEK, AT HALF-PAST EIGHT O'CLOCK, BY
PROF. ELIE CHARLIER,
Director of the French Institute for Young Gentlemen,
No. 43 East Twenty-fourth Street.

SUBJECTS:

MARCH 18TH, . . . MAN'S DESTINATION.
" 25TH, . . . CHATEAUBRIAND.
APRIL 1ST, . . . MME. DE SEVIGNÉ AND HER GRANDSON.
" 8TH, . . . DEMOSTHENES.

Course Tickets, $1 50; Single Tickets, 50 cents.

To be had at Lockwood's, 411 Broadway, and at Christern's, 763 Broadway.

POSTAGE STAMPS FOR SALE,
IN ANY QUANTITY,
AT
HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE.

UP THE MEDITERRANEAN.

PLEASURE VOYAGE.
By Eleanor Richardson.
Illustrated by F. O. C. DARLEY. Square 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE ERICSSON will leave NEW YORK on SATURDAY, May 1st, at 3 o'clock, P.M. on the above voyage, stopping a given number of days at GIBRALTAR, MALTA, ALEXANDRIA, JAFFA (for JERUSALEM), CONSTANTINOPLE, ATHENS, and NAPLES.

No Berths secured until paid for.

Full Steamer Fare for the Voyage $750.

Their Leather pamphlet, with full particulars, can be had of

DURHAM & CO.,
13 William street, New York.

DR. LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS.

A fresh Delivery of Dr. Livingstone's Africa is now ready, and the work may be obtained of the Booksellers generally throughout the United States and Canada; or

HARPER & BROTHERS will send it by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of Three Dollars.

MISSIONARY TRAVELS AND RESEARCHES IN SOUTH AFRICA; including a Sketch of Sixteen Years' Residence in the Interior of Africa, and a Journey from the Cape of Good Hope to Loando on the West Coast; thence across the Continent, down the River Zambesi to the Eastern Ocean. By DAVID LIVINGSTONE, LL.D., D.C.L. Two Maps and a Portrait on Steel, and Numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00.

CAUTION!

Messrs. Harper & Brothers deem this opportunity of cautioning the Public against several spurious publications, which, by a deceptive appearance, are made to appear as though containing from Dr. Livingstone. They are authorized to say that Dr. Livingstone negotiated them entirely and solely for the publication bearing that the present work is the

ONLY AUTHENTIC NARRATIVE OF HIS ADVENTURES AND TRAVELS IN AFRICA.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

HUNT, WEBSTER & CO'S
IMPROVED THIRD-STROKE
SEWING MACHINES.

WE ARE NOW PREPARED TO EXHIBIT this newly-invented and valuable instrument, and would call the attention of the trade to the superiority of a Sewing Machine whose qualities have only to be tried to be duly appreciated.

We have agreed commodious rooms at 449 BROADWAY, for the sale of these Machines, and all interested are respectfully invited to examine and decide upon their merits for themselves.

HUNT, WEBSTER & CO.,
449 Broadway, New York.
Dr. Isaac E. Hunt, Lincoln, Bates,
No. 659 Chestnut Street, Philada.

VOL. I OF HARPER'S WEEKLY,
Neatly bound in Muslin,
CLOTH GILT EXTRA,
is now ready.
Price $1 50.

N.B. This Volume can not be sent by Mail on account of its weight. It will be sent by Express, if so desired, freight to be paid by the Purchaser.

BRODIE'S
SPRING MANTILLAS.

A BEAUTIFUL ASSORTMENT OF BOUR-MADE
SILK AND OTHER MANTLES.
ALSO,
HIS USUAL LARGE STOCK OF LACE STYLES,
NOW IN
FRENCH AND SCOTCH GOODS.
Old St (Now No. 509) CANAL STREET,
NEW YORK.

RICH CLOTH COVERS
FOR
VOLUME I. OF HARPER'S WEEKLY
ARE NOW READY.
PRICE FIFTY CENTS.

The Trade and Booksellers will be supplied at TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT. DISCOUNT.

THE POLYLINGUAL JOURNAL.—A new Publication in French, English, Italian, German, and English, affords great facilities for learning these languages. Specimen, 3d. by post. Address HIRAM G. SPARKS, Editor, 253 Broadway, New York.

THE FIRST VOLUME
OF
HARPER'S WEEKLY,
Handsomely bound in Cloth and Half Morocco, may be had of the following Booksellers:

IN BOSTON.
A. WILLIAMS & CO.,
JOHN J. DYER & CO.,
GOULD, KENDALL & LINCOLN.

IN PHILADELPHIA.
A. WINCH.
H. B. ZIEBER.

IN PITTSBURGH.
HUNT & MINER.

IN NEW ORLEANS.
J. C. MORPHY,
B. M. NORMAN,
GEO. ELLIS.

IN DR. LOTZ.
JAMES M. CRAWFORD,
R. C. WOODWARD.

IN CINCINNATI.
H. W. DERBY,

And of Booksellers generally throughout the United States and Canada.

BURNETT'S COCOAINE.

IT is the source of a new and much admired compound for dressing the hair, prepared from the purest oils of the famous Cocoanut Oil Industrial Establishment, and renders the Hair the easier how stiff and dull soever it may have been for several days. It also promotes a healthy growth and prevents it from falling off. For sale by all druggists.

ANOTHER GREAT TRAVEL BOOK.

UNIFORM WITH LIVINGSTONE'S AFRICA.

ATKINSON'S SIBERIA.

ORIENTAL AND WESTERN SIBERIA: A Narrative of Seven Years' Explorations and Adventures in Siberia, Mongolia, the Kirghis Steppes, Chinese Tartary, and part of Central Asia. By THOMAS WITLAM ATKINSON. Illustrated with Beautiful Steel Engravings and Illustrations from Drawings by the Author. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00.

"Mr. T. W. Atkinson, as artist of considerable merit, is, in pursuit of the picturesque, has ventured into regions which, before him, had been trodden by few, if any, European travelers. Mr. Atkinson's travels embrace Oriental and Western Siberia, Mongolia, the Kirghis Steppes, Chinese Tartary, and portions of Central Asia, and his narrative, which is the result of seven years' explorations, is a most interesting account. It presents a slight deviation to Art in the beautiful steel plates and illustrations with which it is embellished, of what is at once most beautiful and most wonderful in the scenery of the countries through which the author passed. In some instances, as dangerous to the traveler. The public may easily take a journey with Mr. Atkinson, and, while attending our knowledge of this hitherto unknown, but most interesting portion of the globe."—Boston Atlas.

Mr. Atkinson's sketches were made by express permission of the Russian Government. They are, therefore, unrestricted, and are the result of travelling in the plains and mountains of Oriental and Western Siberia, Mongolia, the Kirghis Steppes, Chinese Tartary, and Central Asia. Perhaps no English artist was ever before admitted to this confidential kind of labour; or provided with the permission and number of a general passport; and will his sketches have been executed for the Emperor of Russia. Mr. Atkinson's encampments lead us away into forests, grasps the reader with the thunder and lightning of the storm, and the lightning strikes, the God's-sword-blade, among the mountains, and the reader is startled by the crash of the thunder, and the sound rolls around the red logs. Rivers are seen, in one case almost at the feet of the spectator, whose waters have been brought on waves of pieces more, perhaps, before visited; for an English artist to have penetrated into the wilds of Siberia is one of those fortunate circumstances."—Boston Athenæum.

To the geographer, the geologist, the ethnographer, the sportsman, and to those who read only for amusement, this book will be found interesting. The information is not only an adventurous traveler, but a correct and an observing one."—London Literary Gazette.

It is a valuable addition to the literature of travel, and will be read with interest."—London Sun. Mr. Atkinson's sketches are beautiful."—The geographer finds in it notice of ground heretofore little known, and the ethnologist, and botanist, and mineralogist, and zoologist, and geologist, too, at which they trace the various—the spontaneous productions of nature. A writer of a book of travel of adventure will find a number of points and escapes to interest him. Even the lover of a brisk, good-humored way of speech will find the book a pleasant one in every way."—London Morning Herald. Mr. Atkinson has given a few hundred miles of moving to and fro in a wild and picturesque country, a country almost a book worth reading, step by step."—London Examiner.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

* HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of Three Dollars.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.—The great blood purifier and liver potency upon the fluids of the body, cleansing them from all impurities, corrupting and scrofulous matter, and gentle aperient combined, it is unequaled.

Prepared and sold by D. SANDS, Druggist, No. 100 Fulton Street, New York. Price $1 per bottle, or six bottles for $5.

FUN!!!
HARPER'S COMICALITIES.
SELECTED FROM DRAWINGS BY
LEECH, DOYLE, AND OTHERS.
CONTAINING
THREE HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS.
IN FIFTY SERIES.
PRICE TWENTY-FIVE CENTS.
For Sale by all Booksellers and Periodical Dealers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

MR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL, "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous Illustrations by the Author, will be commenced in the NUMBER for MARCH of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. It is printed from early sheets —received in advance of the time of publication in England—for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE MOST POPULAR FAMILY
NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.

BULWER'S BRILLIANT ROMANCE, entitled "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?" will be published to the magazine of the publishers, with, and issued serially, by Harper's Weekly. Also with the Author, appears in HARPER'S WEEKLY simultaneously with its publication in England.

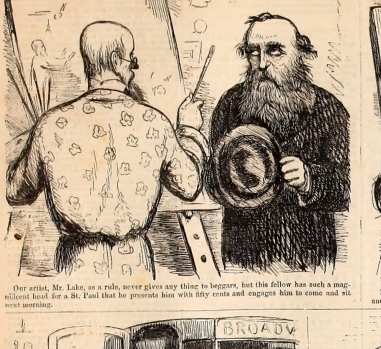
TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

One Copy for Two Years $2 00
Two Copies for One Year 3 00
Five Copies for One Year 6 00
Ten Copies for One Year 10 00
Twenty-one Copies for One Year 20 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Twelve or Twenty-five Subscribers.

Volume I. of HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in cloth extra, Price $2 50, is now ready.

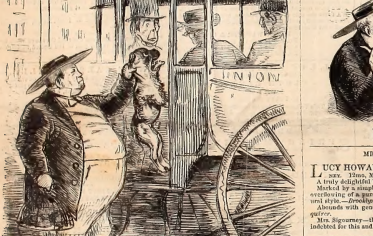
Monthly Numbers can be supplied to those who wish their Numbers bound, at Fifty Cents each. Twenty-five per cent. discount allowed to Booksellers and the Trade.



"HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" will be supplied to subscribers in the United States and Canada.

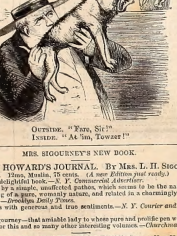
Numbers from the commencement of both the Magazine and Weekly can still be supplied. Specimens can be furnished gratuitously. Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest Club rates.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" must be paid at the Office where they are received. When prepaid quarterly in advance, the Postage in Harper's Magazine is one cent a number, and Twenty-five Cents a year on the Weekly.



Subscriptions will be received from the United States, in addition to their Subscription, Twenty-five Cents on the Magazine, and Twenty-six Cents on the Weekly, to prepay the Postage.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, New York.



Our artist, Mr. Lake, as a rule, never gives any thing to beggars, but this fellow has such a magnificent head for a St. Paul that he presents him with fifty cents and engages him to come and sit next morning.

Disgust of Lake when the grateful fellow, wishing to be civil to his benefactor, makes his appearance next morning clean shaven and in his best clothes.

"Will any gentleman or lady be so good as to hold this 'ere dog while I get in?"

OUTSIDE. "Fare, Sir?"
INSIDE. "As 'im, Towzer!"

MRS. SIGOURNEY'S NEW BOOK.

LUCY HOWARD'S JOURNAL. By MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents. (A new Edition just ready.)

"A truly delightful book.—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

Marked by a simple, unaffected pathos, which seems to be the natural overflowing of a pure, womanly nature, and related in a charmingly natural style.—Brooklyn Daily Times.

Abounds with generous and true sentiments.—N. Y. Courier and Enquirer.

Mrs. Sigourney—that amiable lady to whom pure and prolific pen we are indebted for this and so many other interesting volumes.—Churchman.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

EUROPEAN ACQUAINTANCE: Being Sketches of People in Europe. By J. W. DE FOREST. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

Mr. De Forest has had the rare tact and judgment to let the guide-books alone; and has given us what he actually saw and heard. Hence his unpretending volume affords the most life-like and animated, and charming pictures of European society.—N. Y. Com. Advertiser.

One of the most delightful and entertaining books of travel that has appeared for many months.—Phila. Christian Observer.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of Seventy-five Cents.

SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE. The Sad Fortunes of the Rev. Amos Barton.—Mr. Gilfil's Love-Story.—Janet's Repentance. A Novel. By GEORGE ELIOT (Originally published in Blackwood's Magazine.) 1 vol. 12mo.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FORT PLAIN SEMINARY, MALE AND FEMALE.
W. H. BANNISTER, A.M., PRINCIPAL.
Board, Room-Rent, Room warmed, and Washing, $52 50 per Term.
Next Term open March 25d.
Fort Plain, N. Y.

GROVER & BAKER'S
CELEBRATED
FAMILY SEWING MACHINES,
495 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
18 SUMMER STREET, BOSTON,
730 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

☞ These Machines are justly admitted to be the best in the market for family sewing.

INDISPENSABLE.—No CORRESPONDENT, no Young Gentleman or Lady, no Public Speaker, no Teacher of Youth nor Man of Business should be without procuring these

New Hand-Books for Home Improvement—by Mail.

HOW TO WRITE: A Pocket Manual of Composition and Letter-Writing. Price, Paper, 30 cts.; Muslin, 50c.

HOW TO TALK; OR, HINTS TOWARD A GRAMMATICAL AND GRACEFUL STYLE IN CONVERSATION AND DEBATE. 30 cents.

HOW TO BEHAVE; A Manual of Etiquette and Guide to Correct Personal Habits, with Rules for Public Societies and Deliberative Assemblies. Paper, 30 cents; Muslin, 50 cents.

HOW TO DO BUSINESS; A Guide to Success in Practical Life, and Hand-Book of Legal and Commercial Forms. Price 50 cents.

$1 50 will pay for the four works in one volume, in Muslin. Postage prepaid by

FOWLER AND WELLS, 308 Broadway, N. Y.

SEE ADVERTISEMENT elsewhere headed "STILL A CHANCE!"

E. WALKER & SONS, 114 FULTON STREET, NEW YORK. BOOKBINDERS.

All work executed with promptness, and in an good style, and at as low prices, as at any other establishment. Special attention given to the binding of HARPER'S MAGAZINE and WEEKLY.

STILL A CHANCE!—THE COSMOPOLITAN ART ASSOCIATION having postponed the annual award of premiums to the 25th of March next, subscriptions will be received up to that date. For $5 00 will get a splendid three dollar engraving, "Manfred Drinking," and also the Art Journal one year; a two dollar Magazine, besides a ticket to the award of premiums, among which are the celebrated GIFT PICTURE, and several hundred magnificent Pantoscopic engravings, $100 in Specie, $50 in Silver Plate, and stamps for a specimen of the beautiful ART JOURNAL, which contains full particulars. Address

C. L. DERBY, Actuary C. A. A.,
No. 548 Broadway, New York.

HOW TO DO GOOD AND GET "PAID FOR IT."—Take an Agency for our Publications. The terms are such, there can be no possibility of loss. EVERY FAMILY will be glad to obtain some of them. For particulars address

FOWLER AND WELLS, 308 Broadway, N. Y.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES. For all manufacturing purposes SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES are deemed indispensable. The public insist upon having their clothing, &c., made by them. SINGER'S FAMILY SEWING MACHINE is the latest presented for competition, and being arranged with full knowledge of the defects of other machines for similar uses, has avoided or remedied them all. It is the handsomest Sewing Machine in the market, and is easy to learn to operate. Using one of these machines is an elegant amusement. Price $100, with iron table complete.

I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway, New York.

SEE ADVERTISEMENT elsewhere headed "STILL A CHANCE!"

WHEELER & WILSON M'F'G CO'S
SEWING MACHINES,
OFFICE 343 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
Agencies throughout the Union.

Send for a Circular.

PHONOGRAPHY; or, PHONETIC SHORTHAND. For Alphabet, Specimen Pages of the Phonographic Magazine for 1858, and List of Works (free). Address BENN PITMAN, Cincinnati, O.

$150 WILL PAY FOR BOARD AND TUITION in the FLUSHING FEMALE COLLEGE one year. Address Rev. WILLIAM H. GILDER, A. M., President, at Flushing, Long Island.

MYSTIC HALL SEMINARY for Young Ladies, 5 miles from Boston. A Catalogue may be obtained of the Principal.

MRS. T. P. SMITH, Box, Boston, Mass.

SEE ADVERTISEMENT elsewhere headed "STILL A CHANCE!"

A NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE of HARPER & BROTHERS' Publications, with an Index and Classified Table of Contents, is now ready for distribution, and may be obtained gratuitously on application to the Publishers personally, or by letter inclosing SIX CENTS in Postage Stamps.

The attention of gentlemen, in town or country, designing to form Libraries or enrich their literary collections, is respectfully invited to this Catalogue, which will be found to comprise a large proportion of the standard and most esteemed works in English Literature—comprehending more than two thousand volumes—of which are offered, in most instances, at less than one half the cost of similar productions in England.

To Librarians and others connected with Colleges, Schools, &c., who may not have access to a reliable guide in forming the true estimate of literary productions, it is believed this Catalogue will prove especially valuable as a manual of reference.

To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, when books are to be procured through any bookseller or tradesman, applications with remittance should be addressed direct to the Publishers, by whom it will be promptly attended to.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

DETERIORATION OF THE ANGLO-SAXON RACE IN THE UNITED STATES.

[From the print of view of the London Punch.]

STALWART BRITON. "I tell yer what, Bill! We ought to be very thankful we're Englishmen—for whether it's the Climate, or whether it's the Ale, just see how those Americans are degenerating!"

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. II.—No. 64.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 20, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

CONTENTS.

I. SENATOR MASON, OF VIRGINIA, WITH PORTRAIT.
II. HOW'S MY BOY?
III. INTEGRITY.
IV. THE LOCUSTS.
V. SCENES IN CALCUTTA; WITH TWO ILLUSTRATIONS.
VI. CANTON AND THE CHINESE BOAT GIRLS, WITH THREE ILLUSTRATIONS.
VII. LITERARY.
VIII. DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.
IX. FOREIGN NEWS.
X. BRIDGING THE CONTINENT (THE HONDURAS RAILWAY), WITH FOUR ILLUSTRATIONS.
XI. LOGGED OUT.
XII. "FANNY."
XIII. BENJAMIN'S STORY, "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?"—Continued.
XIV. HIEROGLYPHICS.
XV. THE LATE EARTHQUAKE AT NAPLES, WITH NINE ILLUSTRATIONS.
XVI. WATCHING THE CLOCK.
XVII. A RESURRECTIONIST STORY.
XVIII. THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.
XIX. MARKET AND FINANCIAL REPORTS.
XX. CONSOLATIVES.

SENATOR JAMES M. MASON, OF VIRGINIA.

WE present to our readers this week a portrait of Hon. James Murray Mason, who was so well introduced by Mr. Winthrop, in June last, to an assemblage on Bunker Hill, as "a Senator from the Old Dominion, whose name is associated, in more than one generation, with eminent service in his native State and in the national councils."

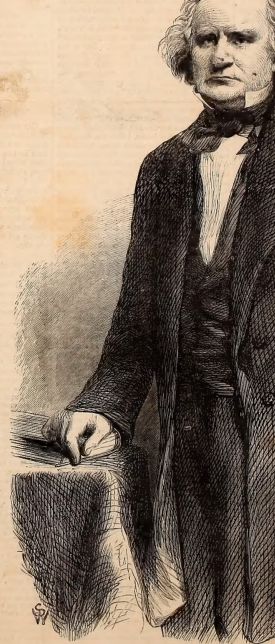
His first ancestor in Virginia was George Mason, who was, at the time of his emigration, a Member of the English Parliament, in which he represented his native county of Staffordshire, where his estates lay. He was of what was denominated the "Country Party," but was a stanch loyalist, and commanded a regiment of cavalry in the "Cavalier" army of Charles Stuart (afterward Charles II.) in the campaign against the "Roundhead" troops of Oliver Cromwell, especially distinguishing himself at the Battle of Worcester, in 1651. After the defeat of the royal forces in that closely-contested struggle Colonel Mason escaped to Virginia, and landed at Norfolk. Soon afterward he established a plantation in Westmoreland County, on the Potomac—"River of Swans" the Indians called it—on which river he and his lineal descendants for now more than two hundred years have lived.

The subject of this necessarily brief memoir was born on the 3d of November, 1798, on Analostan Island, which is encircled by the Potomac River, just above the present metropolis of the Union. It was at that time a part of the County of Fairfax, in Virginia, and was the residence of the Mason family.

As he grew up he was educated at the primary schools in Virginia and in Georgetown, District of Columbia, which was the residence of most of the Members of Congress in the then infant days of the "Federal City." The society of such statesmen as then sat in the councils of the Republic, and the privilege of listening to their debates, was in itself an education. He pursued a thorough course of study, and graduated, in 1818, at the University of Pennsylvania, in Philadelphia. The legal profession was evidently that to which he was best adapted, by endowments and education, among the various pursuits which offered themselves to his choice, and he commenced the study of law at the venerable Alma Mater of the Old Dominion, "William and Mary College," at Williamsburg. He afterward entered as a student the office of the late Benjamin Watkins Leigh, at Richmond, and so profited by the superior advantages afforded him, that he obtained a license to practice in 1820. In that same year he removed to Winchester, in Virginia, where he entered upon the practice of his profession with signal success.

His abilities were soon appreciated by his fellow-citizens, and in 1826 he was elected a member of the House of Delegates from Frederick County, in the General Assembly of Virginia. Distinguishing himself by the soundness of his political views and by his eloquence in debate, he was twice afterward returned a member of that body, which he left finally (declining a re-election) in 1831. He was also chosen and served as a member of the Virginia Convention called, in 1829, to revise the Constitution of that State.

He was elected to the House of Representatives for the District composed of Frederick and Shenandoah counties in Virginia in 1837, where he served but one Congress, and declined being afterward a candidate. He was at the Capital long enough, however, to place himself prominently among the distinguished men of the time as a clear, logical debater, and as an unflattering disciple of the Democratic statesmen of the past generation.



In January, 1847, he was elected by the Legislature of Virginia to the Senate of the United States, to fill the vacant seat of Joel Poinsy'sacker, who died during the session. He was re-elected in December, 1849, for the term commencing on the 4th of March, 1851 (the sessions of the Legislature being biennial); and he was again elected to the Senate in December, 1855, for the term commencing on the 4th of March, 1857, and to expire on the 4th of March, 1863. Those successive endorsements by the Old Dominion, so proverbially jealous of her fame, show that she appreciates the fidelity and ability and dignity with which Senator MASON represents her on the floor of the Senate of the United States.

Senator MASON's present position, as Chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, is proof of the high estimation in which he is held by his peers. True to the high behests of his public duty, he is diligent in his attention to business, and the record of debates shows that he never hesitates to express his convictions upon all public measures, or to criticise the public conduct of rulers when. Although a firm believer in those political doctrines which have crowned Virginia with glory, and the Union with prosperity, happiness, and honor, he never indulges in invectives against other Senators who may differ with him in opinion. His speeches show a high order of talent, which has been ripened and improved by long experience in political affairs. Arranging the points which he wishes to establish as systematically as Euclid laid down his problems, he so demonstrates their truths as he proceeds, calling to his aid time-honored authorities, that when he arrives at the closing argument the whole is geometrically proven. Justly jealous of constitutional encroachments, he is also ever ready to sustain the best interests of our common country, and to defend our national honor.

Mr. Mason has for many years wielded great influence in shaping the foreign relations of the country. His position as Chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations may be said to give him a quasi supervision of the proceedings of the State department; he is naturally in the intimate confidence of the President, and possesses the power of holding the Executive in check. In this high station Mr. Mason has acquitted himself worthily. His views of foreign policy have uniformly been American and conservative. He has never flinched from a bold, independent course, when the interests of the nation seemed to require it; nor, on the other hand, has he ever countenanced the noisy band of demagogues whose fixed idea seems to be that the United States should be an Ishmael among the nations. Not the least pleasing reminiscence of Mr. Mason's career—when he is gone—will be the leading part he took in returning the Resolute to England.

An interesting event in Senator Mason's life was his visit to Bunker Hill, referred to in the opening paragraph of this sketch. A statue of General Warren was inaugurated on the sacred spot where that hero fell, and Senator Mason found himself unexpectedly called upon to become an actor in the scene. His impromptu address was eloquent and effective. "If," said he, "that great and gallant man [Warren] could have returned from the battle-field, and told Massachusetts to hand down the memory of that day from generation to generation, posterity would have found his request fulfilled. Four generations have passed by; we are here in the fifth now. I shall tell it in Old Virginia, when I return to her hallowed land, that I found the spirit of Massachusetts as buoyant, as patriotic, as completely filled with the emotions that should govern patriotism, when I visited Bunker Hill, as it was when that battle was fought."

In person, Senator Mason is stalwart and well-formed, with a fine, imposing head, a pleasing countenance, and a keen eye. One of the few remaining polished links between the statesmen of the past and present generations, his manners are courtly, and the genial warmth of his heart endears him to a large circle of relatives and friends. He married a daughter of the late Benjamin Chew, Esq., of Philadelphia, and has children and grand-children. One of his sons, George Mason, Esq., has recently been appointed United States District Attorney for Texas. He removed from Winchester, Virginia, only five years ago, and having made Galveston his place of residence, made rapid progress in gaining the confidence of the people of his adopted State, as his name was recommended to the final foreappointment by the entire Congressional delegation of TEXAS.

HON. JAMES M. MASON, UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM VIRGINIA.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

HOW'S MY BOY?

BY SIDNEY DOBELL.

"Ho, sailor of the sea!
How's my boy—my boy?"
"What's your boy's name, good-wife,
And in what good ship sail'd he?"

"My boy John—
He that went to sea—
What care I for the ship, sailor?
My boy's my boy to me.

"You come back from seas,
And not know my John?
I might as well have asked some landsman
Yonder down in the town.
There's not an inn in all the parish
But he knows my John.

"How's my boy—my boy?
And unless you let me know,
I'll swear you are no sailor,
Blue jacket or no,
Brass buttons or no, sailor,
Anchor and never a row!
Sure his ship was the Jolly Briton."
"Speak low, woman—speak low!"

"And why should I speak low, sailor,
About my own boy, John?
If I was loud as I am spectacious,
I'd sing him over the town!
Why should I speak low, sailor?"
"That good ship went down."

"How's my boy—my boy?
What care I for the ship, sailor?
I was never aboard her.
So she afloat or be she aground,
Sinking or swimming, I'll be bound
Her owners can afford her!
I say, how's my John?"
"Every man on board went down,
Every man but one."

"How's my boy—my boy?
What care I for the men, sailor?
I'm not their mother—
How's my boy, I say?
Tell me of him, and no other!
How's my boy—my boy?"

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 20, 1858.

THE GREAT AWAKENING.

IT is not yet two thousand years since the origin of Christianity; and to-day it rules the civilized world. But no one who has studied its history can have failed to see that its progress has not been uniform. The growth of a century has been gained in a decade; periods of great activity have been succeeded by years of lethargy; the victories of the Church over the world have been followed by apparent victories of the world over the Church. In a word, Christianity, from the beginning, seemed to acknowledges a law of periodicity; religion has achieved her grandest triumphs by means of REVIVALS.

To use the theological language of Jonathan Edwards—the greatest philosophical thinker and one of the purest Christians that country has produced—"the work of Redemption, in its effect, has mainly been carried on by remarkable communications of the Spirit of God, the way in which the greatest things have been done has always been by remarkable effusions at special periods of mercy." Every age has had such manifestations. We trace them in the Pentecostal times of Apostolic preaching; in the missionary activity of the fifth and sixth centuries; in the genuine yet misdirected fervor of the days of the Crusades; in the mighty march of the Lutheran reformation; and in the great awakening of English-speaking men under the labors of Wesley and Whitefield. Within the present century, the greater part of the growth of Protestant Christianity, both in Europe and America, has been due to such revivals.

The Christian churches of the land are now in the midst of an extraordinary awakening, the greatest, perhaps, which they have ever known. The movement is so so grand a scale that it commands universal attention. It lies with the sublimity of vastness. The most indifferent and the most incredulous lookers-on, even those who profess no belief in Christianity at all, can not choose but gaze, if it be only in wonder to see the heart of almost a whole nation moved by one spiritual impulse. The hurry of the worshiping throngs of Maine are echoed by those of California; the "daily prayer-meeting" guides the sentiment that ocean to ocean. Wherever, within the memory of man, has this great city, spiritually, been so stirred by religious feeling and so attentive to religious observances, as this year or two ago the churches that yet remain in the centres of trade, "down town," were thought to have survived their days of possible usefulness; now they are filled, at high noon, by men of business and men of toil, drawing for the while, their thoughts of daily labor to strengthen their purposes of virtue by earnest prayer. The many churches are open also every night, and no clap-trap appeals or attractive "machinery" are necessary to fill them with attentive throngs. The Sunday services of Protestant worship are every where well attended; the preachers utter their message with unwonted force and fervor; and the minds of men are susceptible of religious instruction and impression to a degree which but a year ago was rare and occasional. And what is true of the city is true of the whole country. The journals, secular as well as religious, teem with chronicles of revival; the telegraph brings tidings from all quarters of an awakening; and every where, in public places, even in those "where merchants most do congregate," as well as in all circles of private society, you hear men talk of the new reformation. A similar movement is going on in the British Islands, "the Bishop of London and the Archbishop of England preach to the masses in the Abbey, and talk of opening the Cathedral for popular meetings;" and Lord Shaftesbury tells us that unusual religious activity among Churchmen of all schools, as well as among Wesleyans and Dissenters.

We are well aware that all men—even all Christian men—are not agreed as to the character of these manifestations. It is said that they are mere signs of an unnatural excitement which will soon pass away, and leave corresponding exhaustion behind it; that such excesses are usually followed by reactions; and that, on the whole, Christianity has more to fear than to hope from them. But the most objective view we hold against the grandest and most beneficent movements in the history of humanity. The progress of mankind in art, in science, and in literature has been marked by periods of excitement, of exaltation. Commerce in action has advanced by leaps, rather than by a regular march; and though the way may have been prepared during the years of silence and of apparent stagnation, three have always been thunder-peals "when thought hath wedded fact." But the test of every great movement in the human mind is its fruit; and it is matter of history that a large proportion of the so-called Evangelical Churchmen, now living, have been brought in by revivals. The leading philanthropists of the time are active in them; indeed, it is believed that most of the truly philanthropic enterprises of the age owe their origin to them. The present revival, moreover, is characterized by calmness, sobriety, and moderation: it is the movement, not of a torrent, but of a deep and quiet river. Nor do we hear any thing of sectarian strife and proselytism; good men of all the churches, come together in the "Union Meeting" for daily prayer.

Believing that the good results of this excitement will far outweigh the evil, and that its tendency is "to awaken and not to lull the land as by a sacred contagion," we bid it God-speed! We trust that, under the judicious teaching of Christian pastors, it will lead to the real awakening of the religious affections will be attended with a corresponding growth of Christian knowledge, and a deepening sense of Christian virtues. And if this be so, the American people will have reason to rejoice, for they will become, over the fruits of the great REVIVAL of 1858.

THE CHANGE OF MINISTRY IN ENGLAND.

SINCE our last number was published we have received advices of a change of Ministry in England—Lord Derby's Ministry taking the place of Lord Palmerston, who resigned the seals of office in consequence of his defeat on the Conspiracy to Murder Bill.

The Earl of Derby is known as the leader of the Conservative or Tory party. For the last twenty years the only members of the Tory platform of that party has been protection to native agriculture. But in 1852, when the Earl of Derby took office as Prime Minister, he found it so impracticable to attempt to restore any of the dreams of his party in reference to the re-enactment of the Corn Laws, that he was compelled to drop that policy was, if any thing, still more friendly to Free Trade than that of the Peelite-Liberals, who had carried it out. The Conservative party was, necessarily, thrown aside. Ever since then Lord Derby has had a certain number of followers in Parliament, whom they have called themselves a party; but they were never able to muster strength enough to build a peculiar policy of their own. There is no reason to suppose that, on any important question, Lord Derby would pursue a different course from Lord Palmerston.

There is, in England, one living political question, and only one, which is, in the estimation of political rights to the masses. It presents itself in various shapes—reform bills, projects for a new ballot, plans for a new electoral districts, etc.; but, at bottom, the idea is always the same—the question which perpetually recurs is, shall the people participate in the government of the country more largely than they have done, or shall they not?

On this issue the politicians of the day are divided into two well-defined parties. On one side the Radicals, with stray allies from the old parties, in favor of an extension of political rights to the masses. On the other, the old parties—under the name of Whigs, Liberals, Tories, or Conservatives—opposing any further concession to the growing spirit of Democracy.

Latterly the Radicals have gained strength enough to cope with any or all of the old parties. They have never fought a battle on the issue which forms the corner-stone of their organization; but they have twice defeated the Government on incidental questions. They defeated Lord Palmerston on the China question, and they have now defeated him on the French imbroglio. These victories must have taught them their strength.

British political custom requires that an outgoing Minister shall recommend his successor to the sovereign. Availing himself of this usage, Lord Palmerston, in resigning office, recommended Lord Derby as his successor. The latter had taken a leading part in defeating the Government, and was quite certain to prove unfriendly as possible the same line of policy as his predecessor. Lord Palmerston thus avoided the painful necessity of suggesting a name from among his real opponents—the Radicals—for the control of the Government. In other words, the succession of Lord Derby is a fraud upon the Radicals, and upon the British people. It is merely another illustration of the art possessed by the British aristocratic clique—who figure as politicians under various unmeaning party names—to retain the government among them at all costs.

It now remains to be seen how long the Radicals will submit to be thus cheated.

BANK MANAGEMENT.

A DECLARATION of nearly two hundred thousand dollars of the Union Bank of this city, and the report of the State of Pennsylvania Commissioners on the Bank of Pennsylvania, have attracted attention to the general subject of bank management.

From the facts elicited in the course of the investigation of the affairs of the failure of the Pennsylvania Bank and the Union Bank scandal have grown rise, it undoubtedly appears that banks, in this particular, are not conducted on principles calculated to ensure to the ultimate benefit of their stockholders; and it is marvelous, considering the fact, that bank stock should rank so high in the market. When a bogus mining or other joint-stock company is started, it is quite common for the promoters to hire good names as directors with a bribe of stock. But it has been commonly supposed that bank directors did something more than lend their names as irresponsible indorsers of concerns started under their auspices. It has been imagined by the public that the office of bank director was the reality onerous and responsible; that each director, in his turn, took an active and personal share in the management of the bank; and that all of these were intimately acquainted with the business, profits, liabilities, and resources of the bank. Recent developments do not justify any such supposition. It appears that the directors of the Bank of Pennsylvania did not know what to a million of dollars her much assets the bank had in its possession at any one time—though they were called upon by their names to sign a fiftieth specifying the bills receivable on hand when requested to do so by the President; and the directors of the Union Bank, in like manner, seem never to have insinuated—during the last ten years—such an examination of their books and such as would have resulted in a reliable statement of their affairs.

These disclosures are calculated to stagger the faith of many believers in bank management. We were accustomed to mining swindles; we knew of railway financial operations; we had read of State defaults; we had even heard of insurance collapses; but banks had hitherto elicited the casualty of the "run," and commanded universal confidence. These recent exposures are likely to shake their standing.

All the foregoing evils have befallen our leading banks during the past ten years might have been averted by the observance of a very few simple rules of business sense. That is to say, that no man should accept a bank directorship unless he is prepared to do the proper work of the office, and to be judge with his own eyes of the business of the institution. If he takes the post in order to discount his own paper to a greater degree than his fellow-men, or to be done by others, loss must eventually result to the bank. Next, every bank should insist on a regular balance of accounts at stated, but uncertain, intervals; the books and cash should be frequently examined by a Committee of Directors, and the employes of the bank should have no notice of such examination; finally, a system of business should be pursued among the officers, and no office should be held continuously by any one person. There is another rule which, if observed by the directors, would almost quickly put a stop to defalcations. There never has been an instance of defalcation within the past ten years in which it did not appear, after the discovery was made, that the defaulter had been living far beyond his means. The least previous acquaintance with his style of living would have conveyed timely and unequivocal evidence of his dishonesty. If bank Presidents were in the habit of calling to know how their clerks live, and what they spend, there would be no more defalcations.

Until these rules are observed, we must expect to hear of periodical mishaps.

THE CASE OF THE BARK "ADRIATIC."

THE American bark Adriatic, having been libelled at Marseilles for steaming down the French vessel Lyonnais; having been condemned and sentenced, together with her owners and captain, to pay the full value of said Lyonnais to her owners; and having escaped from the custody in which she was held by the French authorities, is now fully due at this port.

The condemnation of the Adriatic is said to have been based on the fact that at the time of the collision, namely, during the night, she had no lights aloft.

Maritime law is divided into two parts; that which is universal, and that which is local or national. All nations are agreed upon certain principles of maritime law; which principles, originally derived from the Romans, have been improved and settled by the English and American jurists, and gradually consolidated into the shape of axioms. Such is the law respecting prizes and articles contraband of war. There are other principles of maritime law which are settled by the maritime statutes of the various sea-faring nations, and which vary, therefore, according to the usages of those nations. Such are the rules governing the tackle, apparel, and lights of sea-going vessels. Each nation has peculiar regulations on these heads. It would be advantageous in certain points of view for all nations to agree upon a uniform code in these respects. But they have not done so; and until they do, no nation can presume to impose its peculiar statutes upon the vessels or even the waters of another.

At the time of the Adriatic came into collision with the Lyonnais she was sixty miles from the American coast. According to our maritime law she was beyond the reach of the statutes which govern the waters of the United States. Her case should be tried as the law of nations or the law of France! And if it be true that she has been fined and condemned under a peculiar local French law which obliges vessels to carry lights during the night, how palpably unjust her condemnation was, and how justifiable her escape!

Not only would Captain Dunham, on this state of facts, deserve the applause of the police for his conduct, but the Committee of Congress of Foreign Affairs, to whom the subject has been referred, owe it to the country to insist on the abandonment, by the French Government, of the principle on which his arrest was based, in order that our ships may, hereafter, trade with France in safety.

THE TURKISH ADMIRAL.

CAN not some respectable persons rescue the Turkish Admiral out of the clutches in which he seems to have fallen? Ever since he arrived here he has led the life of a prize pig; he has been carted up and trotted down to see this, that, and the other, between two New York City Councilmen, and driven, and badgered, and bullied, and worried, and cheated, as no respectable visitor ever was before. The accounts which have been given in the daily papers of his Excellency's treatment are vulgarity of the individuals who have assumed to take him in charge are enough to make every one blush for the city.

☞ We shall give in our next number an admirable likeness of his Excellency Ahmed Pasha, Mural Mohammed Pesha, from a photograph taken expressly for this journal. The portrait is to be accompanied by biographical details of great interest, and heretofore unpublished.

THE LOUNGER.

LOUNGERS IN DANGER.

IN these days and in this city a Lounger must take great care, or he will find himself a busy-body. With the phenomenal and multiple life of all kinds, and half a dozen theatres and concerts—with eloquent and instructive lectures—with Barnum's Aquarium—with two Museums, and Simpson's Historical painting of the restoration of the Arctic ship Resolute, and the Dusseldorf Gallery, the Belmont Gallery, and the Bryan Gallery, and the Dusseldorf Gallery, and the artists' studios—with a Mohammedan Mosque—with a dozen other public demonstrations of all kinds—with a dozen Lenten parties every evening—with morning, afternoon, and evening receptions—what is he to do?

In the realm of art the most prominent object for the loafer is Meyerbeer's Huguenots, at the Academy. The manager has issued proclamations and pastoral letters, engravings, advertisements of columns of notices and criticisms, until it is foolish for any body to pretend that he does not know of the performances of the Huguenots in Irving Place.

Yet it is very droll to observe what particular attention is paid to the fact, which is a very plain fact, half despairing appeals are made to the public to come forward and show that New York has of much taste, and sentiment, and musical appreciation as Paris, or St. Petersburg, or Madrid. Every time a new version of Opera Legitur, or of such opera is put upon the stage, a grand hold-day takes place, in which we are claims to assert, that what is considered to be the same thing, to a proper civilization, are to be determined. It was so of Norma, Ugeno, and Bellini, in Chambers Street, thirteen years ago, and it is precisely the same in the Academy of Music now. The public taste is treated by the manager as a farmer treats his field. Every year it must be broken up—furrowed and harrowed, de novo.

Besides, as an observer merely, who has not yet been spoiled by the sights of the Desperate at the Academy, the Lounger is persuaded that it is an unmanageable opera for esthetic and popular purposes. The glittering spectacle and the prolonged thundering upon the tom-tom of the newspapers are excellent contrivances to fetch people in. But Meyerbeer's music, despite Madame George Sand, will never hold the public heart a great while. It is most laborious, elaborate, skilful, careful, stately, effective, imposing; he brings to bear every kind of prestige, intellectual spectacle, costume, ballet, concert; he takes care that the public mind is properly prepared—that heralds, and parasites, and sub-authors, as it were, go up and down the earth blowing great trumpets, and announcing the approach of the stupendous Impostor. But all this coming shines; and when the glad tidings that Meyerbeer is going to produce an opera has been listened to the uttermost parts of the earth, Paris, the metropolis of civilization, suspends all other interest—fabulous sums are offered for places not to be had for the first night—nests are taken, the entire theatre is engaged, for weeks in advance in advance; and the untold evening dragoons are stationed along the Boulevards and the Rue Lepelletier, and the streets swarm with all the people of ease to see those who are going to see the new opera. The work itself is a prodigious piece of ceremony and excitement. It is incontestably a work of great talent and consummate knowledge of the world. It is every thing but a work of genius.

Might not an audacious critic find a great deal of roundabout, in every way, between an oration of Mr. Everett's and an opera of M. Meyerbeer?

There are sounds of a grand music in Meyerbeer, even of war to the fields. While Mr. Ullman makes his engagements with Jenny Lind, Meyerbeer Mr. Maretzek is to plant himself at Burton's, and try to turn his flank. It may be only rumor. If it be true, none one may say that he will not do a great pity. Both the gentlemen are reported to have done well by their newspaper agents; for they come to war, they must necessarily harm each other; and as for the public interest and sympathy and support, why, the public cares very little as much about the managers as the Roman plebs cared for the lions and gladiators in the Coliseum.

VIRTUE and CAKES AND ALE.

With beautiful humility Fashion acknowledges that its glory is nothing. Anxious lest to offend the slightest prejudice, it conforms with exquisite tact to every variation of opinion. Thus, dear reader, the reader knows, the city is plunged into profound woe for its shortcomings and peccadilloes of the last year—under the auspices of Lent. But to assuage your virtuousness and to cheer and allay false zeal. It was, therefore, the kindly office of the Lounger to receive the following card, which combines the most elegant sport for the season with the greatest tenderness for human nature. The card in question is of a contrite pale-gray hue, and the letters are in the deepest purple:

Mrs. Genaramis O'Gammon at home to a VERY LOW Card on Friday evening, when the cause which is indispensable. Dancing from eight to twelve, where at any generosity. N.B.—A copy of the first-rend Mr. Jorgeous's remarks on the Immaculate Conception in the library, upon the punch-table, for those who wish to peruse it."

MOHAMED PACHA AND CAPTAIN MUSTAPHA.

THE Pacha has come and left us. He is the passage of youth, he is "getting it." The daily papers have supplied the details of his reception, and if the world does not know all that it received it is too busy. A wise man, when he does not know how to speak German or to play on the violin, will never ask a lady in that language to accompany him in that dance. The thing he can not do is the thing to try to do.

The city of New York is clearly not a wise man. It tries to learn all arts and accomplishments, and goes for distinguished people, and it makes most melancholy failures.

What, for instance, has this innocent Turk done that, upon touching our shores, he should be forthwith carried off to the most pompous dinner of the entire asylums belonging to the city?—that he should be "set down" in public to pork and wine, both of which, as religiously forbidden by his creed, could hardly be publicly acceptable to him (however he may, in the privacy of his own apartments—caches in private)—and made to witness the frantic efforts of the city fathers to get a "toe" in? Viewed as a punishment the entertainment seems its advantages, but as a festive reception it is rich beyond Rabelais.

Nature gave him a reception somewhat better than the municipal. It dropped in the city in a soft, sparkling beauty, such as the Turk perhaps never saw. It filled the air with evanescent splendor, more exquisite than that of pearls of Ormus; and as the Turk sat cross-legged at his window, and toasted with gratitude a pipe of yenee, listening to the merry bells, and watching the throngs in the streets, he must have felt willing to waive the small-pox, measles, crape, and undertakers, and not altogether unknown to him in his own, his native land, and to observe and study those features which are peculiar to the continent he has reached.

If he has ever read—and there is no reason to doubt that, as a well-educated Turk, he knows the —the letters of his fellow-Moslem, the Capidn Mustapha Rubadui-Keli-Kheh, written from New York in the early part of this century, and preserved in the delightful Mustapha Papers, he will admire and wonder at the tenacity of a nation which exhibits the same habits and manners in the treatment of foreigners that it did fifty years ago. Although with much less simplicity in the forms.

The reader will doubtless remember that the Captain Mustapha writes to Assem Hachem in Trigoli:

"Thou wilt doubtless be anxious to learn our reception in this country, and how we were treated by a people whom we have been accustomed to consider as unenlightened barbarians. On landing, we were visited upon by our lodgings—I suppose according to the direction of the municipality—by a vast and respectable crowd of boys and negroes, who shouted and threw up their hats, desirous to do honor to the distinguished personages who formed the cavalcade. They were somewhat ragged and dirty in their appearance, but we were delighted with their enthusiastic simplicity. One of them, in the zeal of admiration, threw an old shoe, which, with a natural anxiety for its entire salutation on one side of the head, wirrow I was not hit. I was pleased to perceive by my companions, and to that this was the customary manner in which great men were honored in this country, and that I was more highly satisfied they were the more they were subjected to the attackand pelting of the mob. Accordingly, I smiled upon them, waved my hand to my turban, and made a speech in Arabic-Greek, which gave great satisfaction, and occasioned a shower of stones, which, as I judged, from its exceedingly refreshing to us all."

One fancies Mahmoud Pacha secretly envying the happier fate of Mustapha Captain, who fell upon the simple days of the republic, and was let off with only the flinging of an old shoe.

FIDEI ITHE.

THE Spartans and some other savage nations exposed their children in tender infancy, to harden them and inure them to privation. The Americans do the same thing in New England. Accustoming their children with fire. During the year they are kept burned almost to death in winter, and lately one teacher, desirous with the best possible results. Earmuffs, hoes, and stove-pipes are indispensable articles in the season, by which means the buildings, and illuminate the papers with most startling flashes. The children are sometimes also apparently constructed like cages; and when the alarm is given, no foolish scholar need hope to escape the notice of the master. It is a result of the system of education carried on in the common schools, of course that the children should learn that seating is intended to persuade all parents to send their children to school. Now in a republic the leading business of life is politics, and hence there is ought proverb about every body's business being nobody's. The Fejee Islanders, who devour selves upon their fine roads and their pour houses, and, so far, they disproved the justice of the proverb. Here everybody's business is the politician to imitate the Swiss, so far, at least, as to have common places as well as their hips. The Zeitgeist of the nineteenth century has produced a new species of animal, which is to the second what the Lounger is to the first—the Politician. He can be said to his friends at the dinner, "My wife and accompany me to the theatre to-night," and he leave will be most useful to me. She is familiar with the languages of South Africa—she is able to do it is nothing to compare with the well-known fact that in that country one must put one's hand to every thing. The Politician is the man who knows how to proceed, she knows that the wife must be the maid-of-all-work within, while the husband must be the jack-of-all-trades without. Long ago it was decided that I am to be accompanied by my guardian angel—and I am glad of it—but I should be sorry to his country by-and-by laden with richer spoils than my mere conqueror ever won.

It is not being too much of a politician when Queen of England took leave of another conqueror, and handed him a sword, with the characteristic remark, "Sir Drake, stretch it out;" and surrounded with every luxury, Sir Francis Drake sailed away to the Spanish Main, carrying fire and sword, and returned with gold and slaves.

The Politician is just sometimes Dr. Livingstone had inspired all the discoverers, and first explorers of countries—and even a few more—that the ancient history would have been! Rupine, war, and outrage mark the first exploration of the African and Americas, as they do the first settlement of every continent. Even Columbus brought a sword in his hand, and he had a great deal of blood upon there is no sudden story than the history of the Spanish Conquest in America. The great business of the Politician is to prevent the like in these days of crimes and mistakes in the past. When the happy day arrives—the day of which I am sure—that Christendom as a dream, because it involves simple Christianity,—in which the right men are sent to the right place, and the wrong men to Parliament and not the Cortes and Picarro, who is sent to distant lands and

Dr. Livingstone has told the story of his travel and exploration in a work which has been very widely sold in this country, and in spite of which we will always remain an authority upon lands and people of which we know little. He has left behind a counterfeiting or garbling it, or of swindling the public with a spurious publication, different from the one which he has himself authorized, and of which he derives the benefit, is so incredible that it may well be, successful. It has been so in several instances which have come to the knowledge of the Lounger. Every reader who wishes to have Dr. Livingstone's narrative in the form in which he wrote it, and in which he meant it to be published, will take care to obtain the edition of Harper and Brothers.

A gentleman in Rome, New York, writes to the publishers of this paper that he had lately procured a copy of Livingstone's book, "which is evidently a fraud, and got up only as a speculation." The fact of the fraud shows the popularity of the work, and should put every purchaser upon his guard.

CHRISTIAN CAUGHT IN NEW YORK.

NOTHING is so rare as a Christian in Christendom. If a man finds a bag of money in the street and restores it to the owner, it is a matter of congratulation and gratitude in the public prints. The whole "trade" of the city of New York comes to a stand-still, with wondering and fills to newness; and every man has a vague idea that his neighbor is getting the better of him, or at least is paying to. They are all Christian merchants in a Christian city of the nineteenth century of the Christian era. The practical principle of Christianity is—Love thy neighbor as thyself.

"Ah! that would be da trade,"

"Nor in politics,"

"Nor in society,"

"Or A, B, and C.

Where then does it do?

"In the months of ministers on Sundays," answer A, B, and C in their hearts and their conduct.

Nothing so old as Christianity in Christendom. "Love your enemies as yourself." "But as you would be done by." Certainly, answers A, B, and C. "Do unto A, B, and C before they work. Come in, then, you poor starving people, and eat.

"Devil!" says A.

"Extremely odd!" says B.

"Premium on lunatics!" says C.

"Good man, but—" says D, touching his forehead.

The newspapers are full of it. The town talks of it. Seven hundred thousand people hearing every Sunday, and, indeed, every day, of the beauty and the duty of loving your neighbor, hurry in crowds to see a man who is positively doing it. It is really very piquant. How many does he feed? How much does it cost him? How long has he fed it? What the devil does he do it for? How very funny! What a queer old chap! Let's go and see the Tootles!

[CONTINUED CHRISTIANS.]

WRIGHT AND WHITE.

A FEW weeks ago the Lounger was great delighted to learn that Mr. Wright, our Minister to Prussia, to Berlin, had, without injuries to any person, did not put his principles in his pocket when he gave a breakfast to some gentlemen and Ladies in Berlin. Mr. Wright is of the Methodist persuasion a great outrage to many critics; while to a correspondent of the Lounger and to himself it seemed only a simple and manly adherence to his (the Minister's own practice at home, and a pleasant instance of the true Christian and catholic independence of an American citizen.

The Lounger has recently looked with great interest at the papers which were so furious and sarcastic because Mr. Wright didn't choose to give his guests Champagne, although they were grown-up and titled people, to see what criticism they make upon the conduct of Mr. White, the Minister to the United States at Lyons, France. That gentleman lately gave a fête—it was on St. Valentine's day—and because he was not a papist, very much to the Rage of France and of the United States. And the chief newspapers were a-tuns of the present Emperor of France, Louis Napoleon, crowned with laurel, and on one side of that august personage was a band of Swiss de Castellane, and on the other that of George Washington! and the ciphers on the Emperor's carriage were also victorious.

Now France is a friendly ally of ours, and may she long remain so. But if American patriotism and sense of decency in the fête at M. Wright's dispersed in Berlin, what effect has Mr. White's absence from the dinner that he in Lyons upon the national pride? Why should an American official take such pains to put his forehead in the dust to show much an humble he is? Why should he? It be must have his host, as a matter of courtesy, why not carry it, quietly to the host, as he would to the Strasbourg and Boulogne, or for the reign of terror he isn't "inaugurated" in Paris? And why is not Washington a place of honor? Why isn't once Washington's with Castellane, who is the representative of the military Governor of Lyons?

It is not to be excused upon the plea of courtesy. It is only to be explained by the servility of the time.

It is the unwarranted overdoing of an officer who forgets that he should represent America—the democratic idea of the age. So self-respecting gentleman, whatever his official relations with the Emperor Napoleon, would treat a man like Louis Napoleon with more than formal official respect.

As an American and a man, who would not have enjoyed the breakfast of Mr. Wright, even without the lunge at, more than the ball of Mr. White, with the laurel-crowned bust of the French Tiberius?

COSAS D'ESPAÑA.

THE beginning of the history of this continent is the Spanish Conquest, and whoever would commence reading the story of his whole country properly, must begin with it. Here the Spaniard first landed in Mexico a century before the Pilgrims came to Plymouth. The shores of the Mexican Gulf and the West Indies swarmed with people with Europeans and covered with their institutions while the coast of provinces of historic night rested upon the shores, and hills, and valleys on which the great camp of Western empire is now settled.

Hence our historical writing has not been at random. Our well-loved authors, Irving, Prescott, Motley, Hildreth, and Bancroft, have all treated in order of the progress of American discovery and civilization. It was in the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, and under their auspices

Prescott has told their story—that the great discoverer was about. Irving has followed Columbus across the sea, and through his life. Prescott again has chronicled the two great branches of discovery north and south—Cortes and Pizarro, Mexico and Peru, relating from the results of Columbus's explorations. Prescott is continuing the tale of the subsequent Spanish rule in Europe, while Motley accompanies him, devoting his special care to the great battle-ground of modern progress, the Netherlands, on which were sown the seeds from which the harvest of American development has sprung. Hildreth will write the history of Plymouth—and of Plymouth Rock and Jonestown Bancroft and Hildreth will write the wondrous tale.

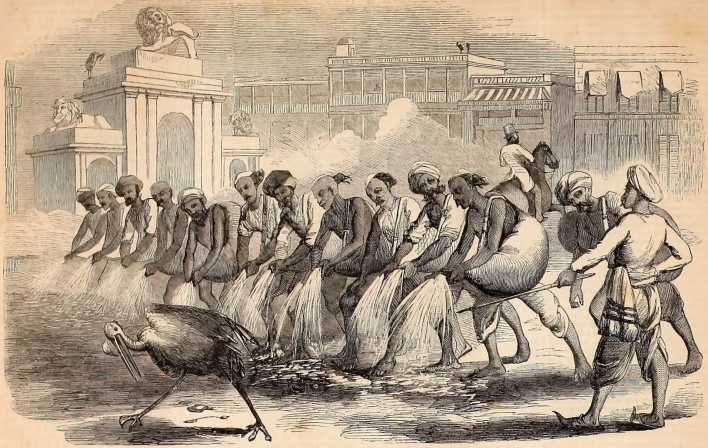
It is this series of historical works which is really the true glory of our literature. Cooper, Emerson, Bryant, Longfellow, and the rest, are secondary glory.

The Spanish Conquest in America is not only a romantic and somewhat confused story, as it is usually considered, but it is full of the most permanent interest in two points: first, the character of the contact of the highest civilization of the sixteenth century with tropical barbarism; and secondly, the demonstrated superiority of Christian principle over pagan power as an instrument of civilization.

This whole question, which may be pursued at length through the histories of Irving and Prescott, is now the subject of a history by Arthur Helps in the English scholar and author—the writer of "Friends in Council," "Essays written in the Intervals of Business," etc. Uniting to an exquisite study clear and racy style a deep and conscientious study of all the original materials and a habit of accurate statement, Mr. Helps has made a most general survey of the whole ground, with special reference to the Spanish sources of labor in their new relations. The work is not yet completed; but three volumes, about the size of Irving's "Columbus," have been issued in London, and have been reprinted by the Harpers here, bringing the history down to the death of Atahualpa in Peru. Of course the third work must ensure the great title of "Conquistas" and Prescott's "Conquests of Mexico and Peru" will henceforth be known as a single story in a much compacter form. It is a masterly compendium, so far as it is advanced, of the whole matter.

To American readers it will have the peculiar charm of translating the most interesting and fascinating account of Las Casas, the Spanish priest, who is usually considered to be the father of negro slavery upon this continent. Mr. Helps shows precisely what Las Casas did, and what he himself thought of what he did. It is the first time that the Roman Catholic Church, as such, can not justly be held accountable for the terrible tragedy of the Indians and the Spanish rule. But the fathers of that Church were generally the friends of the unfortunate race; while Las Casas himself should be recognized and honored as their Christian and Wilberforce.

The whole work is intelligent and delightful. It is full of little maps, constantly repeated upon each page, to keep the reader, without the trouble of referring to an atlas, has the relation of the different countries to each other always before his eyes. It is a little thing, but a great convenience. The spirit of the author is so calm, and wise, and humane—he is so in love with his theme, and grasps it so strongly—that all the romance of the story's relations, and the principles, of which all history is only an illustration, are kept clearly and consistently in view.



MISS BROADSTREET TO THE RESCUE!

WHEN, in your night-cap and dressing-gown, you are preparing to shoot a burglar from your chamber-window, to feel his hand upon your throat must be a discovery of the highest interest and importance to you. In the matter of the Tobacco War, what is that position, compared with the one in which the Lounger correspondent of Miss Mercedes Broadstreet, will find herself, upon pursuing the following indignant communication? It will be clearly a man who goes to no Women's Rights' conventions, and who remains severely seated in the seminoles, when he receives the following letter, when there are already twelve inches, including the Lollies with lumps. Now, therefore, I call the ladies to keep calm. It is a dreadful blow, to be sure, but something may yet be done. While the mischief is brewing, it is hard to do a lot. It is the hideous assault, ladies, upon your very handwriting, glove, pocket-book, pin-cushion? Then give mind thrills with horror to think that the forty-foot itself may become the arena of a desperate contest between Parlor and Counting-House.

"FRIEND LOUNGER.—There appears to be a malicious misrepresentation on the part of the manufacturers of our fine smoking prodigies. Not content with adopting a style of dress which excites a sense of ridicule and disgust in the minds of sensitive, unselfishness, and wickedness, they have made a direct attack on a highly respectable class of citizens—to wit, the ladies, the ornament of the world," or grind the delectable 'weed' itself between their genial selves.

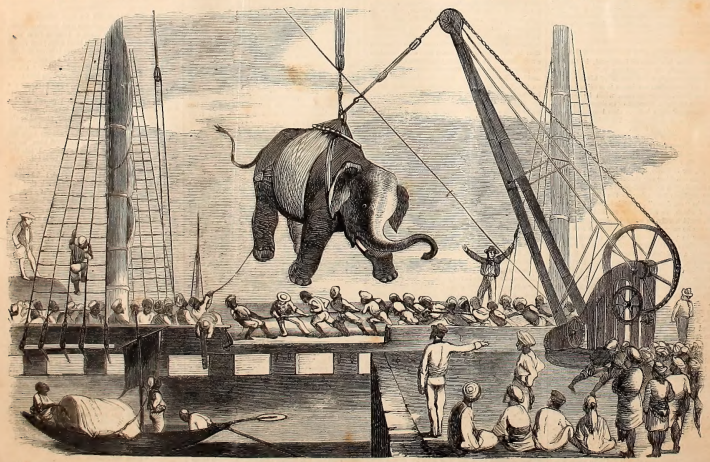
"The sacred rights of 'blowing a cloud,' and returning a 'cheroot' to the lips of a friend, are trampled in the rich brown, waxy streams of expectoration, have never, I believe, been issued in London, and therefore of the extensive and valuable family of Tobacco Worms, I feel sure that no specimens exist. I am at a distance from a museum, to send off the weakening and depressing effect of the Tobacco Worm preserved in spirits. Therefore, 'Patchouli,' or 'Creme d'Ethis.' Is it to be taken for a fact that our most valuable commercial staple is unremarked? Must we submit to have the pure ether substituted by the second abomination of the street-cheroot of France and America, and quietly tolerate the concealing odors, without one attempt to relieve our distressing position? The enthusiastic damsel, of the interesting age aforesaid, has been much annoyed by cheroot-smoking for the last forty-four days, and has felt the gradual encroaching agony of the offending Acrobat which commenced with a 'cheroot' in a cigar. I feel sure that, on the contrary, the fumes of six different-assorted abominations may be 'Vooms,' indistinguishably,

"A. SAVAGE, Tobacco Worm."

WATERING THE STREETS OF CALCUTTA.

SCENES IN CALCUTTA.

THE accompanying pictorial representations of the methods by which the streets are watered in Calcutta, and elephants are landed, are of interest at the present time.



Though New York is in the temperate zone, every resident is aware of the suffering which is caused by the dust in the summer months. In the tropical zone the plague is far more severe. At Calcutta, for instance, the dust penetrates every chink, cranny, and crevice in furniture and clothing, and at times renders life insupportable. At Lucknow, residents declare that they could bear the heat well enough, but the dust drives them from the city. In the capital of the Bengal Presidency large sums are expended for the purpose of allaying the dust. Early in the morning a gang of men may be seen knee-deep in the river filling their leathern bags with water. As soon as they are full they proceed, under the command of a foreman, to one of the principal streets, and range themselves in a line which stretches across the street. Each man squeezes his leathern bag as though it were a bagpipe, and the gang run at a jog-trot through the street, sluicing a deluge before them. As soon as their bags are empty they return to the river to replenish them, and continue their labors under the command of their foreman throughout the day.

Water-carts, it seems, have not been invented in India. But if the accounts we read be reliable, the khistie, or water-carriers, achieve the desired end much more satisfactorily and cheaply than carts do here.

Our other illustration represents the landing of elephants from ships at Calcutta. Elephants, though not used as offensive animals in war in our day, are nevertheless essential parts of a military train; they carry general officers, draw cannon, and form the brew and sinew of the transportation department. Importation of elephants from Ceylon and Bangkok is constantly carried on for the benefit of the Government of India.

When Hannibal wanted to cross the Rhone with his elephants he had rafts constructed, covered them with earth and turf, and, with the aid of a sagacious female elephant, seduced his male monsters upon the raft, which was instantly unmoored and towed across stream. We have invented the crane since Hannibal's time, and now elephants are disembarked from ships with as much ease as any other bulky and weighty articles. Bands are made fast round their bodies, and they are hoisted up and let down, either into barges or into the shallow water on the side of the quay.

Our readers remember the story of the elephant that was sent to England a century and a half since, and who, in the attempt to land from the clumsy craft in which he had made the journey, stove in the bulwarks and narrowly missed drowning the crew. The world has progressed since then; now elephants are no more trouble on board ship than bales of cotton. It must, however, be a striking spectacle to see one of the huge brutes hoisted over the side of a ship and swinging in mid air.

LANDING AN ELEPHANT FROM SHIPBOARD AT CALCUTTA.

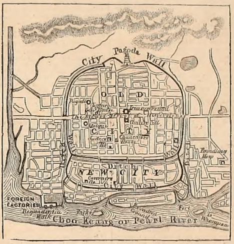
CANTON AND THE BOAT GIRLS.



In the last Number of this journal we gave our readers a chart of Canton River, with the approaches to Canton. Hereto subjoined will be found a plan of Canton itself, which will prove of service in making intelligible the movements of the outside barbarians within the walls of the Sacred City, which is now in their possession.

Canton, often threatened, has at last been taken. The unfordable ditch has been crossed, the impregnable wall has been battered down, the barbarian rockets have cleared a passage for the barbarian feet, pagodas, governor's houses, treasurer's halls, and tea factories have been knocked into a cocked hat, the lion-hearted soldiers of the Celestial Emperor have reserved their vengeance for the present, and the foreign devils strut, vaingloriously, up and down the Strait Street of Benevolence, ogling the small-footed fair ones, and cutting off the tails of refractory citizens.

Poor Yeh, disguised in coolie dress, has been taken prisoner and sent on board a British man-of-war, where, if he is a sensible man, he will lead a jolly life enough, till his Imperial master shall choose, in mercy to the barbarians, to submit to their terms. Two Englishmen and a Frenchman meantime discharge the multifarious duties of the late obstinate governor of the province of Quangtong; and the Celestials will for the first time have an opportunity to test the practical and just rule of the barbarians. Much is to be hoped from the intimate relations into which the best inhabitants of the captured city will be brought with the conquerors. Old prejudices will receive a severe shock; and the capture and rule of Canton may prove an entering wedge toward a willing adoption of a liberal policy by the Chinese, who, it is to be hoped, will perceive not only that the outside barbarians are more powerful than themselves, but also that they are more moderate and just in their requirements, and will be of more benefit to the Chinese than these have hitherto been permitted to suppose.

In the mean time, hit or miss, no one takes the misfortunes of his country easier than the bumboatman of Canton River, who, with his family, goes up and down among the shipping, laden with horticultural dainties, and is ever a welcome visitor to hungry Jack-Tar. The feature on board one of these boats—after the eatables, of course—is the girl, or woman, who steers and takes charge of the boat. Women do almost every thing in China. They plow, they fish, they buy and sell, they gather and prepare tea, row and steer ferry-boats and passage-boats, make boots and umbrellas, and even act in the capacity of porters. China is the country for Lucy Stone and the Woman's Rights people.

As will be seen by our illustrations, the boat girls of Canton River are not beauties. In fact, there are few things in nature more hideous than these broken-down hags—shrill-voiced, sepulchral-eyed, and betrowsered. The river population of China comprises the poorest and most knavishly-inclined of the Tartars. Thousands of families are born, live, and die upon the river. In the boats which float up and down may be seen all ages, from the grave picanniny Celestial, with inch-long tail, and buoy of calabash attached to his body to save him from a watery death should he inadvertently tilt overboard, to the aged crone who sits in the stern burning joss-sticks and mumbling rice. Of the virtue of the boatwomen the less said the better, perhaps. Of their strength and skill in managing their boats in the intricate passages and currents of the river wonderful stories are told. Alone, with a young monkey-faced Celestial slung to her back, one of these girls will guide an immense boat through the most crowded channel, never coming in contact with others, or for a moment losing control over her floating home, and taking advantage of every turn of the current or puff of wind that may favor her progress. There used to be a story current on the river of two of these women who, tending a boat while their husbands and owners were trading on board some men-of-war at the Bocca Tigris, were swept out toward the sea by the swift current. Their boat was a very heavy one, which a dozen stout sailors would scarce have pulled up against the tide. To make headway back was, therefore, a useless attempt, and the girls sat themselves down, contentedly, and suffered the tide to sweep them out. The following day they came back upon a return-tide, under full sail, with a staggering breeze, and with a heavy boat-load of fish, which these Amazons incontinently fried and disposed of to the hungry seamen of the fleet. They had been swept far out into rough water, and had passed the night, unconcernedly, upon the billows. With early dawn they began to ply their bone hooks and cocoa-nut husk lines, with which every boat is abundantly provided, and ere the turn of the tide, which they reckoned to the fraction of an hour, they had their cargo on board.

PLAN OF THE CITY OF CANTON.

LITERARY.

If one were to select a class of men whose biographies should be most interesting and most valuable, whether as indications of personal or of public character—if, in other words, one were to look for the subjects of biography in any one class of men which should best give us the history of their own times, the character of their own age, the style and sort of people they were part of, he certainly would not select the lawyers, the merchants, the editors, the mechanics, or the physicians, and he certainly would select the clergymen.

Give us the biography, or the merest outline sketch, so it be faithful, of the life of a country pastor who has spent a long life in one church, and we will instantly tell you what kind of men he had for supporters—what soldiers and what everyday men they would make.

Dr. Sprague has therefore undertaken a work of great value in writing the Annals of the American Pulpit, of which the third and fourth volumes have now appeared (Carter & Brothers, publishers). The first two volumes were devoted to the Congregational Church, and contained an immense amount of interesting historical and biographical anecdote. The two volumes now appearing are devoted to the clergy of the Presbyterian Church, and the whole four contain a mass of the most interesting personal history that could by any possibility be collected in four volumes.

It is the history of good and great men, brave soldiers, stout fighters, every one of whom won the victory for which he contended. We need not pause to comment on the admirable way in which Dr. Sprague has done the work. The books speak for themselves. Once taken up it is impossible to lay them down, and we venture to say to our readers who are not habitual book-purchasers, that in purchasing these volumes they will secure a collection of most interesting biographies, among which they will find the names of many personal friends of their own, which will afford evening's reading for years, and which will be good books to give to children and children's children. A hundred years hence the names of these good men will be held in esteem and reverence, and this collection of their lives will be a valued book of reference.

The plan of Dr. Sprague has been to collect, as far as possible, personal recollections of his subjects. These have been contributed by friends, successors, or descendants of the persons. Hence the work abounds in incidental anecdote, and we can only regret that our space will not allow us to give our readers much of this which would interest them.

None of our readers can be forgetful of William Wirt's "Blind Preacher," whose eloquence he so touchingly and admirably described in the "British Spy." We have here a brief but very interesting account of him. He was the Rev. James Waddel, and it may not be generally known that Rev. Dr. James W. Alexander, of this city, is his grandson.

Dr. Samuel Buell was the clergyman at Easthampton, on Long Island, that primitive old town where they go to this day by a clock that was presented by Queen Anne.

Dr. Buell was a notorious Whig, and some anecdotes of his intercourse with British officers are well known. We find many of them here. An officer, in great anger with his troop for some insubordination, happened to be asked, in the Doctor's presence, what regiment he commanded. "A legion of devils," was his short reply. "Then I suppose that I address Beelzebub," said the Doctor, with a polite bow. He it was who, observing an inclination to leave the church in the course of a long sermon, paused and said he had been preaching so far to sinners, and they might now go; the rest of his sermon would be addressed to good people. The effect was as might have been anticipated.

We have spoken of the lives of clergymen illustrating the lives and characters of other men. Here is an anecdote contained in the sketch of Rev. William M'Whir, which is worth the price of the volumes. He was on terms of intimacy with Washington, and writing of his first visit to Mount Vernon he says: "At the dinner-table Mrs. Washington sat at the head and Major Washington at the foot. The General sat next Mrs. Washington on her left. He called upon me to ask a blessing before meat. When the cloth was about to be removed he returned thanks himself. Mrs. Washington, with a smile, said, 'My dear, you forgot that you had a clergyman dining with you to-day.' With equal pleasantness he replied, 'My dear, I wish clergymen and all men to know that I am not a graceless man.'"

It is not often that we hear of Washington making a pun, or even attempting a show of wit. But the witticism is the least interesting part of this anecdote.

The history of Rev. William Tennent is well known to a large number of our readers; but there are others to whom the history of his trance will be new, although it has long been a part of local and personal history known to good witnesses. At one time this distinguished clergyman was sick, and supposed to be near his end. Death appeared. He was cold, motionless, stiff, and they laid him out for the grave. The solicitations of a friend succeeded in preserving him from burial, though the funeral ceremonies were held, and two or three occasions for the interment appointed. He then revived at the last moment, before they were about to bury him, and fully recovered. His account of the experience of his mind during that state of quasi-death is interesting, whether regarded as a dream, or, as some have been disposed to regard it, as a visit to heaven permitted by God to an eminently pious man.

CHINESE BOAT GIRLS, ROWING AND STEERING.

Mr. Tennent related the occurrence to a friend, with whom he was riding, and who gives his words, as follows:

"'I found my fever increase, and I became weaker and weaker, until all at once I found myself in heaven, as I thought. I saw no shape as to the Deity, but Glory all unutterable!' Here he paused, as though unable to find words to express his views, let his bridle fall, and, lifting up his hands, proceeded: 'I can say as St. Paul did, I heard and I saw things all unutterable! I saw a great multitude before this glory, apparently in the height of bliss, singing most melodiously; and I was transported with my own situation, viewing all my dangers and all my troubles ended, and my rest and glory begun; and was about to join the great and happy multitude, when one came to me, looked me full in the face, laid his hand on my shoulder, and said, "You must go back!" These words went through me; nothing could have shocked me more. I cried out, "Lord, must I go back?" With this shock I opened my eyes in this world. When I saw I was in the world I fainted; then revived and fainted several times, as one probably would naturally have done in so weak a situation.'

"Mr. Tennent further informed me that he had so entirely lost the recollection of his past life, and the benefit of his former studies, that he could neither understand what was spoken to him, nor write, nor read his own name; that he had to begin all anew, and did not recollect that he had ever read before until he had again learned his letters, and was able to pronounce the monosyllables, such as thee and thou; but that as his strength returned, which was very slowly, his memory also returned. Yet, notwithstanding the extreme feebleness of his situation, his recollection of what he saw and heard while in heaven, as he supposed, and the sense of divine things which he there obtained, continued all the time in their full strength; so that he was continually in something like an ecstasy of mind. And said he, 'for three years this sense of divine things continued so great, and every thing else appeared so completely vain when compared to heaven, that could I have had the world by stooping down to pick it up, I believe I should not have thought of doing it.'"

Thus much must suffice at present by way of extract from these very interesting volumes. They abound in similar anecdote, and they are noble tributes to the memory of a list of worthies whose names are written on the rolls of Heaven in far brighter characters than here, but whose memories it is pleasant, delightful, and rewarding to cherish.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, March 8, in the Senate, Senator Wilson offered a resolution to amend the law regarding desertion from the army. Senator Johnson moved for the printing of 10,000 copies of the Patent Report of last year. The Kansas question being taken up, speeches were made by Senators Doolittle and Foster.——In the House, Mr. Taylor moved for an inquiry into the seizure of the bark Adriatic by the French Government; referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The Printing Deficiency Bills for the thirty-third and thirty-fourth Congresses were passed. Speeches on Kansas were then made by Messrs. Bocock and Dawes.

On Tuesday, 9th, resolutions of the Legislature of Texas, providing for a Southern Rights Convention in the event of the defeat of the Lecompton Constitution, were presented by Senator Houston. On motion of Senator Mason the Bill for the Relief of Commodore Jones was taken up and passed. The Kansas question being taken up, Senator Hamlin, of Maine, spoke against the Lecompton Constitution.——In the House, Mr. Quitman's bill for the employment of volunteers was taken up, and a speech made thereon by Mr. Faulkner. The Diplomatic Appropriation Bill being then considered in Committee, speeches on Kansas were made by Messrs. Keitt, Clemens, English, Phillips, and Montgomery.

On Wednesday, 10th, in the Senate, Senator Johnson's motion to print extra copies of the Patent Report was passed after discussion, and on condition that the volume printed did not exceed 800 pages. Senators Hamlin and Sebastian then spoke on Kansas.——In the House, Mr. Stephens asked, but was refused, leave to present a report from the majority of the Kansas Committee; he declared that he would print the report on his own responsibility. Mr. Curtis made a speech on Mr. Quitman's Volunteer Bill. Speeches on Kansas were then made by Messrs. Foster, Taylor, Haskin, and Dowdell.

On Thursday, 11th, in the Senate, Senator Cameron presented a memorial for a Steam Mail line between Philadelphia and Brazil. Senators Polk and Benjamin spoke on Kansas; after which the House Deficiency Printing Bill was passed.——In the House, a speech on the Volunteers' Bill was made by Mr. Stanton. Mr. Harris rose to present a minority report from the Kansas Committee. On motion of Mr. Humphrey Marshall the question was postponed for the day. The Diplomatic Appropriation Bill was reported by Committee of the Whole, with favorable recommendation. On the Deficiency Appropriation Bill speeches on Kansas and Utah were made by Mr. Case and Mr. Boyce.

On Friday, 12th, in the Senate, speeches on the Kansas question were made by Senators Chandler, Hunter, and Kennedy.——In the House a bill was passed to pay £750 for repairs to the bark Ellen. The Senate bill authorizing the Arctic explorers to receive medals from the British Government was passed. The House then took up Mr. Harris's appeal from the decision of the Chair that he could not show that the Kansas Committee had not fulfilled the directions of the House. After debate, in which Messrs. Harris, Stephens, Grow, English, Campbell, Colfax, Morrell, Washburn, Adrian, Jones, and Letcher took part, Mr. Harris withdrew his appeal.

On Saturday, 13th, in the Senate, the Kansas question was debated by Messrs. Wade, Mason, Bigler, and Broderick. The House was not in session.

THE REPORT ON THE FILIBUSTERS.

The Committee of the House on Foreign Affairs has reported on the arrest of Walker, taking the same view as the President, and winding up with the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That inasmuch as the United States can never consent that any foreign power shall have the right to enter its territory with a view of forcibly carrying off any person who may be therein, so it becomes the duty of the government to disown and disclaim all right on its part to enter, for a similar purpose, the territory of any foreign power or state with which we are on terms of amity and friendship.

"Resolved, That officers of the United States have no right to use the forces under their command in the territory of any foreign state at the instance of, or for the benefit of, such state, unless previously authorized by Congress.

"Resolved, That inasmuch as the views of the President, as made known in his Message to the two Houses of Congress, are in accordance with these principles, no action is necessary on the part of Congress."

THE LATEST FROM SALT LAKE.

We have news by way of the Plains direct from Salt Lake City to the 25th of January—one month later than the accounts received via California by the last steamer. The bearer of the news came through the mountains by a route known only to the Mormons, and of which the army have as yet discovered no trace. He reports the Mormons as busily preparing for a stout resistance to the United States troops. They were casting cannon and manufacturing revolvers and gunpowder in large quantities. It is reported that Brigham Young is not opposed to the entrance of the civil officers into the Territory, and their exercise of their functions, but that all attempts of the army to enter the valley will be resisted to the last extremity. As an instance of the feeling of the Mormons upon this point, it is stated that Young addressed a meeting of nine thousand of the faithful on the 24th of January, to whom he put the question, "All those in favor of giving the troops hell will rise," when the entire multitude sprang to their feet. A skirmish had taken place between a party of Mormons and a picket guard of soldiers, in which two of the former were killed, and it was reported that four of the troops were also slain. The winter at Salt Lake Valley and in the mountains had been unusually mild.

FESTIVITIES AT WASHINGTON.

Of Lady Ouseley's ball on the 4th March, "Jenkins," the correspondent of the Herald, writes as follows:

"Last evening Sir William Gore Ousely, her Britannic Majesty's Special Envoy to Central America, gave a magnificent entertainment, the first he has given since his temporary sojourn at our national metropolis. It was as select as it was brilliant and agreeable, the guests numbering, perhaps, not over two hundred.

"Of course Lady Ouseley herself was the main centre of attraction, and possessing, as she does, extraordinary personal beauty, she lost nothing by the rich, though very becoming manner in which she was dressed. She wore a rich blue brocade, trimmed with a Honiton lace berthe, with a wreath of blue flowers upon her hair, fastened at each side by a diamond brooch.

"Miss Lane, of the White House, was, of course, one of the belles of the evening, and wore a black tulle, ornamented with bunches of gold leaves, a head-dress of gold grapes, with necklace of pearl.

"Miss Cass, the stately daughter of the Premier of the Administration, was magnificently attired in pearl-colored silk, with point lace flounces, but without ornaments of any kind.

"Madame Stoeckl, of the Russian Embassy, looked as stately as a queen and beautiful as a Hebe, in a dress of white silk, with black lace flounces, cherry-colored flowers, and gold beads, setting off a style of beauty which could hardly be enhanced by any outward adornments.

"Madame Sartiges, of the French Legation, wore a rich chene silk, perfectly plain, but elegant, and was surrounded with friends charmed with her lively and intelligent conversation. A niece of hers was also present, tastefully and prettily dressed in pink tarleton.

"Mrs. Brown, the popular partner of the present Postmaster-General, wore a rich pink silk, with pink roses in her hair, and looked young enough to be his daughter.

"Mrs. Thompson, the lively and whole-souled wife of the Secretary of the Interior, was dressed in a rich pink silk, with lace flounces, and a coiffure of pink flowers."

MISS SAUNDERS'S FETE.

The same writer thus describes Miss Saunders's ball at the Postmaster-General's: "Thursday night was the scene of Miss Saunders's triumph, at the residence of her step-father, the Postmaster-General, where she gave—issuing the invitations in her own name—the most brilliant fête of the season. Among the guests were Lady Ouseley (who used to attend parties in the same house when William Wirt first fitted it up) and her charming young daughter; Miss Lane, who yet retains her mourning and her dignified Saxon beauty; the fascinating Miss Butt, of Norfolk, Virginia, who bears her literary laurels bravely; Mrs. Minturn, of your city, most elegantly dressed; Mrs. Senator Clay and Mrs. Maynard, each fine looking, and each in black; the bewitching Mrs. Martin, of Tennessee, bright as the golden grapes which decked her hair; charming Miss King, whose deep hazel eyes must be the windows of a true heart; Miss Julia May, our metropolitan nightingale, in most becoming blue and silver; Miss Comer, of Georgia, naive and yet brilliant; Miss M'Donald, of Onondaga Valley, New York, wearing an amber-colored silk, with lace flounces; Miss Chosch, fair representative of la belle France, in a charming blue silk; Miss Dunlop, called the "Belle of the District" by one in high authority; Miss M'Kim, of Baltimore, a débutante; the beautiful Mrs. Campbell, of Vermont, yet wearing her bridal blushes; Mrs. Senator Thomson, of New Jersey, an acknowledged leader of the fashion, and one of the best dressed ladies here; in short, la creme de la creme was there, excepting our foreign friends, who—for conscience' sake—stay at home and eat red herrings."

PERSONAL.

We find in the Anderson (South Carolina) Gazette a lengthy letter from Colonel Orr, in response to a communication addressed to him, requesting him again to be a candidate for Congress at the October election. Colonel Orr acknowledges the compliment conveyed in the request, but positively declines acceding to the wishes of his friends. He concludes as follows: "In discharging the arduous duties devolved on me I have been actuated by an earnest purpose to maintain your rights, guard your honor, and preserve this government, by restraining it strictly within its constitutional sphere. I have not believed that the highest test of patriotism was found in vehemence of sentiment or violence of counsel; and have consequently co-operated cordially with national men from all sections in carrying out such a policy as would best promote your interests and the interests of this great country. The prospect of retirement brings me gratification as well as regret. I have been in the whirl of political excitement long enough to covet quiet and repose; I require rest and recreation. The long neglect of my private affairs imperiously demands my presence at home. I can not longer disregard those obligations in justice to those who may rightfully claim, through the strongest and holiest ties of affection, my care and protection."

The President has appointed William Selden, late of the firm of Selden Brothers & Co., Bankers, Marshal of the District of Columbia.

Mr. Wingrove Cooke, the correspondent of the London Times in China, whose graphic letters have been read with so much interest, is coming home, unable to stand the climate any longer. Mr. Fillmore, a very able gentleman of the Times' staff, who has just returned from special service in America, succeeds him.

Mr. J. B. Gough, the American temperance orator, has commenced legal proceedings against Dr. Lees, of Leeds, a famous British lecturer on total abstinence, for an alleged defamation of character, and the trial, it is expected, will shortly take place in the law courts in London.

Mr. Arthur Helps, the author of "Friends in Council" and the admirable history of "The Spanish Conquest," is about to bring out a tragedy—"Oulka, the Serf."

Madame Goldschmidt is expected to arrive in England early in June, it is said, with the intention of taking up her permanent residence there—and, possibly, of singing in public.

The Senate, in Executive Session, has confirmed the nomination of M. Cook as Postmaster of Chicago.

Rufus Choate has been engaged to participate in the defense of Tuckerman, the mail robber.

A WESTERN WILLIAM TELL.

The Louisville Journal says: "It has been announced that Captain Travis has accepted a wager to shoot, at three shots, three oranges, placed upon the head and hands of a boy. It is certainly a most remarkable feat, only equaled by that of the great William Tell, with his 'cross-bow and arrow,' shooting an apple off his son's head. It will require an extraordinary amount of coolness, nerve, judgment, and precision even to make the attempt; and much more to accomplish it successfully, as we are certain the Captain will do. Great steadiness of nerve and acute sight are required to thus delicately play with hair triggers, while aiming at an orange on the head of a gentle and confiding youth, who trusts his life to your keeping for the time being. When we reflect that the least tremor or movement of a muscle may be sufficient to cause a premature discharge, and that the deviation of the fraction of an inch from the precise aim might terminate fatally to this trusting lad, the feat appears as fearfully wonderful as it is certainly novel.

"The oranges are each to be 2¼ inches in diameter; one is placed on the top of his head, and one on the back of each hand, the arms being extended. In this position, at the distance of ten paces, or thirty feet, facing the shooter, and with no intervening object, Captain John Travis proposes to hit each orange, and has only three shots to hit the three oranges. The feat is to be performed in this city in June next. The boy who is to support the oranges is ten years of age, and a bright and sprightly lad. He has every confidence in the ability of Captain Travis to hit each object, and has equally as much in his own nerve, which can not be surpassed. He is now under daily training. The boy's feet are placed twelve inches apart and his hands upon his hips. The Captain shoots through the angle made by the bending of the arms and between the feet. This is done to accustom the boy to the firing, and, if possible, give him more confidence and make him feel at ease. From what we have seen, he possesses all the nerve requisite to the perfect accomplishment of this most extraordinary feat. The little fellow is a native of Louisville, and his mother is always present during the practicing. She is entirely satisfied that it will result in safety to her son."

A ROMANCE IN REAL LIFE.

The Boston Ledger says: "On the 23d ultimo a passenger came to Portland by the steamer Anglo-Saxon, and took lodgings at one of the city hotels. Next morning he took the cars for this city in company with a gentleman who had remained at the same house with him over night, with whose countenance he, somehow or other, imagined himself familiar. They got into conversation in coming down the Eastern Railroad, but nothing transpired to elicit the fact whether or not they had been old acquaintances. When they arrived at the dépôt, and had attended to their luggage, one of the gentlemen inquired in the hearing of the other for a cab to take him to a certain street in Charlestown. The other said he purposed going to the same street, and the two engaged the same conveyance. On arriving at the street in question it appeared that they both designed to call on the same individual. This strange series of coincidences greatly puzzled both; but their mutual surprise and delight can be imagined but in a degree, when they found that they were brothers, and that they had thus singularly met at the house of a third brother. One of them has been in the service of the Pacha of Egypt for twenty-two years; the other has spent sixteen years in the East Indies, while the third has been in this country during nineteen years past. The brothers are natives of Scotland, and have not seen each other for twenty-four years.

ANOTHER GIPSY STORY.

A story is afloat that some gossip has been occasioned in Cumberland County, Penn., by the following circumstances: Mr. George Fry, of Shippensburg, married a gipsy girl, belonging to a gang who were haunting the neighborhood, about three years ago. The gipsy girl's father was so enraged at this that he kidnapped her and sent her to parts unknown. Mr. Fry mourned her loss two years, and then married again. But, says the Shippensburg News: Last week Mr. Fry's first wife—his gipsy wife—in company with "George Fry the second," arrived in this place in search of him! By the assistance of Officer Shade, she was successful in finding him. Limited space forbids us from entering into details, at this time, of the excruciating suffering Mrs. Fry had undergone since her departure from this place. The intelligence of her husband's second marriage was a severe shock to her, but she emphatically declares her exclusive right to him. It appears, by-the-way, that Mr. Fry's second wife was "a widow," that her husband went to California some years ago, and, soon after his arrival there, it was rumored that he was murdered. A few weeks since a letter was received from him by her, we have been informed, in which he states that he will return in the next steamer, etc. What the finale of this romance will be is beyond the power of human ken.

A PORCELAIN NOSE.

A Boston paper notices that a Dr. Codman of that city has made for a young lady in that vicinity a porcelain nose, to be worn with spectacles, which is of the exact shape of the original organ, and of a color like that of the natural skin. All this may be very creditable to the professional skill of the Doctor, but a porcelain nose can not be of the slightest service to a woman, since it can not be made "to turn up" under any provocation.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

RESIGNATION OF LORD PALMERSTON.

On 22d February Lord Palmerston resigned office in the following words: "I wish, Sir, to make a short statement to the House with respect to the course which Her Majesty's Government have thought it their duty to pursue in consequence of the vote to which this House came on Friday night. I think it can scarcely be necessary for me to say that that vote led Her Majesty's Government to feel that there was only one course which they could pursue with a due regard to their own honor and with a due respect to this House. We therefore, on Saturday, humbly tendered to Her Majesty the resignation of our offices, which Her Majesty was graciously pleased to accept, and consequently we now hold our offices only for the purpose of carrying on the business of the country until our successors are appointed."

LORD DERBY'S MINISTRY.

Lord Derby, who was recommended for the premiership by Lord Palmerston, formed his Ministry on the 23d, and submitted the list to the Queen. The following are the members of the new Cabinet:

First Lord of the Treasury.—Earl of Derby.

Chancellor of the Exchequer and Leader of the House of Commons.—Right Hon. B. Disraeli.

Lord Chancellor.—Lord Woodstock (Sir F. Thesiger).

Lord President.—Marquis of Salisbury.

Lord Privy Seal.—Earl of Hardwicke.

Secretary for Foreign Affairs.—Earl of Malmesbury.

Secretary for the Home Department.—Right Hon. Spencer Walpole.

Secretary for the Colonies.—Lord Stanley.

Secretary for War.—General Peel.

President of the India Board.—Earl of Ellenborough.

President of the Board of Trade.—Right Hon. J. W. Henley.

President of the Board of Works.—Lord John Manners.

First Lord of the Admiralty.—Sir John Pakington.

Parliament met on the 27th. In the House of Commons new writs were ordered for the seats occupied by members of the Cabinet. Both Houses had adjourned until March 1, when they would further adjourn to the 12th.

LORD PALMERSTON'S LAST SPEECH WHILE IN OFFICE.

The correspondent of the Carlisle Examiner thus describes Lord Palmerston's last speech on the memorable night of his defeat: "And now Lord Palmerston is on his feet—at half past twelve, having sat here since four; and seeing but too clearly his fate in the faces of the Opposition. What wonder that he is hot and angry? But there was something more than excusable feeling in the speech which was to close his Premiership. The language was bad enough—the reckless statement and the vindictive personality. But the tone was far worse—the tone of rage, with gestures to match. Such an exhibition the oldest members could not recollect, and the youngest could not brook. Cries of 'Question,' 'Order,' and 'Time,'—cries very rarely uttered while a minister is speaking, and least of all when he is known to be a falling minister—these ominous cries rebuked his indecorum and recalled him to self-control. It was past one before the House divided. Great was the excitement of suspense. As one after another who might have been expected to go into the left lobby went into the right, calculations wavered, and Ministers seemed to have gained. But when the ministerial tellers came in, and the Opposition came not, it became clear that the majority was with the latter. The agitation rose to its height, and found vent in a cheer when Gibson and Bright re-entered the House. The cheer was renewed when the clerk handed the paper to Mr. Gibson, and he advanced, as is the usage, on the right of the four tellers. Then there was a hush of silence that the numbers might be heard; and he read them out somewhat nervously.

"Then arose such a shout as has not been heard since the old Corn-Law time—a shout taken up and echoed along the lobbies into Westminster Hall. Some of the young members actually waved their hats, which is quite unusual, and not to be encouraged. Only on and behind the Treasury bench was there silence. Palmerston himself sat covered, and with his face bent down."

MINISTERIAL SCANDALS.

The correspondent of the Herald writes: "The appointment of the Marquis of Clanricarde to a seat in the government has caused more legitimate and universal disgust than even the introduction of the Alien Bill by the command of Louis Napoleon and his colonels. Our good Queen is said to be much annoyed at the appointment of a convicted card-sharper as one of her ministers. Worse, much worse, remains behind. If possible, two more discreditable appointments have been made—one of a Mr. D——, an unmistakable Israelite, the son of a notorious bum-bailiff; the other, of a soi disant nobleman, also of Hebraic connection, the Marquis of L——a. Mr. D——, the first, has been appointed a Queen's messenger, on the recommendation of the Marquis of Clanricarde—his qualifications being his marriage with Miss O'Neil, who is the daughter of the O'Neil associated with the noble and honorable Marquis in the well-remembered gambling plant upon Mr. Auldjo, where that gentleman was successfully bled to the tune of half a plum. It is currently reported that if Mr. D—— is really married to Miss O'Neil, our police courts will very shortly take the matter in hand touching the existence in health, though bereavement, of Madam D——, a former wife—a well known teacher of dancing, and a long resident in the vicinage of Grosvenor Square."

PROGRESS OF THE "LEVIATHAN."

The London Times says that the Leviathan "still remains moored stem and stern in the centre of the river, a little below the old building-yard, from which, for so many months, she kept out the light and air, and in which, for so many weeks, grave fears were entertained that she would remain—a permanent adornment of the river's bank. But though, as we have said, nothing worth speaking of in the way of work has been done about the Leviathan herself, a very great deal has been perfected, and, we believe, the arrangements are being made for her final completion and fitting for sea. With regard to this point a great deal of misapprehension appears to exist with the public as to the total outlay necessary to fit her out, and the time it will require to get her ready in all respects for sea-going service. As far as the first-named subject is concerned, we believe we shall be found correct in stating that the total cost of completing her fittings, putting on board stores, etc., and making her in all respects ready for sea, will not exceed £120,000, and that the time required to do this will certainly not extend beyond the month of July. Four months is estimated as being the utmost time necessary to fit her, but circumstances have arisen, such as the company being obliged to give up possession of the yard at Millwall, which may occasion hindrances that will probably delay her completion till the time we have stated."

POLITICAL DEMONSTRATION IN HYDE PARK.

A committee, the names of the gentlemen composing which have been studiously kept in the background, having called an "indignation meeting" of the men of London to protest against the Conspiracy to Murder Bill, and fixed Hyde Park as the place of assembly, crowds of people poured from every quarter of the town to swell what it was expected would be a monster meeting; but great was their disappointment, on reaching the Park gates, to find it placarded that, in consequence of the patriotic vote of the House of Commons on Friday evening, the meeting had been abandoned. The men of London bore their disappointment in silence, which was but natural. The gathering, however, did not want a political aspect, and, from a few little circumstances which occurred, it became tolerably manifest that the refugees were not foremost in the affections of those assembled in the Park; for whenever one of them broke cover a set of youngsters opened the cry, and, helter-skelter, a mob was upon his heels, and chased him from the inclosure. Beyond a few of these little episodes to the great political demonstration nothing worthy of notice took place, and the crowds, after enjoying the balmy breezes of the Serpentine, returned—meek as doves, and quiet as lambs—to their own habitations. Several members of the Legislature were upon the ground to observe the conduct of those assembled, and nothing could be more exemplary.

THE DISPUTED DUKEDOM OF DEVONSHIRE.

The Court Circular states that "there is a claimant to the dukedom and its magnificent appendages in the person of a son of the late duke by a lady to whom, it is positively asserted, that his grace was privately married by a Roman Catholic clergyman, the lady being a member of that Church. Such a marriage, though it might have been attended with illegality, would not be necessarily null or invalid, and the issue thereof might, undoubtedly, be the heir-at-law of his father, and therefore of the Duke of Devonshire, if the late duke had really been the rightful possessor of that exalted title. The claim, if formally advanced, will necessarily raise two important questions; 1st, whether the claimant is or is not the legitimate son of the late duke; and 2d (supposing this point established in the affirmative), whether the late duke was or was not the legitimate son of his father the fifth duke? But in the event of its turning out that the late Duke of Devonshire has left a male heir, born in wedlock, as we are informed is the case, we more than doubt whether his right to succeed to the title will be disputed on the ground that the late duke was illegitimate. We understand there is no doubt at all as to the late duke's having left sons who succeed to very considerable property by his grace's death, and that the claim of one of these to the patrimonial honors and estates is now going through the preliminary stages necessary to a legal investigation."

PROSECUTION FOR LIBEL ON THE EMPEROR OF THE FRENCH.

The London papers give a report of the examination, at Bow Street police-court, of Edward Truelove, a bookseller, who was charged by Mr. Bodkin, counsel to the Treasury, with having "unlawfully written and published a false, malicious, scandalous, and seditious libel, of and concerning his Majesty the Emperor of the French, with the view to incite divers persons to assassinate his said Majesty." The alleged libel was contained in a penny pamphlet, entitled "Tyrannicide; is it justifiable?" published by the defendant. Mr. Bodkin designated the publication as a most "atrocious" production, which advocates the propriety of assassination, and in terms, not indeed direct, but not to be misunderstood, applies this doctrine to the Emperor of the French. The defendant was remanded, but he was liberated on bail.

A FATAL HOAX.

A Sheffield paper contains the following: "A singular circumstance happened at our union last week. For some misconduct the master had put a boy for punishment into the deadhouse. At that time there was a corpse in the 'dead ward,' in a coffin. The boy took the corpse out of the coffin, dressed it in his own clothes, propped it up against the wall, and then himself got into the coffin, lay down, and covered himself over. In the course of a short time the master came, looked in at the door, and saw, as he thought, a sulky lad standing against the wall. 'Now,' said the master, 'do you want any supper?' There was no answer. The question was repeated with the same result. The boy looked out from the coffin and said, 'If he won't have any I will.' The master fled under terror, and received such a shock that it is said he has since died from the effects."

FRANCE.

TRIAL OF THE ASSASSINS.

The trial of the assassins Orsini, Pierri, Rudio, and Gomez commenced on 25th February before the Court of Assizes of the Seine. No person was admitted after half past ten o'clock on any pretense whatever, and if any one left the court he could not again return. The prisoners, who were all dressed in black, are all young men, with the exception of Pierri, who is middle-aged; they all seemed composed, and listened with attention to the proceedings. The early part of the day was taken up with the reading of the indictment, which is of great length. There are no less than thirty-three witnesses. Gomez denied any participation in the act; he only knew of it at the last moment. Rudio confessed every thing; he threw one bomb; he incriminated the rest of the prisoners. Orsini confirmed his former account, and accepted the full responsibility of the part he had taken in the affair; he confessed that he wanted to kill the Emperor, and he was ready to die; he never confided his intention to Mr. Allsop. M. Barnard brought the bombs to Brussels, but did not know for what purpose they were intended; would not say any thing as to the other prisoners. Pierri denied all participation in the conspiracy until the day the attempt was made, and then repented. Most of the witnesses were heard. Mr. Taylor, of Birmingham, did not answer to his name. On the following day, the Court sentenced Orsini, Rudio, and Pierri to death. Gomez was found guilty, with extenuating circumstances, and sentenced to hard labor for life.

THE NEW PENAL LAW.

The new Penal Law, as amended in committee, has been presented to the Legislative Body. The amendments consist of a verbal addition in the third clause, and of two new clauses of which there are in all now ten, instead of eight. In the third clause, relative to the manufacture of "murderous machines" and "fulminating powder," the words "or causes to be manufactured" (ou fait fabriquer) are introduced; and the penalty for him who manufactures, or for him who causes to be manufactured without being legally authorized, is the same, namely, from six months' to five years' imprisonment, and from 50 francs' to 3000 francs' fine. The eighth and tenth are the new clauses inserted in committee. The form is to this effect: "The powers granted to the Government by the fifth, sixth, and seventh clauses of the present law shall expire on the 31st March, 1865, if they have not been renewed before that period." The latter states that "the measures of general security authorized by the fifth, sixth, and seventh clauses shall be taken by the Minister of the Interior on the advice of the Prefect of the Department, of the General commanding in it, and of the Procureur-General. The Procureur-Imperial will act as adviser in those towns where there is no Cour Imperial sitting." The law will thus be in force for seven years. The second and seventh articles retain all their fearfully vague and menacing character.

POLITICAL ARRESTS.

A great many political arrests, some say as many as two hundred, are being made in Paris in a single day. The persons in custody are probably obnoxious demagogues who are to be transported under the new law of public safety. The Bordeaux Journals mention a great many arrests there. Arrests are going on all over the country, and they still continue on a considerable scale.

A NICE QUESTION OF COURT ETIQUETTE.

The correspondent of the New York Times says: "At the last grand ball at the Tuileries another of those delicate questions of etiquette, which are the standing annoyance of official society in Europe, came near destroying the harmony of the evening, so far as the atmosphere which surrounds the throne was concerned. It was a question of precedence between the Prince of Denmark, who was present, and the diplomatic corps. The Prince is the heir to the crown of Denmark; but a law of etiquette, adopted many years ago by the Court of Vienna—a law which has been adopted very generally since in the courts of Europe, as the rule of conduct—says that Embassadors (not Ministers) must take precedence of all foreign princes who are not the sons or brothers of a reigning monarch. The Prince of Denmark is neither of these, but he is heir to the throne—a rank that ought to be higher than a son or brother not an heir; and so the Emperor, not to give offense, sacrificed himself in the following manner: In the Hall of the Marshals, where, on these occasions, a platform is placed, on which chairs are occupied by himself, the Empress, Prince Jerome, Prince Napoleon, the Princess Mathilde, and the Embassadors—the Emperor, not being permitted by the law of etiquette to seat the Prince of Denmark, suppressed his own seat at the side of the Empress, and stood on his feet during the whole evening, thus keeping the Prince company. The Embassadors occupied their chairs."

THE MASKED BALLS.

The correspondent of the Herald says: "The masked balls have been more than usually crowded this season. The entrance takes place at midnight, and no lady is admitted who does not appear in character or in a domino. The animation of these scenes is something indescribable. In no other country but France is the thing found endurable. Here, even the bal masqué is not what it once was; the same class of persons do not form the company, and egalite, which has pushed from their stools so many privileged institutions, has not been without its effect on those high-bred manners which made the French people so justly famous. Still there is an immense residuum left, and, combined with the extraordinary facility afforded by the French language for words of doubtful signification, and the national vivacity in repartee, with the born talent for acting common to all, a scene of unequaled revelry is produced, which those who witness will seldom forget. The Opera House is on such occasions thronged to the roof, many who do not choose to take part in the scene below occupying the boxes. That the licentiousness is terrible no one can deny; that the result of a masked ball is simply a very vortex of sensuality is undoubted, but nothing is done to offend the eye, and if French manners were not sufficient to guard against contretemps, there are police on all hands—mingling among the revelers as part of themselves—to keep order. The dresses are generally models of tasteful ingenuity, got up often at comparatively small cost."

THE FUNERAL SERVICE OF LABLACHE.

The funeral service of Lablache was, pursuant to notice, celebrated with great pomp at the Madeleine on 20th February, and in the course of it Mozart's Requiem was executed, the solo parts being sung by Mario, Tamburini, Alboni, and Grisi. A great number of artists and musical persons were present, and among them Rossini; the church was crowded to excess. The mortal remains of the great singer were afterward conveyed to Maisons-Laffitte, and there interred. The cords of the pall were held by Prince Poniatowski, Prince San Giacomo, Baron Taylor, and M. Carafa.

A WOMAN CONDEMNED FOR FORETELLING A REVOLUTION.

A singular trial has just taken place at Rheims. A woman named Lorinet, whose husband was condemned to transportation so long ago as 1854, for belonging to a secret society (no other offense), said, in the shop of a barber named Jesson, on January 14, a few hours before the attempt was made upon the Emperor's life, that something remarkable would occur in Paris between the 15th and 20th of January, which would lead to a revolution. The barber Jesson, who had himself been arrested as a member of a secret society in 1854, repeated to several customers what Madame Lorinet had said. They were now both tried for "false news, of a nature to disturb the public peace." Their counsel urged that whatever might be the culpability of his clients, they were, at any rate, not guilty of "false news," because, unfortunately, an event very likely to lead to a revolution was perpetrated in the evening of the 14th, and was publicly known in Paris on the 15th. The Court, however, condemned the prisoners for the sole fact of the false news, and sentenced Madame Lorinet to three months' imprisonment, with a fine of 500 francs, and Jesson to six months' imprisonment, with a fine to the same amount. The public prosecutor took occasion to say that at first it was hoped that foreigners only were guilty of the odious crime, but that judicial inquiries had now demonstrated the fact that the attack upon the Emperor was expected by the revolutionary party throughout France, and that they were in readiness to act as soon as the success of the crime should be announced.

CHEAP JEWELS.

The Court Journal says: "Opals may be had at this moment in Paris at less than half the usual value. This is said to be owing to the impression which has got abroad, and which has come from Russia, that it is the pierre de malheur! carrying misfortune to those who wear it. The Empress is even said to have joined in this wild superstition, and foresworn the wearing of the beautiful parure of this stone she had just formed from the re-setting of several others."

ROSSINI AND THE ORGAN-GRINDER.

On the 27th of last month an Italian organ-grinder stationed himself in the court-yard of the house occupied by Rossini, at the corner formed by the Boulevard and the Chaussée d'Antin, and began playing several airs from the répertoire of the great composer. He had played the serenade from the Barbiere, and was about to repeat it, when Rossini, accompanied by a friend, passed through the court-yard. The maestro felt in his pocket for a few sous, and while doing so he inquired of the man if he was aware whose music he was playing. "Of course, I do," replied the man, "it is from our great Rossini." "And the air you played before?" "Also from Rossini," said the man; "I should not think of playing any thing but Rossini in the serenade which I am now offering to him." "You offer a serenade to Rossini! and why?" inquired the composer. "Because to-day is his birthday," replied the man. Rossini, on hearing this reply, was deeply touched, and he turned to his companion and said: "This poor fellow is the only person that has remembered the date; all my friends have forgotten it; even I myself had done so. Believe me, when I say that the greatest triumphs of my career have not moved me more than the attention of this poor man." And the maestro drew from his purse a hundred-franc piece, and presented it to the organ-player, who was in the greatest astonishment at his generosity. "It is Rossini himself who has spoken to you," whispered the friend, when the composer had turned his back. "Rossini!" cried the Italian, and running after the retreating maestro, he kissed the hem of his cloak, and exclaimed, "Thanks, maestro! but it is not money that you have given me; it is a medal which I shall preserve all my life."

A MONSTER CAFE.

The Paris correspondent of the Globe writes: "I sent you some details of the monster café on the Temple Boulevard, capable of accommodating 12,000 frequenters. The joint-stock company to which it belongs begs to rectify a misstatement of your paper of the 22d. There are, on the ground floor, not eighteen broad billiard-tables but twenty-four! I was asked to be eye-witness of the fact, and the performances thereon, and I must confess that I saw nothing that gives a better idea of the immensity of the locale and the din of ivory balls, so much as the great quadrangular hall at Salterre, Bradford, where Titus Salt keeps 1000 power-looms at work, all weaving alpaca stuffs by steam, and all going as by clock-work, under one glass roof. The difference was they worked without clamor, while the noise of 'Carombole' and its jargon formed a wild uproar, not to add that time is wasted in the one, while the Yorkshire Titus can never regret that 'he has lost a day.'"

PRUSSIA.

A PRUSSIAN DUEL.

A telegram from Konigsberg, in Prussia, states that General de Plehwe has been killed in a duel. His adversary was a relative, named Jachmann, a lieutenant in the 3d Curassiers. Money matters led to the quarrel. General de Plehwe was one of the leading members of the "pietest" party. A letter from Konigsberg, of the 16th, gives the following details: "When, on the 11th, General de Plehwe presented himself at Trutenau, and Councilor Jachmann refused to receive him, he asked to speak to Lieutenant Jachmann, who conducted him to his room, and made him sit down. The General asked whether it was by the order of his parents that he had refused admission to the house to his (the General's) son, and the Lieutenant replied in the affirmative. The General then asked whether he (the Lieutenant) shared in the opinion of his parents in the matter, to which the Lieutenant replied that his opinion had nothing to do with the affair, but that, as he was interrogated on the subject, he was bound to declare that his views on the subject perfectly coincided with those of his family. 'If that is the case,' said the General, 'you are an infamous wretch, and you shall fight me to the death;' and he then retired. The Lieutenant laid the affair before the council of honor of his regiment, who for three days made vain efforts to bring about an amicable arrangement. General de Plehwe admitted the correctness of the facts advanced by the Lieutenant, but refused to come to any understanding with the council of honor, saying that, as a general, he knew what he had to do. A duel with pistols, at eight paces distance, took place on the 15th, in presence of Captain de Schlichting, the second of the General; Lieutenant de Lehwaldt, second of M. Jachmann; and a council of honor, composed of five officers. The General advanced to within two paces of the barrier, and armed. Seeing that his adversary did not move, he called out, in a loud voice, 'Lieutenant Jachmann, what does this mean? I do not understand it; you must fire.' The Lieutenant shook his head, but did not move. 'Gentlemen,' said the General, 'I beg you to advise the Lieutenant to fire.' As Jachmann still remained motionless the seconds observed that the General might fire first, if he chose; and he did so. The ball entered his adversary's mouth, broke his lower jaw, and passed out at the neck. After staggering for a moment Jachmann advanced a few paces and fired. His ball entered the heart of the General, who fell dead on the spot. Every one who had been engaged in this unfortunate affair rendered homage to the moderation and conciliatory spirit evinced by Lieutenant Jachmann."

ITALY.

MORE LAWS TO PROTECT NAPOLEON.

The Sardinian Government has presented to the Chambers a Bill on conspiracies against the life of the heads of foreign governments. It proposes to punish the crime with hard labor, which may amount to ten years, and in certain cases to inflict the severer punishments imposed by the penal code. It also proposes to punish the defense of political assassination by imprisonment of from three to twelve months. The Bill, in addition, effects certain modifications in the law relative to the jury, with a view to increase the number of challenges allowed both to the Government prosecutor and the accused. But the most important part of the measure is that which constitutes 200 electors of the town in which the Court of Appeal is established judges of the fact, such 200 electors to be designated by a commission composed of the mayor, a municipal councilor, and a councilor delegated by the intendant. These judges of the fact are to be nominated for six months, and can not be reappointed for the six months following. The jury charged to try offenses of the kind referred to is to be selected from the 200.

THE KING AND THE CENSUS-TAKER.

A late law of Piedmont orders that a census of every man, woman, and child shall be taken this year, and that each individual capable of doing so must write his or her own name, followed with the occupation. The census-paper was presented to the King himself by a census-taker, who seems to have been a "strict-constructionist," and his Majesty, pleased at the officer's close observance of his duty, wrote, "Victor Emmanuel, Constitutional King."

THE COST OF ROSY CHEEKS.

A Milan correspondent of the Musical World writes: "A young and clever English girl—very good-looking, and with a bloom of health upon her rosy cheeks—recently applied to a certain theatrical agent here for an engagement. After the lapse of a few days the agent introduced an impresario to hear the young aspirant for musical fame exhibit a specimen of her talent. The impresario stared at the English girl in a very peculiar way, and, at last, stammered out, 'But, Signora, I want some one to sing the "Traviata."' 'I am quite glad to hear it,' replied our young cantatrice; 'I have studied the opera; do me the favor to hear me sing the cavatina.' No sooner said than done; the cavatina was sung, and well sung, the impresario all the while looking daggers at the poor devil of an agent, who was thinking of his fee, and what good business he had done. 'Well,' he exclaimed to the manager, 'what do you think of her?' 'Think!' sulkily replied the other. 'She sings well,' added the agent. 'Diablo!' cried the manager, bursting into a furious passion, 'what's the singing? You ass, why did you bring me here? With that fat, and those red cheeks, she'll damn the opera, in the last act, the very first night!' So much for pale faces."

SYRIA.

OUTRAGE UPON AN AMERICAN MISSIONARY.

On 11th January the house of the Rev. Walter Dickson, at Jaffa, Syria, was broken open by a band of Arabs. He describes the scene in a letter to his son. When he first heard the noise, he says, "I got up immediately, and dressed me, and went out to the back-gate, where the dogs were barking. The Arabs had broken down the gate, but had not entered. I returned to the house and told Fred, who had arisen and dressed himself. I took down the gun, and we both went down toward the broken-down gate. As we were advancing Fred said, 'Don't fire, father.' 'No,' said I, 'you take the gun.' He took the gun, and we advanced within three or four feet of the gate, when one who stood outside the wall fired obliquely, and hit Fred in the lower part of his bowels and groin with a heavy charge of buckshot. He fell, and said, 'They have hit me! take the gun!' which I did, and fired at random through the gateway, not seeing any one, as they fell back behind the wall. I made my retreat into the house as soon as possible. Fred had hobbled in before I did, and was lying on the floor, bleeding most profusely—your mother and Mary trying to stop the blood with cotton-batting. He said, 'Father, pray for me, that I may be able to bear it.' He said he was faint, and asked me to give him some water, which he drank. I then secured the doors as fast as possible.

THEY BURST INTO THE HOUSE.

"In a few minutes we heard a noise at the door—they were trying to burst it open with a lever, which they soon did, although I held it as long as I could. As it flew open they retreated for an instant, and then five large, stout men rushed in, armed with guns, swords, pistols, and a large club six or seven feet long. With this one of them aimed a blow at my head with all his might. I threw up my right hand to ward off the blow, but he felled me senseless to the floor, cutting my head and wounding my hand. As soon as I recovered I sprang to my feet and ran out to raise an alarm, but was followed and knocked back into the house. They began plundering, but soon left that, and caught Mary by the arm to drag her out doors. She caught hold of me and I hold of her, but they soon broke our hold by striking me with their gun. She then caught hold of the bedstead, upon which her two little children were sitting, and pulled it down. They succeeded in dragging her out, and three of them violated her person! They then caught hold of your mother, dragged her into an adjoining room, and committed the same act. They then demanded my money. I took out my purse, handed it to them, and told them there was all the money I had. They renewed their ransacking in earnest, searching every trunk and box in the house, and strewed the floors with their contents. Not finding any more money, they presented the muzzle of a gun at my breast, and demanded more money. I caught the muzzle and held it above my head. They twitched it away and searched again, selecting such articles as they wanted, and tied them up in bundles. One of them caught me by the head, and with a drawn sword made a cut to take it off. I caught the sword with my left hand, which received a deep cut.

THE SCENE OF RUIN.

"When they had taken every thing they wanted they went off, it being nearly daylight. Fred lived about half an hour after he was shot. He made not the slightest struggle, as we perceived, when he died. After the robbers first came in he moved partly under the table, after that we saw him move no more. They dragged Mary out over his dead or dying body. They robbed us of most of our bedding, carpets, wearing apparel, and all our money, not sparing bread, silver spoons, table knives (forks being useless to them were not taken), and, in short, every thing they wished; also ruined the timepiece.

"Thorough measures are being taken to bring this matter before the Sultan and our Government. All foreigners here are equally interested. What the result must be we must wait and see.

"From your pilgrim father,

"Walter Dickson."

INDIA.

THE INDIAN GENERALS.

A correspondent of the London Daily News is telling some interesting stories about the Indian Generals:

"Sir Henry Lawrence, whose only fault was too great a respect for the religious prejudices of the natives—a feeling which led him to forbid the destruction of the mosques and private houses close to the Residency, which leniency subsequently cost the garrison very dear—even he coincided with Neill in swift punishment, hanging the men and flogging the women who were caught plundering and burning. At Allahabad some Jewish merchants were plundered of every thing. Neill, as was his wont, gave each of the convicted marauders three hundred lashes, with a fresh hand at the end of each hundred. This struck more terror into the natives even than hanging. The women were every where foremost in pillaging, and very few instances of humanity can be recorded in their favor. The Mussulmanee women, generally speaking, hounded on the men to every atrocity. I only know of one instance where a Mohammedan interfered to save the lives of Christians. This was a Munshi at Allahabad, who sheltered three of the native Christians. Instances of the basest treachery are innumerable. A Mohammedan, forty years in our service, was detected in a plot to betray the magazine at Allahabad to the mutineers. A respectable native official came to pay his respects to Havelock, who sternly asked him if he had had any share in the mutiny. He denied it stoutly, saying, 'You may hang me if I have.' 'You will be hung,' the General answered, dryly, and produced a book of the fiend Nena, showing that this very man had been his paid agent. The soldiers led him away, and made him lick up some of the blood of our murdered women, then flogged him, and hung him. But the Mohammedans were ever foremost. The Mohir, who reigned nine days as King of Allahabad, offered a reward of 100 rupees for every European and fifty for every native Christian. A Chaprasi, named Haider, attached to the Mission, was his most active agent in ferreting out his victims. When Neill arrived he thought it best to go and make salam to his old masters, as if nothing had happened. A gentleman employed on the railway was present—a man of great personal strength—who seized and pinioned him, and he was carried off to one of the magistrates. The evidence was conclusive, and in five minutes he was condemned to be hanged that evening. He no sooner heard his doom than, by a violent effort, he wrenched his bonds asunder, and was off like a shot. The magistrate happened to be one of the swiftest-footed men in India; away he went after the prisoner, overtook him, knocked him down, kicked him, forced him to get up on a palkigari which was standing by, and hung him on a tree, then and there; after which, looking pitifully at his fist, he complained that 'the wretch had spoiled his knuckles.' This will give you an idea of the advantage of having able-bodied magistrates in these times."

CHINA.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF CANTON.

We have now our files containing full accounts of the bombardment and capture of Canton.

The bombardment of the city commenced at six o'clock in the morning of Monday, the 28th of December, and during the whole of that day the gun-boats were busily engaged in transferring the various arms—British and French, seamen and marines, artillery and engineers, 59th and Sepoys—from Honan, the larger men-of-war, and the troop-ships to the Canton side. The fire continued all day; it seemed to flag toward evening, but only for a time; and at six o'clock a large fire burst out in the extreme western suburbs, kindled by Captain Hall and a party of men from the gun-boats, designed to clear a road up to the wall from just below French Folly: it raged furiously for several hours, and effectually cleared away all obstructions.

The bombardment during the night is described as "a sight never to be forgotten." Along the whole river line there were fierce fires raging, houses tumbling, and timbers crashing. At the extreme east end were the gun-boats, pouring in rockets and shell; next came some French ships; then the Niger, Hornet, Cruiser, Surprise, and Nimrod; then Dutch Folly, with its rockets and mortars; below it, two large French gun-boats, and last of all the Phlegeton and Actæon. The fire from the various ships was kept up only at intervals, but from their numbers it appeared incessant. During the brief pauses every thing was still as death in the city—no shouting or screams, or sounds of confusion; not a human being was to be seen either on the city side or on Honan, but it seemed as if the stern form of the Destroying Angel were crouching over the fated and unhappy city, and awing its victims into silence. The shells were whirling through the air, their track marked by the fizzing of their fiery fusees twinkling like stars during their revolutions, till at last, arriving at their destinations, there was a flash and an explosion, which told how accurately and fearfully these engines of destruction do their work. Some of these shells reached even to Gough's Fort, and fragments were found there the following day. The rockets, too, seemed to be hissing about in every direction; and the elliptical shell from the French ships caused no little astonishment as they burred through the air with a noise not unlike that of an immense humming-top. The scene was one replete with awe, and dreadful must have been the sufferings of the poor people, thus made to answer for the sins of their rulers. By midnight the fire in the city seemed nearly to have expended itself; but every now and then the flames shot up with fitful glare, dying away again nearly as rapidly. The whole of the suburbs seemed to be on fire, but nothing was touched on the Honan side.

APPEARANCE OF THE CITY.

The city was soon taken. On the following Sunday a correspondent entered the city by the new road carried through that portion of the suburbs immediately above the French Folly, and which had just been opened. No Chinese were to be seen. You enter the city by the southeast angle of the wall. The streets were entirely deserted. The town had suffered very much in this quarter; not a house scarcely that had not a hole in the roof, indicative of the entrance of a shot or rocket. No dead Chinese were lying about, which may be accounted for by an order that all bodies fallen in with should be buried; but when the city was first entered the walls were well covered with dead bodies.

HOW YEH WAS CAUGHT.

On Tuesday an expedition into the interior of the city was planned and executed. Mr. Parkes had heard of Yeh's whereabouts, and was anxious to catch him. His Excellency was reported to be residing at the Ut-Wa College, in the very centre of the city; but on arriving there it was found he had decamped the previous Thursday to the Lieutenant-General's Yamun, in the southwest corner of the old city. This information was given by a Chinese officer, who refused to point out the Yamun, but depending on two Chinese guides whom he had engaged by promise of reward, Mr. Parkes made his way to the place indicated, under the protection of about 100 Blue-jackets, commanded by Commodore Elliot and Captain Key. Bursting open the doors of the Yamun, the retreating figure of the High Commissioner was the signal for a general rush after him, and notwithstanding the protestations of an ambitious mandarin that "Me Yeh!" the stout Viceroy found himself in the embrace of Captain Key and the Commodore's coxswain, who had outrun the others, and ranged up one on each side of him. He was brought back, and conducted to a seat, and was soon identified by many Chinese who were marched in singly, and asked by Mr. Parkes who the gentleman was; they all instantly fell down on their knees, saying he was the Chetoi (Governor-general).

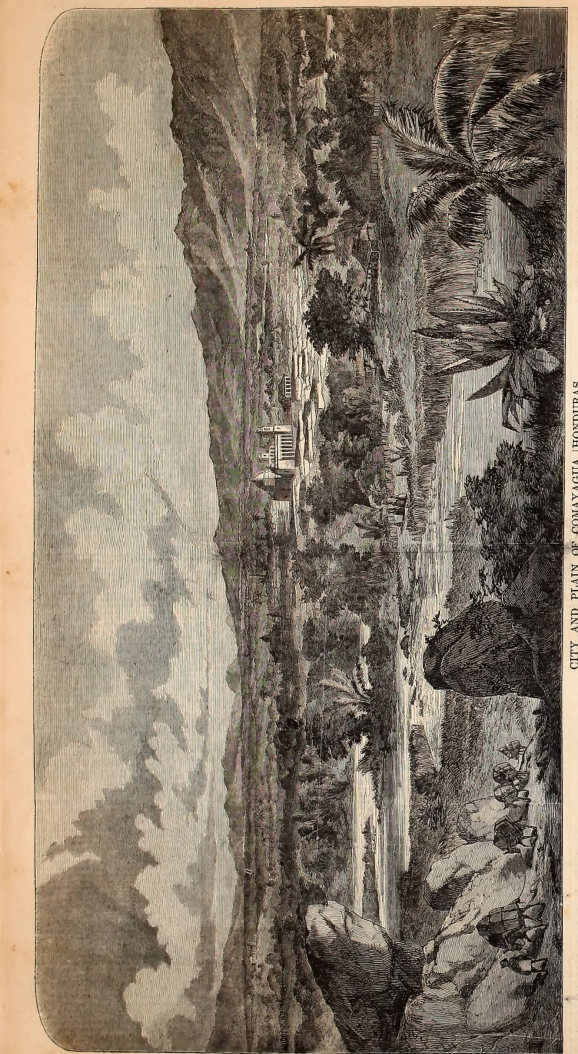
WHAT HE LOOKED LIKE.

The correspondent of the London Times writes: "If he had six headmen in his train, and if we all stood kidnapped men before him, he could not hold his head more haughtily. It is a huge, sensual, flat face. The profile is nearly straight from the eyebrow to the chin. He wears his mandarin cap, his red button, and his peacock's tail, but in other respects has the ordinary quilted blue tunic and loose breeches, the universal winter wear of this part of China. He seats himself in an arm-chair, and some inferior mandarins, who have pressed in after him, stand round and make him a little court. The officers who fill the room are passing to and fro upon their duties, and of course refrain from staring at him. Yet no one can look upon that face without feeling that he is in the presence of an extraordinary man. There is a ferocity about that restless, roving eye, which almost makes you shrink from it. It is the expression of a fierce and angry but not courageous animal. While the long nails of his dirty fingers are trembling against the table, and his eyes are ranging into every part of the room in search of every face, his pose of dignity is too palpably simulated to inspire respect, even if you could forget his deeds. But no one can look upon him with contempt.

"The two admirals and the generals now arrive, and after some salutations, which were naturally more embarrassing to the captors than the captive, the English admiral inquired whether Mr. Cooper, Sen., was still living. You will recollect the circumstances under which this gentleman was kidnapped. Yeh burst forth into a loud laugh, which sounded to every one present as though he were recollecting and enjoying the recollections of this poor man's sufferings. When he had finished his cachinnations he replied, 'I can't recollect about this man, but I will make inquiries to-morrow, and if he can be found you shall have him.'

"The disgust was at that moment so great, for many in the room had known and esteemed poor Cooper, that if the audience could have decided the matter, Yeh would have been taken out and hanged.

"He was told that his answer was not courteous, and he replied that it was, at any rate, the only answer he should give.



"After some further conversation, Yeh was sent on board the ships."

THE PLUNDER.

For six days the western gate had been open, and exit had been denied to neither men, nor goods, nor treasure. Surely there could be nothing left to reward the captors. How can we strain our minds to comprehend the stolid, stupid confidence of these Chinese officials? The treasury was full of silver, as full probably as it ever was. As many as fifty-two boxes, which a man could not singly lift, were found, and sixty-eight packets of solid ingots. There was also a store-house of the most costly Mandarin fur dresses, lined with sables and rare furs, and there was a room full of copper cash. Now a strange scene occurred. The instructions were to bring away any bullion, but to touch nothing else. These orders were obeyed with a strange and self-denying fidelity. The soldiers and officers with difficulty turned their eyes away from the rich dresses. But how to remove the heavy load of bullion. Crowds had assembled in front, and a happy thought occurred to one of the officers: "A dollar's worth of cash to every coolie who will help to carry the silver to the English camp." In a moment the crowd dispersed in search of their bamboo poles, and in another moment there were a thousand volunteer Cantonese contending for the privilege of carrying for an enemy their city's treasure. With their stipulated strings of cash around their necks, away they trudged with the English soldiers and the sycee silver.

HOW CANTON IS TO BE GOVERNED.

The Governor of Canton was taken prisoner as well as Yeh and the Tartar General. The Governor Pihquei was subsequently installed as vice-Governor of the city, with powers similar to those wielded by Yeh. The allies were to continue their protectorate until satisfactory terms were made by the Government of Pekin. A committee, composed of two Englishmen and one Frenchman, had been charged with the supervision of the Government, and had issued a proclamation inviting the people to return, assuring them of their protection.

CITY AND PLAIN OF COMAYAGUA, HONDURAS.

BRIDGING THE CONTINENT.

THE HONDURAS INTEROCEANIC RAILWAY.

CENTRAL AMERICA, during the past five years, has attracted greater attention than any other portion of the American continent. It has been the theatre of national rivalries and consequent embittered diplomatic contests, and of an episode of adventure more remarkable than any other recorded in modern annals; and which, from varying points of view, has been denounced as piratical, or applauded as in the highest interest of humanity and civilization. But the great fact, out of which these rivalries and contests have sprung, and which gives to Central America its real value in the eyes of the world, is that, somewhere within its borders, lies that "short and easy passage" between the seas of which Columbus and Cortez dreamed, and which is the great desideratum of modern commerce. Tehuantepec, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Panama have become familiar words, as designating those geographical points to which the enterprise of our day has been chiefly directed in its search for an interoceanic highway. Each affords certain facilities for such a work, and each has able and earnest advocates. It seems not improbable, however, that the palm of superiority—for which all contend—will be held in reserve until the question shall be determined by the test of experiment.

Meantime the great world can have only a relative interest in the question, limited to obtaining an intelligent idea of the various routes proposed, and a knowledge of the leading facts upon which their claims to attention are founded. It is hardly necessary to say that it is solely with the view of gratifying this interest, and only in the sense of contributing impartially to enlighten the public mind in these respects, that reference is had, in these pages, to any of the great projects in question.

The construction of the Panama Railway may be regarded as the first practical attempt toward connecting the oceans through an improved means of communication answering to modern requirements. This work, commenced in 1849, was carried forward in the face of many serious obstacles, resulting from a fatal climate and an unsettled condition of affairs in the Isthmus, to a completion in 1855, since which time it has been in constant operation. It is unquestionably a remarkable monument of commercial enterprise and engineering daring and skill, and has proved of vast public utility.

Another project for connecting the oceans, at points perhaps more advantageous than the termini of the Panama Railway, is that of constructing a railway through the Republic of Honduras, between Puerto Cortez (late Puerto Caballos) on the Atlantic, and the Bay of Fonseca on the Pacific. This road is in course of construction, under the auspices of a Joint English and American Company, at the head of which is William Brown, Esq., M.P., of Liverpool, the head also of the great commercial house of Brown, Shipley & Co., and Chairman of the Atlantic Submarine Telegraph Company, who, by a life of service in the cause of "peace and good-will among men," earned from the lips of Lord Palmerston himself, in a speech delivered some years ago, the honorable designation of "the living link between Great Britain and the United States."

The plan of this road, designated as the "Honduras Interoceanic Railway," originated with our countryman, Mr. E. G. Squier, not unknown as an author and antiquary, and who, some years ago, held the position of representative of the United States in Central America. To his various books and reports the world is principally indebted for the information which it possesses relative to the work in question; and to him also is conceded the credit of having organized and put in operation the powerful company which has undertaken the enterprise.*

But however Mr. Squier may have contributed to make known to this generation the facilities of the Honduras Isthmus for a route of interoceanic communication, the credit of the original discovery belongs to those iron men who, in the days of Cortes and Pizarro, traversed every part of the American continent, and investigated its most secret recesses, in their search for "el secreto del estrecho" (the secret of the Strait), or that open water connection between the oceans which they supposed to exist, and of which Cortes wrote that its discovery "would make the King of Spain master of so many kingdoms that he might consider himself Lord of the world." Failing to find such a Strait, they next devoted themselves to careful search for those points where communication overland could be most easily established.

ANCIENT EXPLORATIONS.

As early as 1540, but thirty-eight years after Columbus had landed on the shores of Honduras at Truxillo, and but fourteen years after Cortez himself, at the close of a long and weary journey from Mexico overland, had built the town of Natividad at Puerto Caballos—as early as 1540, Alonzo Caceres, one of the lieutenants of Alvarado, had found-

* See "Notes on Central America; particularly the States of Honduras and San Salvador, their Geography, Topography, Climate, Population, Resources, etc., etc., and the Proposed Interoceanic Railway, by E. G. Squier, late Charge d'Affaires of the United States in Central America; with Original Maps and Illustrations." P. 400, 8vo. Harper & Brothers, New York.

PUERTO CORTEZ (LATE CABALLOS) AND ALVARADO LAGOON, ATLANTIC PORT OF HONDURAS RAILWAY.

ed the city of Comayagua, then called Valladolid, the present capital of Honduras, in obedience to instructions "to find out an eligible situation for a town, midway between the oceans. It was the intention of the founders," adds the historian of Guatemala, Juarros, "by means of this place to obtain an easy communication between the Atlantic and Pacific; its situation, being about half-way between Puerto Caballos and the Bay of Fonseca, would render it a convenient intermediate dépôt; the climate being healthy, and the soil fertile, much of the sickness and waste of human life would be prevented, and many of the fatigues and privations avoided that were experienced in the journey from Nombre de Dios [Chagres] to Panama."

Although the establishment of the city of Comayagua does not seem to have led to any immediate change in the course of trade across the Isthmus of Panama, still the object had in view was neither neglected nor abandoned. Among the many papers relating to this subject in the Department of the Marine, at Madrid, is a memorial addressed to the King of Spain, in 1565, by Phillip de Aniion, entitled, "On the Utility and Advantages which would result from changing the Route of Transit between the Seas from Nombre de Dios and Panama to Puerto de Caballos and Fonseca."

The memorial of Aniion sets forth that the subject of which he proposes to speak is one that "concerns the glory of God, the service of his Majesty, and the common good," and he claims to be heard, and have his representations credited, as "being an old settler in the country, well informed on its condition and resources, and from having traveled all over it." He affirms that the change proposed by Hermosilla would "result in the saving of the lives of many Spaniards, in consequence of a better climate; in the better protection, at less cost, of the establishments on both seas against the attacks of freebooters and pirates; and in the speedy establishment of ten or twelve cities in a country rich in the ores of gold and silver, and abounding in corn, cattle, and other supplies."

Upon the point of comparative salubrity, Aniion speaks with the blunt emphasis of a man in downright earnest. He says: "At the outset, if there be any thing on earth which may be compared to hell, it is the climate of Nombre de Dios, which is so notorious that I shall not enlarge upon it, but sum up by saying that in all the Indies, fruitful and abundant as they are, Nombre de Dios [near Chagres] alone is so thoroughly barren that no kind of fruit can be grown there, not even plantains; nor can children be reared there; and the Spaniards die out so rapidly that the population becomes almost entirely extinct every six months, and is only filled up by the number of persons attracted thither by the large profits on the vast quantities of gold and silver which pass through the place."

The testimony of Aniion was followed up by that of numerous officers of the Spanish Crown, and confirmed by the results of a survey of this route by the celebrated Italian engineer, Bautista Antonelli, in the year 1586. It would seem that at this period the Council of the Indies had resolved to break up the transit at Panama, and transfer it to Honduras; but the wars which followed between Spain and the English, French, and Dutch, extending equally to the colonies, the coasts of which were harassed by invasions and infested by pirates, had the effect of preventing the contemplated change; and the project seems not only to have become neglected, but absolutely forgotten. It is said that some time during the last century the line was again examined, under orders from the Spanish Crown, with reference to a ship-canal; but of this we have no satisfactory evidence.

CHURCH OF MERCED, AND INDEPENDENCE MONUMENT, COMAYAGUA.

MODERN DISCOVERY.

In making these references to the early Spanish explorations and reports, we do not wish in the least to detract from the credit which belongs to Mr. Squier, who, three hundred years later, has again drawn attention to the capabilities of the Honduras Isthmus. It is due to him to say, that his conclusions, as to the advantages of that Isthmus for an interoceanic highway, were founded upon observations made on the spot, quite irrespective of the hints and data furnished by ancient documents bearing on the subject, and which, indeed, have only been rescued within the past year from the chaos of the Spanish archives.

The great physical fact which gives feasibility to the project of a railway through Honduras is, that there is here a breaking down or interruption in that great back-bone of the continent, the mountain chain of the Cordilleras, constituting an uninterrupted transverse valley extending from sea to sea. The manner in which, in 1850, Mr. Squier was led to infer the existence of such a valley is a good example of close induction from observations on the prevailing winds and other data, but too long to be detailed here. At that time, it would seem, our explorer felt no interest in his discovery, except as a remarkable topographical feature of the country. Later, however, when the question of interoceanic communication took a practical form, he was led to reflect upon it in that connection; and early in 1853, at the head of a small party of engineers, took the field in person, to test the accuracy of his inferences by an actual survey. The results seem to have more than realized his anticipations, and he lost no time in securing, from the Government of Honduras, a charter for a railway on the line that he had marked out, which, it is claimed, is far more liberal in its provisions than any which has yet been conceded for a similar purpose. Since then, as we have said, a company has been organized for the construction of the work, under guarantees of the neutrality of the line, and of protection against "interruption, seizure, or unjust confiscation," in the form of treaty stipulations between Honduras and the principal maritime nations of the world.

The line of the proposed work commences at Puerto Cortez (late Caballos) on the Bay of Hon-dures, in lat. 15° 49' N., and long. 87° 32' W., and from mouth to mouth across the continent to the Bay of Fonseca on the Pacific, in lat. 13° 21' N., and long. 87° 35' W. Its total length, from ancient boundaries to the plains, is 148 geographical miles—shorter is an error—but it is 148 miles which is equal to about 161 statute miles. It lies wholly in the State of Honduras, whose territorial right and sovereignty over it has never been called in question.

BAY OF FONSECA, PACIFIC PORT OF HONDURAS RAILWAY.

PUERTO CORTES.

Puerto Cabello was discovered by Cortes, in his expedition from Honduras in 1524, who named there a town, which he called Natividad. The selection was made, to quote the language of his historian to the King of Spain, "porque es el puerto mejor que hay en toda la costa descubierta de esta Tierra-firme, hoy, desde Las Perlas hasta La Florida"—that is to say, "because it is the best port hitherto discovered on all the coast of the main land, from Las Perlas to Florida." It was surveyed in 1854 by Lieutenant Jeffers, U.S.N., who describes it as "a good harbor, of great capacity, with plenty of water, and easy of entrance and exit. Situated at the base of the hills, there are several small streams or swamps to affect the healthfulness of the locality, which is sufficiently extensive for the formation of a large city."

BAY OF FONSECA.

On the other side of the continent, and constituting the Pacific port of the proposed railway, is the large and beautiful Bay of Fonseca, which has been justly described as "constituting on the coast, by its fifty miles in length by about thirty in average width, perfectly protected, and containing a series of three large islands, offering inner ports with ample water, and admirable sites for towns and commercial and naval establishments sufficient to accommodate the three States of San Salvador, Honduras, and Nicaragua, took place in Honduras, however, for the Atlantic front fortnight. The entrance to the bay from the sea is about eighteen miles broad between the volcano of Conchagua (3800 feet high) on the east, and of Cosiguina (2000 feet high), which rise like huge lighthouses on either hand, and constitute invaluable landmarks for the mariner. On a line across this entrance are the high islands of Conchagua and Tigre, and a cluster of smaller ones called Los Farallones, which serve to protect the bay against the swell of the sea.

These islands belong to San Salvador, but the principal islands, Sacate Grande and Tigre, belong to Honduras. At these, Sacate Grande and Tigre, at best, being upward of seven miles long, and rising, at its southern extremity, to the height of 1500 feet. The island of Tigre, however, from its position, is the most important. It is, perhaps, fifteen miles in circumference, rising—as will be seen in the engraving—in the form of a regular cone, to the height of 2200 feet. Seen from the sea, at a moderate distance inland, is very gentle, and abounds of cultivation. The port of Amapala has a fine anchorage for the largest vessels.

Salubrious, surrounded by a country of illimitable agricultural resources, and with one of the exhaustless coal, gold, and silver mines inland, abounding in the finest and excellent species of wood, possessing all the necessities for sustaining a large and prosperous population, the Bay of Fonseca is unrivaled in its adaptation to the wants of a great work of universal utility like the one proposed, and seems to have been set apart by Nature herself as the ultimate centre of enterprise, and the great emporium of trade on that side of the continent.

PLAIN OF COMAYAGUA.

The leading physical feature of Honduras, however—that which gives feasibility to the projected railway, and value to the fine ports above described—is the great Plain of Comayagua, which is in the very centre of the State, midway between the seas. In it rise the rivers Humuya and Goascoran; the former flowing due north into the Atlantic, near Puerto Cabello, and the latter due south into the Bay of Fonseca; the valleys of which are in conjunction with the plain itself, constituting that great transverse valley between the oceans to which we have previously alluded.

This plain is not far from forty miles in greatest length by from five to fifteen broad. It is of regular or longest axis is north and south, and nearly coincident with a line of the projected railway. Both its eastern and western borders it is skirted by mountains five or six thousand feet high, and it consequently enjoys a climate cool, equable, and salubrious comparing, in respect of temperature, with the south of France in the month of May. The hills and mountains adjacent to the plain are covered with pines, and on their summit and slopes, wheat, potatoes, and other products of the temperate zones are cultivated, and may be produced in abundance. The production of the plain itself, however, are essentially tropical. Its soil is extremely fertile. In short, the plain of Comayagua offers all the conditions for attracting and sustaining what there is abundant evidence that it formerly sustained, a large and flourishing population.

In the centre of the plain stands the city of Comayagua, the capital of Honduras, which, as we have seen, was founded in 1540 by Alonzo Cerron, as a kind of half-way house between the seas, and which, in view of equipping through it the oceanic highway—an object which now, after a lapse of three years, seems on the point of being accomplished. The city now contains between 7000 and 8000 inhabitants. Previous to 1827 it had about 16,000, and was embellished with churches and monuments. In that year it was taken and burned by the monarchical faction of Guatemala, and has never wholly recovered from the shock. It is the seat of a bishopric and a university, and has a magnificent cathedral and a number of large and beautiful churches. In front of the Church of La Merced is a square, or plaza, ornamented with a monument raised to commemorate the independence of the country. There are several other considerable towns in the plain, the principal one being Las Piedras, with a population of about 6000 inhabitants.

The line of the proposed road pursues a direct course across the plain to its southern extremity, where there is a comparatively easy pass out of where there is a comparatively easy pass out of about 200 feet to the summit, which may be overcome by two passes, called respectively Rancho Chiquito and Guajoca. The latter presents the greatest facilities. It is not, however, at night to suppose, a rocky summit, abruptly divided by the water flowing into the great ocean, but a beautiful valley, a savanna or natural meadow, bounded on the east by a gradual rise of the mountains, and on the west by a corresponding range of hills. In this meadow-like valley, on the east, the traveler finds two bright streams, scarcely a hundred yards apart, flowing in opposite directions. From a narrow divide between these rises into the Atlantic, the other of the Goascoran, falling into the Pacific. An active spectator could survey the entire line in a single day.

ENGINEERING AND COMMERCIAL DATA.

We have thus indicated the leading practical features of Honduras as connected with the projected railway. The engineering data bearing upon it are hardly known as matters of fact in general reader, and it is perhaps enough to say that the profile of the line exhibits no grade higher than 200 feet in height; or, to speak more intelligibly, the sum of the ascents and descents, on the whole distance of 161 miles, 2000 feet, considerably less than upon some of the most successful American railroads. Local freights, for instance, involving a grade of more than 60 to 80 feet to the mile; that the cost of construction is estimated at $30,000, and that it is the opinion of Mr. Squier, built, shorten the voyage to California, as compared with the route via Panama, by about 1500 miles of sailing distance, and from six to ten days in time.

Should it realize these anticipations, wholly or in any considerable degree, some idea of its utility may be gained from a consideration of the following data. The arrivals and departures at San Francisco, via the Isthmus of Central America, during the year, for the years 1855, 1856, 1857, 60,521 per annum. This number is irrespective of the passengers for Salt Lake, and the Pacific ports generally, and would probably swell the aggregate to upward of 80,000. For the same period the number of vessels engaged on the western coast of the American Continent, and of which the natural flow is by the speediest and safest route from the Atlantic American isthmus, has amounted to not less than 400,000 tons, or nearly that the capital of the Bank of England, in annual value.

Of course the commerce of California now constitutes the largest item in the aggregate of trade with the ports of the Pacific. But leaving California and Oregon out, the commercial statistics of States alone, with there ports, rose from 626 vessels of 244,000 tons in 1849 to 1856 vessels and 1,007,000 tons in 1853, and its imports and exports increased, in the same period, from $17,001,320 to $60,000,000, or about 100 per cent.

And if (as is most probable, in case an adequate route of communication between the oceans, with rapid ports and subsidiary steam lines (Atlantic and Pacific), the trade and travel between Great Britain and her Australian colonies should follow the direction of the Central American Isthmus—in this event we should be called upon to add to the large aggregates above cited an additional commerce of not less than 30,000 persons, bullion to the amount of upward of $100,000,000, and general trade to the value of $62,000,000!

All travelers concur in representing Honduras itself as a country of surpassing beauty of scenery, unbounded agricultural and mineral resources, and possessing climates equally delightful and salubrious. "In its physical aspect and configuration of surface," says Mr. Squier, "it is an epitome of all other countries and climates of the globe. High mountain ranges, isolated volcanic peaks, elevated table-lands, deep valleys, broad rivers, level plains, and extensive alluvions, are here found grouped together, forming a picture of surpassing beauty and singular rivers, the whole teeming with animal and vegetable life, and possessing every variety of climate, from eternal frost to the cool and bracing temperature of eternal spring."

LOCKED OUT.

THE snow was coming down fast—white, solid, determined flakes, that meant business. All day New York to spend the winter, and defied any thing to melt them except the fire. Even Broadway, and even the white marble front of Stewart's, and the long vista of blackness that stretched through the night where Grace Church was, could not daunt them. They clung to the carved architraves of the stores that lined the street—every projection and lintel looked as if it had been trimmed with swan-down by some eccentric architect. The peaked roofs of the houses in Washington were heavy with the white load, and nodded to each other with knowing coquetry as the flakes that formed to cut modern fashions, they had gone back to the pictures on the tombstones, and were constantly disturbed by the change.

There was snow on the sidewalks; deep, despotic, and unmelted. Here, that there was a path—up all the thousand pitfalls and ruts of the great city arteries, and there was a path—but in some of the town under one vast charitable mantle. The few people that were out on foot thundered along with quick-beating hearts, and sometimes for miles were deep in it, and might be seen standing in some great drift looking dump and helpless. Small boys dashed through the huge banks like water-dogs through the white cousin of the surf at Long Beach. They plunged into it as if they had been born Russians, and were continually taking snow-baths. They seemed to love to get it into their shoes, and hair, and ears, and sometimes they would emerge from a long dive under the surface, looking a perfect picture of Santa Claus in their shaggy coats.

The world was en runners. The centre of Broadway was a confused arabesque of sleighs; a vast labyrinth of furs and horses, very dimly illuminated, and, indeed, by the half-frozen gaslights that seemed to grow feebler every moment as if ere long they would perish altogether with the cold.

A bitter wind began to drive the dry, thick snow salant. It hurried its inflexible mass in the face people's eyes on the streets, and routed them up into furrows like some wild howling animal. It rushed round the corners of the houses with a rush and a howl as it would garrote every passing wayfarer, and then, as if mad with disappointment at its failure, it would shriek like a fiend down the alleys.

It was a night to make Charity feel ill at ease. A night to make Charity, as she sat by a warm basement all his money at the grog-shop this evening."

"Hush! I see!" said Rufus. His charity rather startled by this revelation of intoxication. "Your brother is drunk, then?"

"Yes," said the very drunk. But that wouldn't matter so much—he's used to it—if the snow hadn't come on so deep, and we lost our footing. He is asleep in a ditch, Sir, he was too far gone to push."

Rufus took a closer glance at the speaker, who by this time had struggled completely out of the snow, and was kneeling down and tenderly lifting a head from the mud that lay breathing mysteriously on the chill air. She was starvation idealized. Her features were all beautiful, but shrunken. Her delicate nose was pinched, her cheeks fallen away, her lips of a purplish hue. But through this Death and Beauty were visible, like prisoners dimly seen through the narrow grating of the cold cell; but not extinct.

"What is your name?" asked Rufus.

"Janet Lee, Sir."

"Janet East! Janet Northeast it should be, poor child—you look so cold! Come, help me to lift your brother. Another of you, and I'll see if I can't find some cab and take care of you and him until morning."

The pair bent down and tugged at the inert form of Mr. East. Presently a crimson face became visible, with the head of hair that Nature, in flaming fecundity, had bestowed upon it. Rufus knew the features misused of ice. There was the beautiful face of Mr. East's perishing with cold. He had within him such a plentiful supply of fuel in the shape of vivacious brandy, that the cold was quite excessive as the bolder of a Mississippi steamer out. Presently Mr. East, who had been roused by the unusual by Rufus, seemed to awake to resentment, and after a few staggering attempts to gain his feet, he made a determined effort to fall. He mercifully never got farther than the knees, he eventually resumed a somewhat erect position, and, leaning immersed up to his waist in the snow, and debauched steady of Rufus, "Whashyouwant?"

"All right," said Rufus, "I'll help the drunken man a tremendous lift that near sent him backwards into the snow-bank. "Now, Miss Janet, take his other arm, and help me along to my door."

"Oh, thank you, Sir!" cried little Janet East, and her large eyes widened with gratitude as if she would straightway devour Rufus. I see the snow that just at that moment she felt inclined to devour almost any thing.

The supporters had a long walk, like a coat of arms, Mr. East staggered along until they reached the front house in which Rufus had his humble lived. Here the unpleasant conviction forced itself on the latter's mind, that the same difficulty presented itself to him as to get the drunken man into the door alone. How was he to get in?

"You mustn't get any nearer!" he said reflectively to Jane, while he hung Mr. East by his coattail on one of the iron spikes of the area-railings to keep him steady. "You don't get a step, Miss, have you?"

"Nothing but slippers, Sir," answered the girl, holding up a little foot enveloped in what seemed to be a collection of ragged pieces of sticking-plaster.

"Well, then, you will have to stay here," said Rufus, tugging at a huge boot with a sole so thick that a famous would have worshipped it for years"; and with a deliberate aim and vigorous swing he flung it at the obstinate window-sash on the third story, and a shower of splinters of broken glass was followed in a second or two by a lifting of the window-sash, and a human face.

"Hello, Rufus! Is that you?"

"Open, Jack. Confound you, you sleep like a hippopotamus!"

"Ay, ay, Sir!" answered the gentleman through the sash, and presently there was clearly a rumbling on the stairs—that rumbling so pleasant to locked-out seven—was followed by the unbolting of the door by Mr. Jack Dingly in person, who appeared in a mixed costume of counterpane and slippers.

"Why, who have you here?" he exclaimed, as Mr. East, still armorially supported, was hoisted into the hall.

"It's all right," said Rufus. "Help me up stairs with this gentleman, Jack, please."

So Mr. East was gradually conducted up stairs, and without disturbing the slumbers of another lodging he sat down with considerable dignity, and declared his intention of passing in that spot the remainder of his days.

Rufus Gay was an artist on wood. By no means a wooden artist by the way, for he executed every week in the Pickwissing, were the most spirited and imaginative things in their line that American could boast of. Mr. Jack Dingly was of the same temper, but he had one skeleton in his house—he was honored by having a boy! would cut out his effects. If he drew a pretty woman with dimpled cheeks and nez retroussé, when the block came out of the hands of Dibble & Co.—who did the engraving for the Pickwissing—she was sure to have lantern jaws, and a proboscis like a sawdish. Then Rufus would glare gloomily on the effects of his genius, and say with profane emphasis that he would like to know what Gayarré would like if he had his drawings to treated?

Jack Dingly and Rufus Gay roomed together.

As both were artists, their apartments were a pleasing mixture of the bedroom and the studio. The sofa and the duvet were combined. The washstand was concealed by an easel. The sofa—that sofa on which so many ragged models had reposed for Jack Dingly's historical pictures that were never purchased—was at night clothed with equivocal blankets and sheets brought from some mysterious corner behind the oak-skin. The walls were covered with rough sketches of what artists call "effects." Snatches of yellow and blue which Dingly called "sunsets," and of white and black which Dingly called "moonlights."

They led a jolly life for all that in their "cells," as they called it. It may have gone hard with them sometimes to pay their rent, but they never repined, and laughed at their little straits—and I doubt much if Leviathan, the great Wall Street lender, slept half so heavily in his wide bed as these two young fellows on their queer couches.

After Rufus had explained the circumstances that led to the strange addition to their party, the first question was to get Mr. Jacob Dingly's fine gentleman was with difficulty persuaded to extend his limbs on the historical sofa, where, covered with a picture drapery of red cotton, he presently went to sleep, retaining to the last a vague impression that he had been unwarrantably insulted.

Then the stores of the camp were produced as soon as this happy consummation was attained, and Jack and Rufus spread their bread and cheese, and somewhat exhausted demijohn of sherry before Jane Kerr, with a good-will that made the feast with invisible flowers. How the poor child ate! How the famished black eyes glared at the food! How the thin hands trembled as they clutched it!

She was very pretty. They soon discovered that—but it made no matter just then. She was hideously as Medusa, they would have lit the fire and cooked her frozen feet, and dried her clothes all the same. None but those who have lived among artists know how good and gentle are men made by Art!

As the poor thing gained strength under the care of the two young fellows she began to tell her own wrongs, fragments of her little story. It was simple and sad. She was an orphan. She and her brother lived together in a tenement house in the lowest end of Walker Street. Her brother, a capital fellow, if Jane was to be believed, "was very steady but one fault—he drank. He worked as a cabinet-maker in a large manufactory in Second Avenue, and earned quite a respectable income, but this income, alas! he seldom brought home. Mein Herr Mechlenheim, who kept the little grocery near where they lived, got it all. She, Jane, earned a little by sewing—but oh! it was not enough to buy food. People will not wear shirts —curse them! (this ejaculation is Jack Dingly's)—pay as little. Has she cried? It was not the time or for spending his money as he liked. It was his. He earned it. He had a right to do what he liked with it. Of course this disconnected to such a course of life as her brother's was easily imagined. Nonpayment of rent. Hard language. Then, finally, the evil day—until on that fatal snowy night poor Jane and her brother, who had been locked out by order of the greggery to which she, faithful sister, had gone to fetch him, found the door bolted against them by their last landlord, and were forced to seek shelter, while utter insanity hungered.

"There never was such a pitiful-looking creature in the world," thought Rufus Gay, as she finished her little tale. "Just look at her eyes—what a face for a picture! What intelligence in spite of her haggard, woeful cheeks! Egad, she must have a brave intellect to have stood such a siege and not been starved out."

"What an effect of rags!" thought Jack Dingly. "What a picturesque arrangement! Backed by an old wall well toned down, what a study she would make for A. Kyzing Minor!"

Rufus, however, being of a more practical turn of mind than his friend, was revolving a thousand plans for the improvement of Jane's and her brother's estate. "She might go out for a governess; is not, I know of Mrs. Bulus wants some one to do anything. But pshaw! of course she doesn't. How should she? or she might set up a fancy store in Broadway, as she is so clever with her needle. Five or six hundred dollars would do it. Just then Rufus's mind came to some end to all his events and the vision crumbled. He planned numerous elegant occupations for his protégé; but somehow all of them required money. Where was the devil of it? Through all this vista of vague dreams—all through the long vacation that left to London the trills chimed to the cockney bore, "Turn again, Whittington, Lord Mayor of London"—there rang the words, "Five hundred burden, "Janet Eust is pretty, Janet Eust is young;" and somehow the tune grew more and more distasteful to his ear, and eventually chimed into dim echoes of marriage bells, while Rufus Gay sat musing.

Rufus and Jack slept that night together, and Janet lay on a pallet-bed in the studio, made up of a consultation of coats and waistcoats, and slept at once picturesque and comfortable. Jack went off to bed, muttering, as he glanced at the impromptu couch, "Good Heavens! what an effect! what a study for a Sleeping Mendicant!"

The next morning Rufus Gay went out early in the snow, down to the tenement house in Walker Street, the manner of which he got from Jane the night before, and had an interview with the hard landlord, which resulted in that individual, after some demur, accepting the artist as security for the rent owed by the Eusts. This seemed to Rufus a capital joke. The idea of any body accepting him as security for any thing was so ludicrous to him that he came into Jack Dingly rosy with exercise and breathless with laughter, and woke that gentleman out of a sound sleep to tell him the farcical incident.

"I'm glad to hear it," said Jack. "She's a lovely creature, this Janet."

Rufus was grave in a moment.

"Do you think so, Jack?" he said—"I can't agree with you at all. She's small, and thin, has a hump."

Hump be dished!" cried Jack, starting up in bed, "Are you blind, man? Why, with a month's feeding that girl would be a Venus."

"Hallo! Hallo! you seem wonderfully interested, Mr. Dingly."

"Well, so I am, Mr. Gay. Why not?"

"I don't care," said Rufus, sullenly"—you may marry her to-morrow if you like, for what I care."

Who talks of marrying her, you fool? I only want to draw her. She's just the thing for my picture. She is—she is—she is—Mary Magdalene girl!"

"Jack Dingly, I have to request that you will speak a little more respectfully of Miss Eust. She's not a beggar girl, Sir!"

"Miss Eust," why Rufus—Rufus! what's the matter? you look as red as a turkey-cock. By Jove, I believe you are in love with the girl!"

"Have you any prior claim, Mr. Dingly?"

The only reply that Jack Dingly to this solemn question, which Rufus asked with such pomp and formality, was to catch the latter by the neck and roll him over in the bed shrieking with laughter.

"Don't suffocate me," spluttered Rufus, as soon as he disentangled himself from Jack's clutch, "Ass that I am! Nothing nothing! Drop in it, is there, Jack?"

Jack sat up and looked earnestly at his friend. Then he took his hand and said,

"Rufus, my boy, you are a gentleman. It does not matter a pin what girl you marry if she is an honest girl; and if you love this little waif, and that her to be as sound as a nut, marry her to your wife, why, in God's name, marry her, and I'll be your bridesman."

Rufus pressed his friend's hand, and said nothing.

What Janet's delight was on that morning when she woke and found that the hard landlord had been appeased, it would take a bigger pen than the one I write with—which is, I regret to say, very old and very small—to describe. Neither is my little black crow-quill a big enough pen from the grocer's, and grocers water every thing, even their ink—to portray the pleasure with which Rufus looked on Janet's face when she woke. It is a pity, then, that the historian is obliged to say that he was only a tenant.

If by any mechanical contrivance I could, by aid of pen and ink, illuminate this page with fireworks—such fireworks as Rufus's would, on the present occasion, present the reader with a perfect blaze of rejoicing—I would do so; but as this should be able to read, inscribed in blue letters on a vermilion ground, "Jane Eust is engaged to marry Reginge columns of the Daily Times three months after the incident I have above related had occurred. The lines were these:

"MARRIED, at the Church of Holy Symbury, by the Reverend Amos Sharpeyes, Rufus Gay, Esq., to JANET, only daughter of the late THOMAS EUST."

"FANNY."

FANNY was a beauty. Fanny was a perfect belle pet. She was as delicate and graceful as a fawn, and as loving as she could be.

She was over the world to show some pretty little attention to these she loved, and was always one of my most welcome visitors.

Who do you think Fanny was?

She was a small, high-bred, terrier dog.

Her master believed he loved her as well as if she had been his child; her master never was married, or he would have known his mind a little on that, I think.

I first became acquainted with this pet of a Fanny when I lived in California.

We were in the same house for a while, and she used to let us play with her. She was a treasure, not quite—for kittens enjoy perfect repose, sometimes, and Fanny never did.

At last her master came to New York. Of course he brought Fanny, too. It was a long, tiring voyage to the dog, and her confinement in the little cabin deprived her of her exercise, so she passed through without injury.

In New York she was the observed of all observers. She gamboled by the side of her master when he walked in Broadway street, and lay lovingly at his feet while he sat at his desk in the office.

Now, I don't suppose gentlemen ever say where without Fanny he passed a slight steel chain round her neck and fastened her to the leg of the table; but when he visited any of his acquaintances,

I lived then in one large room in a boarding-house, and there she was always one of an evening with her master, and springing up into our little girl's crib, kiss her face with animated delight.

Lily would call her some of an evening pretty creature, caressing it, and they were very happy together.

Lily was fond of the gentleman, yet if he ever came without Fanny she was disappointed.

One evening, however, Fanny was not his companion. Lily looked eagerly at his feet, and behind him, but not seeing her pet, anxiously inquired for her. Greatly grieved she was to hear that Fanny was lost.

The gentleman took Lily on his knee and told her the sad tale.

He had been, the evening before, conversing with a friend at Taylor's saloon. When he was ready to go he whistled to Fanny, who bounded on before him till they reached the street, when the gentleman suddenly remembering something he had left, returned to fetch it, shutting the door behind him, but imagining his little companion was already at his feet all the while. Not until he again reached the street did he miss her. He whistled and called in vain; no bounding response answered his voice.

At once concluding that Fanny, finding herself shut out, had run home as fast as she could, he followed, but, arriving at his room, he was disappointed in not finding her, as he expected.

Advertisements were inserted in the newspapers. A considerable reward was offered to any person who would find and bring her back.

The tale was told to me, as the gentleman sat writing as usual at his desk, he heard a hesitating "Cap'n" upon the door.

"Come in!" he called.

The door opened, and Fanny bounded forward, and flung herself into her master's arms, and kissed him with kisses.

Behind her came a white-headed boy, who said he "would like that reward for bringing back the dog."

The gentleman knew that this boy had stolen Fanny and brought her back only in the hope of being paid, and he refused to give a penny-piece in the form of a sound chastisement; but the experienced youngster was too quick for him. Seeing the indignation at the avenue he was receiving, he was cowing, and took to his heels, nor did he stop until fairly out of sight.

Fanny looked none the worse for wear. She was so frantic with joy at being once more under the protection of her master himself that she could offer very careful to keep close by him and almost under his feet.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER VIII.

The Interior of the Crown House. The British Constitution, as known in a Family Party.

GRAVE was the family gathering that Christmas Eve called at Mordred Court. Thither flocked the cousins of the House in all degrees and of various ranks. From dukes who had nothing left to wish for but kings and coalitions to give, to bitchers hurriers and aspiring curates, of equally great dignity in their own sphere, the superb family united its motley scions. Such reunions were frequent, they belonged to the hereditary policy of the Crown House. It was in this occasion the master of the clan was more significantly than usual known as a "cabinet," in the constitutional history of the British empire. A new Government had been suddenly formed within the last six weeks, which overthrew a powerful, none direful blow on our ancient institutions; for the House of Vipont was not a party-name in its arrangements, and was wholly unrepresented in the Ministry, even by a beriship of the Treasury. Vipont Hall was the family mansion of the patriotic and resentful kindred.

It is the history of the Constitutional dinner. The gentlemen have joined the ladies in the state room of the mansion. The Hall Marquis had rearranged and redecorated in his old age—during the long illness that finally conducted him to his ancestors. During the latter years that princely Marquis had deserted Mordred Court for Vipont Hall, and the Crown House [illegible] filled with that brilliant society of which he had been long the ornament and centre. Everywhere was the mind active, the habitation of time and space, and a journey to a northern county was a visit to a world-home, making the invitations even of a Marquis of Montfort unwilling to languish beauties and gouty minuteness. The scenery had all the unworldly career, this long neglect of the dwelling consecrated to the hereditary traditions and conscience of the illustrious sinner. And other occupations beginning to pall, his lordship, accompanied only by his faithful valet, installed at a late taste in the decorative arts, came resolutely to Mordred Court, and there, interviewing with architects, and gilders, and upholsterers, redeemed his errors; and soothed by the reflection of his wealth provided for his successor added to his vanity—a coffin.

The state rooms before the eye. You are in the grand drawing-room, copied from that of Versailles. That is the picture, full length, of the late Marquis in his robes; its pendant is the late Marchioness, his wife. That table of malachite is a present from the Emperor Napoleon Alexander; that vase of Sevre which rests on it was made for Marie Antoinette—see her monogram—and was provided for her use, but open door at the far end you eye loses itself in the vista of other compass chambers and drawing room, the statue hall, the orangery; other rooms there are not pertaining to the mansion—but made fit for Bishops, a library that might have adorned Alexandrine—but they are not lighted, nor required, on this occasion, for it is strictly a family party, sixty guests and no more.

In the drawing-room three whist-tables carry off the more elderly and grave. The piano, in the music-room, attracts a younger group. Lady Adelaide Vipont, eldest daughter Hall Marquis, lately not yet brought out, but about to be brought out this year, seems in threading a wonderfully intricate German piece, with variations. Her science is consummate. No pains have been spared on her education; elaborately accomplished, she is formed to be the sympathising spouse of a wealthy statesman. Lady Montfort is seated by an elderly duchess, who is good-natured, and a great talker; near her are seated two middle-aged gentlemen, who have been conversing on the state of Europe, having cut in, turned dialogue into monologue.

"Linked music long drawn out,"

The elder of these two gentlemen is Mr. Carr Vipont, bold, with clipped parliamentary whiskers; valued himself on his talent for discussing but with a prettier precocse—looks a large-armed man. Carr Vipont has about £40,000 a year; has often refused office for himself, while taking care that other Viponts should have it; is a leading member of Committees; speaks very seldom, and on to great length, never arguing, merely stating his opinion, carries great weight with him, and as he votes, vote fifteen other members of the House of Vipont, before adjourning sittings. He can therefore turn divisions, and has decided to do so on the present occasion, a pleasant man, a little consequential, but the reverse of haughty—nay, unusually overbearing. The other gentleman, to whom he is listening, is our old acquaintance Colonel Alban Vipont Morley —Darrell's friend—Lucretia's friend—a man of importance, not inferior, indeed, to that of his kinsman Carr, in authority in club-rooms, an oracle in drawing-rooms, a luminous mass of the brain sociale. Alban Morley, a younger brother, had entered the army, distinguished himself, rose also, from the Guards with the rank of colonel, and on receiving a legacy from an old aunt, which, with that interest derived from the sum at which he sold his commission, allowed him a clear income of £1000 a year, he determined to come sufficed for all his wants, fine gentleman though he was, and retired with the full parliament—refused a high place in a public department. Single himself, he showed his repugnance for wedlock in the interest he took in the marriages of other people—just as East Wardwin, too wise to set up for himself, had a great passion for royalty by becoming the king-maker. Alban colonel was exceedingly accomplished, a very fair scholar, knew modern languages. In painting an amateur, in music a connoisseur; witty at times, and with a fund of dry humour, but thrifty in the expenditure of it; too wise to be known as a wit. Manly too, a daring rider, who had won many a fox's brush, a famous deer-stalker, and one of the few English gentlemen who still keep up the old sport of hawking—twice a week to be seen, full in hand, against all comers in Angela's rooms. This, well-shaped —not handsome—man of deer exercise. Far from it, but with an air so thoroughbred, that, had he seen him in the Park, the Duke of Wellington had a crush-room and a fops' alley—even him as either of those resorts, surrounded by elaborate dandies, and whose faultless toilets studies and beauty-men would have resented to you seconds—not vulgar, and yet not at all distinguished by that quiet form—plain in manner, plain in dress, plain in features, but you have said, "Yet, he is very distinguished it is to be so plain!" Knowing the great world from the cuss to the cuticle, and on this Christmas Eve, in social dignity and position, Colonel Morley was not calculating—not cunning—not scrupulous—but he was one of the more quick because its movements were straightforward. Intimate with the greatest, but sought, not seeking, he was a man of great importance. But when his advice was asked (even if advice necessitated the sacrifice of a fact) he was blunt candor. In fine, a man of such social reputation as rendered him an ornament and prop to the House of Vipont. He was the unexpected depths of intelligence and feeling which lay in the lower strata of his character to the world, to witness of some other one, and justified Darrell in commending a boy like Lionel Haughton to the Colonel's care and kind administrative counsels. The Colonel, like other men, had his weaknesses, if weakness it can indeed be to believed that the House of Vipont was not merely the Corinthian capital, but the embattled keep from moral decay, and the very first resistance extraordinaire reason of the British monarchy. He had put hose of his cousins to the test, and hence he did not provoke your spleen by enlarging on the manifold virtues of his kindred. Nor has he harmless jest against its members or even against its pretensions, but such seeming evidences of forbearance as to make those very pretensions to mitigate envy. His devotion to the House was not obtrusive. It was plainest to those of the House of Vipont for the sake of England, he loved England for the sake of the House of Vipont. Had he been pressed to name the circumstances reveral of the ordinary laws of nature, to dissociate the one from the other, from the cause of the House of Vipont, the Colonel would have said, "Save at least the Ark of the Constitution! and really none of the family could.

The Colonel had none of Guy Darrell's intimate friendship pride; he was not proud of his more pedigrees—much too liberal and enlightened for such obsolete projections. No! He knew the world as few men in its centre. Knew that old family and long pedigrees are of no use to a man if he has not the personal and real worth merit. But it was of use to a man to be a cousin of the House of Vipont through without any money, without any merit at all. It was of use to be part and parcel of a British institution; it was of use to have a hereditary interest and right to share in the administration and patronage of the empire, as the Crown is the fountain-head of "the sun never sets." You might want nothing for yourself—the Colonel and the Marquis equally wanted nothing for themselves; but man is not to be a selish egotist! Man has cousins—he has cousins over vast continents. Benevolent consciousness, in words that inflame every manly breast, the ancient Greek who does not love his Peleus or State, even though he take nothing from it but barren honor, and contribute toward it—a great many disagreeable taxes. As the Peleus to the Greek, was the House of Vipont to Alban Vipont Morley. It was the most beautiful touching affection imaginable! Nevertheless the House was in difficulties—whenever it was not in difficulties—a cousin—Colonel by his side, sparing no pains, neglecting no means, to get the Ark of the Constitution back into smooth water. That duty done, he retired again into private life, and scorned all other reward than the still whisper of applauding conscience.

"Yes," said Alban Morley, whose voice, though low and subdued in tone, was extremely distinct, with a perfect enunciation, "Yes, it is quite true, my nephew has taken orders—the defect in speech, if not quite irremediable, seems to be my obstacle, owes to eloquence; an oracular mission may not be sufficiently interesting, and when the right word comes, there is the chance of surprise in it. It is good that George has a deep and distinguished clergyman."

Mr. Cabin Vipront. "We want one—the House wants a very distinguished clergyman; we have some at the present—at the Commons not even a bishop; all mere parish parsons, and among them not one we could push. Very old, with more than forty sittings to his credit. He seems seldom take to the Church kindly—George must be pushed. There I think of it, the more we want a bishop; a bishop would be useful in the present crisis. (Looking round the rooms proudly, and informally.) Ah, Mr. Jacqueous gathering, Morley! This demonstration will strike terror in Downing-street—the Old House stands firm—never was a family so united; all here, I think—that is, all worth naming—all, except Sir James, whom Morley chooses to dislike, and George—and George comes to-morrow."

Colonel Morley. "You forget the most eminent of all our countercurrents—one he could indeed strike terror into Downing Street, were his voice to be heard again."

Cabin Vipront. "Whom do you mean? Ah, I know!—Guy Darrell. His wife was a Vipront —and he is not here. But he has not yet resigned to communicate with any of us—the only connection that ever fell away from the house of Vipront—especially as it is not in the present. Singular man! For all the use he is to us he might as well be dead, but he has a fine fortune—what will he do with it?"

The Duchess. "My dear lady Monfort, you have been quite silent with this subject."

Lady Monfort. "No, indeed. Hush! we are disturbing Mr. Cabin Vipront."

The Duchess, in awe of Carr Vipront, sinks her voice, and gobbles on—whisperously.

Cabin Vipront (resuming his speech). "A very fine fortune—what will he do with it?"

Colonel Morley. "I have never, but I had a letter from him some months ago."

Cabin Vipront. "You had—and never told me!"

Colonel Morley. "Of no importance to you, my dear Carr. In better times you indeed to me a charming young fellow—a kinsman of his own (no Vipront)—Lionel Haughton, son of poor Colonel Haughton. You may not remember."

Cabin Vipront. "Yes, a handsome scamp—went to the dogs. So Darrell takes up Charley's son—what's in his brief?"

Colonel Morley. "In his letter to me he anticipated that question in the negative."

Cabin Vipront. "Darrell may master business?"

Colonel Morley. "Not that I know of." Cabin Vipront. "Perhaps he will select one of his wife's family for his heir—a Vipront; I should not object."

Colonel Morley (dryly). "I should. But why pay my Darrell any regard? I always thought he would—I think so still."

Cabin Vipront (glancing toward his own daughter Edmund). "Well, a wife well-chosen might restore him to society, and to us. Fitly, indeed, that a man should be cut off from us somehow. So you think Darrell will marry again? A remarkably fine-looking fellow when I last saw him; not old yet; I dare say well-preserved. I wish I had thought of asking him here—Montfort!" (Lady Monfort, who, in her two male friends, was passing by toward a billiard-room, paused.) "Montfort, you are about the regular suite)—Montfort! only think, we forgot to invite Guy Darrell. Is it too late before our party breaks up?"

Lord Montfort (coldly). "I don't choose Guy Darrell to be invited to my house."

Carr Vipront was literally stunned by a reply so contumacious. Lord Montfort dense at with Carr Vipront suggested all the respect due to their his senses.

"Not choose, my dear Montfort! you are joking. A monstrous clever fellow, Guy Darrell, and at this crisis—"

"I hate clever fellows—no such bores!" said Lord Montfort, breaking from the caressing clasp of Carr Vipront, and passing on.

"Spare your regrets, my dear Carr," said Colonel Morley, "Guy Darrell is not in England —I rather believe he is in Vevona."

The Colonel sauntered toward the group gathered round the piano. Adelaide had risen when Lady Monfort escaped from the Duchess, and, mingling courteously with her brother guests, found herself close to Colonel Morley. "Will you give me my revenge at chess?" she asked, with her rare smile. The Colonel was charmed. As they sat down and ranged their men, Lady Monfort remarked, carelessly—

"I overheard you say you had lately received a letter from Mr. Darrell. Does he write as well —cheerful? You remember we used to like much with his daughter, much in his house, when I was a child. He was ever most kind to me." Lady Monfort's voice here faltered.

He writes with no reference to himself, his health or his spirits. But his young kinsman described him to me as in good health—wonderfully young-looking for his years. But cheerful—no! Darrell and I entered the world together—we were friends as much as a man so busy and so eminent as he could be friends with a man like myself—indolent by habit, and oblivious out of Mayfair. I know his nature; we are not correspondents. Why should we be? We can not be happy! Impossible!—alone—childless—secluded." Poor Darrell, shrouded now; in the tomb, "as Hamlet at port"; but fiction does not stand alone in this. How very many books are dry, hard records—how absolutely rabid among us is the drivelling reading of the people of Africa—the wildest schemes! Dear County Guy, as we used to call him, how much more sad his might have been! Don't let us talk of him, he makes me nervous!" There I think of it, the more we want a bishop; a bishop would be useful in the present crisis. (Looking round the rooms proudly, and informally.) Ah, Mr. Jacqueous gathering, Morley! This demonstration will strike terror in Downing-street—the Old House stands firm—never was a family so united; all here, I think—that is, all worth naming—all, except Sir James, whom Morley chooses to dislike, and George—and George comes to-morrow."

Colonel Morley. "You forget the most eminent of all our countercurrents—one he could indeed strike terror into Downing Street, were his voice to be heard again."

Cabin Vipront. "Whom do you mean? Ah, I know!—Guy Darrell. His wife was a Vipront —and he is not here. But he has not yet resigned to communicate with any of us—the only connection that ever fell away from the house of Vipront—especially as it is not in the present. Singular man! For all the use he is to us he might as well be dead, but he has a fine fortune—what will he do with it?"

The Duchess. "My dear lady Monfort, you have been quite silent with this subject."

Lady Monfort. "No, indeed. Hush! we are disturbing Mr. Cabin Vipront."

The Duchess, in awe of Carr Vipront, sinks her voice, and gobbles on—whisperously.

Cabin Vipront (resuming his speech). "A very fine fortune—what will he do with it?"

Colonel Morley. "I have never, but I had a letter from him some months ago."

Cabin Vipront. "You had—and never told me!"

Colonel Morley. "Of no importance to you, my dear Carr. In better times you indeed to me a charming young fellow—a kinsman of his own (no Vipront)—Lionel Haughton, son of poor Colonel Haughton. You may not remember."

Cabin Vipront. "Yes, a handsome scamp—went to the dogs. So Darrell takes up Charley's son—what's in his brief?"

Colonel Morley. "In his letter to me he anticipated that question in the negative."

Cabin Vipront. "Darrell may master business?"

Colonel Morley. "Not that I know of."

Cabin Vipront. "Perhaps he will select one of his wife's family for his heir—a Vipront; I should not object."

Colonel Morley (dryly). "I should. But why pay my Darrell any regard? I always thought he would—I think so still."

Cabin Vipront (glancing toward his own daughter Edmund). "Well, a wife well-chosen might restore him to society, and to us. Fitly, indeed, that a man should be cut off from us somehow. So you think Darrell will marry again? A remarkably fine-looking fellow when I last saw him; not old yet; I dare say well-preserved. I wish I had thought of asking him here—Montfort!" (Lady Monfort, who, in her two male friends, was passing by toward a billiard-room, paused.) "Montfort, you are about the regular suite)—Montfort! only think, we forgot to invite Guy Darrell. Is it too late before our party breaks up?"

Lord Montfort (coldly). "I don't choose Guy Darrell to be invited to my house."

Carr Vipront was literally stunned by a reply so contumacious. Lord Montfort dense at with Carr Vipront suggested all the respect due to their his senses.

"Not choose, my dear Montfort! you are joking. A monstrous clever fellow, Guy Darrell, and at this crisis—"

"I hate clever fellows—no such bores!" said Lord Montfort, breaking from the caressing clasp of Carr Vipront, and passing on.

"Spare your regrets, my dear Carr," said Colonel Morley, "Guy Darrell is not in England —I rather believe he is in Vevona."

The Colonel sauntered toward the group gathered round the piano. Adelaide had risen when Lady Monfort escaped from the Duchess, and, mingling courteously with her brother guests, found herself close to Colonel Morley. "Will you give me my revenge at chess?" she asked, with her rare smile. The Colonel was charmed. As they sat down and ranged their men, Lady Monfort remarked, carelessly—

"I overheard you say you had lately received a letter from Mr. Darrell. Does he write as well —cheerful? You remember we used to like much with his daughter, much in his house,

Do not be afraid of fancy. Do not imagine that an eternal separation exists between the beautiful and the true; that all that is graceful and lovely, touching and affecting in the literature of our language—or of other languages—is in any degree less worth the having than stern truth. Do not run there for novels, poets, and novelists, and dramatists. Do not imagine (one of the greatest of fictions!) that these are merely to be regarded as playthings, put to pass a little leisure time. A fiction may do us far more good than a fact. There are times (there have been in my own life) when it is quite true that fiction has produced much that is unmistakable reality—that is worth absolutely nothing but its intrinsic paper; but fiction does not stand alone in this. How very many books are dry, hard records—how absolutely rabid among us is the drivelling reading of the people of Africa—the wildest schemes! Dear County Guy, as we used to call him, how much more sad his might have been! Don't let us talk of him, he makes me nervous!" There I think of it, the most painful subjects upon principle."

Lady Monfort. "Nonsense—you will not talk of him!" The Queen's pawn. No, you will not talk of him—no?"

The Queen moves, and the Colonel was within three moves of checkmating his adversary. Forgetting the resolution uttered in the heat of the pursuit, and seemed despondently meditating a hopeless defense—

"Pray, my dear cousin, what makes Montfort dislike my old friend Darrell?"

"Dislike! Does he? I don't know. Vanquished again, Colonel Morley!" She rose; and, as he restored the chessmen to their box, he heard her murmur to herself, in a tone—

"This young kinsman—will he not be a competitor to Mr. Darrell?"

"He would be a confidant and a pride to a father; but to Darrell, so distant a kinsman—a stranger—why not?" Why not? A principle for him, that is all. A very gentlemanlike young man—graceful, fluent by nature, polished in polish and knowledge of life. When he comes back he must enter society; I have put his name up at the clubs—may I introduce him?"

Lady Monfort hesitated, and, after a pause, said, almost inaudibly—

She left the Colonel, slightly shrugging his shoulders, and passed into the billiard-room with a quick step. Seven or eight persons were there, looking at the players. Lord Monfort was chalking his cue. His wife stood close and straight up to him; her color was heightened; her lip was quivering; she placed her hand on his shoulder with a timid familiarity. It seemed as if she had come there to seek him from an impulse of sudden fear. He looked round, and, muttering kindness of voice, "If he had been successful!" and called him by his Christian name. Lord Montfort's countenance became merely apathetic, now assumed an expression of extreme displeasure. "I wish to teach you to make a carom, I suppose!" he said, muttering, and turning from her, contemplated the balls and studied the carom.

"Father in my way, Lady Montfort," said the player, looking up, and laughing as he spoke.

Lady Monfort's countenance became still more flushed. She turned, mowed, and retreated to the drawing-room, and for the rest of the evening was unconsciously animated, gracious, fascinating. As she moved with her host guests for the night, she looked round, saw Colonel Morley, and said, in a low voice, to him—

"Your nephew comes here to-morrow," said she, "my old playfellow; impossible quite to forget old friends—good-night."

Miscellany.

READING.

A taste for reading is not only important, but necessary, to all intellectual beings. It is impossible to overestimate its advantages. The question is not what it can do, but what is there it can not do? It is the key which opens every door in the temple of learning. It is an armor of defense against the atrocity of ignorance and the vanity of superficial knowledge. It is a powerful weapon from degradation, and a refuge free from interruption.

The great men of all ages have been great readers. They employed a person to be always reading to them while at their meals, and in the evening. He made extracts from the comments of Tacitus. "Cæsar," he says, "in his book on grammar is not so afford something valuable. Cicero read with a pen in his hand for the purpose of making quotations. It is unnecessary to enumerate instances of this kind, for they form an integral part in the life of every celebrated man.

Books have been prized by the wisest and best of mankind even in the most dangerous times, when there are bad books as well as good books, and the choice of books is as important as a taste for reading. The materials for miscellaneous reading are so multifarious, that it is difficult to show how to select, and what to read. The Bible is first on my with Lord Bacon, "There seemeth to be a superiority of books. But shall no more be made, for I make answer that the Scriptures, as the Author of Heaven, may do over the serpents of the enchanters." In our books, we should select such as these which furnish facts and fancies, sanctified by religion and purified by morality. Facts in history, and the philosophy founded on those facts; facts in political economy, and the science built on those facts; facts in natural philosophy, and the science defined from those facts; facts in philology, and the history and diversities of language; facts in astronomy and the sublime and magnificent discoveries and theories of their original proportions—but freely selected as such. But do not confine study only to hard facts.

Lord Bacon, or Lord Bacon's index-maker, uttered the aphorism, Knowledge is power. The aphorism is true, but not entirely true. Let us add, "Wisdom is strength"), and perhaps a great deal of the knowledge which is power was valuable, and worth being no man's indefensible possession, if, belonged neither to Solomon, nor to Bacon, nor the index-maker, but to every body. Who discovered it first is of no particular importance.

That knowledge is power, does not of course stand good in every case; the aphorism is of general application. Thus a man knows letters, and by that means he becomes the possessor of much the friend and companion of all the great men whose writings are preserved in the language he understands. Every new acquisition of a foreign tongue gives him an introduction to those foreign worthies whose books are untranslated, and makes him grow more intimate with those who have been "done" into his native tongue. Again, a knowledge of the elements of nature, their properties, and characteristics, and their action on each other, gives him the ability to command them in his service —to harness their four ancient coursers, fire, water, earth, and air, to the car of his inventive genius.

Knowledge is power in another sense—with the money-maker, to wit. He whose speculations are the result of careful thought and deep research of information is scarcely to be considered a speculator after all. A neophyte on 'Change, with the learning of all the schools in his head, but not the school of life, would be at the mercy of the jobbers. A man of the world, with his eyes and things, is the grand secret of success in commercial enterprises. Such knowledge is power—the power of accumulating wealth and building a fortune.

In any way you please the aphorism is true—true of the sawyer holding his battery, of the statesman in his political schemes, of the speculator in his dashing enterprises, of the murderer compassing his base purpose, of the lady with her chariot outwitting the prisoner—of all, every where.

FATAL EFFECT OF SOUND.

Great noises, or violent concussions of the air, such as those produced by large cannon or loud thunder, produce sufficiently most astounding, and, in some instances, overwhelming effects on men and animals. Brocster relates that when peace was proclaimed at London in 1697, two cannon were were dismounted and drawn up in line, in order to fire their volleys. Opposite to the centre of the line was the door of a butcher's shop, where there was a mastiff dog of great courage. This dog was chained by the leg; but when the first volley was fired, it immediately started up, ran into another room, and died in the course of a few days. On the firing of the second volley the dog rose, ran several times over the room trembling violently, and apparently in great agony. When the third volley was fired, the dog ran about once or twice with great fury, and was instantly felt quite dead, throwing up blood from its mouth and nose.

FACES.

There is a great deal in a face; all the interest of life depends on face. It is a difficult thing to imagine how we should do without faces; we have no faculty for doing things without faces. In fact: there is not one man in a thousand, save and except the mere animal, who can do without the face of a lamb, it has such a pretty innocent face; but oysters are slaughtered remorselessly, wrenched out of their shells without the slightest compunction: they have no faces, though they have beards; and as for cows, they utter never a word, whilst in no mournful countenance—and therefore they are not pitied. As a proof of hypocrisy in all our pity for negroes, all we ever procure is tracts, and all our anti-cruelty crotchets—it is nothing more or less—extend to the lobster. The consideration of the big drops coursing each other down the stag's face, as he is pursued to ancient disease and death, had such faces as mermaids, there is not a fish-wife at Billingsgate who would dare to skin eel; but mermaids have no masculine faces and so attack all both cats, that nobody pities them. What a pathetic face the monkey has, and yet how few turn to the body of the murdered Caesar, when he says,

"Over thy wounds now do I prophesy,
Which like dumb mouths do ope their ruby lips!"

Here is a metaphor of face, bringing to the hearer the most touching of the countenance of one wounded even to death. It was from flattering, recognized or not, of the universal sympathy with face, that led Shakespeare to the adoption of this metaphor, and it tells well. Ovid's bleeding trees excite very little more sympathy than a skinned sheep—certainly not more than a squeaking lobster—they want face. Gorrick was the man to show the world what could be done with face. He was one of the few who ought to act without a mask.

COCKNOACHES ON BOARD SHIP.

The Red Sea water is hotter than the ocean, and the steamers are renowned for cockroaches, animals—as they are called among ladies who have written a book upon India—not very different from the generation of domestic ills: "The transparent character of the cabin and its partitions allows indecorous and conversations sometimes to be overheard; for instance, a lady, on board the Cleopatra, I'm certain I heard something crawling." No wonder—George being in the land of Nod. "George, louder, 'yes you sleep!' Here's a cockroach, I'll kill him, shall I, do get up and kill it?" Some sleepy towel remonstrance, and then further talk. "George, I'll never love you any more if you don't actually look for that cockroach." And, on no response being made to this terrible threat of never-ending and lamentation causes of ever having left her dear mamma—and, in short, the whole history which we doubt's cure if she is happy or miserable.

DE GENTLE.

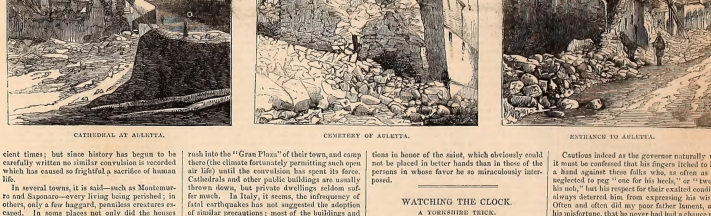
He ever gentle with his maiden God bless them; watch over them constantly; reprove them earnestly, but not in anger. In the forcible language of the Scriptures, "Be not bitter unto them." "Yes, they are good boys," I once heard a father say, "but—" I fails to them very much, but do not like to hear my children—the world will beat them." It was a beautiful thought, though the father himself was ignorant. For, if we make child in the circle round the table, healthful and happy, and the world will be the same, if long enough spared, the storm will not fear. Adversity may wither them, sickness may fade, a cold world may frown on them, but amidst all let memory carry them back to a home where the law of kindness reigned, where the master's repressing eye was moistened with a tear, and the father frowned "more in sorrow than in anger."

LYING.

"It is more from carelessness about truth," said Johnson, "than from intention; I fear that there is so much falsehood in the world."

EAST PORTION OF VIGUILLA. RUINS OF ITO. MONASTERY OF ST. FRANCIS.

THE EARTHQUAKE AT NAPLES.



THE nine illustrations which accompany this article were forwarded to the Illustrated London News in the shape of photographs; they may, therefore, be assumed to be correct representations of the terrible ravages which have been committed by the late earthquakes in the kingdom of Naples.

No such earthquake, or rather series of earthquakes, has been known in Europe within the last thousand years; nor, perhaps, has any ever occurred which occasioned so terrible a loss of human life. Our Central American earthquakes—such as the one which destroyed the city of San Salvador four years ago—were terrible, certainly. But when one realizes that between thirty and forty thousand human beings perished in the Naples earthquake, our American catastrophes sink into insignificance. We have no record of the amount of life sacrificed by the earthquakes of antediluvian times; but since history has begun to be carefully written no similar convulsion is recorded which has caused so frightful a sacrifice of human life.

In several towns, it is said—such as Montemurro and Saponara—every living being perished; in others, only a few haggard, penniless creatures escaped. In some places not only did the houses and walls crumble to pieces, crushing every one who was exposed, but the earth gaped, and those who escaped the crush of falling masonry were ingulfed, and perished miserably when the yawning cleft was closed by the force which opened it.

The usual physical operation of an earthquake is best described by the word "earth-wave." The earth undulates; a wave, like a wave of the sea, passes over it, alternately raising and depressing the surface. The rate at which this wave travels has been estimated, on scientifically ascertained phenomena, at 1000 miles an hour. But the wave is but one of the phenomena of earthquakes. The sudden openings and rents in the soil, the convulsive shocks, the periodical trembling—none of these can be distinctly referred to the wave-like motion. During the late earthquake in the kingdom of Naples, persons who had escaped from the first terrible shock were overwhelmed by a second convulsion in the act of gathering up their property from the ruins.

In Central America, and those parts of South America which are exposed to earthquakes, the houses are built with a view to withstand such freaks of Nature. They are all one story high. The walls, which are very far apart, are wonderfully thick, in many cases four to six feet at the base, and gradually narrowing toward the roof. There are no narrow streets; wide squares abound. When the people of Guatemala or San Salvador note premonitory symptoms of a storm such they was, however—to the priests tell us—well, hearty, and lively when she was dug out. In reply to an inquiry as to how she had subsisted during her three weeks' subterranean sojourn, she replied that a baby in black had appeared unto her and fed her on bread and water. The profane critic may cavil at the diet, and wonder why the saint did not treat the poor girl to something better, as evidently canvas-back duck and Lacrima Christi could have been had at the price, the whole operation being supernatural; but in such matters profane cavilers must be frowned down. St. Januarv has figured on two or three occasions. Very fat and rosy monks have appeared and confessed that they had been ten or twelve days under ground, with the ruins of a cathedral resting on the small of their back, and a chapel or two on the nape of their neck; but, thanks to St. Januarv! they rather enjoyed the excitement, and were none the worse. Pious persons have acknowledged the miracle by contributions in honor of the saint, which obviously could not be placed in better hands than in those of the persons in whose favor he so miraculously interposed.

CATHEDRAL AT AULETTA. CEMETERY OF AULETTA. ENTRANCE TO AULETTA.

WATCHING THE CLOCK.

A FORBIDDEN TRICK.

ABOUT ten years ago the grand national and provincial steeple-chases took place at York, and three very gentleman-like and well-dressed strangers came as far as Little Studdington, and put up at my father's house, "The Angler's Rest." They went into town, and returned from it every day in our four-wheel during the week; and when the races were over, they were so enamored of the snug little house and its capital accommodation, that they remained with us a fortnight, eating and drinking of the best, and always delighted to see the old gentleman at their dinner-table. I think I can see my respected parent now, as he was wont to sit upon the extreme edge of his well-polished chair, in rapt astonishment at their fashionable conversation. If they happened to mention an absent friend under the rank of a baronet, it was in a sort of apologetic tone—their connections being so exclusively aristocratic. Good society was my poor father's weakness; and never having been familiar with the turf himself, his sense of the excellences of our nobility was quite overwhelming. The three friends were wont to play at cards after dinner for pretty large sums; and the games which seemed best to suit their elegant but eccentric taste was that of triangular critchago. My father was a capital hand at this, and easily perceived that they were but indifferent performers; but they never dreamed of asking him to cut in, although one or other of them would often request his advice at an important crisis.

Cautious indeed as the governor naturally was, it must be confessed that his fingers itched to hold a hand against these folks who, as often as not, neglected to peg "one for his heels," or "two for his nob," but his respect for their exalted condition always deterred him from expressing his wishes. Often and often did my poor father lament, after his misfortune, that he never had had a chance with the cards; but my belief is, that had he ventured upon such a thing, these unskilled gentry would have very rapidly improved in their play, and would have won his shirt off his back if they had played long enough.

One afternoon, when they had dined as usual, early, and before the cards were produced, their conversation turned upon wagers: how Lord Clickclack had won ten thousand pounds by being dumb for a day: how the Duke of Oxfordshire had backed himself to walk from Pall-mall to Bond Street on a levee morning without opening his eyes; and of the ingenious device of his antagonist, the Marquis of Luxall, in driving over him in a Hansom cab until he did so; with many other anecdotes of the aristocracy not included in the collection of Mr. Burke.

RUINS AT ATENA. RUINS AT POTENZA. STREET IN FABOLA.

"This sort of thing is much harder than it appears to be," observed one of the three gentlemen. "Now I will lay ten pounds that no man keeps himself in one position and counts the ticks of that great clock, for instance, for a whole hour."

"How do you mean?" exclaimed my father, greatly interested.

"Why, that no man can sit in a chair—your chair, for instance—facing the clock, and wag his head from right to left as Old Time with the scythe yonder is wagging, for the space of an hour, and never say any words but 'Here she comes, and there she goes,' as the clock says."

"You bet ten pounds that I don't do that?" cried the governor.

"Not with you," replied the other, coolly; "I don't want to win your money, my good man. I will bet either of my two friends that they do not do it."

"Nay," said one of them, "'tis easy enough; but I would not bother myself with such a thing for twice the money. I don't see," added he, "why you should not give our good Boniface a chance, either."

"Do, pray do!" cried my father, who was perhaps the most stolid man in the world, and could have sat six hours doing any thing he was told to do without any inconvenience. "I'll bet you."

So, rather against his will, as it seemed, he who had proposed the conditions agreed to make the wager.

My father was then placed in his chair immediately opposite the clock; the stakes on either side were placed upon the table within his view; he was warned that every means would be resorted to short of laying hands upon him to induce him to look away, or say any thing besides the words agreed upon; and as the clock struck four the old gentleman's head had begun to wag, "Here she comes, and there she goes," and "Here she comes, and there she goes," very slowly and solemnly, keeping time with the pendulum.

"He'll lose," cried one of the gentlemen.

"Certain to lose," replied another, laughing. "Hallo, old chap, there goes your window-pane!"

There was a crash of breaking glass, that made the governor wince again, but he did not alter his position a hairbreadth, or desist one quarter of a tick from his monotonous task. Some of the particular china which then ornamented our oaken shelves next came down with a run; but its owner's face only turned a little pale, as he thought what step-mother would say about it. "Here she comes, and there she goes," was all it drew from him.

His antagonist seemed now to have given up the destructive plan as a failure.

"I say, Boniface," cried he, "I am going to put the stakes in my pocket—I am;" and suiting the action to the word, he swept off the two ten-pound notes into his waistcoat before the governor's own eyes.

A shadow of anxiety flitted for an instant across my parent's brow, but "Here she comes, and there she goes," was all that torture itself would at that time have wrung from him. Ten minutes of the terrible ordeal had already passed."

"Boniface," observed the sporting gentleman with feeling, "we must now part. My friends and myself have passed a pleasant time at Little Studdington, but our visit is now at an end. One of us has just gone out to order the four-wheel; and by rapid driving, we shall just catch the express train to London. In anticipation of this position of affairs, our little articles are already packed and ready to be placed under the seat. Receive, my dear Sir, the assurances of our consideration. I wish that we had any thing else to offer you in return for your very genial hospitality; this ten-pound note of yours will remind us, be assured, of your kindness, until the day when it shall be spent. I would that the terms of our little wager permitted us to shake you by the hand. Unlucky it is, too, that we start from the back-door, so that you will be unable, of course, to see the very last of us. In forty minutes about you will be released from this irksome task, and we ourselves shall be at York, Boniface. Heaven bless you! What! not a word at parting?"

"Here she comes, and there she goes," cried the governor, stoutly, but suffused with a cold perspiration.

"Yes, here she comes," repeated the sporting gentleman derisively, as the sound of wheels made itself to be distinctly heard from the back; "and there she will go in about a minute: she is a fast mare."

He closed the door, and the governor was left alone with the broken window, and the smashed china, and the infernal pendulum, repeating his prescribed formula with the utmost constancy, but with an anxious expression of countenance.

To him presently entered my maternal step-parent, who is of a suspicious temperament. "Whatever have you been about, John, to let them chaps go away without any one to drive Polly, and at such a pace as— Goodness gracious, the china! What has happened? Rachel, Betty, Dick!" screamed she, "what has come to your poor father? Do but look at him! Speak to us, John!"

"Here she comes, and there she goes," murmured the governor, sadly, and swaying himself slowly from side to side like a mandarin.

I shall never forget the scene as long as I live: I laughed until I could stand up no longer, and then I lay down on the floor and laughed there. The indignation that was thrown into the old gentleman's tones as he pursued his terrible task only made the matter ten times more ridiculous.

"He is mad, stark staring mad!" cried my step-mother, as she laid her hand upon his shoulder.

"Here she comes, and there she goes," exclaimed my father irascibly, as with one well-directed blow of his elbow he tumbled the old lady upon the floor.

Then I really thought he had gone mad, and went to get a rope to tie his arms; only the foam flew from his lips—he was in that passion of rage—that I did not dare come near him when I had got it. We sent for the policeman, therefore, and of course we sent for the doctor; and presently they both arrived, and were as astonished as we were to see what was taking place.

"When did this fit come on him?" asked the medical man, as the clock struck five.

"Here she comes, and there she goes," yelled the governor, starting up from his chair. "Where are those three thieves? They have robbed me of ten pounds, and board, and horse-hire, and lodging for fifteen days and a half." (He had been calculating all this, poor fellow! in case they should have really gone away, while he was repeating his foolish sentences.) "Ride after them—ride!"

Alas! we did ride, but we never came up with them. They had left our Polly at the station in the four-wheel, but they were off nobody knows where. We found out only, long afterward, that our visitors were three of the London swell-mob, who had been warned out of York by the detectives during the race week, to which circumstance we had been of course indebted for their patronage. My poor father never held up his head again: the jockey-boys were always wagging theirs whenever they saw him, and crying out: "Here she comes, and there she goes," until he was driven into his grave.

It is a sad story from beginning to end; but now that I have fairly published it, I feel that there is something off my mind. There will be no need for futile attempts upon my part to conceal this disgrace to my family any more. And perhaps, after all, one of the reasons why I am so "up to the time of day" myself—as we say in Yorkshire—is because of the warning that was afforded to me in my poor father's watching the clock.

A RESURRECTIONIST STORY.

Dr. Monkton was a physician; and was so far advanced in fortune and reputation as to be able to retire for four months every year into the country, and leave his practice and his patients to be ready for his return. There was a very romantic story attached to him, which, looking at his red face and considering his precise, old bachelor habits, one would not have suspected. But there was something when one knew him better, which seemed to intimate that he might have gone through trying scenes and hours. It might be fancy, however, for he never said one word on the subject, and, intimate as I have been with him, I never dared inquire how much of the things reported was true and how much false.

The tale was this: When he was quite a young man, and only beginning to make some little progress and money in his profession, it was said that the strange chance had happened to him to revive the apparently dead body of a subject brought to him, he knew not whence, for dissection. Whether this part of the story was really true, or had been adopted to account for subsequent circumstances, I can not tell. Certain it is, that the knowledge and belief of the story grew up with me, and it was very long before I thought of doubting it. What further is certain, is, that all the few friends he had at that time remembered a most beautiful woman who lived with him, and whom he declared to be his wife, but few believed her to be so. A profound mystery hung over her, none ever hearing of father or mother, or former friend of any kind. It was not many, indeed, who had the opportunity of inquiring, for not above two or three persons were ever admitted intimately to their house. The name by which he called her was Umbra. Whether it was a fictitious name or a real one he would not say. The report which these persons made of her was, that she was exquisitely lovely; but as far as intercourse went, little better than some warm marble to which Dr. Monkton had given a dose of the elixir of life. The story goes, that, like those Athenians who recovered from the plague, all trace of her former existence had been erased from her memory by the illness which had consigned her to the grave, and that she retained neither any recollection of past events, nor, except the use of language, any trace of what knowledge she might formerly have acquired. However that might be, Monkton loved her better than every clever and learned creature of the earth, and during the years of their connection he gave his friends the idea of a man who has one sole interest forever present to his imagination.

It was about two years after it first became known that this beautiful shadow inhabited his house, that a merchant, who had a tolerably intimate acquaintance with Dr. Monkton, returned from abroad, and chanced to be admitted to the presence of his shadowy inmate. He seemed wonderfully struck by her, and afterward told Dr. Monkton that if he had not seen his own wife in the tomb he could not but have believed that she and this beautiful creature were the same. Monkton repelled the idea with an indignation for which there seemed to his friend no cause; but the cause, I suppose, was the frightful fear that it was true. She, however, was wholly unmoved at sight of the stranger, and this comforted Dr. Monkton a little, and prevented him from taking any steps for the absolute exclusion of Provost, for so was the young merchant named. Provost, for his part, desired nothing more than to come frequently to the house, and indulge the pleasure he felt in looking at the image of one whom he had lost in the height of love and youth; and at last, unlike any other of their acquaintance, came alone, and in the morning, and succeeded in getting admitted to the presence of the mistress of the house, even when the master was absent. Dr. Monkton learned this with some displeasure, and forbade the continuance of his visits. Umbra was willing, nay, seemed glad to concur in the prohibition, and Monkton informed his friend that the arrangements of his very small and secluded establishment prevented him from receiving guests, except when invited.

His friend thought him jealous, and acquiesced; but it excited rather than discouraged him, and he sought every occasion to elude the prohibition. A few days after it had been given, he made some pretext for calling in the evening, and succeeded in establishing himself in the little drawing-room. Here he endeavored to talk to the lovely shadow more than was the custom of Monkton's guests. It was necessary for him to bear the chief burden of the conversation, for he got few words from her, and almost fewer looks; and, in order to keep conversation alive, he told anecdotes and described scenes, to which she gave a mere passive attention.

"I was walking," said he, "with only one person along the edge of the cliff I have described to you. The sea was many hundred feet below us; the precipice went sheer down to its brink. On a sudden a great layer of the rock seemed to unjoint itself from the rest, and a rent yawned between the ledge we stood on and the main mass of the mountain. My companion sprang into my arms. I feel her now."

"Oh, no, no!" cried Umbra. "That is a dream. I know it is a dream. Don't speak; but is not it a dream?"

At Umbra's voice, at her most unusual manner, Dr. Monkton started up, and then ran to her, and received her in his arms.

"Oh, Monkton, I can not bear to hear any body else talk of that dream. It seems to become real again. His foot slipped just on the very edge!"

"O God! who told you that?" cried Provost, in the most vehement agitation.

She looked up, and full at him, when she heard these tones of his voice, screamed aloud, and shrank into Monkton's bosom, pressing her hands on her forehead. Provost was no less agitated. He would have seized her hands; but she turned away from him with such agony of fear that life seemed unable to support it, and, gathering herself closer into Monkton's bosom, she fainted like one dead.

He carried her from the room, and would suffer no one to hear the words of reviving consciousness from her lips. But from this moment he could no longer repress the idea that Umbra had been the wife of this man. Yet he did not allow it to separate her interest from his. The grave itself had given her to him. He had devoted all the affections of his soul to her. Any right to claim her by another he cast off as a weak pretense, which, if she should urge, would be mere proof that she loved another better than she did him. This was the idea that people said haunted him, and, in the fury of his jealousy and his love, he made it the sole question between himself and Umbra. She, in the mean time, with purer instincts, saw the same idea very differently. With her it was a wandering notion, which terrified her like some dreadful phantom. Her love for Monkton had absorbed every faculty that remained to her, and whatever interfered with it was terrible to her imagination. When a dark and doubtful sense of duty, then, came between her and him, it was repelled by all the efforts of her will. And yet at times it seemed to overshadow her in a shape which she was not able to drive away. She was frightened at herself when happiest in his presence, and he was vehement with her in proportion to his adoration and his jealousy.

Provost, in the mean time, became aware of the misery which had grown up in the house of his friend, and knew that he himself was the cause. The extreme beauty of Umbra, and her resemblance to his wife, moved him strongly to compassion and interest; and, firmly believing that she was not the wife of Monkton, he felt but little scruple, when he learned how she was now treated, in endeavoring to induce her voluntarily to quit her present home for his. A horrible wavering notion seems to have possessed her that Provost had a right to command her to do so. Then, again, she lost sight of it, and only a vague idea that she was to be cast off by Monkton darkened her imagination.

When Monkton learned from her own lips the struggle she was enduring, the last hold upon his passions gave way. They broke that hour over their boundaries, and spread their own ruin around them. In his madness he himself hurried her from the house, and led her to Provost's door. There he furiously rang, and, hearing some one running to open it, he started away like the wind, and, rushing into his own desolate house, locked himself in his room, and neither answered nor summoned the frightened servant who beheld his return.

It was a winter night of tempest, but there was no fire nor light in Monkton's room. He was not heard to stir from the moment he entered it; and the servant who watched a little while at his chamber-door, and once or twice knocked timidly, was fain to retire at last, and conceal her fears for her master in her still greater awe of him. Morning came, and she once more tried to obtain an answer; but all was silent within his room. After a few more moments, however, she had forgotten her awe of him, on beholding an object of yet greater terror. She screamed his name in a voice which prevailed over his passions. It made him spring up, unbolt the lock, and the door was thrust open as he did so by the trembling servant. She dragged him to the step of the entrance, and there lay the dead Umbra, frozen to death. No doubt she had followed him in his flight, and had not attempted to enter, since he had driven her away, and had sat down and died on the step. Monkton took her up in his arms, and for three days he never loosed the dead body, not though the dreadful taint of corruption spread over it. At the end of that time his brain reeled, and his strength wavered. His arms, in spite of himself, gave way to force; she was taken from him, and he sank into a stupor from which it was long before he recovered.

A short outbreak of remorse followed, and then he shut up her name in silence as profound as the grave which a second time held her. He made no confident; he gave no detail. One journey he took as soon as he was released from the restraint to which his temporary alienation of reason had reduced him, and at that time he was too much absorbed in his own feelings to care whether he was observed or not. They thought he intended to open the tomb of Umbra, and see her with his own eyes in the last resting-place. They watched him, but he did not go there. He went to the vault where the wife of Provost was recorded on the marble to lie, and caused the lid of the coffin to be lifted which bore her name. The lid was lifted, and the coffin was an empty one.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

The following is a copy of a barber's sign in Green Street, Albany:

CAPILLIARY ABRIDGER
AND TONSORIAL OPERATOR.

"Don't you know that some people are always taking offense at something; construing every slight into an affront, every doubtful word into an insult? They are like one of my carriage-horses. He has a bad habit of shying. Sambo, the coachman, was driving them the other day, and the horse displaying his bad trick, the mistress in the carriage expressed her fears that the horse was unsafe. 'Don't be afeared, Missus,' says Sambo, 'there's no danger; this 'ere horse is always looking out for an insult!'"

"Have you any thing like cheese here?" shouted a wagoner, as he halted his team in front of Joe Baird's store. "Yes, Sir-ee!" shouted Joe, in reply; "we have some tallow, very much like it!"

Female Employment.—"We see that there is an agitation to employ women in the business of watchmaking, which is said to be beautifully adapted for the delicacy of their pretty little fingers. We highly approve of this employment of female hands; for there is probably not even a surly old bachelor who, having recovered from a long illness, would not be too happy to admit that women (Heaven bless them!) are at all times, but more especially in moments of sickness and danger, the very best watchers in the world!"—The Hermit of the Haymarket.

The Parentage of Joking.—It's a wise joke indeed that knows its own father.

Doctor Chapman, of Philadelphia, whose wit was equal to his medicine, having been invited by a friend, more eminent for a love of show than for real literary attainments, to examine his newly fitted-up library, was asked how he liked the taste displayed. He looked round upon the gorgeous crimson curtains, the rich mahogany cases, and dark maroon paper and carpets, and then, with his peculiar comical expression and nasal voice, replied, "Every thing read (red) but the books."

A three-year-old boy of ours has a new pair of boots with red tops. A friend was teasing him, saying he would take them at night. "No!" says Ned; "I put 'em in the bed." "But I will take them out!" says the friend. "No, can't do it; I seep in the middle!"

Paddy in the Witness-Box.—A certain witness, in an action for assault and battery, mixed things up considerably in giving his account of the affair. After relating how Dennis came to him and struck him, he proceeded: "So, yer honor, I just hauled off and wiped his jaw. Just then his dog cum along, and I hit him again." "Hit the dog?" "No, yer honor; hit Dennis. And then I up wid a stun and throwed it at him, and it rolled him over and over." "Threw a stone at Dennis?" "At the dog, yer honor. And he got up and hit me again." "The dog?" "No, Dennis. And wid that he stuck his tail betwixt his legs and run off." "Dennis?" "No, the dog. And when he came back at me, he got me down and pounded me, yer honor." "The dog came back at you?" "No, Dennis, yer honor; and he isn't hurt any at all." "Who isn't hurt?" "The dog, yer honor."

A fellow was convicted of arson, the penalty of which crime was imprisonment for life. Upon being called up for sentence, he was asked by the Judge the usual question as to what he had to say why the sentence of the law should not be passed upon him. "Nothing, your honor," replied he, "but to ask for mercy." The Judge went on and passed sentence of imprisonment for life. The prisoner stood a moment in silence, then looking up at the Judge, significantly says, "Well, you've done your worst!" "What?" said the judge; "you rascal, open your head again and I'll commit you for contempt!" The idea of committing a man for contempt while under sentence for life was certainly original.

A lately arrived native of the Emerald Isle, who a few years since was in the employ of a friend of ours, had been for some time anxiously expecting a letter informing him of the arrival of his brother, who had announced his intention of joining him in this country. After several fruitless visits to the post-office, he returned home very late one night after the family had retired to rest; and on passing the door of our friend's bedroom, the latter inquired, "Well, William, any news yet?" "Ah, yes!" replied William; "furstht-rate, bad news. Me brother's comin till Amuriky—but he's dead!"

A gentleman traveling in the West stopped at the house of a pious old woman, and, observing her fondness for a pet dog, ventured to ask the name of the animal. The good woman answered by saying that she called him "Moreover." "Is not that a strange name?" inquired the gentleman. "Yes," said the old lady, "but I thought it must be a good one, as I found it in the Bible." "Found it in the Bible!" quoth the gentleman. "Pray, and in what part of the Bible did you find it?" The old lady took down her Bible with the utmost reverence, and turning to the text, read as follows: "Moreover, the dog came and licked his sores." "There!" said she, "wasn't the dog's name Moreover?"

Mr. Jenkins broke the lock of his gun, and sent it to a gunsmith, who imperfectly mended it, and charged one dollar, which was paid. Soon after, Jenkins used his gun, and on the first shot the lock broke in the same place; he sent the gun again to the smith with a request to do his work so that it would stand; the lock was again mended, and another charge of a dollar made. But Jenkins contended that the first mending being imperfect no charge should be made. Thereupon the smith brought suit before John Nixon, then a justice of the peace, and a wag withal. Jenkins, indignant, went to M. W. Hines, then a distinguished lawyer, and told him he would give him twenty dollars to defend the suit. The bargain was struck and the money paid. The case came on for trial at nine o'clock; at twelve, the lawyers were still hard at work, when the Judge raised his spectacles, interrupted the lawyers, and inquired the amount in dispute. On being informed, he took a dollar from his own pocket, and handing it to the smith, said, "Here, poor gunsmith, is your dollar, and there are no costs."

At a meeting of stockholders of the Buffalo, Corning, and New York Railroad, held at Batavia in 18'5, there was in attendance a rich but miserly old farmer from Canadice named Terbush. As the ride to the place of meeting was free to the stockholders and their families, the old farmer took his gude frau along with him. Arriving at the place of meeting, the old fellow got out of the car with his wife, half famished with the long ride, and too stingy to patronize a hotel. Seeing an old acquaintance, he went up to him with, "Cale, is there a bakery around here some'ers? Mammy and I are hungry and want to get some crackers." "I don't know about the bakery," said Caleb; "but there's a crib around the corner where you can get some corn in the ear!"

A long-legged Yankee, on visiting a menagerie for the first time, while stalking around the pavilion, suddenly came on the elephant; whereupon he turned to the keeper with surprise: "Thunder and lightning, mister! what critter have you got there, with a tail on both ends."

IRISH PROVERBS.

By the Cove of Cork.

Men of straw don't make the best bricks.

It's a narrow bed that has no turning.

When money is sent flying out of the window it's poverty that comes in at the door.

The Pig that pleases to live must live to please.

One man may steal a hedge, whereas another daren't even as much as look at a horse.

Short rents make long friends—and it holds good equally with your landlord and your clothes.

The mug of a fool is known by there being nothing in it.

You may put the Carte before the Horse, but you can't make him eat.

Money makes the gentleman, the want of it the blackguard.

When wise men fall out then rogues come by what is not their own.

"Les Belles Lettres."—Valentines decidedly belong to the order of Belles Lettres, as they are generally the rose-tinted emanations from, or else the heart-glowing offerings to, Belles.—Our own dear Jenkins.

DRAWING-ROOM THOUGHTS.

By a Waiter who has moved in the First Circles.

A full heart is as difficult to carry as a full cup—the least thing upsets it.

Characters, like pipes, get blacker the oftener they are smoked.

The more polished a person's mind, the more susceptible it is to the warmth of friendly impressions, like a well kept mahogany table, whose bright surface is marked instantly with any dish that is placed upon it hot.

Many friends, like cards, are flung down upon the ground as soon as those who have been playing with them have got all they cared out of them.

The Value of Early Rising in Congress.—It is your early M. C. that catches the Speaker's eye.

Inquiring Gentleman. "Mrs. Brown, is Mr. Smith, your boarder, a man to be trusted?"

Mrs. Brown. "I don't know any body more so. I've trusted him for two years, and I expect to trust him for-ever. He never pays!"

John Doe boasts of his plays (unacted), Richard Roe reads them, and says to D., "You resemble Shakspeare very much!"

"You flatter me," replied the unctuous D.

"Not at all; I would scorn the act."

"Then where's the resemblance 'twixt the Bard of Avon and your humble servant?"

"Well," replies Doe, "I'll tell you. Shakspeare, in his early days, was guilty of stealing—"

"Well?" quoth Doe.

"Why, there the likeness between you ends."

Yankee (very keen). "Why, Pomp, you can't tell who made the monkey?"

Pomp (keener). "Oh yes, I can, massa. The same One made de monkey dat made you."

"Did the defendant approach the plaintiffs seriatim?" inquired an attorney, in a case of assault and battery, the other day.

"No, Sir-ee," was the reply; "he went at 'em with a poker."

Two young Irishmen happened to get into an affray in which one of them was knocked down. His comrade ran up to him, and cried out, "Zounds, Dennis, if ye be dead can't you spake?"

"I'm not dead, but spachless," said the other.

Young Hopeful (to his mother). "Now, mother, if yer don't let me come into the dinner-party to-day, I'll go right out and catch the croup!"

Mother. "Catch the croup, indeed! how can you?"

Boy. "Why, lie down in the snow, just as I did last week!"

The most curious thing in the world is a woman that is not curious.

John's wife and John were tête-à-tête; she witty was, industrious he; says John, "I've earned the bread we've ate;" "and I," says she, "have urned the tea."

"This is a grate prospect," as the prisoner said, in peeping out of his cell window.

Lord Byron made a comparison of divers languages with music. "The Russian tongue," said he, "was like a kettle-drum; the German like a base-viol; French, as a wedding-hymn; the Italian like an Æolian harp; the English only being the human voice." On the contrary, H. Heine gives the following. He says: "Take a word into the mouth, turn it around therein, and spit it out; that's English."

The creator of the ideal philosophy, I. Hegel, gives the following definition of a word (notion) that is often tried to be explained in these papers. He says:

"Love is the absolute identity with the totality of that finite being—connected with cupidity and carnity of I and thou—for I and thou is he, and he is the love."

"Smoking is a disgusting ptyalism, with inevitable concomitant dirt."—Dr. C—x.

Dr. C., from his sermons awaking,
 Comes "down upon" smokers and smoke,
Just (to judge from his language, jaw-breaking)
 Having dined upon Art-o'-choke.

Encyclopedias ranged at his back,
 He raves without reason or manners,
And, filibuster-like, makes an attack
 Upon the defenseless Havanas.

Truce, Doctor Chanticleer! truce to this war!
 At best, 'tis a crusade Quixotic;
Stick to your sermons—leave me my cigar;
 Thus each may enjoy his hypnotic!

Nephelegereta.

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

Franklin Square, Monday, March 15, 1858.

The foreign trade of the port for the last week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week of last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Mar. 13, 1858	$1,767,954....	$1,074,398
Corresponding week, 1857	5,065,712....	891,209
Increase..............		$163,189
Decrease..............	$3,297,752

There is no change in the money market to report, except that exchange on England has fallen so low, that some parties anticipate a revival of the gold shipments in this direction. At least it is probable that many of those foreigners who are availing themselves of the present occasion to invest in American securities, will accompany their orders with the gold to pay for what they buy. Money is freely lent at the Banks at 6 and 7; and any quantity can be had on call at 4 and 5. It is probable that the Bank average, to be published to-morrow morning, will not vary much from that of last week—say $32,750,000. To-morrow a California arrival will be due.

The New York bids for the new Treasury loan were sent in on Saturday. It is generally supposed that the loan will be taken at 3½ @ 4. Much more than the amount required was applied for from New York.

The stock market has been dull, and prices have receded 2 @ 4 per cent. during the week. The event has been caused by the movements of speculators, who, having bought in at low prices, sold out at the close of last week, and left the weight of the market on weak shoulders.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

New York, Monday, March 15, 1858.

The Wholesale Produce Markets during the past week exhibited no remarkable changes for Breadstuffs, the receipts of which were moderate. The demand for Flour and Wheat was mainly for home, and that for Corn was chiefly for export.... Cotton was more active, especially on Saturday, and it closed rather firmer.... Provisions fluctuated in demand and value. Toward the close the inquiry was fair for nearly all kinds, and prices displayed more steadiness....A very brisk trade has been reported in Rio Coffee, which tends upward. Sugars, Molasses, and Rice have been in good request at full rates. Teas have been more freely offered, and prices have favored buyers, especially for Oolongs, of which the available supply is heavy. The demand, however, has not been as brisk.....Less activity has been discernible in Hides and Leather....The leading kinds of Naval Stores and Oils have attracted considerable attention at improved quotations....Wool has been in more request.

The reported receipts of Live Stock during each of the last two weeks compare thus:

	Week ending March 3.	Week ending March 10.
Beeves....................	2,583	3,539
Milch Cows................	209	211
Veal Calves................	448	565
Sheep and Lambs..........	7,376	5,337
Swine....................	——	375

Of the Forty-fourth Street Market supply of Beeves last Wednesday there were received from

New York..........	868	Iowa................	51
Ohio................	801	Pennsylvania	59
Indiana............	472	Michigan	17
Illinois............	417

The range of prices according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday was as follows:

Poor to first class Beeves, per pound...$	7½	@	$ 11½
Common to ex. Milch Cows, per head.	25 00	@	60 00
Veal Calves, per pound	5	@	7½
Sheep and Lambs, per head..........	3 00	@	6 50
" " per pound.........	8	@	11
Live Swine, per pound..............	4	@	5½
Dressed " "	5½	@	7½

The Country Produce Markets present no very remarkable alterations. Much of the produce recently received was injured by exposure during the uexpectedly cold weather. Supplies of desirable commodities are moderate, and prices generally favor sellers. The demand, however, is not brisk.

Wholesale Prices obtained by Producers at Washington Market.

Apples, per barrel....................	$3 00	@	$6 00
Apples, dried, per pound..............	6	@	7½
Peaches, dried, per pound	18	@	20
Plums, dried, per pound..............	18	@	20
Hickory Nuts, per bushel	2 25	@	2 50
Chestnuts, per bushel	1 50	@	2 00
Peanuts, per bushel	60	@	1 25
Cranberries, per barrel..............	10 00	@	12 00
Potatoes, per barrel..................	2 00	@	4 00
" per bushel....................	1 00	@	1 10
" sweet, per barrel.............	5 00	@	5 50
Onions, per barrel	1 50	@	3 00
Turnips, per barrel..................	50	@	62
Beets, per barrel	1 50	@	1 75
Cabbages, per 100	6 00	@	8 00
Parsnips, per barrel	1 25	@	1 50
Carrots, per barrel..................	1 50	@	1 75
Leeks, per 100 bunches	3 00	@	—
Celery, per dozen	1 25	@	1 50
Garlic, per 100	5 00	@	—
Eggs, Limed, per dozen..............	8	@	10
Eggs, Fresh, per dozen	15	@	16½
Chickens, per pound.................	12	@	14
Fowls, per pound....................	10	@	15
Guinea Fowl, per pair...............	44	@	50
Ducks, per pound	17	@	21
" per pair	1 00	@	1 25
Turkeys, per pound..................	12	@	15
Geese, per pound....................	9	@	11
Pigeons, per dozen	2 50	@	3 00
Prairie Hens, per pair...............	75	@	88
Partridge, per pair	1 00	@	1 25
Quail, per dozen.....................	2 50	@	3 00
Roasting Pigs	1 25	@	2 50
Rabbits, each.......................	18	@	25
Hares, each.........................	37	@	50
Squirrels, each	5	@	8
Venison, per pound	8	@	13

ADVERTISEMENTS.

TO SOUTHERN AND WESTERN MERCHANTS.

WM. BUCHANAN MACKENZIE is now exhibiting, in his spacious Millinery Rooms, a most superb collection of choice PARIS BONNETS, among which are several of very rare design and quality. WM. B. MACKENZIE, 294 & 296 Canal Street, Brandreth Building.

LECTURES IN THE FRENCH LANGUAGE,
AT
THE SPINGLER INSTITUTE,
Union Square.

A COURSE OF FOUR LECTURES
WILL BE DELIVERED ON THURSDAY OF EACH WEEK, AT EIGHT O'CLOCK P.M., BY
PROF. ELIE CHARLIER,
Director of the French Institute for Young Gentlemen, No. 48 East Twenty-fourth Street.

SUBJECTS:

March 18th, . . . Mad'e de Stael.
" 25th, . . . Chateaubriand.
April 1st, ... Mad'e Emile de Girardin.
" 8th, ... Beranger.

Course Tickets, $1 50; Single Tickets, 50 cents.
To be had at Lockwood's, 411 Broadway, and at Christern's, 763 Broadway.

THE OLD DOMINION COFFEE POT.

The lovers of good coffee would appreciate these new and popular machines after being subjected to the mere ghost of coffee, as so many families are by the use of the ordinary boiler or biggin; the secret is, these are so contrived as to retain all the aroma during the process of boiling.

PRICES.
1 quart, $1 50; 1½ quart, $1 75; 2 quart, $2; 3 quart, $2 50; 4 quart, $2 75; 6 quart, $3; 10 quart, $4 50. A liberal discount to the trade.
E. P. TORREY, Manufacturers' Agent,
No. 6 Platt Street, New York.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS Purify, Cleanse, take out from the body corrupt humors, obviate a state of costiveness—so shall your cold, your influenza, your dysentery, your rheumatism, your weaknesses and debility, and the pain in your side, be the affair of a day. Disease can not remain to give you pain or occasion disturbance, but from the effect of those worn out parts of of the body's substance which have continued beyond the time nature designed. The bowels, the skin, or the kidneys are at fault. Brandreth's pills will restore them to order and re-establish the body's health. Five hundred thousand persons have been restored by them from sickness to health in the last twenty years. Principal office 43 Brandreth building, Canal Street. Sold also at 296 Bowery, 241 Hudson Street, 113 Third Avenue, 175 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, and at 124 South-sixth Street, Williamsburgh. Price 25 cents a box.

POSTAGE STAMPS FOR SALE,
IN ANY QUANTITY,
AT
HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square.

UP THE MEDITERRANEAN.

PLEASURE VOYAGE.
By Steamer ERICSSON.
A. B. LOWBER, Commander.

The ERICSSON will leave NEW YORK on SATURDAY, May 1st, at 2 o'clock P.M. on the above voyage, stopping a given number of days at GIBRALTAR, MALTA, ALEXANDRIA, JAFFA (for JERUSALEM), CONSTANTINOPLE, ATHENS, and NAPLES.
No Berths secured till paid for.
Full Steamer Fare for the Voyage $750.
For further particulars apply to
DUNHAM & CO.,
13 William Street, New York.

HUNT, WEBSTER & CO'S
Improved Tight-Stitch
SEWING MACHINES.

☞ WE ARE NOW PREPARED TO EXHIBIT this newly-invented and valuable instrument, and would respectfully solicit a call from all persons in want of a Sewing Machine whose qualities have only to be tried to be duly appreciated.

We have opened commodious rooms at 469 BROADWAY, for the sale of these Machines, and all interested are respectfully invited to examine and decide upon their merits for themselves.
HUNT, WEBSTER & CO.,
No. 469 Broadway, New York.
Cor. Essex & Lincoln Streets, Boston,
No. 820 Chestnut Street, Phila.

BRODIE'S
SPRING MANTILLAS.

A BEAUTIFUL ASSORTMENT OF HOME-MADE
SILK AND OTHER MANTLES.
ALSO,
His usual Large Stock of LACE STYLES,
BOTH IN
FRENCH AND SCOTCH GOODS.
Old 51 (New No. 300) CANAL STREET,
NEW YORK.

GROVER & BAKER'S
CELEBRATED
FAMILY SEWING MACHINES,
495 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
18 SUMMER STREET, BOSTON,
730 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

☞ These Machines are justly admitted to be the best in the market for family sewing.

$150 WILL PAY FOR BOARD AND TUITION in the FLUSHING FEMALE COLLEGE one year. Address Rev. WILLIAM H. GILDER, A.M., President, at Flushing, Long Island.

MYSTIC HALL SEMINARY for Young Ladies, 5 miles from Boston. A Catalogue may be obtained of the Principal,
Mrs. T. P. SMITH, Box, Boston, Mass.

VOL. I. OF HARPER'S WEEKLY,
handsomely bound in CLOTH EXTRA,
is now ready.
Price $3 50.

N.B. This Volume can not be sent by Mail on account of its weight. It will be sent by Express, if so desired, freight to be paid by the Purchaser.

MILK! MILK!! MILK!!! — ALDEN'S CONCENTRATED MILK. — The remarkable virtues of this invaluable preparation are now freely admitted by all who have had the opportunity of testing them. By some peculiar process, the quality of the Milk is retained unimpaired, even though kept throughout the longest voyages and exposed to the warmest climates. To those who "go down to the sea in ships," what a luxury it is to obtain fresh Milk daily! and how much expense and trouble are saved to owners of, and those belonging to the vessels, when, instead of taking a cow to sea, the same benefit can be obtained by purchasing a quantity of this preparation!

It is put up in cans, in the form of a paste, and will readily dissolve in hot or cold water. Five pints of water, added to one can of "Concentrated Milk," will produce three quarts of excellent Milk, or one barrel will make 700 quarts of good Milk, that will give entire satisfaction to the consumer.

As it is put up, it will cost from 6 to 8 cents per quart, and is equal in every respect to the Orange County Milk. It will be found to be free from the floating particles of grease found in other preparations. The ward-room mess of the steam frigate Niagara took a large supply of this article for its present use, and no sea-going vessel should be without it.
ALDEN & WOODHULL,
35 White Street, N. Y.

A NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE of Harper & Brothers' Publications, with an Index and Classified Table of Contents, is now ready for distribution, and may be obtained gratuitously on application to the Publishers personally, or by letter inclosing Six Cents in Postage Stamps.

The attention of gentlemen, in town or country, designing to form Libraries or enrich their literary collections, is respectfully invited to this Catalogue, which will be found to comprise a large proportion of the standard and most esteemed works in English Literature—comprehending more than two thousand volumes—which are offered, in most instances, at less than one half the cost of similar productions in England.

To Librarians and others connected with Colleges, Schools, &c., who may not have access to a reliable guide in forming the true estimate of literary productions, it is believed this Catalogue will prove especially valuable as a manual of reference.

To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, whenever books can not be obtained through any bookseller or local agent, applications with remittance should be addressed direct to the Publishers, which will be promptly attended to.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, New York.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR APRIL.

Contents.

TROPICAL JOURNEYINGS. Illustrated by Twenty-three Engravings.
PICTURES FROM SIBERIA AND TARTARY. Illustrated by Twenty Engravings.
AN AMERICAN AT SINAI. Illustrated by Thirteen Engravings.
THE LADY OF BELISLE.
CIVILIZATION AND HEALTH.
THE MIST OVER THE VALLEY.
BIANCA MILESI MOJON.
THE WAY OF THE WORLD.
HASHEESH AND HASHEESH-EATERS.
NUMBER 101.
LOST. By the Author of "John Halifax," &c.
THE VIRGINIANS. By W. M. Thackeray.
Illustrations.—Gather ye Rosebuds while ye May.—A Ministering Angel.—Four Head-Pieces.
Chapter XVII. On the Scent.
Chapter XVIII. An Old Story.
Chapter XIX. Containing both Love and Luck.
Chapter XX. Facilis Descensus.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERARY NOTICES. Books of the Month.
EDITOR'S TABLE.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
PRIVATE GALLERIES. COLLECTION OF MOSES LEVI, ESQ.
Illustrations.—Eruption of Vesuvius; Murillo.—Taking of Moscow; Horace Vernet.—Return from Market; Landseer.—Figures and Cattle; Rosa Bonheur.—Snow Storm; Claude Lorraine.—Destruction of Sodom; Poussin.—Fruits and Vegetables; Ostade.—Declaration of Independence; West.—Model of a Brick; Michael Angelo.—Study of a Piece of Chalk; Ruskin.—Storm at Sea; Turner.—Moonlight on the Alps; Rembrandt.—Innocence; Milais.—Childhood; Sir Joshua Reynolds.—Battle of Stony Point; Trumbull.—Battle of New Orleans; Leutze.
FASHIONS FOR APRIL.
Illustrations.—Promenade Costumes.—Walking Dress.—Under-Sleeve.

MR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL, "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous Illustrations by the Author, was commenced in the December Number of Harper's Magazine. It is printed from early sheets, received from the Author in advance of publication in England—for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.

TERMS.
One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00
And an extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

The Postage upon "Harper's Magazine" must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

CARPETS! CARPETS!!
A. A!! A!! A!! A!! A!! A!!—ANDERSON, 99 Bowery, is selling carpets at a tremendous loss from manufacturers' prices, viz.:—English velvets, 9s., 10s., 11s. per yard; English Brussels, 6s., 7s., 8s.; ingrain carpets, 3s., 4s., 5s.; oilcloths, 2s. 6d., 3s., 4s. $200,000 worth purchased for cash, and must be sold. HIRAM ANDERSON, 99 Bowery.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.—The original and genuine article. As a Spring and Fall purifier of the blood, and general tonic for the system, it stands unrivaled.
Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, No. 100 Fulton Street, New York.

RICH CLOTH COVERS
FOR
VOLUME I. OF HARPER'S WEEKLY
ARE NOW READY.
Price Fifty Cents.

The Trade and Bookbinders will be supplied at Twenty-five per Cent. Discount.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

MR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL, "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous Illustrations by the Author, was commenced in the DECEMBER Number of Harper's Magazine. It is printed from early sheets—received from the Author in advance of publication in England—for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

Five Cents a Number; $2 50 a Year.

BULWER'S BRILLIANT ROMANCE, entitled "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?" pronounced to be the masterpiece of this polished, witty, and learned novelist, by special arrangement with the Author, appears in Harper's Weekly simultaneously with its publication in England.

TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.
One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.
One Copy for Twenty Weeks $1 00
One Copy for One Year 2 50
One Copy for Two Years 4 00
Five Copies for One Year 9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year 20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year . . . 40 00
An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Twelve or Twenty-five Subscribers.

Volume I. of "HARPER'S WEEKLY," handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $3 50, is now ready.

Muslin Covers are furnished to those who wish their Numbers bound, at Fifty Cents each. Twenty-five per Cent. Discount allowed to Bookbinders and the Trade.

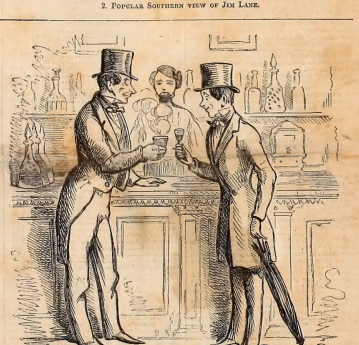
"HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY," when taken together, are supplied at Four Dollars a year.

Numbers from the commencement of both the Magazine and Weekly can still be supplied. Specimen copies furnished gratuitously. Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest Club rates.

The Postage upon "Harper's Magazine" and "Harper's Weekly" must be paid at the Office where they are received. When prepaid quarterly in advance, the Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year on the Magazine, and Twenty-six Cents a year on the Weekly.

Persons residing in the British Provinces will remit, in addition to their Subscription, Thirty-six Cents on the Magazine, and Twenty-six Cents on the Weekly, for the American postage.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

KANSAS SKETCHES.



1. POPULAR NORTHERN VIEW OF JACK CALHOUN.

2. POPULAR SOUTHERN VIEW OF JIM LANE.

3. WHAT IS TO BE SUPPOSED THEY WOULD DO IF THEY MET.

4. WHAT THEY DO WHEN THEY MEET.

FANCY SKETCH OF THE AMERICAN EAGLE.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

METROPOLITAN GIFT BOOK STORE.

The subscriber has for sale a complete assortment of Books, comprising a selection of the principal publications, which are selling at very low prices.

Also, every variety of Note, Cap, and Letter Paper.

A Gift, worth from 75 cents to $50, with every Book or ream of Paper.

Any person sending an Order for 10 Books, will receive a Book and Gift extra.

This sale of Books is no humbug.

We do not advertise a list of Gifts at double their real value, as is done by some of our Great Gift Concerns, but will guarantee to sell Books and Paper at lower prices, and to distribute a larger amount of Gifts, than any other store.

No connection with the firm of Andrews & Co., which is a branch of some other establishment.

We are selling our Books at lower prices and giving out more valuable Gifts, and our competitors have adopted a plan to mislead the Public.

Catalogues, containing a list of over 1300 different Works, sent to any address.

JOHN S. ANDREWS,
140 Nassau Street,
New York.

Near the City Hall.

FAMILY SEWING MACHINE DEPOT.
FIFTEEN and FIFTY dollars
SEWING MACHINES.

The Fifteen Dollar Family Machine is the best cheap machine ever offered for the Public. Fifteen minutes' instruction given to persons agents it. The Fifty Dollar Machine is warranted to excel all other family sewing machines. We challenge the world to produce its equal! THOMAS & CO., 499 Broadway, N. Y.

☞ Agents wanted to sell the $15 machine.

WHEELER & WILSON M'FG CO'S
SEWING MACHINES,
Office 343 Broadway, New York.
Agencies throughout the Union.

Send for a Circular.

We prefer them for family use.—Tribune.
They are the favorites for families.—Times.
The machine for family use.—Advocate & Journal.
We can not imagine any thing more perfect.—Evang.
Will give entire satisfaction.—Observer.
The best ever invented.—Christian Inquirer.
In looking for the best, see these.—Examiner.
Admirably adapted for family use.—Chronicle.
We praise it with enthusiasm.—Christian Intell.
Worthy of the highest award.—Sabbath Recorder.

THE LADIES

Will thank us for calling their attention to a new and elegant preparation for dressing the Hair. We refer to a compound of Cocoa-nut Oil, &c., prepared by Messrs. JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., to which they have given the name of Burnett's Cocoaine. A single application renders the hair (no matter how stiff and hard) soft and glossy for several days. For sale by all druggists.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.
For all manufacturing purposes SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES are doing indispensable work. The public insist upon having their clothes sewed by them. The SINGER'S FAMILY SEWING MACHINE is the latest presented for competition, and being arranged with full knowledge of the defects of other machines of similar uses, has avoided or remedied them all. It is the handsomest Sewing Machine ever made, and the easiest to learn to operate. Using one of these machines is an elegant accomplishment. Price $100, with table complete.
I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway, New York.

PHONOGRAPHY; or, PHONETIC SHORT-HAND. For Alphabet, Specimen Pages of the Phonetic Magazine for 1858, and list of Works (free), Address BENN PITMAN, Cincinnati, O.

LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS IN AFRICA.
AVOID IMPOSITION!
CAUTION!

Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS take this opportunity of cautioning the Public against several spurious publications, which, by artful advertisements, are made to appear to though emanating from Dr. Livingstone. They are authorized to say that Dr. Livingstone repudiates them entirely, and wishes it to be generally known that the present work is the

ONLY AUTHENTIC NARRATIVE OF HIS ADVENTURES AND TRAVELS IN AFRICA.

8vo, Price, $3 50.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE,
NEW YORK.

☞ This work will be sent to any address in the United States under 3000 miles' distance upon receipt of Three Dollars.

FUN!!

HARPER'S COMICALITIES.
SELECTED FROM DRAWINGS BY
LEECH, DOYLE, AND OTHERS.
CONTAINING
THREE HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS.
FIRST SERIES.
PRICE TWENTY-FIVE CENTS.
For Sale by all Booksellers and Periodical Dealers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. II.—No. 65.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 27, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

CONTENTS.

I. SENATOR SLIDELL, WITH PORTRAIT.
II. NIGHT THOUGHTS.
III. THORN AND KISS.
IV. EDITORIALS:
V. THE LOUNGER.
VI. HIS EXCELLENCY RIAZ-ADDAULAH MOHAMMED PASHA, WITH A FINE PORTRAIT.
VII. THE LITTLE GRAY CLOAK.
VIII. DR. LIVINGSTONE'S NEW VOYAGE OF DISCOVERY, WITH TWO ILLUSTRATIONS.
IX. LITERARY.
X. DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.
XI. FOREIGN NEWS.
XII. THE BURIAL OF CONTENTS, AND THE EGYPTIAN LADIES, WITH TWO FINE ILLUSTRATIONS.
XIII. THE APPARITION OF MONSIEUR BOBBY.
XIV. ARGOSY.
XV. MISCELLANY.
XVI. BEN'S'S STORY, "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?"—Continued.
XVII. BURIAL OF THE QUEEN OF OUDE, WITH THREE ILLUSTRATIONS.
XVIII. THE CHAFED CHEESEMEN.
XIX. THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.
XX. MARKET AND FINANCIAL REPORTS.
XXI. CONGRATULATIVE.

SENATOR JOHN SLIDELL, OF LOUISIANA.

We proceed, in due course, to add to our gallery of political portraits that of the Honorable John Slidell, one of the two Senators from Louisiana in the Senate of the United States.

The modesty of the United States Senator from Louisiana has rendered the task of his biographers one of no common difficulty. Materials are absolutely wanting, save those which can be found in the histories of the country.

It is known that he is a New Yorker by birth; that he was born, in this State, somewhere in the neighborhood of 1793, and that he went to seek his fortune in New Orleans as soon as he reached man's estate. It is to be presumed that he had received from his family a good—indeed, considering the times, one might say an excellent—education; for, though he arrived at New Orleans "poor, friendless, and alone," he was able to take his place almost immediately at the bar of that city, and to cope with the master intellects which have always adorned the forum of Louisiana. The eminence of his brother (the late Commodore Slidell Mackenzie) in literature, will also vouch for the completeness of the education of the two young men.

We have no record of the cases in which Mr. Slidell was engaged during his fifteen or twenty years' toil at the bar of New Orleans. Suffice it to say that his success as a lawyer was unparalleled even in that city of sudden success, and that, after a few years' patient labor, and successful competition with the chiefs of the profession, he made himself so high a name that he was necessarily retained, on one side or the other, in almost every important lawsuit which arose, and gradually accumulated a princely fortune.

His first public service appears to have been as United States District Attorney at New Orleans, to which office he was appointed by General Jackson. The General and the lawyer were united by the closest ties of intimacy; it was Mr. Slidell who took the lead in procuring from Congress the reimbursement of the fine laid upon General Jackson for his violation of law during the danger of New Orleans in the last war.

He was frequently sent to the State Legislature of Louisiana; and having vindicated his capacity for public and political business, was chosen one of the Louisiana delegation to Congress. In the House he was remarked for his tact and skill as a manager, and his shrewdness and coolness in debate. At times, under peculiar provocation, he would become excited, and then the words would flow from his lips in a perfect torrent; but this rarely happened. His temper was thoroughly under command, and his sagacity was never betrayed by outbursts of passion.

While a member of Congress, Mr. Slidell was selected by the President to act as Minister Plenipotentiary and Envoy Extraordinary to Mexico. The circumstances imparted unusual importance to the mission. War was actually on the point of breaking out. Taylor was on the Rio Grande, and the American squadron lay off Vera Cruz. Previous to firing the first gun, however, the President was anxious to make one effort more to preserve peace, and the Mexican Government having intimated that a new Envoy from the United States would be received, Mr. Slidell was accredited. The mission did not achieve any useful purpose. After many and futile discussions the Mexican Government refused to receive Mr. Slidell; and after much strenuous exertion on the part of the latter to avert from Mexico the blow that was impending, he finally demanded his passports and returned home.

After his return home, his commanding influence in his own State, and the reputation he had won in his Congressional and diplomatic career, enabled him to take a lead in federal politics. It was generally understood that he was an ardent believer in the theory of the gradual Americanization—the word is now naturalized—of this continent, and of the steady absorption of the Spanish, Indian, and other races by the hardier Anglo-Saxon. It was evident, even so far back as 1850, that the time could not be far distant when the intervention of the United States in Central America and Mexico would become a duty; and many looked to Mr. Slidell as one of the soundest authorities on this very important and delicate question. In accordance with this sentiment, Mr. Pierce, on assuming the direction of the government, tendered to Mr. Slidell the post of United States minister to Central America. Unfortunately for the country, the offer was gracefully but peremptorily declined. Our interests in Central America were committed to much weaker hands, and the Presidential term of Mr. Pierce passed away without witnessing the solution of any of the embarrassing questions which are involved in our relations with our Southern neighbors.

When Mr. Soulé vacated his seat in the Senate to fill the post of United States Minister to Madrid, Mr. Slidell was appointed to succeed him for the unexpired term; and at the close of this term he was re-elected for six years. He has been a very quiet, unobtrusive member of the Senate. He is more felt in council than in debate. In the exercises of the party with which he is acting no member's advice carries more weight than Mr. Slidell's; the speaking and ornamental part of the political fight he leaves to others. His sentiments, when spoken, are expressed in strong, terse, unimpassioned language.

It is understood that Mr. Slidell enjoys a more than common share of Mr. Buchanan's confidence, and that his counsels possess unusual weight at the White House. Should the settlement of the Kansas question, and the gradual development of destiny in the South leave room for the adoption by the United States of a bold and generous policy, Mr. Slidell—it is generally supposed—would be intrusted with high and important diplomatic duties. His name has been freely mentioned for the mission to Paris; and should the settlement of the chronic disturbances in Central America and Mexico require to be effected in Europe, he would no doubt be tendered either this or some other equally important office. In the event of the retirement of Mr. Cass from the office of Secretary of State, Mr. Slidell might perhaps be a prominent candidate for the vacancy. It is generally believed that Mr. Slidell was in close correspondence with Mr. Buchanan at the time of the Ostend Conference, and that the doctrines embodied in the famous document known as the Ostend Manifesto received his hearty approval. As there is no reason to suppose that the President has altered his views since that manifesto was given to the world, Mr. Slidell would doubtless be selected as one of his aids should the time come for its realization.

In person Mr. Slidell is striking; his figure is stout, about the middle height, with a bold, dignified mien. His features are rather handsome. One who knew him well thus spoke of his private character: "His character, with many excellences, abounds in contradictions. John Slidell accumulates, save, spends more, and wastes more than any other man in New Orleans. While apparently yielding you his confidence and securing yours, he walks quietly, composedly into your affections, and gains every thing he wants without loss to himself. The man of liberality, the spendthrift, the economist, appear to combine in his composition. What shall we say to such a character?"

HON. JOHN SLIDELL, UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

NIGHT THOUGHTS.

'Tis sweeter than all else below,
The daylight and its duties done,
To fold the arms for rest, and so
Relinquish all regards but ours;
To see her features in the dark;
To lie and meditate, once more,
Some grace he did not fully mark,
Some tone he had not heard before;
Then from beneath his head to take
Her notes, her picture, and her glove,
Put there for joy when he shall wake,
And press them to the heart of love;
And then to whisper "Wife," and pray
To live so long as not to miss
That unimaginable day
Which farther seems the nearer 'tis:
And still from joy's unfilled cup swell
To drink, in sleep, while on her brow
Of innocence ineffable,
The laughing bridal roses blow.

TROTH AND KISS.

A TREMBLING came upon her lip,
Such as June rose-buds know
When queen-bees there alight to sip
The honey-drops which flow
Beneath each petal's roseate tip,
For bees to blossoms blow!

One cheek trembled too! And then
Tear's dew-drop slivered both!
I pressed her to my breast, and when
I found her mouth,
She kissed the happiest of men
And I sealed there our troth.

Twice twenty years have blown away,
Filled up with wedded bliss!
For every month 'tis seemed like May,
Our every joy like this
Of our remembered youthful days—
The day of troth and kiss!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 27, 1858.

CAN THIS COUNTRY SUSTAIN A LINE OF OCEAN STEAMERS?

THE Collins steamers are advertised to be sold in April, and it is reported in the papers that the Messrs. Brown, Bankers, the owners of the bulk of the stock in the Collins line, and also its chief creditors, have determined to buy them and run them on their own account. It is unfortunate, rightly or wrongly, that notwithstanding the enormous tax levied upon the country for the support of the Collins line, it has never been profitable; both the legitimate profits of the enterprise, and the illegitimate assistances which it derived from the unfair protection of Government, were more than absorbed by the inordinate expenses of keeping it going. The question which is suggested, therefore, by the announcement that the line is hereafter to be run by the eminent house which we have mentioned, is, Can we sustain an American line of ocean steamers?

It is not to be disguised that the bulk of the passenger business between this and Europe is already in the hands of British ship-owners. The Cunard line of steamers, whatever objections may be made to them, are unquestionably the most uniformly successful line of the present day, and also the safest. It is natural to suppose that until this country has established itself in the way of ocean steamers than has yet been witnessed, the greater part of the travel between the United States and Europe will be in the hands of the Cunard company. And while rich travelers patronize that line, as the most reliable and the safest, poor persons will naturally take their passages on board the many excellent and cheap screw steamers which ply between New York and Glasgow or Liverpool or European port.

The success of these steamships, and the unfortunate failure of the Collins line, are, therefore, the obstacles which stand in the way of the establishment of a successful line of American transatlantic steamers. An American ocean steamship company is bound to make a reputation for regularity, speed, and safety before it can compete on advantageous terms with the Cunard and the Glasgow lines. The English have a vast advantage in the race.

The prospect is at present that the only American lines of ocean steamers which will contend, this summer, for a share of the travel, will be the Asapo and Fulton, and the Vanderbilt. The two former vessels are well known and popular. They are known to be well provided and carefully managed. They enable an American to go to Paris without passing through England. They are consequently understood to be profitable to their owners, and they will doubtless continue to be so. Whether the Vanderbilt was run at a profit last summer by her owner can tell. She carried great numbers of passengers, and, to judge from the complaints made by the public, she was not unskillfully managed. She may perhaps do well. What is to become of the Collins steamers—the Atlantic, Arctic, Baltic, Adriatic—no one can tell; they may, as we said, run as a new line without a small capital, but in case, they will have to be added to the list; but there was, some time since, some talk of their passing into the hands of some foreign government.

Is this all that can be done by the ship-owners of the United States toward contending for the steam enjoyment of the Atlantic?

The bulk of the travel between the United States and Europe is American. Even the foreigners who cross the ocean have every motive for preferring an American to a foreign ship, if it can be shown a to be equally secure. Establish a safe line of American steamers to Liverpool, and they will in twelve months command three-fourths of the whole trade. Why should not this be done? In sailing vessels we have beaten the foreign world; why can not we do as well in regard to steamers? There is an opportunity to be made by a fair and square trial of the experiment; let us see whether the Messrs. Brown Brothers, of New York, or any other parties will realize it.

THE NEW TREASURY LOAN.

MR. COBB has not been as successful in borrowing money for the Government as it was generously suggested he would be. Though over eight millions were offered him when he only wanted five, the rates at which the tenders were made were considerably higher than he anticipated; and as the law is peremptory, he will be obliged to award the loan to the lower bidders, whose proposals will average 4¼ per cent. for the five millions. Nor is this all: it is quite obvious that the certificates which bear this low net rate of interest will speedily find their way back to the Treasury Department in payment of duties; while the five and a half per cent. will remain in the market out, in the hands of private holders. Altogether the operation is no matter of congratulation to Government or country. It is very easy to say that he was victimized by a coalition of brokers and financiers; but a man of his position of finance to be victimized by a coalition of brokers and financiers; but a man of his position of finance to be victimized by such foolish sorts persons from getting as high interest for their money as they can, or from combining together if they can thus lend certain their ends, it is not easy to see how this can avail to make the case any the less awkward for the Treasury Department.

That United States securities at par could be placed at lower rates of interest than five or four and a half per cent. is plain enough. Five and five per cent. are the market rates for call loans on railroad and State and city bonds in New York. A million of dollars can be borrowed any day in that locality at five per cent. on such securities, and on demand at twenty-four hours' notice. It surely can not be pretended that United States bonds, with a fixed term to run, are on a par with such loans as these.

Abroad, we hear of money eagerly seeking investment at two per cent. The rate of loans could undoubtedly have been procured at that in London at that rate. A judicious financial agent could have placed the whole loan at three, in the course of a few weeks, and would have netted a handsome profit into the bargain. The whole thing could have been done at Frankfort or Paris.

The whole blame of the transaction should not be heaped by the public on Mr. Cobb. Congress is responsible for the Act which tied his hands. But the loan will not redound to his fame as a financier. It is to be hoped the United States to obtain cheaply the ten millions which the Government will still require to get through the year.

REVIVAL OF BUSINESS

WITHIN the past fortnight business has received to a surprising extent. The accession of a large amount of specie to the capital that at former weeks since the revulsion, and various branches of trade have begun to display unusual activity. The ship-yards are all busily; the foundries are again in full blast; the grocers are preparing for the spring sales; the dry-goods dealers are also laying in a moderate stock for the summer consumption of the country; booksellers are beginning to make their preparations forward wealth and prosperity which this country has made have been consequent upon, and in a most unexpected manner, by the recent financial depression and suffering. The revulsion of 1857 will prove to have been one of the most fortunate accidents of the century.

At the time that wholesome check overtook us we were plunging headlong into a vortex of extravagance and speculation. The former, bad as it was, was not the worst. The latter, ruinous plus of produce was unprecedented, we were spending the whole of the profits of labor in a manner of foreign luxuries. We were spending enormous sums in the construction and maintenance of railroads which were utterly unnecessary for the time. We were living individually on a scale wholly unsuited to a hard-working people. In the shape of private and public waste and extravagant expenditures, curtailed our exorbitant imports, checked our reckless railway enterprises, and brought the whole business of the country within narrow and convenient limits. That the evil was superficial, and not radical, was proved by the fact that the country was sound at bottom, and the people generally rich—the unprecedented accumulations of excess which the late prosperity had left in individual centres prove to demonstration.

It now remains to be seen how long we can contrast ourselves with an ordinarily successful business. So long as the trade of the country bears due proportion to its consumption it may be taken for granted that it will be profitable, and the general commercial condition healthy. But as soon as the standard of present consumption is neglected, and we begin to build for the future, or to trade for exorbitant profits, further disasters may be anticipated. But till this is the case we may consider the horizon serene.

AN OPENING FOR YOUNG MEN.

IT is all very well to talk of the merits of the dry goods, or the hardware, or the law, or the physic, or the engineering business for promising young men. Doubtless some may do well in one or all of these, with adequate labor and experience. But a careful examination of the facts can not fail to demonstrate to every unbiased mind that all these are vastly inferior—in point of promise and capacity—to the ancient business of burglary.

In the first place, the training or apprenticeship requisite for the profession of burglary is slight. A few weeks practice with the "jemmy," the "dark lantern," and the "jack," will be the most unskillful hand perfect. Then the capital required to enter into business on one's own account is extremely insignificant; a few dollars—a single haul from a gentleman's pocket—will supply outfit. Finally, unlike many of the trades which are popular with young men, the art of burglary is not confined to any one locality; it is cosmopolitan. Merchants are confined to the place where their trade can be carried on; lawyers must remain in the locality where they studied law; but doors and bolts are the same all the world round; and burglars, after exhausting New York, may find a virgin soil in Boston and Philadelphia, and a very fair success-ful field in the cities of the Old World.

The chief advantage of the ancient art of burglary in New York is the troubled immunity which it enjoys. Now and then, it is true, some one catches a burglar on his premises, holds him down, and secures him; but this is very rare indeed; but it is evident that these are rare cases. The business of arresting burglars being left entirely to the police, who is usually fast asleep while they are operating, arrests are naturally few. In some foreign countries, it is said, the police connive at professional burglars. That is not the practice here. On the contrary, our police not only do not make any serious effort to arrest burglars when caught, but they place themselves actively to conceal the deeds of the burglars. When a burglary has been committed, the first effort of the police is, "Try to not mention it to the newspapers." Thus the burglar not only escapes the suspicious eye of the police, but is enabled to dispose of the stolen property without difficulty and to advantage. A published account of the deed and of the burglar's description will attract suspicion to the guilty parties and prevent a satisfactory sale of the plunder.

Where can there be a finer business—one which can be undertaken with so little outlay of time and money, and prosecuted with so little risk as this? Is it any wonder that there are so many practitioners of the science in New York? But so many respectful, law-abiding citizens sleep with a revolver at their head, resolved—considering the apparent sympathy of the police with burglars—to shoot, without parley, the first man who breaks open their window, and to shoot down every strange man found on their premises after the doors are locked?

THE BRITISH OCCUPATION OF CANTON.

CANTON is occupied by British and French troops, the latter very properly filling a secondary place. The proclamation which followed the capture of the city, Lord Elgin announced that it would be restored to the Emperor so soon as peace was established. He took pains to assure, not the Chinese only, but the world, that Great Britain had no intention of acquiring territory in that part of the globe.

Policemen long ago noticed that rogues seldom undertake their villainies in pursuance of a deliberate plan. They are led on, from petty to wrong, until circumstances seem to compel them to commit the most heinous crimes. There is reason to believe that the experience of Lord Elgin's agents now installed at Canton may afford ground for comparison between them and the common run of civilized communities.

Before since Canton has been known to our world we have heard of the Governor of Canton, who have secured to the citizens a measure of protection and order in return for systematic robberies. We have been prepared, moreover, the past fifty years for the Governor of Canton to make requisitions upon wealthy merchants for sums of ten thousand, or four thousand pounds and dollars at a time, and these exactions have always been successful. This black mail has secured the safety of the Governor's person. Those who paid it were secure of official favor, and of a moderate amount of protection against their thieving colleagues with which Canton swarms. Those who did not pay it were left to protect themselves as best they could.

One of the first consequences of the establishment of European sway at Canton will be the cessation of this kind of robbery by the regular thieves, and of spoliation by the higher authorities. The small shopkeepers and private citizens will enjoy a period of safety and peace such as they have never known before, and the Hong merchants will cease to expect a periodical requisition from the Governor regularly enough to give him half a year's profits of their business. It is not to be supposed that the change will pass unnoticed by the community, and it is fair to presume that the practical Chinamen will appreciate it highly, and that, when the time comes, if it ever does, for the evacuation of the city by the foreigners, they will strenuously resist the removal of so wholesome and thorough an authority.

It is possible—it is likely—there may come a time, when the English at Canton may be placed in a dilemma between abandoning the city to thieves and assassins or retaining it as a British protectorate. In such an event, the duty of the civilized power would be obvious. It could behoove England but little to annex Canton to the British empire, but it would be a great advantage to the commercial world to have that port under the control of intelligent Europeans, and to have its police as well managed as that of Liverpool or London.

UP THE MEDITERRANEAN.

THE expedition in the steamer Ericsson, Captain Lowber, to visit Cairo, Jerusalem, Constantinople, Greece, and other parts of the Old World, appears to offer a capital opportunity for persons who have but little time to spare, and who desire to see these interesting points in a comfortable manner. A first-class American steamer, with all her appointments of luxury, will be a very different ship for a voyage in the Mediterranean from the miserable little craft in which Eastern travelers usually sail about these seas. Should this plan prove successful, it will be but the first of such voyages, and it may result in the establishment of a regular excursion of a Mediterranean line of steamers. Only a few years ago the idea of a steam voyage to Jerusalem was thought a mere speck in the sea from the material for squibs in Punch. Now it is a realized fact.

GIFT ENTERPRISE SWINDLES.

MAYOR TIEMANN has rendered the public a signal service in breaking up one of the gift enterprises swindles which have been so successful of late in fleecing those people in the rural districts. A concern which proposed to distribute gifts among the purchasers of its goods was, on examination, found to be carried on in the name of a man of straw, and to be based on the purest fraud and imposture. It is to be hoped that the Mayor will inquire further. Without exception, these gift enterprises are fraudulent and dishonest. They profess to be the equitable of a matter by pretending to sell for a dollar that which is worth two, and, as might be expected, they cheat every one who has any dealings with them.

THE LOUNGER.

DIGNIFIED RODDIE.

THE Senate of the United States is the most dignified assemblage on the face of the earth. It is so called by all foreign observers, who write books upon America, of which there is no end in sight. It is so considered by Americans themselves, who, eager to tell the truth, greet the House to be a beer-garden, and point with pride to the assembly of sages and statesmen who occupy another wing of the building. The reporters have been struck with new force by this characteristic of the Senate during a recent debate in that body. The points were taken, the question stated and urged with decorum and dignity, and it is difficult, upon reading the debate, to tell where the real point lay.

Probably, as is usually the case, there was a great deal of truth upon both sides. The Lounger, of course, can not give only an abstract of the discussion, but it embraces all the chief points.

MR. JOHN SCOTT SMITH, of Fourth Ward, for "Second Sage and Statesman. "You're a—d liar!"

MR. BRADISH, for "Fourth Ward, for"

THE POETRY OF ADVERTISING.

IS there any profound moral difference between the acts of Jones, who uses a counterfeit bill in favor of barter, and forging his name to a letter praising soap, with the intention of persuading the public to buy it? If the one act sends the offender to the State Prison, where should the other send him? Jones is for the benefit of the public in the case of pilfering, nothing, of course, can be done. Smith says he does. "I can prove great good arising" at the dinner to-night. After the Press has been drunk, and Brown has squirted in reply, I am going to say, "Mr. President, I must confess that truth has been down thrown!" "I think it will be rather a long journey," says Brown. "Where, I pray, and what is Smith's wrath, when "the Army and Navy" have been drunk with applause, and Commodore Stewart has returned thanks? Jones is filled with their usual felicity, to res the deceitful Jones rise and say with the poet, with it will, "Mr. President, I must confess that toast has been drunk down on both sides." For this kind of larceny there is no law, and in the society of Sheridan's dramas it is so estimable in other branches—a man must hold his tongue and drink his wine.

So when Jones reports Smith as having said something, it may be difficult to disprove that he never said any thing which could tear that construction. But when Jones deliberately sits down and writes a letter and prints it, in a community in which Smith is perfectly well known as an author, with the evident intention of giving another man's book the advantage of Smith's name and prize—what is the word generally used to describe such conduct?

Now publishers are well known to be the most modest and retiring of men—especially in the newspapers. But ought they not to avail themselves enough to take care that their names are not abused? Ought they not to see that their names are not put to untruths? Is no restraint to be placed upon the poet who prepares the advertisements?

Let us suppose, for instance, an advertisement commences with Washington Irving's name at the top, followed by "New book in press." There are probably people in the world so stupid, when they see that, as to suppose that Irving is about publishing a new work. Of course, the author of the advertisement had no intention of producing such an impression—because it would be a pure forgery; but it shows how careful these poets ought to be. Let us next suppose that the work is stated to have received the unqualified approbation of Mr. Irving; and that a letter is printed dated at Sunnyside, November 1st, 1857, praising the book and complimenting the author, and telling him how much money he ought to make by it, etc., etc. Let us then further suppose that Mr. Irving never wrote such a letter. Is that not a great triumph of imagination? Is it not an evidence of that high order of genius known as invention? Is not Sing Sing so called because it is the temporary cage of poets who sing just such songs as that? Might you not naturally suppose that you would next read, "Mr. W. B. Astor will give ten dollars to every body who buys a copy of this delightful work?" How could you know he would not, until you asked him? How could you know that Mr. Irving wrote no such letter, until you had made the inquiry?

There is a very vulgar phrase about "cutting it a little too fat." And it is always well for such a poet as has been described to remember, that if he has no self-respect to lose, the public has always, under certain circumstances, plenty of contempt to spare. Doubtless, before this paper appears, the publishers, in the case supposed, will have absolved themselves from all complicity in the imposition upon the public which has been already exposed by Mr. Irving's publisher. It is to be hoped that they will also impart the name of the adventurous person who writes letters in the name of Washington Irving.

ATROCIOUS THEFT.

A SKILLFUL theft of time was accomplished, a short time since, at the residence of Rabelais Lamb. The distinguished author, whose urbanity of manner is as well known as the geniality of his genius, lives, as our readers are aware, upon the lovely banks of our noble Ganges, at his secluded and beautiful retreat of Mont Blanc. The home of Rabelais Lamb is naturally an intellectual Mecca. No man but is glad to have been there, and proud to tell of the visit. But Lamb is an author, and a hard-working author; he is also a gentleman, and his private life and his family circle should be as secure of invasion as those of the most obscure of his fellow-citizens. But rudeness is not altogether unknown, even upon the banks of our noble Ganges, as the sequel will show.

Among the many inconsiderate persons who do not hesitate to call upon Mr. Lamb at all times, and totally regardless of his engagements and employments, there is often a sly intruder who carries away with him, quite unperceived, a most valuable part of the day, or even purloins three or four hours of careful work. Some time since, Gape, a celebrated lion-hunter, hitherto esteemed a tolerable sort of person for a man of his class (and who gave occasion to the celebrated witticism—"Why is a visit of Gape's to Bryant or Longfellow precursive of the Milennium?" "Because it is a boar lying down with the lion")—arrived at Mont Blanc at an early hour of the morning and inquired for Mr. Lamb. The author came out of his study, and sat entertaining his guest. Although he was very busy, and anxious to continue his work, he could not take the visitor into his study, and had no one to leave him with—being naturally unwilling to leave a man who would thrust himself into his house, as Gape had done, alone with the spoons. Gape thus began his robbery in the very presence of his host. He bagged the entire forenoon, and appropriated the afternoon until three o'clock, when he left for the cars, having taken all of the day that was worth taking. Scarcely had he quitted the door when the whistle of the locomotive was heard, and the wretch, who had fully intended to be left, returned to the scene of his crime to carry off the rest of the booty. In sheer despair Mr. Lamb took him into the study, and while there, with an effrontery which is beyond human belief, Gape surveyed a set of Lamb's works, in 15 volumes, in half-gilt calf, standing upon the mantle, and coolly asked the author if he would not give them to him!

Entirely overwhelmed by this last blow, Lamb sank quietly into a chair and wrote the name of the burglar upon the fly-leaf; after which, having despoiled the author of his works and his day, the cold-blooded miscreant departed.

There are plenty of traces of him. His haunts are perfectly well known; and no police or clew are necessary to discover him. But what shall be said of a state of society in which such criminals not only go at large unrebuked, but openly display upon their library shelves the ill-gotten plunder of their marauding forays? Nor only this; but point to it with pride, and have no remorse for having cheated a fellow-creature and a hard-working author of a day!

WHAT ARE GRAMMAR?

BARNUMBO declares, upon a large and beautiful transparency in front of the Museum, "SCARCELY ANY BODY KNOWS WHAT AN AQUARIA IS." Now Mr. Tailor, of Tooley Street, presents his compliments to Barnumbo, and desires him to take notice that he, Mr. Tailor, is "scarcely any body," because he knows "what an Aquaria is." "It are a things," says Mr. Tailor, "very interesting to contemplate. It resemble a glass chests full of marine production, shell, and sands. Fish swims in it. Fish, in facts, breathes and lives, move and have its beings in it. It amuse and instruct. It kindle the philosophic minds. It elevate the sentiment of all beholder. Young ladies likes it. It are a beautiful inventions and a fortunate hits for Museum."

And now, having shown that he is "scarcely any body" by promptly answering the question, What is an aquaria? Mr. Tailor, of Tooley Street, demands of Barnumbo a reply to the inquiries, What are Grammar? and What is the rules of person and numbers?

A DESIGN UPON THE CENTRAL PARK.

THERE is a report that the Commission of the Central Park intend to invite the gentleman who laid out the Bois de Boulogne, near Paris, to come over and superintend the laying out of our park. Such a rumor is too likely to be true. The error which imported a statue by a tenth-rate Italian sculptor—Persico—to adorn the Capitol at Washington, instead of employing our own sculptors, is perennial. In the fine arts we have a national preference for foreign performances which is not fully justified by their uniform superiority. Why, for instance, in the case of this park, should we send abroad for a landscape gardener? Is the Bois de Boulogne such a beautiful park that it should be selected as the model of ours? On the contrary, the rectangular stiffness of French garden taste is the least desirable in the world to imitate.

And not only is the model a poor one, but there are plenty of men in this country who are, probably, quite capable of designing a great public park. Let the Commission (assuming the report to be correct) first advertise for proposals from American landscape gardeners. At least, give us a chance of knowing our inferiority. Nobody wants the work poorly done for the sake of having it done at home; but nobody wants the new park to be turned into a Bois de Boulogne. Don't assume that a man can do this park because he is not an American, or because he did something that pleases Paris and French taste.

The Lounger will be very glad if he is firing his pistol before the enemy is in sight. But he can hardly be too soon. Commissions are such droll things.

SOUND AND SENSIBLE VIEWS.

WHEN the Huguenots is withdrawn and Mr. Fry's Leonora is produced at the Academy, let us not all discover that we have spent enough for the Opera at present, and can not afford to go any more. On the other hand, let Mr. Fry not be disgusted and disappointed if we all do say so.

Is he not an American? What business had he, then, to write an opera? What right has an American, with the Stock Exchange open to him, and the dry-goods line, and the wet ditto, ditto, to fall to scraping fiddles and tum-ti-tid-y-ing? Why not leave that sort of thing to Italians and Germans, who have nothing on earth to do but eat maccaroni and pickled cabbage? They are expected to write operas, and then go and listen to them, and cry, "Bravi! bravi!" and when they choose to come here and shout and squeal and make faces in public for our amusement, why, we can toss them a trifle and laugh, and then turn away to the serious business of life.

It is refreshing to watch the profound contempt with which a man who invests his soul and body in a voyage or an operation; who is forever talking and wondering about short credits and long credits; who finds himself sometimes calculating whether, in a great hurry and press, thirty-five inches might not make a yard—regards a man whose investments no winds can blow over, nor storms sink, nor commercial crashes affect, and whose interests are planted as deep as the everlasting hills.

We might as well confess it—those of us who believe that "a sound, sensible, business man" is the ideal of manhood—that the pity is on the other side. We don't pity the poets and musicians, the artists and authors, half so deeply as they pity us. We don't laugh at them half so heartily as they laugh at us. In books, in pictures, in wit, in music, in intellectual sympathy and conversation, there is an exhilaration, a satisfaction, an inspiration, and a happiness, that reveal to a man what it is to be a man—that make life worth living—that make men nobler and women fairer—a delight which Golconda and Potosi could not buy. There is an old story of treasures that moth and rust can not corrupt, and that thieves can not steal. When you have glowed as you read a poem—when you have kindled before a picture—when you have melted under sweet music, has it never occurred to you that the story might be true; that the hope, the aspiration, the ecstasy of every great human work, were all ingots of that treasure?

Don't pity a man for writing a song or an opera, but commiserate yourself for wanting to pity him. Shrewdness and thrift are, certainly, useful things in a world where men must have bread to eat. But they are apt to degenerate into dishonesty and meanness. Genius, also, is inclined to be impracticable. If your horses will not plow your potato-field, it may be because they are blind and stubborn. It may be, also, because they are horses of the sun. And, excellent Sir, except for the sun that shines without feeding, there would be no potatoes to the acre.

FROM A PAINTER'S PORTFOLIO.

THIS ink-sketch is a Tuscan boy—
  How well the urchin I remember!—
Who would my hurried nap annoy,
  One drowsy noon of gold September.
He leaned upon the window-sill,
  His brown, bare elbows laid along,
And, heedless of my presence, still Kept droning a Campagna song.

It was the vintage: beautiful
  Was every peasant boy that bore
A bursting basket, overfull,
  Of grapes that hung his forehead o'er;
And laughingly they crowned the girls
  With vine-wreaths also; while bright glances
Came answering through the leaves and curls
  That fringed their ruddy countenances.

Beneath a road-side olive-tree
  A cross, rose-garlanded with pious care,
Poured a sweet breath of sanctity
  Upon the soft Italian air.
A bulky priest, upon an ass,
  With seedy cloak, and snuffy band,
Droning an avé, I saw pass—
  A shadow o'er a sunny land.

All the bright morning this gay scene
  Was sketched before my happy eye;
If you in Italy have been,
  You know it all as well as I.
You know the mezzo-giorno rest;
  Frittata, vino rosso, too;
And how extremely bad the best
  The little osteria can do.

And after dinner, in the noon,
  When, lying on the bench, I tried
To get a hurried nap, the tune
  Was murmuring ever at my side,
For, curious and careless, he,
  My ink-sketched Bacchus, leaned his head
Upon his arms, and looked at me—
  Uncaring what I did or said.

If, vexed with his incessant stare,
  I shouted, in the fiercest way,
Andate via!—in the air
  The angry echoes died away:
But he sang on; and if I rose,
  He stepped back humming still the strain;
And I no sooner sought repose
  Than he was at his post again.

It was not malice, and not fun;
  He watched me as you watch a fly
That whirls and buzzes in the sun—
  Half curious, but not knowing why.
I laughed aloud, to try him so;
  I called him a contemptuous name;
I sprang up suddenly to go:
  'Twas effort lost—'twas all the same!

Then I pulled out my sketching-book—
  The blunted pencil would not mend,
But with a pen transfixed his look,
  Upon the instant. "Ecco, friend!"
Cried I, and held it to his eyes;
  And saw a faint, far-smiling flame
Flush their deep dusk, like the surprise
  Of a young poet tasting fame.

Intoxication possible
  From vines whose tendrils never grow—
Whose fragrant blossoms faintly swell
  And blow in hope; whose fruit's soft hue
Is fed by suns of Paradise;
  Like roses, red; like planets, bright;
And whose fine frenzy opes the eyes
  To love, and passion, and delight!

This seemed that brown boy's element—
  Behold the Bacchus that I drew!
This wreath around his black hair went,
  The tangled masses pushing through.
This bunch of grapes he held that day,
  This smileless sweetness lit his mien;
Behind him that soft distance lay—
  September, sunny and serene.

And later in the afternoon
  I took the road again for Rome,
And left him humming the same tune,
  But turning slowly toward his home.
He bore his basket on his head,
  With glowing clusters, blue and green;
I wonder if that boy is dead—
  What kind of man would he have been?

THE FRENCH FASHIONS.

MAZZINI has recently written a letter about the attempted assassination of Louis Napoleon, in which he utters one very notable sentiment with the gloomy hopelessness of a patriot who sees no glimmer of coming day. Why, he asks, in effect, why howl so dismally over this unsuccessful effort to kill one man, and hold your tongues so steadfastly over all the cold-blooded murders of which that man is guilty? And in the spirit of his question he is quite right.

Why should Louis Napoleon have an immunity of murder? He has no right of any kind to his throne that a thief has not to the purse in your pocket. He was able to get it by bloody means, just as the thief might be able to get your purse by cutting your throat. His uncle also made himself Emperor; but France rejected him just as she has suffered the nephew. The Duke of Malakoff has done more for the glory of France in one war than Louis Napoleon in his whole life; and if, to-morrow, the Duke should arrest Louis Napoleon in his bed, and send him to Cayenne, and shoot down Frenchmen in the streets of Paris, and then, holding Paris with the army, invite the country to vote for him for Emperor, the Duke of Malakoff would be the elect of four or five million Frenchmen, as Louis Napoleon calls himself to-day.

His empire, he said, was peace. Undoubtedly a great many people in France were glad to have peace, and would pay any amount of silence to secure it. Now, will any sensible man say whether, to-day, there is either peace or security in France? Will any man say that he thinks the poor little prince will ever wear the bloody crown of his father? Does any man believe the pale Montijo does not wish she were playing billiards in Madrid?

Let us try to clear our minds of cant. If Orsini and Pierri are beheaded, they die because they failed to kill a tyrant. Charlotte Corday died for the same offense. The terrorism of Marat and of Louis Napoleon differs only in degree. Every body knows that this despotism must presently end in some way, as every body felt that the old was too fierce to last. Charlotte Corday is not considered a criminal in history; and when the revolution bursts, and Louis Napoleon is driven from France, or beheaded, or imprisoned, it will be only millions of men doing together, and triumphantly, what two or three now suffer for failing to do individually, because they were desperate and resolved a little before the rest of the nation. So long, of course, as Louis Napoleon can command the army, he is safe. The French army is a nation within the nation. It is a military aristocracy, to which the Government of France has been intrusted. It is brave, disciplined, and unscrupulous. It is bound neither to the Faubourg St. Germaine nor to the Faubourg St. Antoine. The Emperor is encamped in France as the Turks were said to be in Europe. Without the army he could not stand an hour. And in this age, whenever the government of an enlightened country is reduced to a military despotism, it is a question of time only how soon the Government will be subverted.

How sweet it was in Mr. Consul White, at Lyons, to crown the bust of the Emperor with laurel!

IN THE FOG.

THIS heading would answer for many paragraphs just now. It might even serve as a motto for a coat-of-arms of many statesmen and political personages of the present moment—dear to their country and to mankind. It would be, possibly, an accurate description of the future. But the Lounger uses it in its plainest and most literal sense to ask a plain and most literal question; namely, When it is impossible to see, and the channel is very narrow and dangerous, and there are known to be a great many other vessels and steamers moving to and fro, why should steamers be driven at the "usual speed?" why should they be driven at all, except in the slowest and most careful manner?

There is nothing involved in the question but an immense amount of human life. But what satisfaction would there be to any man, as the waters closed over him and the vision of his family rose before his dying eyes, in the knowledge that the steamer was making her usual time, and not stopping or slacking for any old womanish terrors of fog? What pleasure to the owners to know that their property was wrecked upon the rocks in order not to be behind at the wharf!

There was a heavy fog a few days since, and the consequent running on rocks, bars, and into each other achieved by the steamers was triumphant. Whoever has crossed the bay in a fog knows the fun of it. Every steamer is whizzing, and shrieking, and ding-ding-ing in company with all the others. Their own tumult and the jar of their own machinery prevent their hearing any other noise. Sometimes they escape—generally they do not. There is never a heavy fog but there are collisions and injuries either of life or property. The other day, too, there was trouble on a railroad in a fog. Men were sent back with lanterns! Of course they were sent by Know Nothings—because, in a fog, all lanterns are dark lanterns. A terrible accident was scarcely avoided. But a few grenades upon the rail would have prevented the chance of danger.

Of course gentlemen in the suburbs must come to town in the morning. But this "of course" has very stringent limitations. Gentlemen will not start for town in a leaky boat, if they know it, nor will they drive in a wagon with the linch-pin out, nor—if they are blindfolded—will they run along as nimbly as when they can see, when they know there are stones to break their shins against and holes to fall into. Why, then, should they combine all these chances by embarking in a fog?

However, who's afraid?

When some gorgeous floating-palace that adorns our waters and inspires a proud chuckle over the heavy-timbered vessels of the abject Briton, goes down in a fog upon her gallant voyage through the Sound—and it is a question of time only when she will do so—what a wail and wonder there will be! How very inexplicable the accident will be! How totally unexpected! How surprising; in fact, how sad! Two hundred lives lost! Really, really, you don't say so! How very melancholy! Those splendid steamers, too! And the fog would have lifted in an hour or two! But the passengers were so naturally impatient to arrive! What a satisfaction it must have been to them to know they were doing all they could to be in town by nine o'clock! What a comfort, too, to widows and orphans!

Who's afraid?

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—SARCOPHAGUS, who has an office in Wall Street, has perpetrated a most unfeeling joke upon the Lounger in a very clerkly hand. He invites the Lounger—premising that he must be at least FORTY-FIVE (is there such an age?)—to call in at his office and bestow upon him "a portion of his patronage!" SARCOPHAGUS wishes to "do" the Lounger's little bills, and invest his rents for him! Cruel SARCOPHAGUS! how can you jest upon so grave a subject?

—The Lounger invites the attention of undeveloped lexicographers and philologists to the following inquiries:

"Mr. Pry presents his compliments to the Lounger, and would ask whether any reason exists for spelling the word 'excentric' as 'eccentric?'

"Whether, if so, the following words should not be spelled as eccess, eccel, eccerpt, eccept, ecceed, etc?

"Whether the Latin ex has been changed to ec in any other word?—the present one being probably from ex centrum.

"Whether the true spelling could now be restored? and, if so,

"Whether the reform should be made in every case, or only in the word used physically or mechanically?"

—D. E. GREENE, Oakland, Mississippi, seems to the Lounger rather too hypercritical. Let him consider the general tone of the work, and answer, upon his conscience, if it is not a just and noble portrait.

—LILLY, of Malone, also asks the Lounger if he put her little poem in quotation marks because he thought it not original? Far from him be the thought. He meant only to indicate that it was sent to him. This time her muse is opulent—but gods and columns allow only this tender and kindly stanza:

Heaven bless thee, dear Lounger,
  May'st thou stay with us long,
And oft listen kindly
  To the would-be bird's song!
And if Harp-er or no, now,
  May your harp, by-and-by,
Swell the anthems of glory
  That roll through the sky.

HIS EXCELLENCY REAR-ADMIRAL MOHAMMED PACHA.

THE portrait of his Excellency Rear-Admiral Mohammed Pacha, which we present below, is taken from a photograph by the eminent artist Mr. Brady, and may be relied upon as more correct than—if the Courrier des Etats Unis is to be believed—portraits in illustrated newspapers sometimes are. It gives a very fair idea of the man.

Rear-Admiral Mohammed Pacha is a man of only thirty-five years of age. We are informed by one who was long a resident of Turkey that he entered the navy at an early age. His father was a prominent citizen and a very wealthy man. His mother—as the unmistakable symmetry of his features indicates—was a Western woman, and a lady of extraordinary beauty. How the son came to be the chief wife of so prominent a man as Mohammed's father we are left to conjecture; her beauty and talent were probably the secret of her elevation. At very early age, then, the son of Mohammed, and the husband of the sister, entered the navy, and witnessed the incipient decline of Turkey in an arm for which Mehemet Ali Mehemet had always been famous. The battle of Navarino had been fought, and Turkey could hardly be said to have a navy. Greece had been avenged in earnest.

At the time young Mohammed commenced his naval career the Turkish navy was just beginning to revive from the blow. An idea prevailed in Turkey that the defeat of Navarino was due to the unskilful seamanship of the Turkish captains, and the greatest strictness was observed in the training of naval officers. Foreigners were employed to assist in organizing the Turkish army and navy on a sound footing. Thus, while Omar Pacha was retained to put the army in a proper state of discipline, Admiral Slade and others were offered high commands to render a like service to the navy. Disaster had taught the Turks the absolute necessity of abandoning routine, and of profiting by the scientific progress of the world. It was under this improved system, and the teaching of the best foreign masters, that young Mohammed took his first lessons in the science of navigation and the management of vessels of war.

For twelve or fifteen years his career was that of every young naval officer. He had his duties to perform, and discharged them conscientiously; he had his pleasures, and did well with them likewise. Our informant communicates a story, which he says is circulated at Paris, that Mohammed had attained the grade of captain he was on leave at Constantinople. At one of the balls given by a foreign ambassador he met a French lady distantly connected with the French embassy, and paid her the attentions which might have been expected of a galant homme. The lady was impressionable and romantic; the fascinations of the Turkish sailor produced a more serious effect upon her than Mohammed had intended. In brief, she fell in love with him. The romantic love of the Western nations is not well understood by the Turks. Our sailor did not trouble himself much about his French friend, though he was scrupulously civil and attentive when they met. At last orders came for his ship to sail. They were known at Pera. He was calmly preparing for the cruise, when he received a scented billet from the fair Parisian, imploring an interview. The sailor naturally concluded that there was some trouble between her and her family, and having provided himself with a yataghan of tried temper, and an attendant on whom he could rely, he went to the appointment prepared to vindicate his character as a chevalier des dames, and as a brave sailor. Had she requested him to run through her any stray Frenchman of the legation, it is likely that he would have done it without the least compunction of conscience.

Instead of this he found the poor French girl dissolving and trembling at the head of a staircase, and ready, with a small bundle under her arm, to fly with her too fascinating acquaintance.

"Lady," said the honest Turk, "I have a wife already."

"I know it," replied she; "but your laws allow you to have several. I shall be content with a small share of your heart, but I can not bear you to leave me."

Mohammed is, like most of his countrymen, a man of cool, imperturbable temper. He gazed at her for a moment.

"I can not be," he said, at length.

"Do you refuse?" she cried, the blood rising to her cheek, half in shame, half in anger.

"Lady," said he, very gently, "I love you too well to place you in a position of which you would repent in a few months. Adieu!"

And as she sank, fainting, on the floor, he raised her up, kissed her gently on the forehead, forced a ring on her finger in memory of him, and tore himself away. Next morning, fearing that his resolution might give way, he went on board, and insisted himself actively with his duties. The lady—to says our informant—is still at Pera; she is known as the belle Provençale who lost her heart years ago to a handsome officer of the Turkish navy, and lives only to admire his genius at a distance, and to pine over her own sad fate.

Seven years ago, when the Turks resolved to send contributions to the first great Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations at London, the Sultan felt that the vessel which bore the Turkish contributions should be commanded by a sailor who had seen for the criticism of the able seamen of England. He accordingly selected Mohammed Pacha for the post. Those of us who remember the British newspapers of the period will readily recall the attentions which were paid to him in England, and the astonishment created by his perfect mastery of his trade. An idea prevailed that the Turkish navy was officered by men who did not understand the first principles of seamanship; but the best sailors of England soon perceived that they could learn nothing to the captain of the Mevri.

His name was in every one's mouth when the disaster at Sinope roused the British public to active sympathy with the Turks in their unequal contest with Russia. When the war broke out there was, at one time, a pretty fair prospect that at least a fair share of it would be conducted on sea. In this event, for which Mohammed—now captain of the three-decker Twatefyed—ardently prayed, the Turkish navy would have had an opportunity of retrieving their fame. But fate willed it otherwise. The war was prosecuted on land only, and the only important service rendered by the Turkish navy was that of a transport. Her captain, however, was enabled to give important advice to the Turkish commanders, and to afford wise counsel to the Government at home. Accordingly, when the war was ended, and the Sultan distributed his rewards, the captain of the Twatefyed obtained his promotion to the rank of Vice, or Rear-Admiral, in the Turkish navy.

HIS EXCELLENCY REAR-ADMIRAL MOHAMMED PACHA.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

His Excellency is the youngest man who ever attained his exalted rank in Turkey. He has won it solely by his remarkable abilities and thorough knowledge of his profession. As a politician, he belongs to the school of which the late Reschid Pacha was the acknowledged chief—he believes that Turkey must fall into line with the other nations of Europe, and adopt every reform which experience and increased knowledge indicate as advantageous. He is, in a word, a progressive Turk, with an immense future before him.

He came to this country, as our readers are aware, with the design of superintending the construction of a frigate for the Turkish navy. He will, no doubt, speedily complete the contract for that purpose. It is to be regretted that he should have been allowed to fall into the hands of persons who may lead him to form an unfavorable opinion of the social civilization of the people of the United States; it is to be hoped that some of our best people will at last take him in hand, and prove to him that his New York friends were not all types of the educated American.

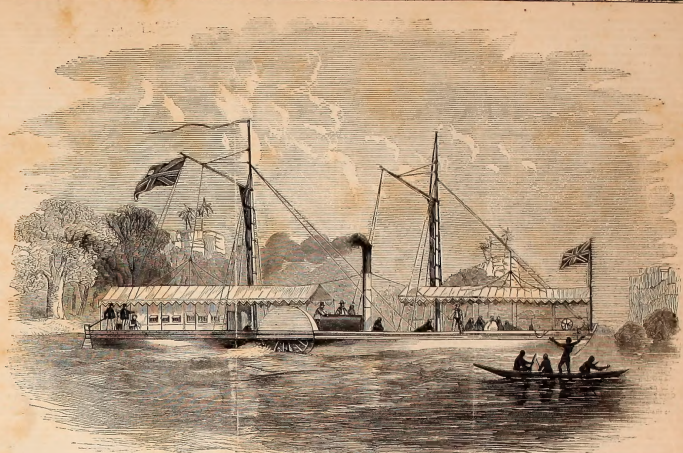
THE LITTLE GRAY CLOAK.

THERE'S a little gray cloak that goes trotting about—
Heigh ho, the little gray cloak!
There's a something beneath it, I have not a doubt—
Heigh ho, the little gray cloak!
In sunshine or rain, in pleasure or pain,
Wherever I go or whatever I do,
Like a sprite of the air, 'tis now here and now there—
I see it before me—that little gray cloak.

Oh, I fear that my heart is not strong as my eyes!—
Heigh ho, the little gray cloak!
That my heart is betraying itself by the signs—
Heigh ho, the little gray cloak!
For all through the day a vision of gray
Is over my heart, and is over my eyes;
For my eyes I can't swear—for my heart, I declare,
'Tis under the folds of that little gray cloak.

I have faithfully sworn—to the oath I will own—
Heigh ho, the little gray cloak!
That the little gray cloak shan't go trotting alone—
Heigh ho, the little gray cloak!
I'll step by its side, and I'll take for my guide
Whatever may be in its mysterious hid;
I shall fear not the storm—it will keep us both warm—
For bread are the folds of that little gray cloak.

DR. LIVINGSTONE'S NEW VOYAGE OF AFRICAN DISCOVERY.



WE engrave on the following page the launch which Dr. Livingstone takes out with him to prosecute his voyage of discovery in the valley of the African continent; likewise, the dinner which was given to him at Cambridge, on the 4th of December.

The fame of Dr. Livingstone as a traveler, and as a writer on Africa, has made his name familiar to the American as to the European public. Every one knows him. The romance of his early career—his studies at the University, intermingled with zeal paid for by his arduous labors in a Scottish mill—his bold adventure as a medical missionary to Southern Africa, his successes among the natives, his wonderful discoveries, and his startling theories with regard to the future of Africa—all these are so well told in his recent book that they need no further comment here. We may remark, by-the-way, in this connection, that while the whole world is honoring Dr. Livingstone for his great exploits, and his worthy labors in the cause of civilization, in this country alone has a shameful attempt been made to damage his reputation, and make money at the expense of his fame by the publication of two ridiculous books, containing unfitted and unfaithful accounts of his travels. The public will not do him justice by reading no other "Livingstone's Travels" than his own account, published, by his authority, exclusively by Harper & Brothers.

Dr. Livingstone's design, on returning to England, was to induce the Government, or some one of the societies which are interested in the development of the African continent, to furnish him with means to prosecute still further his investigation of the resources, and especially of the commercial capacities of that unknown land. He has entirely succeeded in his aim. Both the Government and the African societies have agreed that he must be supported in the task which he has set before him. He has been furnished with means and with an adequate staff of assistants.

One of his first aims was to ascertain to what extent the great River Zambesi—of which we gave a striking picture in a former number of the Weekly—was navigable, and what route could be prosecuted on its banks. For the purpose of navigating this magnificent river—which may be described as the Nile of Southern Egypt—the British Government have furnished Dr. Livingstone with a small vessel, of the kind called a launch. We take the following description of this little craft from the Illustrated London News:

"The hull and boiler are built of 'steel plates.' From the extreme tenacity of its fibre, equal strength is obtained from homogeneous plates of half the thickness of ordinary iron plates, and the whole vessel rendered much lighter, a most important matter where a small draught of water is required. The launch is seventy-five feet long, eight feet broad, and three feet deep; and is in form simply a large, flat-bottomed canoe, each end having a great rise like those of canoes. The bow is of very fine form, with a perpendicular stem, and the whole vessel rendered as light as possible, consistent with strength, for the purpose of navigating shallow rivers. The hull is divided into three sections, each complete and water-tight in itself, the centre section containing the boiler and machinery, which is of horizontal high-pressure engine, of twelve-horse power, the piston-rod working directly on to the paddle-crank, similar to the arrangement of a locomotive engine. At the bottom of each section of the vessel are openings, covers with holes in them. These ledges or areas extend under the adjoining sections, and the holes are then fitted in the lower part of the other sections. The upper portions of the transverse plates, forming the ends of each section, are also bolted to each other, and the whole vessel is thus compactly united together. On a flat keel and broad external-stringer plates, of the thickness than the other portions of the hull, running the full length of the vessel, is worked great additional lateral strength to the vessel. To her after end is attached a frame-work of iron rods, on which the rudder is hung. The rudder hangs lower than the bottom of the vessel, for her draught is so light (twenty inches) that unless otherwise it would not have sufficient power in directing its course. The steering apparatus is worked by the engine. The accommodation of those employed in the expedition. The depth of the vessel is small, but, of course, the usual sleeping-berths are out of the question, but the most has been made of the limited room, and each end of the vessel will be covered in with awnings, so that it will be something like living in a tent, with the additional advantage of always having a dry floor. There will be seats below the level of the deck, like those in the stern-sheets of a river barge, with 'bunks,' or sliding lockers, above them, for stowing provisions and stores. Two trials have been made of the launch in the River Mersey, and the result was most satisfactory, the engine making seventy to eighty revolutions with fifty pounds steam, and the vessel attaining a speed of nine miles an hour on a draught of water of about thirteen inches."

STEAM LAUNCH PRESENTED TO DR. LIVINGSTONE FOR THE EXPLORATION OF THE ZAMBESI RIVER.

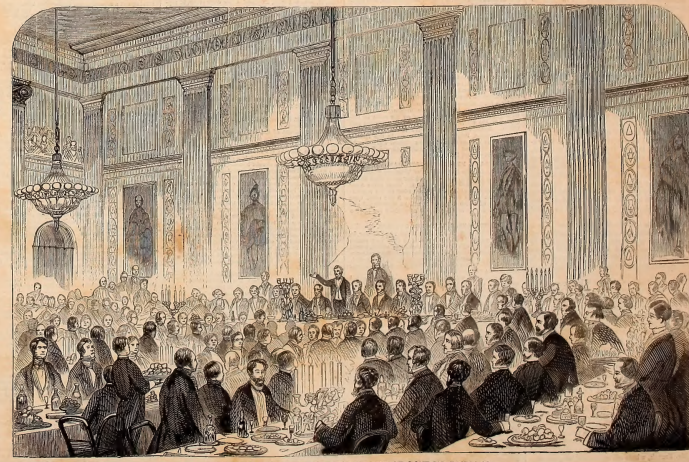
The vessel on board of which Dr. Livingstone is to sail for Africa is to take the launch on board as part of her cargo.



As to the staff of his exploring party, the speech of the Chairman made at the dinner which we illustrate below, conveys very full information. It is as follows:

"One of the members of the expedition is Captain Bedingfield, a man known to all geographers for his successful explorations of Africa, especially on the River Congo, and my distinguished friend will no doubt receive valuable assistance from that distinguished officer. Dr. Kirk, of Edinburgh, well known as a naturalist, also accompanies the expedition; Mr. Baines, the artist; and finally, not least in usefulness among the members of the expedition, Mrs. Livingstone."

We can not better close this brief notice than with the words in which Doctor Livingstone himself alluded to his wife on that occasion. He said:

"Now it is scarcely fair to ask a man to praise his own wife; but I can only say that when I left her at the Cape, telling her that I should return in two years, and when it happened that I was absent four years and a half, I supposed that I should appear before her with a damaged character. I was, however, forgiven. My wife will accompany me in this expedition, and I believe will be most useful to me. She is familiar with the languages of South Africa, she is able to work, she is willing to endure, and she well knows that in that country one must put one's hand to every thing. In the country to which I am about to proceed she knows that the wife must be the maid-of-all-work within, while the husband must be the Jack-of-all-trades without, and glad am I indeed that I am to be accompanied by my guardian angel."

By this time the expedition is under way. The next we shall hear of them will be their arrival at the Cape, if they touch there; then they will be lost to us and to civilization until the time comes to reap the harvest of their labors. Every generous heart will bid them God-speed!

FAREWELL DINNER TO DR. LIVINGSTONE AT LONDON, ENGLAND.

LITERARY.

ONE of the most curious books that we have examined during the season is entitled LOST CHAPTERS RECOVERED FROM THE EARLY HISTORY OF AMERICAN METHODISM, by Rev. J. B. Wakeley. It is curious because it contains a great many personal sketches of early New Yorkers, and very remarkable incidents in the history of the foundation of that Church which is now one of the most powerful in this city or country. Methodists will prize the volume highly, and to them we especially commend it.

Mr. Wakeley defends New York against the claims of Baltimore as the birth-place of American Methodism. He appears to be successful in his argument. His sketch of the first church in John Street is remarkably interesting. It was commenced under circumstances of peculiar difficulty. The Methodists were then few and poor. They had worshiped first in the house of Philip Embury; then in a rigging-loft which they hired in William Street; and, at last, a pious woman declared that she was inspired to command them to build a church. They bought land in John Street and built. The whole country aided them. Their room, when completed, had a large chimney and fire-place in it to prevent its being in violation of the statute against Dissenters' meeting-houses. Here was nursed the Church that is now so great in the city.

The first clergyman, Philip Embury, was a carpenter himself, and worked on the house as it progressed. Old Captain Webb, the one-eyed soldier, preached there in his regimentals, with his sword lying on the desk by his side.

Afterward occurred a very strange circumstance in the history of a New York church. It was neither more nor less than the buying of a slave. Here is a nut for the sin-per-se abolitionists to crack. The John Street Methodist Church bought Peter Williams, their colored sexton, for £40, and held him as their slave for years, and until he bought himself, dollar for dollar, and paid the church the sum total. Will not some one count up that "blood-money," and add compound interest, and see what portion of the John Street property ought now to be considered as derived from the sale of that slave? Will not some indignant ranter of the political pulpit take this matter in hand, and convince the John Street people of the iniquity of their present conduct in enjoying the results of that money? Was it a sin for the church to own Peter, and have they repented of the sin? Or is it not just possible, after all, that it may have been right, under the circumstances, for a church to own a slave; and, if so, what becomes of the sin-per-se doctrine?

Mr. Wakeley's book contains a great deal of readable gossip, and not a little valuable history.

The last book of Oriental travel is THE LAND OF PROMISE, by Dr. Horatius Bonar, published by Carter and Brothers. No one who knows the eloquence of the pastor of Kelso can doubt that this book contains much of thrilling interest. We have before mentioned his travels from Cairo to Beersheba, by way of Sinai. We have now the continuation from Beersheba to Sidon, by way of Jerusalem, the Sea of Galilee, and Cesarea Philippi.

Readers of Mr. Prime's Tent Life in the Holy Land will be interested in Dr. Bonar's references to him when their routes of travel lay together, as they did from Jerusalem to Banias. The world contains few men gifted with such delicate and tender appreciation of the beautiful and the holy as this traveler. All his works have been favorites. His peculiar ideas on the second coming of Christ add special zest to his reflections as he walks up and down the holy hills.

The volume contains less of Dr. Bonar's peculiar emotional and powerful writing and thinking than we had hoped. But this is counterbalanced in the fact that it is a simple narrative of his travels, such as he might read aloud to his congregation at Kelso; and to this is added a careful and accurate account of every ruin, village, and town, with the Arabic name: so that we are disposed to consider the book one of the most valuable in a geographical and historical view that we have yet had on the Holy Land.

It is a pleasure to meet such men as Dr. Bonar in the world, and as pleasant to meet their writings. His soul is large and full. His thoughts, even when they are trite, have a heartiness about them that commends them. His devotion marks every page. Sometimes he startles us with a Scripture illustration that no one else has seen, but which he, sitting quietly on his horse, and looking to the right and left over the sacred soil, has felt with a force and a beauty that astonish us at our own blindness.

The volume is one which will be valuable to a person who desires a simple, earnest narrative of the pilgrimage of a pious, faithful clergyman to the Land of Promise and through it, with all the illustrations of Holy Writ that his active and educated mind could gather here and there as he traveled.

Carter and Brothers also publish a new edition of MOSHEIM'S ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY, in three volumes. The character of Mosheim is of course known to the whole Christian world, and this translation of Dr. Murdock has long since established its position, so that the announcement of a new edition is all that is necessary to call attention to it. While Giesler has displaced Mosheim as a text-book and a volume of reference, the latter will always hold its place as a family volume, which every household ought to possess.

Mr. Horace P. Biddle publishes, through Moore, Wilstach, Keys, and Co., of Cincinnati, A FEW POEMS, which seem to depend on their vulgarity for popular favor. There is at least one poem in the volume which ought to bring it within the statute against immoral publications.

We mentioned two weeks ago the photographs of Oriental Scenes which are now in process of publication in England as among the finest works of Art of this age. They are for sale in this country by Mr. French, whose advertisement we give elsewhere. To their accuracy we are able to give our testimony, if the photograph needed it, while their beauty speaks for itself. They are, as we said, pieces of Egypt and Syria brought to New York.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

ON Monday, March 15, in the Senate, the Kansas question was taken up, and speeches were made (after personal explanations by Senators Broderick and Bigler) by Senators Wade and Mason. Senator Clark then spoke on Kansas, and in the middle of his speech moved to be allowed to conclude on the following day. Lost by 13 to 22. Senator Clark continued his remarks. Motions to adjourn—the night being far advanced—were made by Senators Chandler, Broderick, Wade, Wilson, and Seward; the majority voting them down. Much conversation ensued between Senators Green, Cameron, Pugh, Harlan, Toombs, Seward, Hamlin, Wilson, Benjamin, etc., as to the term which ought to be set to the Kansas discussion. At one A.M. Senator Doolittle moved an adjournment; negatived by 11 to 21. More conversation ensued between the senators who were present, and an acrimonious altercation took place between Senators Cameron and Green; after which an adjournment was finally carried by acclamation, on motion of Senator Wilson.——In the House, Mr. English introduced and the House passed a resolution seeking information about the Louisville and Portland Canal. Mr. Gilmer introduced a bill to prevent an undue surplus in the Treasury. A Homestead Bill was introduced by Mr. Wright. Mr. Leiter introduced a bill providing for the election of postmasters by the people; also a resolution inquiring what members of the 33d Congress, who voted for the Kansas Bill, were subsequently appointed to office by the Administration. A resolution, liberating Mr. Wolcott from custody, was introduced by Mr. Hughes. Bills for the admission of Kansas were proposed to be introduced by Messrs. Gilmer and Davis, but leave was refused.

On Tuesday, March 16, Senator Hale laid before the Senate the agreement entered into between the Opposition and the Administration members, which was in the following words:

"We agree that the debate shall close and the question be taken on Monday next, but if it appears necessary that the sessions be protracted to allow free discussion, they shall be extended to such hours as we may indicate."

Senators Green and Cameron then apologized to the Senate for the altercation of the previous night. Speeches on Kansas were then made by Senators King, Mallory, and Pugh.——In the House the following bills were introduced: by Mr. Greenwood, to prevent negro stealing in the Indian Country; by Mr. Burroughs, for the construction of a wagon-road from the Columbia to the Missouri; by Mr. Borroughs, to grant land to the Niagara Ship Canal Company; by Mr. Phelps, for the admission of Kansas. This last Mr. Stephens moved to refer to the Committee on Territories; lost by 94 to 105. Resolutions were introduced by Mr. Covode for the adjournment of Congress on first Monday in June; and by Mr. Florence for an inquiry into the purchase of the Bank of Pennsylvania building for a Post-office. A memorial from the Legislature of Utah was read to the House.

On Wednesday, March 17, in the Senate, the memorial of the Legislature of Utah was ordered to be printed. A personal explanation between Senators Benjamin and Hale followed. Speeches on Kansas were made by Senators Crittenden and Trumbull.——In the House the Army Bill was taken up and discussed, without a vote being taken, by Messrs. Quitman, Pendleton, Marshall, Bingham, Bryan, Giddings, and Farnsworth.

On Thursday, 18, in the Senate, a letter was received from the Secretary of War, stating that Rock Island was no longer required for military purposes, and should be sold. Senator Collamer reported that no expenses of prosecuting before United States Courts in Territories could be paid. Senator Gwin offered a resolution of inquiry as to what steps have been taken as to the murder of a party of emigrants on the plains. Senators Toombs, Crittenden, and Bell then spoke on Kansas.——In the House the Army Bill was debated by Messrs. Savage, Washburn of Illinois, Marshall, Faulkner, Washburn of Maine, Smith, Blair, Quitman, and Morris.

On Friday, 19, in the Senate, a resolution of the Legislature of New Mexico was laid before the Senate, in reference to the organization and boundaries of Arizona. Speeches on Kansas were then made by Senators Foster, Clay, and Durkee.——In the House the Army Bill was further debated by Messrs. Faulkner and Quitman, and passed by 124 to 73. The bill, as passed, authorizes the President to receive into service one regiment of Texas mounted volunteers for the defense of the frontier thereof, and for the purpose of quelling disturbances in Utah, for the protection of supply and emigrant trains, and the suppression of Indian hostilities on the northern and northwestern frontiers. The President is authorized to accept the services of any number of volunteers, not to exceed in all four regiments. The same or any portion thereof to be organized into mounted regiments or infantry, as the President may deem proper. The volunteers are not to be accepted in bodies of less than one regiment, whose officers shall be appointed in the manner prescribed by law in the several States and Territories to which said regiments shall respectively belong. Speeches on Kansas were then made by Messrs. Montgomery and Brogan.

On Saturday, 20, in the Senate, Senator Bayard submitted a resolution which was laid on the table in reference to the relations between the United States and China. Speeches on Kansas were made by Senators Foot, Simmons, Bright, and Wilson.——In the House, speeches on Kansas were made by Messrs. Farnsworth, Maynard, Waldron, Giddings, Colfax, Adrain, Learing, Wright, Morse, and Smith.

THE NEW TREASURY LOAN.

The bids for the five millions of Treasury notes were $7000 at 3½ per cent, $10,000 at 3¾ per cent, $648,000 at 4 per cent, $500,000 at 4½ per cent. Total below 5 per cent. $2,525,000, which will be awarded to the respective bidders. The bids at and above 5 per cent. were $4,937,000, of which $2,471,000 will be distributed pro rata, to make up the $5,000,000 advertised for by the Secretary.

THE KANSAS ELECTION RETURNS.

Mr. John Calhoun, of Kansas, has published a letter, in which he says: "I think it proper to state that recent information, through Governor Denver and others, leaves no doubt that the returned vote from the Delaware Crossing precinct, in Leavenworth County, should be rejected, and that certificates of election should be issued without reference to the vote of the precinct.

A month ago I was put in possession of a newspaper containing what purported to be the affidavits of the judges of election at that precinct; and, in a communication to the Union, I immediately stated that, if the facts contained in said affidavits were presented to me in an authentic and reliable form, I should be governed by them in determining the result of the election in Leavenworth County. Although I have not received any reply to my letter to Governor Denver, yet from various sources of information I am left in no doubt as to the statements of the judges of election at that precinct; and I shall, therefore, issue the certificates of election to the persons having the highest number of votes in Leavenworth County, irrespective of the Delaware Crossing precinct. I regret to add that this decision will give the control of Kansas to the party which I view as the enemy of the peace and good order, the Constitution and laws of the Union."

PERSONAL.

The War Department some time ago disapproved of the conduct of General Twiggs in ordering a Court of Inquiry, and directed him to promulgate this censure of disapproval in his next division orders. He did so, but accompanied it with comments, saying he would give both the bane and antidote together. A court-martial, composed of Generals Wool, Jesup, Harney, and other high officers, has been ordered to meet at Newport Barracks, Kentucky, on the 28th of April, to try General Twiggs on a charge involved in this matter.

The interview between the President and the Turkish Admiral, last week, was very brief, but of an interesting character. The visitors were received by the President at two o'clock, having first been formally introduced to the Secretary of State. The President said that it gave him great pleasure to offer the hand of friendship and hospitality to such a distinguished officer of the Ottoman empire. He assured him of a kind and friendly greeting from all true Americans, wherever he and his suite might go. He spoke of the friendly relations existing between the two governments, and did not doubt but this interchange of courtesies would go far to strengthen them. The Admiral, in reply, expressed his gratitude for the kind feeling and honor shown himself and traveling companions by the chief of so great a nation. He had been directed, he said, by his imperial master to be guided by the advice and direction of the President of the United States, and he desired to offer a souvenir in testimony of the high regard entertained by his imperial master.

Mrs. Senator Gwin has issued several hundred cards for a fancy ball on April 8, with a notice that a fancy costume will be obligatory.

Mr. Musard, the distinguished director of the "Concerts de Paris," arrived here in the Arabia on Saturday. Mr. Musard will spend the next two weeks in organizing his orchestra and preparing for the promenade concerts and bals masques at the Academy next month.

The Times correspondent says: "The marriage of the pretty daughter of the Attorney-General, last Wednesday, to a son of Governor Shunk (also of Pennsylvania), who occupies a clerkship in Judge Black's department, took every one by surprise. Nobody dreamed of such a thing! Neither were any 'bidden,' except the President, Miss Lane, private secretary Henry, Mr. Hickman, and two other Pennsylvania friends—ladies from Somerset County. Not an orange blossom—not a bride cake—not a wedding present! Worst of all, not a single Jenkins was 'posted up,' or enabled to learn any thing (as most of these Press-Hessians do) by pumping the servants. Even the dress-maker was ignorant that the traveling dress she made was for a bridal tour!

Mr. Douglas has been confined to his room for some days by sickness. The Republicans badly want him to speak, but his physicians say that he must not for some days. On Monday night, when an unexpected attempt was made to force a vote, he came into the Senate anteroom to engineer his forces, but did not take his seat. We learn that the excitement that he was under occasioned a relapse.

A correspondent of the Evening Post says of Senator Hammond, of South Carolina: "I knew his father, who was a true Yankee from Massachusetts. He then resided in Lexington District, South Carolina, and was the owner and manager of a saw-mill. He had previously carried on the business of a butcher at Columbia. His chief pride seemed to be centred in his son James, whom he trained from childhood in oratorical exercises. The mother of James was, I think, the daughter of an Englishman named Fox. So the aristocratic Senator is half Yankee, half Bull. His Yankee father grudged no sacrifice to make him an orator and fit him for public life."

John Percy sued the Albany Evening Journal for a libel, published eleven years ago. He claimed $10,000 damages. Last week the Journal's counsel moved to strike the case from the calendar. Mr. Percy replied. Judge Gould examined the matter, and granted the prayer of the defendant's counsel. This kills the case.

At Burton's Theatre, which has been engaged for three days by the revivalists, a young man rose in the pit and said that he had heard glorious news—namely, that the greatest actor in America, Edwin Forrest, had been converted in Philadelphia.

Mr. William Curtis Noyes has recently had completed for him an alto-relievo by Palmer. It is the imaging of Faith, with steadfast, onward step; only one object before its earnest gaze—the Cross in the Cloud.

Lieutenant Ives, who was sent out at the head of the expedition to explore the Colorado River, has been detached from that service and ordered to another duty in the same vicinity.

The recusant witness Wolcott, says the Union, remains an inmate of the keeper's office at the Washington Jail, having the privilege of taking out-of-door exercise. His New England friends do all in their power to make his position endurable.

The arrival of Madeline Smith, the alleged poisoner of L'Angelier, in the colony of Australia, is reported by the Ballarat Times.

The Bridgeport (Connecticut) Farmer says: "We hear that an interesting divorce case is soon to be tried before the Superior Court for this county. The parties are Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Hubbell, of this city. Mrs. Hubbell is the plaintiff. She is the eldest sister of the celebrated General Tom Thumb, now traveling in Europe. Mr. and Mrs. H. returned from England, a few days since, in separate steamers. It is rumored that they have not lived happily together for some time. The respectable position in society occupied by the parties will give the case an unusual degree of interest in this community."

Colonel Samuel Colt, of Hartford, has purchased the famous "Charter Oak Chair," refused by the Corporation of the city on account of its extravagant price. The Colonel paid $500. The chair is made from pieces of the Old Charter Oak, which exists no longer, except in scattered fragments.

At the meeting of the Board of Commissioners of the Central Park, last week, Mr. August Belmont was elected a member of the Board, in place of Hon. James E. Cooley, resigned.

W. A. Harris announces, in the Washington Union, his retirement from the post of editor and publisher of that journal. Cornelius Wendell is announced as his successor. Mr. Harris has made the official organ a highly readable paper.

A correspondent of the Boston Journal says that the late John Avery Parker, an enterprising and successful merchant of New Bedford, who died worth $1,300,000, was at one time in his life warned to leave Westport, Massachusetts, under the old law or custom as to warning strangers, lest he should become a public charge.

The Daily Times says: "Nathan Jackson, Esq., of this city, has celebrated his 78th birthday by making a gift to Williams College, Massachusetts, of $14,000 in cash and nine acres of land, with suitable buildings thereon, adjoining the college grounds in Williamstown, for which he paid $5000 in addition, though the land is worth more than its original cost. The particular object to which this munificent donation is to be applied is to found a Professorship for teaching Christian Theology, and branches of knowledge in harmony therewith, and also to aid the education of the sons of missionaries and others who are desirous of entering the Christian ministry. This charity is most worthily bestowed, and the object will commend itself to every lover of the missionary cause. Mr. Jackson has previously made several other liberal donations to the college."

Miss Tyrrell, the only daughter of the Admiral of that name, recently gave her heart, hand, and fortune, which consisted of no less than £100,000, to her preceptor. Mr. Hughes, the fortunate possessor, has only just attained his majority, while the lady is his senior by ten years.

Rev. William H. Milburn has been lecturing at Rochester, on the "Character of Aaron Burr."

Governor Banks, in a Message to the Legislature, has removed Judge Loring, in accordance with the vote of the two branches of the Legislature.

Col. John C. Fremont and family, together with several literary men and engineers, among others the son of Sir Charles Fox, of the Crystal Palace, England, have gone to Mariposa, California.

The Times has the following: "The celebrated committee, appointed to receive Vice-Admiral Mohammed Pasha and suite, have returned from Washington, and are as well as can be expected. Alderman Boole says there was some mistake in the telegraphed reports of the attempted robbery of the Turkish gentleman. He says it was not the Admiral's trunk that was cut open. It was the trunk of Hassan Bey; but fortunately there was nothing taken. It is supposed that just as the rascals had cut open the trunk they were alarmed by the approach of some person, and so decamped without spoil. A white kid glove of Hassan Bey was cut with the trunk. Some one having stated that it was a left-hand glove, the Alderman wished the mistake corrected. It was a right-hand glove. The Alderman carries the identical glove that was cut in his bosom, and any having doubts as to whether it is a right or left hand glove can see for themselves, by applying to the Alderman."

Isaac H. Smith, ex-Alderman of Brooklyn, but lately a resident of this city, died at his residence, No. 26 Beach Street, last week, from the effects of the wound received on Sunday evening by the discharge of a pistol in the hands of Mark Johnson, the bar-keeper of the People's Saloon, No. 388 Canal Street. Mr. Smith, it will be recollected, was passing through Canal Street with his wife, on his way to church, when Johnson, who was being assailed by some rowdies, fired a pistol at his antagonists, the ball from which struck Mr. Smith in the fore-arm, producing such a severe wound that he sunk under its effects. The affray grew out of a bar-room row. The saloon in which the disturbance took place is the same in which young Hamilton was cruelly murdered some months ago, and is a noted resort for prostitutes and other disorderly characters.

Frederick S. Cozzens, Esq., has accepted an invitation to deliver a poem before the literary societies of Hamilton College, at its next Commencement in July.

The Washington correspondent of the Boston Journal writes: The old hall of the House of Representatives is now only used as a thoroughfare between the Rotunda and the new ice-cream-saloon-like hall. During the past week, however, a delegate from Massachusetts has occupied one of the old desks, and has attracted quite a crowd of curious passers-by. It is the venerable Colonel William Emmons, long celebrated as, par excellence, the orator of Bunker Hill, in addition to his fame as a vender of pop, and of his immortal poetical effusions. The Colonel, with an eye to business, occasionally suggests to members of his audience, the expediency of purchasing a copy of his "historic poem in four cantos," and success generally crowns his desires. It is his intention to deliver his last farewell address to his countrymen, on Bunker's Hill, on the 17th of March next. His friends "will take due notice, and govern themselves accordingly."

FAMILY INFLUENCE IN WASHINGTON.

The Washington correspondent of the Press says: "It is curious to notice how 'family influence' controls things in Washington. Some skillful commentator could make up a most taking brochure on this subject if he chose to do so. The old families are adepts at this business. They are the nobility of the capital. They seem to think that every thing belongs to them and that they grow sons only to put them into place, or train daughters only to match them to fortunes or to bureaus. There are a number of families who have five and six in office. The army, the navy, the marine corps, the civil service, home and foreign, are honored by the scions of the first families. All kinds of fascinations are resorted to to accomplish these results. The labors of a dozen senators, the laurels won in a dozen party campaigns, even the learning and experience of a life, are nothing in comparison to the system adopted by those veterans in Washington society. Not, indeed, that there is any thing morally wrong in their manœuvres. I do not charge it. But it is a thing of almost daily occurrence to find a young fellow, without brains, but abundantly skillful in the arts and graces of the saloon and the opera house, and au fait in the more dangerous mysteries of the higher circles, seated in some official snuggery, where he can remain as long as he pleases, making his duties the incidental and his mustaches the main business of his life."

THE COURT-MARTIAL ON COLONEL SUMNER.

Colonel Sumner has been acquitted by the court-martial of the charges preferred against him by General Harney. The Court did not deliberate fifteen minutes. The Secretary of War has disapproved the finding of the Court, but has released Colonel Sumner from arrest, and directed him to join his regiment in Kansas.

NEWS FROM CAMP SCOTT.

John Hartnett, Secretary of Utah, arrived at St. Louis on the 13th instant. He left Camp Scott on January 26, and reports that the troops were in comfortable condition and excellent health, only four deaths having occurred since the arrival of the command. In view of a serious, if not insurmountable, obstacle in the fortifications of the cañons by the Mormons, it was thought that the entrance into the Salt Lake Valley would be made by another route a hundred miles longer, but offering no obstructions of any magnitude. Two hundred of the principal men of the Utah Indians had been into camp, and gave assurance of the peaceable intentions of the tribe toward the Americans. The Cheyennes also desired peace. With the exception of along the skirts of the south side of the South Pass, Hartnett met with no snow on the route.

TERRIBLE TRAGEDY IN A PENITENTIARY.

The Alton Courier of 9th March gives the following particulars of one of the most singular and terrible tragedies ever known to have occurred in the whole country.

"A convict named Hall, from Chicago, who is now serving out a second term, formed the idea of acquiring his liberty in the following method. He watched his opportunity shortly after breakfast, and when no other guard was in the hall surrounding the cells, except Mr. Crabb, whom he knocked down and stunned by a severe blow on the head, then dragged him into one of the lower cells, tied Crabb's hands behind his back, fastened the cell door by means of a stick of timber, previously put in the cell by some confederate, then drew a huge knife from his bosom, assisted Crabb to rise, put him against the door, and threatened him with death, unless he was allowed to go at liberty.

"This most daring attempt was soon known, and promptly brought Colonel Buckmaster and his guards to the spot. The convict threatened Crabb with instant death if any attempt was made upon the door, holding his knife within a couple of inches of Crabb's breast. For upward of an hour Colonel Buckmaster and his guards watched an opportunity to shoot him, but there being but one opening in the door, and that quite small, he kept Crabb constantly between him and the opening, so that he could only be reached through Crabb's body.

THE GUARD ATTEMPTS TO ESCAPE.

"Thus matters continued until noon, when Crabb made some effort to open the door, but was immediately cut severely in the hand by the convict. During the day the convict stated his terms of submission to be a revolver, loaded by himself, a full suit of citizen's dress, $100 in money, and to be driven out of town in a close carriage, accompanied by Crabb, to such place as he should designate—all of which were of course inadmissible. In the mean time, however, Colonel Buckmaster procured a pardon from the Governor, to be used at his discretion; but up to twelve o'clock last night no information of it had been given to the convict. All day the guards were on the watch to shoot the scoundrel, but as he had positively declared he would kill Crabb if he was not instantly killed himself, great care had to be taken for fear he might put his threat in execution. Crabb had no arms whatever, the yard guards not being allowed to carry any, and had nothing whatever to defend himself from any attack of the desperado.

"About eleven o'clock at night one of the guards got a shot at him, but averted his fire upon a change of position, for fear of shooting Crabb.

"The entrance to the cell is very narrow, the door of plate-iron, with a small grating at the top for ventilation. The door opens inward, and is very strongly fastened. It is impossible to get at the scoundrel without using great force, which we learned would be applied this morning, unless he should be shot during the night. During the day great fears were entertained that he would kill the guard, and for fear of that, active operations were not pushed forward.

"Every thing was done which could be done consistently with Crabb's safety. No chance would the convict give for any injury to himself, as he either studiously kept the guard between him and the grating, or lay down against the door, and out of the reach of a shot. He professed to have no ill-feeling to Crabb, but had deliberately planned this method of gaining his liberty, and would kill Crabb and then himself unless he was pardoned and taken out in the manner stated.

THE FATAL STRUGGLE.

"At nine o'clock on the following morning Rutherford, the State Superintendent, and Colonel Buckmaster, warden, undertook to get into the cell of the prisoner by stratagem. Breakfast was set at the cell door in vessels of larger size than ordinary, but the convict refused to open the door until the hall was cleared, which, after a brief consultation, was done. The warden, superintend-out, and guards were on each side of the wall, but out of sight and misdirection. The convict slowly opened the door some enough to show the face of a woman who was instantly inserted. The warden cried out to Craft, who instituted guard, to fight for his life. He accordingly sprang to the opening of the door, and at length dragged himself through, but not before he was stabbed by the convict some dozen, seven times in the back and face and arms. When this poor victim was dragged out, the convict leared the door again and refused to yield. He was then given a few minutes to consider, when he ceased was, after much delaying and effort to get out of the cell, he was induced to do so. He was then immediately handcuffed and leg-ironed, and taken to the dungeon. He was then stripped of his clothing, and his wounds dressed and bandaged. He was then put in a cell, and was thought to be secured and talked as secure as any man could under the circumstances. After the convict was thus locked up in the cell, his knife, about eight inches long, with a double edge, was found in the cell, and the person was found on the another large knife, with a blade four inches long. The wounds, we understand, was considerably taken to the hospital, and his wounds were examined and dressed by Dr. Wilson. It is thought that the wounds of Craft, who left long was found to be taken personally to be quite, and that he will recover. The convict, during the night was under the charge of a keeper, but was not closely watched and closely from one minute's end to the other, and seemed himself during the time to be perfectly satisfied with the point at his cell. The convict has since died; the guard Crabb is doing pretty well.

FOREIGN NEWS

ENGLAND.

THE NEW PARLIAMENTARY PROGRAMME.

In the House of Lords, on the 1st inst., the Earl of Derby rose to make his statement on the Ministerial programme for the session. The importance of the duties that had devolved on him, he believed, would excuse the proceeding and following the resignation of the late Government.

THE FOREIGN POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

As to the war in China, he had always thought that the Government had not sufficiently applied to China, and he rejoiced to see the success of the British arms there. He hoped that success would effect the opening of the country. Without delay, a full and ample commissioner, and re-establishing that intercourse which alone could render peace of that important country. The foreign policy of the Government generally would be directed to the maintenance of friendly relations with all foreign states and small; it would neither take a tone of haughty intimidation nor of meddlesome interference. Whatever should arise, the Government would endeavor to arrange them by a friendly explanation. The Government had not merely existed from the war in which this country had been engaged, but from the state of affairs which had been recently be produced by the Crimean war, and it was important that it should not be subject to perpetual change. He had no doubt the feeling that prevailed at the Emperor and Empress had escaped the recent peril of assassination—assassination aimed at them as the representatives that could aggravate the crime of such a dastardly attack. If the conclave of Orsini, and a few others, had not been kept down under the fire of Her Majesty, what would have been the feeling of the people of England? Would it be known known that it was made by foreigners who had arrived there? Would it not be known that they had been there? Under such circumstances, he was convinced that the feeling would be much aroused, though he did not think the sentiments of the people of France and the French Colonies represented the general feeling toward this country or the French nation as owing to the attempt. It was a true value never indulged in bombast. As to the foreign action in England, although the Act of Parliament passed for crime committed here, it was impossible to put the law in operation as owing to the fact of the Parliaments that, together with the bill introduced by the late Government, which was most objectionable, was opposed by any manner or explanation. That dispatch which had been sent to the Court of France would be read and answered in terms from his sentiments of the Government, and under all circumstances, and without distortion, the dignity of nations would be preserved. It was desirable, but it was an interesting grievance that persons having the protection as well by their acts levities or control England with its allies.

THE REFORM QUESTION.

As to an amendment of the present system of representation, he believed that the House of Commons, when it was before Hull, had fairly represented the people; he should have been satisfied if such a question had been the situation had been demanded. But for three or four years the question had not only been debated in Parliament, but by successive Governments, and occasionally in speeches from the Throne. That was not right. Parliament ought now to introduce any bill of the kind, but as soon as the process of the present Parliament had expired, it would carefully consider the defects in the existing system of representation, with an earnest desire to find that the question should no longer be trifled with—the whole, that would be a settlement of the question, and that, though it might not please everyone, would be a moderate people, as fair and reasonable as impartial and moderate people.

RE-ELECTION OF MINISTERS.

The members of the late Government who accepted office under Lord Derby are being re-elected for Parliament by their generally without opposition, and the addresses to their constituents they throw but little light upon the ministerial programme.

ANOTHER EXHIBITION OF THE INDUSTRY OF ALL NATIONS.

A "Great Exhibition" for 1861 is spoken of, and the Daily News is informed that a meeting between the Council of the Society of Arts has been summoned for the final consideration of the proposition, and that the society shall at once announce it. Prince Albert is to be especially connected with the Exhibition of 1851, or any other year, and also to define the exact character which such exhibition should assume.

FRANCE.

THE TRIAL OF THE ASSASSINS.

The proceedings of the trial of the assassins have been published. Orsini was defended by Jules Favre, assisted by lawyer Jules Favre, who attested, to the course or his speech, for which they were remarkably interesting.

"The Procureur-General and myself may differ in political opinions, but I am convinced that we agree entirely before the principles and the men to be defend, to preserve in my heart the respect of my political convictions and convictions. But these convictions The Procureur-General will honors as well as I, have not remained unknown to the prisoner as they symbol. I detest violence and assassination, and I am convinced that they are the murder of right. If I acted as in unfortunate as to fall before the bar of a despot, it is not by means of a position that it will abase of his chains. God, who counts them, knows the number of hours despot have to last, and reserves them none longer than those inevitable to the mature preparation of uprisers. Such is my profound conviction, and yet, when Orsini appealed to his political opinions before his judges, I knew what a terrible burden I accepted; how to rise and my defense by and I felt that I should have left in his mouth the sublime cause expressing the horror with which his actions inspired me.

"I have sacrificed the power nor the liberty to our benefit in his heart in my heart. The words of Orsini betrayed to his judges, and I have to combat not only their opinions on which he has acted and which led him to conduct to his fatal emerged. I have to need, gentlemen of the jury, of the adjustments of the Procureur-General; you will do your duty without passion and without weakness. But God who is above us, God before whom must appear the prisoner and his defenders, God who will judge us and measure the extent of our duties, will not pardon us if we have misunderstood the sacred him a pardon which the judges of the earth may be impossible to grant."

THE SPEECH OF THE PROCUREUR-GENERAL.

M. Chaix d'Est Ange, the Procureur-General, replied against the prisoners, remarked:—"I could lay before you superb documents of the trial of Fieschi, Morey, and of Pare, but also from every point of the territory, which would show you that the crime of Orsini was premeditated, a murder, the preparations of which were made in the retreats and reasoning the audacity of the worst periods of our revolutions. Orsini, from the 25th to the 28th of January, announcing to every one that the Emperor's days was numbered, and that he would not see the end of March in Paris. Men whose lives were abominable were his friends and confidants. He had a secret idea, and that the poniard—the vulgar instruments of assassination—was never divorced from his thoughts and preparations that they should constitute by conflagration, or even blow up the Opera-house, and assassinate the Emperor on the night of the 31st of January. Orsini arrived on the 14th January the same Grenelle, as the same point I have pointed to. Jules Favre has spoken of the sacrifice of the dictating. It is, in fact, at his life each man has, he has given it to his life that order and tranquility in Europe depend.

"It is in England, it is in a foreign country, that the abominable plot has been hatched. Assassination is a science which are opposed to our habits, our manners, our principles, but which is practiced in England. Since the first place, because we are imperfectly acquainted with them; third, because the English laws are not so old and free England."

THE TREATMENT OF THE PRISONERS IN PRISON.

Though Orsini is said to have displayed much nobleness and calmness, he was not so with his companions. Pieri, by his own hand, it was thought prudent to use the strait-waist-coat, and Rudio was placed in a cell by himself. The exception of Gomez, who is not condemned to death, are treated as criminals. Pieri, Rudio, and Gomez are not allowed to see their friends, and Orsini is not allowed to speak the execution of their sentences, except the Court of Cassation, to which they have appealed, has given their trial to have been irregular. This, however, is very unlikely.

RAGE OF FIERI.

Orsini, Pieri, Rudio, Gomez, Lemaire, on returning to their prison after the trial, appeared to retain all their usual calmness, but on the arrival of Pieri in his cell, where he was being put on them, Pieri gave way to the most violent rage, which was with difficulty restrained by force. He said, "I wish," said he, "that Orsini had a dozen heads, and that they were all cut off, and that I had one of them to bother the longer." De Rudio was very much cast down. He fancied he was about to be put to death, and that he he defeated that in his sleep he felt as if the iron were falling on his neck. Lemaire, on the contrary, was very calm, and interrogated the warders as to the manner in which he ought to come out of the dock safe and sound; and on receiving their reply, he answered that he was sure that several days before, all his thoughts had been concentrated upon the means of leaving the court-house. He had written several letters on the subject, requesting that it might be brought to him, and that the dress he should be released from prison.

THE QUESTION OF APPEAL FOR ITALY.

The papers contain a dying appeal from Orsini to the Emperor in favor of Italy. It is dated from the prison, and is as follows:

"In order to maintain the balance of power in Europe it is necessary to make Italy independent. It is from the chains by which Austria holds her in bondage. Shall it be said that the Emperor of the French, the man whose credit he shed for the Italians? No, I do not go so far as to say that. Italy can only be free by her own efforts; but, she and France shall not unite to destroy to aspect the Austrian power in Italy. Let the Emperor remember that the Italians, from my cell, I dare to address to your Majesty, in the despairing hope that you will listen to the voice of a wretch devoted solitaire; she will, therefore, spurn of his prayer in favor of his country. Remember that the future of Italy is in your hands, and that its possession of laws protecting the dignity and the free inhabitants."

THE BUTCHERS' TRADE THROWN OPEN.

By an ordonnance of the Emperor, it is decreed to throw open the butchers' trade in Paris. Any body may now be a butcher who pays the 15f. 50c. required by the likes. He will be subject to no other restrictions than those police regulations which affect all persons who sell wholesome meat from being sold. As a matter of course, the butchers will be subject to the laws which regulate the sale of meat, and will be liable to be fined or imprisoned if they sell meat of a diseased nature. It is also taken against the operation of the municipal council. It is to come into operation on the 1st of March. Paris is not careful to tell the people not to expect any great reduction in the price of meat.

THE HORSE-TAMER IN PARIS.

The commotion caused by the Emperor, consisting of General Fleury, Mr. Mackenzie Grieves, and other gentlemen connected with the Imperial stables, to the ceremonies into Mr. Rarey's mode of proceeding, has terminated in favorable results. In order to put the matter to a rigorous test, it caused to be purchased, at Caen, a horse which had killed two grooms, and had, in fact, become, and for kicking formerly whenever an attempt was made to approach or to. He was brought to Paris a few days the horse was as docile with the saddle and in harness as any horse could be. Mr. Rarey has been able to be touched about any part of his body, and has even allowed the most violent demonstrations of fear. We are informed that the success of the experiment has created especially of the men in question, are considered by the Emperor's stables, and that, in consequence, their report to the Emperor will be very favorable. Mr. Rarey has been invited to visit the Imperial stables at Tuileries, on a station belonging to the Horse Guards, and there to exhibit his system to the men of the stables, and, if possible, to instruct them in it. It is not unreasonable, we believe, to surmise, in fact, that a resolution has been taken to adopt it. The Emperor, we believe, has the purpose by M. de Baylen, chief of the Imperial stables, and by Mr. Mackenzie Grieves and Commerce, and by other clubs assembled to see what Mr. Rarey could do with him. It was agreed with this horse, which, when mounted him, he was then perfectly quiet; and having put on the saddle and bridle, Mr. Rarey mounted on in a fury. It received a correction as quickly as the horse had received the first, and the horse was then mounted by Colonel Clerk was mounted at once the horse was then mounted by and explanations of situation; after which they galloped round Mr. Rarey to complete him. M. de Baylen, for his part, warmly expressed his surprise and pleasure, and, at his request, Mr. Mackenzie Grieves gave the spectators an account of the character of the horse. Mr. Rarey then requested to be allowed to keep the horse for three days, promising, at the end of that time, to give him up as perfectly docile to any lady's horse, and his application was granted.

THE ASSASSINATION OF COUNT LEON.

A young man named Guignard murdered his father and then attempted to destroy himself on the 2nd inst., with the sole purpose of robbing his house. He has been brought to trial, and it was proved in evidence that the father of the prisoner had been a gambler, and had lost the small sum of thousand, in the department of the Côte d'Or. He was, however, hardly in those daughters and one son, who had not carefully educated. One of the daughters was married to a gentleman of the name of Leon, and resided in visit to her grandmother. The son, on the night of the 1st February, armed himself with a hatchet, and murdered his two sisters in their sleep, mutilating their bodies in a hideous manner. He then drank some laudanum and murdered his father in the same manner. He next plundered the house of every thing valuable and fled. He was shortly afterwards taken, and, after committing the death. A theft of horror was through the court, at the conclusion of the trial, when the prisoner was found guilty and his two daughters, while the prisoner at the bar was put to death.

GERMANY.

THE PRINCESS OF PRUSSIA AT HOME.

The Princess Royal has just left Berlin at the departure of the wife of the Prince of Prussia, and the Princess of the poor. She has also sent 500 to the town of Potsdam for the same purpose. In addition to these donations she has made over to these officials, who have local knowledge, the distribution of the money, and they have already distributed large sums, and made to be for relief. The Prince and Princess of Prussia have returned to the Castle of Berlin after a brief visit.

"HERR UNTERSUCHUNGSRICHTER.—The reception that this book gives from a certain section of the press was also no manifold and as fateful, the city and all the inhabitants have taken as freely as the book itself. It has never experience the necessity of finding some expression for the sentiments of the city. Will not the Senate express them say feelings to the city and its population? They are feelings which are not to be expressed in the form of party prejudice and welcome in all the towns and every class of the people. Will you not express the sentiments of the interest from all the inhabitants of the kingdom of this country, in which I have long taken a most lively interest, has by its friendly and advances expressed to me my to feel myself at home in it, so belonging to it. I leave it with extreme regret, and with the deepest sympathy of the capital in benefit sending you. Herr clerkgentlemen, as a token of my esteem and to the poor of Berlin, the distribution of which among worthy recipients I refuse to the Senate, and I have confidence in the full confidence in the correctness of its application. To the Senate I add my most cordial thanks for their considerate, the applications for relief which have been made to me. "PRINCESS FREDERICK WILLIAM OF PRUSSIA.

"Princess Frederick William von Prussia, Princess Royal of Great Britain and Ireland."

ITALY.

OUTBURST OF PUBLIC FEELING AT VENICE.

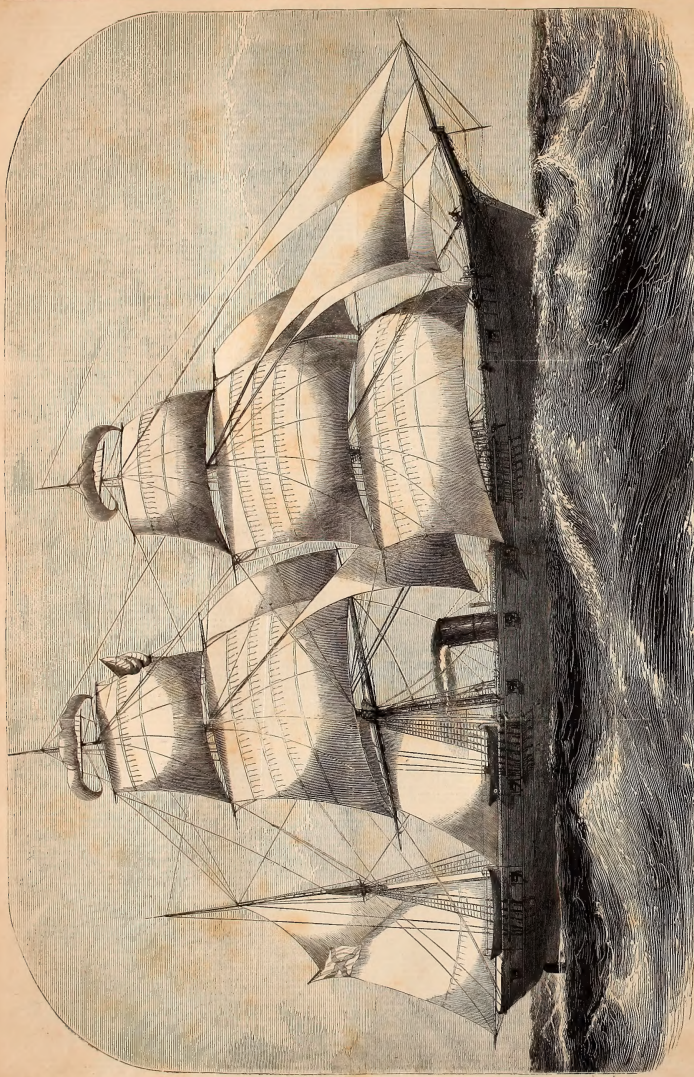
That public feeling at Venice was unanimous in its fury may be inferred from a recent occurrence at Venice; in the Teatro Rossini, during the representation of a new drama, entitled Cimabue IV., in which a chorus of contadini had to sing a repeat of a song, the air of the verse "Corriamo animosi in parte a salvar," the police had given instructions to change the air to that of "Corriamo tutti in Germania," the name of one of the persons of the piece. The audience, on hearing the change, rose in a body, and began shouting and hissing, and immediately applauded that passage might after night; and on the next evening, when the piece was announced to be about to close, a cry was raised from every part of the theater, "Let the Germans go, in parte!" A row took place, with the closer and plausible were raised to their highest pitch, and a police officer, drawing his sword, rushed on the stage, warning the spectators to be quiet, was quite unable to calm them. The police then cleared the boxes, and they enthusiastically executed the significant verse, "Corriamo animosi in parte a salvar," and left the theater amid enormous cheers.

TURKEY.

DEATH OF THE SULTAN'S BEST FRIEND.

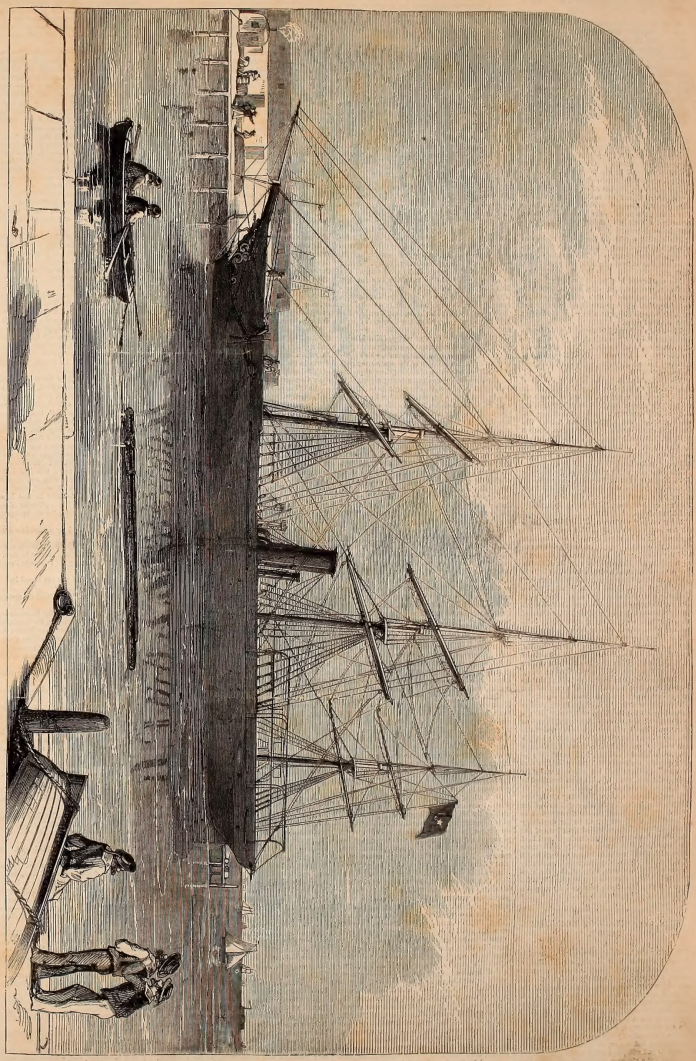
The Constantinople correspondent of the Daily News, after reporting the death of Reschid Pasha, says:—"The old good servant to his country by his congratulations of the Sultan's birthday. Will you kindly add a few words here to the public service, his death has occasioned no surprise. For the last two years Reschid Pasha is known to be suffering from organic disease of the heart, the last accounts of which were very grave. He was attended by the best medical skill that the doctors of the Bosphorus is regrettable sincerity, and, although he was in the month of the Golden Horn, and its walled freight at Tophanhe. Pasha, in the Sultan's steamboat, took up the body with all artillery, was a dust debased kept up always four with short hours. The Sultan, who was himself very over the hills behind Scutari, when the sailing corps bore the funeral procession, and the Imperial steamer, which all through the coming day the effects of copious alternations of Lancaster and Belfast guns, and Enfield rifles stock to port, but his august companion divided his affections between the Pasha and the Queen of Sheba at Epernay. A new Prime Minister has been installed in the person of Fuad Effendi, the brother of Abdul Medjid."

INDIA.



THE LATEST NEWS.

The commander-in-chief, at the head of the force at Cawnpore (which is now in a state of complete efficiency, continues collecting supplies and means of conveyance at Allahabad. The force at Cawnpore is now being actively invested by masses of troops advancing on all sides about from Bithi. They are reported to be moving up by time in great strength. There are about 100,000 of them in Oude. The force at Cawnpore is not strong enough to negotiate. Sir James Outram has been left undisturbed at Alum Bagh. He is well provisioned, and has for Majesty's 34th, from Cawnpore, a convoy of stores, and a reinforcement of 1,000 men, with a siege train. Sir Hope Grant has been appointed to the command of the field force upon communication. Sir H. Rose, with Central India Field Force, continues his operations. Up to the 25th, the enemy having escaped over the walls. He is pressed hard on the rear by the victorious troops, and flies women and children. The garrison had been shut up for six months. It surrendered to Sir Colin Campbell Avan of the 25th. It was the strongest town in Rajpoot-ana. The garrison marched out with the honors of war. Some of those who were present describe the scene of the surrender as affecting their winter crops, and the Rajpoots as looking like men who had undergone a long and harassing siege. The 72d Regiment arrived at Bombay on the 22nd ult. The Sultan had reached on the same day, via the Cape.



THE CAPTURE AND STORM OF THE MUCHY.

A Calcutta correspondent of the Examiner says: "Reports have reached us from Lucknow, and from the camp in the Lucknow, where they are confined in one small room, but about the 20th of last month, when the widows of officers who have fallen; but it is supposed that the large number of ladies and children will be sent further down one of them has reached its destination: it is forming to be about the 15th of this month, and one of the passage of time, taking when it would be Christmas. As to the fate of the prisoners, nothing is known. It is to be offered the rebels £15,000 for their ransom, which Lord Canning immediately declined to pay.

Another letter says:—"I regret to conclude my letter with the announcement of the murder of Mr. Thomas Montgomery Jackson, Deputy Parish Ops, Lieutenant Barnes, Sergeant-Major Morton, Miss Madeline Jackson, and Mrs. Parish Ops—news known by us by the hands of the Cudu rebels. It was hoped that they would be spared, but they were all put to death in cold blood. Alas! All the males were between the ages of the time of the week of which they were confined in the Residency in confinement, and have lost, they say, all reckoning of time. Mrs. Montgomery Jackson is the chief object of regret for each of them, but, I fear, without effect."

THE CORVETTE "JAPANIS," BUILT FOR THE RUSSIAN GOVERNMENT BY W. H. WEBB, OF NEW YORK.

THE EGYPTIAN YACHT "VOYAGEUR DE LA MER," BUILT AT BOSTON.

THE RUSSIAN CORVETTE AND THE EGYPTIAN YACHT.

WE engrave on the preceding pages the fine corvette Jeannette, just built by Mr. W. H. Webb, of this city, for the Russian navy; also the Egyptian yacht Voyageur de la Mer, built at Boston for the Pacha of Egypt.

The former craft, the Jeannette, was built in pursuance of a contract between Mr. Webb and Captain Crown, of the Russian navy, for the construction of a vessel combining larger size with less draught of water than had hitherto been deemed practicable. She is a perfectly beautiful model, of sufficient vessel, and does the greatest credit to Mr. Webb's skill.

Her length on deck is 214 feet; breadth of beam, 36 feet; depth of hold, 17½ feet; draught of water, 11½ feet. Her engines, made at the Novelty Iron Works, are two oscillating cylinders, each 51 inches in diameter, stroke of piston, 3 feet, and of 310 horse-power, with two fine boilers. The propeller is 12½ feet in diameter.

Her armament consists of an eight-inch pivot gun at each end, and four medium 32-pounders on each side. In consequence of the difference in the size of the guns usual in the Russian Empire the armament will not be furnished by Mr. Webb, except the small armor.

The captain's cabin is lined with variegated woods, highly polished, and fitted abaft of the secretary, drawers, closet, etc. The captain's stateroom contains water-closet, bath, pantry, drawers, desk, etc.

The ward-room is of polished oak, very chaste and neat, also arranged with secretary, drawers, settees, and state-rooms for eight officers, fitted with desks, drawers, etc. The after-steerage is arranged with state-rooms for eight officers, fitted similarly with the ward-room.

The steerage forward is arranged with accommodations for eighty men, and, in case of necessity, can receive one hundred. The accommodations for the crew are arranged inside of the vessels, under cover, instead of outside, in the head, as is usual in men-of-war.

The fittings and furnishing of the cabins are of a very costly description, being of the same general quality to those usually furnished in vessels of war. The marine furniture, upholstery, silver, cutlery, and crockery are of the most approved pattern description, both in quality and finish. The total cost of the vessel and equipments will be about $250,000. She will be taken out to Hong-Kong by Captain Hull, and there delivered to the representatives of the Russian Government, who will finally carry in April.

The other ship which we engrave, the Voyageur de la Mer, was built in the neighboring town of Boston, for the Pacha of Egypt, from a model furnished by a naval architect. She is a vessel of 200 tons measurement, 216 feet long, 22 feet deep, and 27 feet beam.

She is entirely constructed of iron, being one of the few iron vessels built in this country. The total weight of iron consumed in her construction reached the enormous aggregate of 881,000 lbs.; to which add the timber necessary to fit her out, and more were required. Three plates vary in thickness from three-eighths to three-quarters of an inch in thickness. The frame also is wholly of iron.

She is full ship-rigged, but is provided with a propeller as well as sails and oars. Her speed and safety she is traversed from side to side by five water-tight bulk-heads; so that her hull consists of six water-tight compartments, each entirely independent of the other. She has two flush decks.

Her accommodations were intended to be of the most perfect character. Her boilers, four in number, were designed by James Montgomery, and built by C. S. Greenleaf, at the Dry Dock Works, of New York. Her engines, which are oscillating, are of 800 horse-power each. They were built at the Atlantic Works, East Boston. It will be noticed that they are unusually powerful for such a vessel.

The Voyageur de la Mer is originally designed as a pleasure-boat for the Pacha of Egypt. Her appointments are in the most complete and luxurious character. So drawing-room is more comfortable than her saloon—the Pacha does not lack for cash—no men more convenient chamber than the state-room in which he will sleep on board his yacht. We believe that she is provided with every "modern convenience"—such as gas, hot and cold water for baths, bells, etc. She has been described as an American first-class hotel afloat.

It seems, however, notwithstanding all the care that has been bestowed upon this vessel, and all the outlay, that she does not answer the expectations of her builders. Some defects in the machinery department have hitherto baffled the efforts of the builders to make her steam as she should, and loud has been the wail in Boston over the misfortune of the craft which was to do Boston so much credit in Egypt. We, of course, are quite unable to report on the subject; we hope, however, that the accidents which have occurred may be remedied in future, and that the Pacha may ere long make his trial trip in Le Voyageur de la Mer.

THE APPARITION OF MONSIEUR BODRY.

EXACTLY one hundred years ago there lived in Paris, in the Rue Sainte Marthe, a rich silk-merchant named Gombert. He was about sixty years of age, a widower, with an only child, a beautiful girl of nineteen, who was no less admired for her personal attractions than for the handsome fortune which she was likely one day to inherit. Mademoiselle Gombert was, indeed, the great match of the quarter in which the silk-merchant dwelt, and if she did not marry it was not certainly for want of suitors. A hundred years ago the reign of the Encyclopedists had begun; their principles were dictated far and wide, and religion was going out of fashion; but a stranger accidentally dropping into the church of Saint Merri, on a Sunday morning, would have concluded, from the number of young men who knelt at mass and sat out the sermon, that devotion had—at all events—lost no ground in that quarter of the city. He would, however, have been wrong: the cause of this crowd of devotees arising simply from the fact, that Saint Merri was the parish church of Monsieur Gombert and his daughter, and that to see, and possibly, attract the notice of the beautiful Madeleine, had a direct deal more to do with their attendance than the sincerity of their faith, or their admiration for the preacher. Whether Madeleine Gombert was aware or not of the motive which her presence excited I will not pretend to say: the chances are, that feminine instinct set her right on that point, though it did not influence her conduct. As for Monsieur Gombert, he was far too much engrossed by cutting a Pope's encroachments on this peculiar demonstration; to doubt was not his habit. He accepted every compliment, whether sincere or not, purely in all he saw.

Of course, it was never intended by nature or fashion, by Madeleine Gombert or her father, that the possessor of so much beauty, and the heiress of so much wealth, should go to the altar without a bridegroom: it did, in fact, been a thing decided on, after the usual French mode of bargain, when there was any thing to marry for—while the war vat a child. The business of the silk-merchant of the Rue Sainte Marthe had suffered in the very close relations with a rich manufacturer of the city of Lyons, the name of Benoit Blairaux. As connection increased, the desire arose on each side to cement it by the union of the two families. Monsieur Benoit had an only son, Augustin, a student an only daughter. Could any thing be more natural than a match between these young people? The terms of which should be, that Monsieur Benoit's son should marry Monsieur Gombert's daughter.

Although the proposed marriage of Henri Bodry and Madeleine Gombert was a matter arranged for years' standing between their parents, which needed no consent on the part of the contracting parties, still, with the view of making the arrangement all, Monsieur Bodry one fine morning consented to the request of Henri, that he should be left alone for an his betrothed, a few months before he came of age; on which occasion the nuptials were to take place. The consent of Monsieur Bodry was, to this degree of curiosity respecting the person who was destined to his partner for life, that he left the truth must be told—he was, though of feeble constitution and uncertain health, extremely fond of pleasure. Every day, or, at least, every day of enjoyment, and to have his full swing of the capital before he settled down for ever in the dull city of all others which the young Lyonnese must ardently desired. Supplied, then, with a full purse, and the better of a handsome horse, Monsieur Bodry, left, which constituted his sole credentials, Henri Bodry set out from his native town of Lyons in the fair end of November, in the year seventeen hundred and fifty-seven.

A hundred years ago the journey from Lyons to Paris was an affair of time. Ordinary travelers usually took a fortnight to accomplish what now-twenty days on the road; but the wealthier aristocracy, who had their own carriages, and were in no slow as the public wages, but infinitely more agreeable. The rate of traveling adopted by the dignity of Henri Bodry he took the coche. In those days of no intercourse between nations, divided by any great distance, it seldom happened that the traveler who was going all the way not with a companion or companions before he had reached the ancient city of Macon. The coche, as soon as it was ready for the night at the auberge called The Cross of Burgundy; and in a large room containing four beds, the usual complement of that time, Henri was left to pay for his bed, and make it out how he might until eight o'clock on the following morning, when the vehicle would be once more in motion.

With a long November evening before him, the youngster was in a pleasant case; for when he was waiting for his promised supper, a stranger entered the apartment, dressed as if for a journey, and carrying a small valise in his hand. He was a young man, apparently about the same age as Bodry, good-looking, and of a highly prepossessing countenance. After bestowing a glance on the occupant of the solitary couple of beds he proceeded to him, as if to see which bed was unoccupied, and then took possession of one of them by throwing in his cloak, hat, and valise upon it. This act of appropriation performed, he approached the table where Bodry sat, and without any preamble asked him if he was traveling, and which way he was going. With the frankness of his age, Henri at once told him his destination, at which the newcomer expressed great satisfaction, he being also bound for Paris, and as freely as he had spoken went on to say, that he had come some distance across the country, was very cold and hungry, and if Monsieur had not already engaged supper, he would be most happy in being permitted to share that meal with him. Bodry was delighted to have a companion so agreeable, and acquiesced in the proposal most readily; the supper was soon served, and over a bottle of Moulin a Vent, the wine for which Macon is still so famous, the young men rapidly made acquaintance, and discovered that in age there are no reserves. Bodry entered into his own affairs without the slightest concealment, described his prospects, and the object of his journey, and fairly acknowledged, in reply to a laughing question from the other, that he had no great vocation for his impending marriage.

In return for this confidence, the stranger said, his name also was Henri—Henri Blairaux—the son of an avocat at Bourg-en-Bresse; that he was not encumbered with money, but hoped to acquire it by following his father's profession, after he had studied enough law at the college in the Rue St. Jean de Beauvais. As to the law itself, it was not his choice; he would rather have spent a fortune, than to be the means of making one client miserable, could you have?

The intimacy which thus sprang up between the travelers was not diminished by the time they reached Paris. On the contrary, it had grown into a romantic friendship. Their habits and tastes were so closely allied, that what the one proposed the other was sure to be ready for.

Among the subjects which engaged them during the latter part of their journey was the question of how they should spend on their arrival in the capital. Bodry knew nothing of Paris, and therefore made no objection to the plan of the latter, which was proposed by Blairaux; so they went to the Eau d'Argent, in the Rue des Carmes—an auberge at the time of which I am speaking in favor not slightly in his cups, as being the only place in Paris for drinking Vin de Beaune. It was not a fashionable part of the town, but the college was near and the residence of Monsieur Gombert not remote. Considering the close proximity, it seemed odd that neither love nor law was meant to be the first consideration which brought the young Bodry to the auberge, they saw the Marionettes on the Boulevard du Temple; together they went to dance at the opera of the Porte St. Martin; together they sat in the Jardin de Janelle, the most celebrated of all the Transeunaval houses of Paris; together, they were every where, in short, except to the College of Law and the Church of Saint Merri.

Some evenings, when they were returning home, decidest but them through the Rue Saint Martin, and as a matter of course ever Bodry was to be seen as remembered that he had been already three weeks in the capital without delivering any letter of introduction—including any introductory one from Monsieur Gombert and Mademoiselle Madeleine. A series of circumstances arises from a trifle, as the real cause. Henri Bodry was a little out of sorts, and proposed—like a certain gentleman when he "kick-ed his wife"—passing the evening by way of amendment. When he reached the Eau d'Argent, however, he found his friend Blairaux had directly to bed; in the course of the night he was seized with a violent fever, and, though it was not more than the following morning, he remained very ill. Nothing could exceed the kindness and attention which Henri Blairaux, who, as his friend's bedside all night, ministered to all his wants, soothed him by his care and encouraged him by his cheerfulness.

Bodry's discourse turned chiefly on what was uppermost in his mind at the moment of his delirium; and his desire to make the long-neglected visit was increased by a letter which arrived from his father, asking many questions respecting the silk-merchant's family. But it was in vain he would try to get up, or still hold his head, if he kept yet, in the perversity of his malady, he persisted in declaring that the visit was immediately to be paid. Henri Blairaux urged that Monsieur Gombert was not aware of his being in Paris, with various other arguments, and concluded by saying, that if his friend desired it, he would go to the Rue Saint Martin and explain the circumstances of the case.

This last suggestion operated singularly on the mind of the delirious invalid. Yes, Blairaux should go as he proposed, but he must not say a word about his having presumed to pay attention to the real Bodry—keep Blairaux entirely out of sight—and by-and-by, when he was able to appear in person, the visit would make merry over the past and laugh it entirely away. Blairaux combated this proposition at first; but, finding that the objections only increased his friend's nervous irritability, he consented.

All this was not a difficult one for Monsieur Gombert knew very little of his correspondent's domestic affairs, and nothing personally of his future son-in-law. The worthy silk-merchant entertained his visitor with all the effusion which the approaching connection seemed to warrant, and met with a demonstration no less cordial. It was in Monsieur Gombert's counting-house that the greeting took place, but the greeting over, the scene was changed to an inner apartment, where Madeleine with her mother, who had retired there from her cradle, was occupied with her embroidery, feeding the hungry, providing shrouds for the naked, and clothing the destitute. The worthy first sensation on seeing the beautiful girl to whom Bodry was betrothed, but it lasted only a moment, being quickly succeeded by the pleasure which he experienced in looking at and conversing with her. At the end of an evening of hours he found himself head over ears in love. On the other hand, the impression which he appeared to have made on Monsieur Gombert and his daughter, and on the old nurse, who had a voice in every thing, was all he could have desired, provided always, that he had been Henri Bodry, and not his temporary substitute.

Unwillingly, at last, he rose to take his departure, and lingered as he pressed the hand of Madeleine Gombert, and, as freely as he dared, on the tenderly withdrawn; neither did the expression of her countenance convey the idea that he would not be welcome when he next renewed his visit. This was consistent enough with the relation in which Henri Bodry stood toward the family Gombert, but, somehow or other, Blairaux could not divest himself of the notion—which ninety-nine Frenchmen out of a hundred would have entertained—that no small share of the reception accorded to him was a homage to his own personal merits.

On his return to the Rue des Carmes he found Henri Bodry much worse. A physician was sent for; Blairaux was committed to his special charge, but the fever increased alarmingly, and as evening drew on he began to fear for his friend's life. At Bodry's request Blairaux related to him all the particulars of the interview in the Rue Saint Martin, and the subject still engrossed the mind of the sick young man, to the exclusion of every other. Even when conscious of his own danger he still continued the theme.

"I have often been ill," he said, "but never felt before as I feel now. Should I die, Henri Blairaux, promise me here, that you will still be Henri Bodry."

Think what a desolation it would be in Monsieur Gombert and Madeleine to be told of my death! Think, for, my sake, that you will feel that I have done my duty in giving her the husband she expected. Do not, I say, undeceive them. I know very well what I say. Unless you promise this I can not die content."

Blairaux, deeply convinced that his friend's mind was wandering, but, to keep him quiet, he again promised all that was required of him. Bodry appeared satisfied, and his anxious attendant believed he slept; but suddenly he rose up in bed, and with a distressing change was evident in the wandering came short and thick, his voice was faint and low, the delusion of fever was evidently upon him.

It was ten o'clock at night, and Monsieur Gombert was alone in his counting-house. Every thing was silent in the apartment but the ticking of one of those large clocks—which, by the way, existed, and highly tolerated with gilding—which we call in the age of Louis Quinze, though they belong to the time of his great-grandson. That clock had just struck ten, and the last stroke had hardly ceased to vibrate when Monsieur Gombert, who happened to raise his head, became aware of some one who was standing near the door. He had not heard any body enter, perhaps because he had been absorbed in his accounts, and his astonishment—not unmixed with fear, for he was quite alone and night nature—was very great.

"Who is there?" he asked, with hesitation.

"Is that—you—Jacques?"

Jacques was Monsieur Gombert's confidential clerk, but no answer was returned, and the merchant remained speechless, with his eyes still fixed on the figure, which now slowly advanced a few steps, and, as it seemed to him, without noise. As the figure drew nearer, though the light from the solitary candle was very dim, Monsieur Gombert perceived a pale, hollow face, which wore an expression of great anxiety; the eyes were deep open and glittered exceedingly, and a quantity of dark hair streamed widely. Monsieur Gombert gazed for some time on the face before him. The appearance came nearer still, and then Monsieur Gombert imagined—had indeed, indeed—something that he recognized features he had lately seen. This supposition gave him a glimmer of courage.

"Is it you?" he said, "is it you, Henri, here at this hour?"

"Bodry!" answered the figure, in a deep, sepulchural voice.

"How! Death! Has any misfortune arrived?"

"The greatest that can happen to me," Henri Bodry said an hour ago. I come to invite you to Henri Bodry's funeral."

"You! you! But you are Henri Bodry!"

"I was—this morning."

"Ah! I don't—I don't!" exclaimed the merchant, and fell senseless from his stool.

As his senses returned to him he made in falling, Madeleine and old Petronille, the beune, who were at work in the next room, rushed into the counting-house. To Monsieur Gombert's question as a fit, and hastily applied such remedies as they could devise. After a few minutes the silk merchant opened his eyes.

"Where is he?" he said, looking round with terror.

"Who, Sir?" asked Madeleine. "What do you mean?"

"Who?" he repeated, slowly, again looking round him. "Who? Henri Bodry. He was here this moment."

"Impossible, Sir!" said Petronille. "You were alone when we came in, and, indeed, had the night you called out. There was not the shadow of a person in the room."

"The shadow!" returned Monsieur Gombert. "Ah! that it is. The shadow. It was no living man."

"I beseech you, my father," said Madeleine, "to tell us what is the matter. You look ill and frightened indeed."

"I have reason to be so," replied Monsieur Gombert. I have seen a spirit—a ghost!"

He then, as collectedly as he could, related what had occurred.

"That is a fancy," said Madeleine. Monsieur Gombert shook his head.

"A dream," added Petronille. "You supped well on that famous goose of Alencon—you had more than one glass of Burgundy in honor of Monsieur Bodry's arrival—you fell asleep over your books after supper; a wrong time; you became sleepy: an indigestion arrives—here's a ghost!"

Ingenious reasoning, but not satisfactory to Monsieur Gombert.

"I saw him," he persisted, "as distinctly as I see either of you. It was the face of a dead man. He stood with his forefinger—"

These words, and the earnestness with which Monsieur Gombert spoke, infected Madeleine with a portion of his fear, and Petronille's also. They also looked timidly about them, dreading to behold some hideous apparition.

Mademoiselle Gombert was the first to regain her presence of mind.

"Let somebody be sent at once to ask news of him."

This suggestion was immediately adopted. Jacques, the confidential clerk, who lived in the house with the rest, was thought the most proper person to attend on the errand, without being made aware of the motive which had led to his errand, was directed to ask if Monsieur Henri Bodry would come and see Monsieur Gombert directly. In less than half an hour he returned, with a countenance much discomposed.

"Sir," said he to Monsieur Gombert, "I bring you very sad tidings. The young gentleman who came here only this morning so full of life and spirits died about an hour ago!"

Madeleine Gombert was thunderstruck. She could scarcely believe her ears. But it was more than astonishment. There was a pang at her heart. That fine, handsome young man, who had so much interested her!

Monsieur Gombert felt very ill, and went at once to bed. Old Petronille and his daughter kept watch beside him with as many candles burning as there were candlesticks in the house to hold them; and, further to scare away all evil spirits, Madeleine read aloud the Office des Morts, Monsieur Gombert joining fervently at the end of every psalm with the anthem, "Heu mihi!"

So much affected, indeed, was the honest silk-merchant by the sudden death of his correspondent's son that he did not get the better of the shock for several days. To attend Henri Bodry's funeral was entirely out of the question; and the knowledge that it had taken place while he was confined to his room materially contributed to his recovery.

"Once fairly under ground," thought Monsieur Gombert, "he is not so likely to pay me another visit, unless—unless—" and this doubt harassed him sorely—"unless he is vexed at my not having complied with his wishes."

As for Madeleine, poor girl, she talked over the sad event with old Petronille. It was the only consolation she could find for the loss of her lover. She also sought comfort in devotion, and, instead of going now and then when the day was fine, went regularly, morning and evening, to mass in the church of St. Merri.

III.

In the mean while Henri Blaireau had paid the last offices to his friend in the Cemetery of the Innocents—at that time the place of burial for half the people of Paris—and had written an account of his untimely death to the elder Bodry at Lyons, informing him that all his son's effects were under seal. These pious duties performed, he directed his thoughts to what concerned himself. But he found the study of the law much more distasteful to him now than it had even been before. In vain he pored over Pandects and delved into Digests; nothing came of it; one object always kept floating between his eyes and the page, which neutralized all his toil; and that object was the smiling face of Madeleine Gombert.

"How unfortunate," he constantly reflected, "that I should have presented myself in the name of another man! She had never seen Henri Bodry—not even friendship subsisted between them; her regret, if she feels any, must all be on my account, and I—unhappy wretch that I am!—I have made myself my own rival! If Monsieur Gombert had accepted the invitation to the funeral, I could then have explained my poor friend's caprice, but to attempt to do so now would expose me to I know not what odious accusations."

This hourly Jeremiad made him, of course, much less of a lawyer and much more of a lover than ever, and it always ended in his throwing aside his books and wandering forth to the Rue Saint Martin.

One rainy evening, weary of pacing up and down the dark, damp street without any reward, he stood up for shelter in the porch of Saint Merri. The vesper service was going on, and, thinking the inside of the church more comfortable than the out, Henri Blaireau pushed open the little baize door and entered. The interior was nearly as obscure as the street he had left, for Saint Merri is a large church, and was very dimly lighted. The congregation, as thin as it generally is at vespers on a raw, foggy, wet winter's evening, seemed to consist of only a few old women, and Henri roamed undisturbed through the aisles, thinking, as usual, of Madeleine Gombert. He had twice crossed the small lateral chapel which stands on the south side of the building, without noticing that any one was there; but the third time he passed, his attention was attracted by a female figure kneeling before an altar dedicated to the Virgin. Something besides curiosity prompted him to stop and gaze. He did more than stop; he drew nearer, placing himself discreetly behind a massive pillar, the better to obtain a view of her face. For some time she remained absorbed in prayer. At length she raised her head, and the lamp above the image of Our Lady shedding its rays full on the worshiper, revealed to him the features of Madeleine Gombert. He uttered an exclamation of surprise, at which Madeleine looked round in the direction from whence the sound proceeded; but she soon withdrew them, unable, apparently, to penetrate the gloom. Once more she prayed, and Henri felt an almost irresistible longing to cast himself on his knees before the same altar and pray there, too. But the fear of disturbing her made him pause, and while he hesitated she rose. She did not perceive that she was not alone in the chapel, and came up to the spot where he stood. He put out his hand and caught her by the sleeve. She turned quickly, and, lighted by the altar lamp, beheld, close to her, the countenance of the man for the repose of whose soul she had just been praying. The sight was enough to startle the strongest nerves. "Heaven! Monsieur Henri!" she cried. "Save me, Mother of Grace!" and as fast as her feet could carry her she rushed to the chancel door.

To run after her was Henri Blaireau's first impulse, but he had not gone three yards before he tripped over an old woman who was fast asleep (at her prayers) in the aisle, and came down on the pavement with a crash. In the midst of a furious scolding, Blaireau picked himself up as well as he could, and then, remembering for the first time what was due to the proprieties of a church, desisted from further pursuit. To quiet the old woman, whose occupation (besides praying) was the letting of rush-bottomed chairs to the pious, he gave her all the sous he had in his pocket, and then stole away on tip-toe, thinking himself lucky in not having drawn on his head the fulmination of the officiating priest. Once outside, he quickened his steps; but all his haste was vain: he only arrived within sight of Monsieur Gombert's door to see the skirt of Madeleine's garment disappear as the portal was closed.

Could he not find a lodging in the Rue St. Martin—could he not find a lodging in the very house where Monsieur Gombert dwelt?

He resolved to return next day and see about it. Fortune might be more propitious the next time he encountered the beautiful Madeleine; at all events, he would enjoy the melancholy pleasure—this is the way a lover always puts it—of seeing the object of his affections, even if he were himself unseen.

Mademoiselle Gombert said nothing to her father about her fright in the church of St. Merri, but she made a confidante of Petronille. The old bonne crossed herself on hearing the fearful tale, and asked a great many questions. In what form did the apparition present itself—did it wear a shroud—was it very pale—did it speak—had it a smell of sulphur? All that Madeleine could say in reply was, that the spirit appeared to her to be dressed in the usual male costume, and looked exactly like Monsieur Henri Bodry.

IV.

The next morning, in order the better to execute his project unobserved, Henri Blaireau set off to the Rue de la Grande Friperie, where he bought at one of the numerous second-hand shops in that useful quarter, a three-cornered military hat and a long, gray dragoon-cloak, which last, though it had seen at least twenty years' service, was declared by the conscientious merchant who sold it to be better than new. Wrapping himself closely in his dragoon's costume, he then proceeded to the Rue Saint Martin, and carefully reconnoitred Monsieur Gombert's house once more. Daylight enabled him to discover what had been hidden by the darkness of night, the very thing he desired: on one of the door-posts of the open gateway was an écriteau announcing that a garni, or furnished room, was to be let, application to be made to the concierge. It was not on the ground floor, for these were the silk merchant's warerooms; neither was it on the first floor (the house had no entresol), for there were located Monsieur Gombert and his family; neither was it on the third floor—but without stopping at every landing-place, let us climb at once to the top of the stair-case, open the door of a chamber, familiarly termed a mansard or garret, and there we have the joli appartement, bien meublé, as the concierge poetically described it. What furnished it well, consisted of a truckle bed without hangings, two rickety chairs, and a still more rickety table; what made it handsome was, perhaps, the flooring of red tiles which, in spite of their color, did not make the room look warm. It was, in short, a wretched hole, and Henri Blaireau shivered as he cast his eyes round it, but then he was under the same roof with the maid he loved, and that reconciled him, of course, to its wretchedness. He returned to the Ecu d'Argent, settled his account, and loading an Auvergnat with his own and his deceased friend's trunks—a weight which the strongest mule might well have refused to carry—finally installed himself in his delectable abode.

But there was one obstacle to complete concealment which no precaution could overcome. If there be any particular spot on the face of the globe where gossip holds its head-quarters, it is in a Paris porter's lodge, and this was equally the fact in the reign of Louis the Fifteenth as it is in the reign of Napoleon the Third. The occupants of the lodge at Monsieur Gombert's were Pierre and Phrosine, an elderly couple, whose surname was Le Pocheux: the former had been for many years a soldier, the latter every thing in the menial line, and their marriage had been as much an affaire de convenance as if his father had called himself De Rohan and hers De Montmorency. Gossip was the staple of their intellectual existence, and though there did not appear to be much food for it in so simple a circumstance as the hiring of a garret at ten livres a quarter, yet the military externals of the new lodger had fixed the attention of Monsieur Pierre, whose scrutiny inclined him to think that the dress and its wearer did not altogether correspond: so much baggage, too, was incompatible with the condition of a person who took up his lodging under the eaves; and, finally, Madame Phrosine had taken particular notice of very white hands, very bright eyes, and a very handsome face, as far as the cocked hat and the cape of the cloak allowed them to be visible.

The greatest ally of Monsieur and Madame le Pocheux was, naturally, Madame Petronille (they never failed to salute each other with the prefix which I have adopted), and to her they imparted the news of the stranger's arrival, accompanied by their own enlightened commentaries. Gossip is the mother of a great many children, and her eldest-born is Curiosity. The old bonne became curious about the mysterious dragoon, and it was not long before her curiosity was shared by Mademoiselle Gombert. To have a peep at him, on the first opportunity, was Petronille's expressed intention.

For the first hour or two after he was established in his new quarters, Henri Blaireau found occupation enough in trying to make it look more habitable; but when this process was at an end, and he found that, stretch his neck as he might from his solitary window (which only overlooked a court-yard), he could see nothing of the apartment in which Mademoiselle Gombert resided, he began to get very impatient of confinement, and yearned to approach her more nearly. But to leave his room in broad daylight would be to court unnecessary observation, so he waited till it was dusk before he issued from his den. Then, wearing the attire on which he counted for disguise, in the event of his meeting Monsieur Gombert, he slowly descended the stair-case, lingering at every step as he drew near the first floor. He had arrived at the last turning when he observed some one standing in the door-way of Monsieur Gombert's suite of rooms. There was just light enough for him to see that it was a woman; his heart at once told him who it was—and clearing the flight at a bound, he stood before her. She did not alter her position, but remained behind the shadow of the door. He was encouraged to speak, and after the ceremonious fashion of his time and nation, took off his hat as he did so; scarcely had he uttered a word, before a violent scream saluted him, the door was slammed in his face, and he heard the cry of "Murder!" vociferated within, in the shrillest of female tones.

He rushed down stairs; and, the porte cochère being not yet closed, reached the street without detention.

Petronille—for she it was who had been lying in ambush—continued to exercise her lungs, as she floundered on the parquet, without daring to lift her head, until she brought round her the whole of Monsieur Gombert's household, with the exception of Madeleine, who, more piously disposed than ever, had gone again to vesper service, in the church of Saint Merri.

"But what is the matter, my poor Petronille?" said Monsieur Gombert, as they raised the old woman, and conducted her into an inner room.

"Oh, Sir! Sir!" replied she, with hysterical effort; "I have seen him—I—myself!"

"Seen whom, Petronille?" asked the silk-merchant, tremulously.

"Fresh from the grave, in his winding-sheet—with eyes like burning charcoal!"

Monsieur Gombert groaned instinctively, and did not repeat his question; Jacques, the clerk, Marie, the cook, and Felicité, the fille-de-chambre, were, however, clamorous to hear all.

"But tell us, Petronille, for the love of Heaven!"

"One, two, three—as slowly as the clock strikes, I heard him descending the stair-case, just as I was holding the door in my hand, after letting out Mademoiselle, when she went to vespers. How can I tell why I waited to see who might be coming? These things are fate! Suddenly, before I knew what had happened, he stood within a yard of me. I might have touched him. Then I saw his face! The face of the young gentleman from Lyons, who died last week at the Ecu d'Argent, in the Rue des Carmes. The face of Monsieur Bodry!"

Monsieur Gombert dropped into a chair, unable to utter a word; consternation was depicted on every countenance; and a loud knocking was heard at the outer door.

Every body (Monsieur Gombert only excepted) screamed again; and Pierre, the concierge, came in, amazed, removing from his head a little skull-cap, made of carpet.

"Monsieur Pierre," shrieked Petronille, "I have seen a ghost!"

"Bah!" replied Pierre, "I've seen five thousand. A ghost and a dead man are much the same thing, I imagine. When one sleeps on the field of battle, one sees plenty of ghosts."

"Ah, but they don't walk, Pierre, those dead people," replied Petronille.

"Very odd, if they did," said Pierre, "when their legs are shot away."

The obstinacy of the old soldier did more to recover Petronille than even his corporeal presence, and with as much emphasis, but more circumstance, she repeated her adventure. Still Pierre shook his head.

"But Monsieur Gombert," continued the bonne, "has been visited by the same ghost. It is the ghost of a young man! He came to him an hour after his death. And what will you say, when I tell you—my duty now compels me to reveal it—that Mademoiselle Gombert, in her turn, has seen the spirit? No later than yesterday evening it appeared to her in the church of Saint Merri. On that account, she has gone again to-night, to consult Monsieur le Curé."

"What is that you say?" cried Monsieur Gombert. "Oh, my good friend Pierre, run to the church and bid her return instantly! Also ask Monsieur le Curé to come as soon as the service is over."

The concierge no longer presumed openly to deny what was affirmed on so much higher authority, but he obeyed Monsieur Gombert's orders, and set off at once.

V.

When Henri Blaireau got into the street he was at a loss what to do next. One set of inclinations prompted him to go and get some dinner; another set of inclinations, loftier, nobler, altogether more becoming a lover—led him to follow the route which Mademoiselle Gombert had just taken.

Accordingly, he also bent his footsteps to the church of Saint Merri. Arrived there, he made no pause in the porch, lingered not an instant in the nave, took no heed of priests or old women, but plunging into the south aisle, steered his way softly through the labyrinth of piled-up chairs, till he came to the chapel of the Virgin. What was his delight, as he cautiously peeped from behind the pillar where he had stood the evening before, when, in the same attitude and in front of the same altar, he beheld Mademoiselle Gombert!

Experience had taught him wisdom. His unlucky features, he resolved, should not get him into a scrape again. He advanced, therefore, at a quick step, covered his face with both hands, took advantage of a devotee's privilege by plumping himself on his knees beside Madeleine, and bending down his head, began to pray with great fervor.

Though such an association in worship was not so uncommon as to be remarkable, Mademoiselle Gombert felt a little uncomfortable at the close proximity of the stranger.

"Beata mater," murmured the new supplicant, "et intacta virgo, gloriosa regina mundi, intercede pro nobis ad—" He paused for a moment or two, and then turning toward Mademoiselle Gombert, substituted for the right word, "Magdalenam;" and, before she could recover from her astonishment, he added:

"Forgive me, Mademoiselle; but in me you behold the person who, last night, unhappily caused you trouble."

Madeleine rose hastily to her feet, and moved from the chapel; but she was overtaken by Henri Blaireau before she had gone many steps.

"Can it be?" she said, faintly. "Do the dead return to this world?"

"Not the dead," said Henri, seizing her hand; "not the dead, but the living."

Madeleine's senses could not resist the fact of a human hand being clasped in hers, a hand warm as her own. The voice, too, that breathed in her ear had no sepulchral tone.

"If not the dead, who and what are you? The face I saw was that of Henri Bodry."

"Mademoiselle, forgive a deception which was not premeditated—nay, was almost involuntary. Henri Bodry is, indeed, no more; but I am not Henri Bodry. Oh, you will pardon me, Mademoiselle Gombert, when you have heard my story."

There was something so persuasive in his manner, that Madeleine was induced to listen. He was not a good common-lawyer, but he was an excellent special pleader. Is it necessary, then, to add that his suit was not unprosperous?

"There is," said a rough but cheery sort of voice behind them—the voice of Pierre the old concierge, carpet-cap in hand, and on the broad grin—"I don't know what to do at home, ma'msell'. Madame Petronille has been in fits, and every body is distracted at having seen a ghost. I'm afraid," he added, turning to Henri, "I'm afraid it was yours, Monsieur."

The stir at Monsieur Gombert's house had scarcely subsided when Madeleine entered.

"Father!" she cried, running into his arms, "I grieve for your distress—for poor Petronille's—but there is one behind me (do not be alarmed at a mere personal resemblance) who can explain all."

About a quarter of an hour afterward the curé of Saint Merri was announced.

Monsieur Gombert went with a smiling air to meet him.

"I don't know," he said, "what you will think of my dilemma. I sent for your spiritual aid; but instead of an exorcism, I think I will, upon the whole, ask you to have the kindness to bestow a blessing!"

ALONE.

Patient and faithful, and tender and true,
Praying, and thinking, and working for you—
Bearing all-silently sorrow for years—
Hopefully striving to conquer my fears;
Say, did my patience, my tenderness, truth,
Merit not more than the blight of my youth?

Give me once more my wild energy back,
Give me the hopes that illumined life's track;
Give me the faith that I wasted on you—
Give me the love that I squandered thereto—
You can not: too lightly you cast them aside,
And for you and all others those feelings have died.

Yet, though the hopes that I cherished are dead,
Though the light from my spirit forever hath fled,
Though 'twas doubting in God when I doubted in you—
As my standard and type of the leal and the true;
O'er the wreck of my life I would never repine,
If the peace I have lost were but added to thine.

Miscellany.

UNCLE TOBY'S PHILOSOPHY.

The mild benevolence of Uncle Toby's philosophy can not be too often borne in mind. The world owes a great debt to Lawrence Sterne for these few simple sentences. "Had I studied Sterne more and Voltaire less," said the unhappy Aaron Burr, "I might have been a better man."

"My Uncle Toby was a man patient of injuries; not from want of courage, where just occasions presented or called it forth. I know no man under whose arm I should sooner have taken shelter; nor did this arise from any insensibility or obtuseness in his intellectual parts; he was of a peaceful, placid nature, no jarring element in it, all was mixed up so kindly within him: my Uncle Toby had scarcely a heart to retaliate upon a fly. 'Go,' says he, one day at dinner, to an overgrown one who had buzzed about his nose and tormented him cruelly all dinner-time, and which, after infinite attempts, he had caught at last as it flew by him; 'I'll not hurt thee,' says my Uncle Toby, rising from his chair, and going across the room with the fly in his hand: 'I'll not hurt a hair of thy head. Go,' says he, lifting up the sash, and opening his hand as he spoke, to let it escape; 'go, get thee gone; why should I hurt thee! This world surely is wide enough to hold both thee and me.'"

NATIONAL CHARACTERISTICS.

An Englishman, it has been said, is never happy but when he is miserable; a Scotchman is never at home but when he is abroad; an Irishman never at peace but when he is at war.

USEFULNESS OF INSECTS.

If insects speak to us neither by the voice nor by their physiognomy, by what do they appeal to us? By their energies. By the prodigious destruction which they effect in the over-productiveness of nature; by their colors, fires, and poisons, and by their arts. In all these manifestations, if properly understood, there is nothing but wisdom and beneficence. Even the persecution of domestic animals by flies constitutes their safety. Without the stimulus given by these tiny persecutors, cattle would remain at times stupidly resigned, till, no longer capable of movement, they would perish on the spot. Flies drive them to running waters, or to more salubrious places. In Central Africa the nam regulates the migrations of whole herds. The tsetse, it is to be supposed, is sent by some such similar provision of nature. Even the terrible ant, when it invades a house and expels the inhabitants, does so for wise purposes. They destroy every living thing; mice, toads, snakes, are all devoured—not an insect, nor even an insect's egg is left. The house is thoroughly cleansed, and then the visitors leave it to its master, going on to another. The spiders of the Antilles are such good servants, and so useful in the destruction of flies, that they are sold in the markets as birds are with us.

Among the other auxiliaries of man are the dragon-fly, that kills its thousands of insects in a day; the cicindelæ, which, with its two sabres for jaws, is immensely destructive of insect life; the carabi, a tribe of warriors armed to the teeth, real "gardes champêtres." It is cruel to destroy these useful little creatures; they should, on the contrary, be respected.

Of auxiliaries of another description we have worms, which digest, cleanse, and renew the soil. In a similar manner the necrophori are ever busy in removing putridity. Gardeners are often exasperated at the presence of insects in tubercules, as of the dahlia, when they are really there only to remove the dead or deceased parts. Nothing would be more advantageous to all who are interested in gardens than to know how to distinguish useful from hurtful insects. People would not then be daily committing violence to the harmonies of nature.

Some insects are edible: a learned entomologist tells us that caterpillars have a taste of almonds and spiders of nuts. The Roman ladies used to eat the cossi, as the Eastern ladies still do the blaps, and the Portuguese of Brazil ants, "at the moment when their wings raise them in the air like an aspiration of love."

MANLINESS.

Learn from the earliest days to insure your principle against the peril of ridicule. You can no more exercise your reason if you live in the constant dread of laughter than you can enjoy your life if you are in the constant terror of death. If you think it right to differ from the times, and to make a point of morals, do it; however rustic, however antiquated, however pedantic it may appear, do it—not for insolence, but seriously and grandly, as a man who wore a soul of his own in his bosom, and did not wait till it was breathed into him by the breath of fashion.

NOT PRAYING ENOUGH.

Felix Neff once made the following comparison: "When a pump is frequently used, but little pains are necessary to have water: the water pours out at the first stroke, because it is high. But if the pump has not been used for a long time, the water gets low; and when you want it, you must pump it a long while, and the water comes only after great efforts. It is so with prayer: if we are instant in prayer, every little circumstance awakens the disposition to pray, and desires and words are always ready. But if we neglect prayer, it is difficult for us to pray; for the water in the well gets low."

BRUSSELS LACE.

The spinning of the fine thread used for lace-making in the Netherlands is an operation demanding so high a degree of minute care and vigilant attention that it is impossible that it can ever be taken from human hands by machinery. None but Belgian fingers are skilled in this art. The very finest sort of this thread is made in Brussels, in damp, underground cellars, for it is so extremely delicate that it is liable to break by contact with the dry air above ground; and it is obtained in good condition only when made and kept in a humid, subterraneous atmosphere. There are numbers of old Belgian thread-makers, who, like spiders, have passed the best part of their lives spinning in cellars. This sort of occupation naturally has an injurious effect on the health; and therefore, to induce people to follow it, they are highly paid.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER IX.

"Les extremes se touchent."

The next day the gentlemen were dispersed out of doors—a large shooting party. Those who did not shoot, walked forth to inspect the racing stud or the model farm. The ladies had taken their walk; some were in their own rooms, some in the reception rooms, at work, or reading, or listening to the piano—Honoria Carr Vipont again performing. Lady Montfort was absent; Lady Selina kindly supplied the hostess's place. Lady Selina was embroidering, with great skill and taste, a pair of slippers for her eldest boy, who was just entered at Oxford, having left Eton with a reputation of being the neatest dresser, and not the worst cricketer, of that renowned educational institute. It is a mistake to suppose that fine ladies are not sometimes very fond mothers and affectionate wives. Lady Selina, beyond her family circle, was trivial, unsympathizing, cold-hearted, supercilious by temperament, never kind but through policy, artificial as clock-work. But in her own home, to her husband, her children, Lady Selina was a very good sort of woman. Devotedly attached to Carr Vipont, exaggerating his talents, thinking him the first man in England, careful of his honor, zealous for his interests, soothing in his cares, tender in his ailments. To her girls prudent and watchful—to her boys indulgent and caressing. Minutely attentive to the education of the first, according to her high-bred ideas of education—and they really were "superior" girls, with much instruction and well-balanced minds. Less authoritative with the last, because boys being not under her immediate control, her sense of responsibility allowed her to display more fondness and less dignity in her intercourse with them than with young ladies who must learn from her example, as well as her precepts, the patrician decorum which becomes the smooth result of impulse restrained and emotion checked. Boys might make a noise in the world, girls should make none. Lady Selina, then, was working the slippers for her absent son, her heart being full of him at that moment. She was describing his character, and expatiating on his promise to two or three attentive listeners, all interested, as being themselves of the Vipont brood, in the probable destiny of the heir to the Carr Viponts.

"In short," said Lady Selina, winding up, "as soon as Reginald is of age we shall get him into Parliament. Carr has always lamented that he himself was not broken into office early; Reginald must be. Nothing so requisite for public men as early training—makes them practical, and not too sensitive to what those horrid newspaper men say. That was Pitt's great advantage. Reginald has ambition; he should have occupation to keep him out of mischief. It is an anxious thing for a mother, when a son is good-looking—such danger of his being spoiled by the women—yes, my dear, it is a small foot, very small—his father's foot."

"If Lord Montfort should have no family," said a somewhat distant and subaltern Vipont, whisperingly and hesitating, "does not the title—"

"No, my dear," interrupted Lady Selina; "no, the title does not come to us. It is a melancholy thought, but the marquisate, in that case, is extinct. No other heir-male from Gilbert, the first Marquis. Carr says there is even likely to be some dispute about the earldom. The Barony, of course, is safe; goes with the Irish estates, and most of the English—and goes (don't you know?)—to Sir James Vipont, the last person who ought to have it; the quietest, stupidest creature; not brought up to the sort of thing—a mere gentleman farmer on a small estate in Devonshire."

"He is not here?"

"No. Lord Montfort does not like him. Very natural. Nobody does like his heir, if not his own child, and some people don't even like their own eldest sons! Shocking; but so it is. Montfort is the kindest, most tractable being that ever was, except where he takes a dislike. He dislikes two or three people very much."

"True; how he did dislike poor Mrs. Lyndsay!" said one of the listeners, smiling.

"Mrs. Lyndsay, yes—dear Lady Montfort's mother. I can't say I pitied her, though I was sorry for Lady Montfort. How Mrs. Lyndsay ever took in Montfort for Caroline I can't conceive! How she had the face to think of it! He, a mere youth at the time! Kept secret from all his family—even from his grandmother—the darkest transaction. I don't wonder that he never forgave it."

First Listener. "Caroline has beauty enough to—"

Lady Selina (interrupting). "Beauty, of course—no one can deny that. But not at all suited to such a position; not brought up to the sort of thing. Poor Montfort! he should have married a different kind of woman altogether—a woman like his grandmother, the last Lady Montfort. Caroline does nothing for the House—nothing—has not even a child—most unfortunate affair."

Second Listener. "Mrs. Lyndsay was very poor, was not she? Caroline, I suppose, had no opportunity of forming those tastes and habits which are necessary for—for—"

Lady Selina (helping the listener). "For such a position and such a fortune. You are quite right, my dear. People brought up in one way can not accommodate themselves to another; and it is odd, but I have observed that people brought up poor can accommodate themselves less to being very rich than people brought up rich to accommodate themselves to being very poor. As Carr says, in his pointed way, 'it is easier to stoop than to climb.' Yes; Mrs. Lyndsay was, you know, a daughter of Seymour Vipont, who was for so many years in the Administration, with a fair income from his salary, and nothing out of it. She married one of the Scotch Lyndsays—good family, of course—with a very moderate property. She was left a widow young, with an only child, Caroline. Came to town, with a small jointure. The late Lady Montfort was very kind to her. So were we all—took her up—pretty woman—pretty manners—worldly—oh, very! I don't like worldly people. Well, but all of a sudden, a dreadful thing happened. The heir-at-law disputed the jointure, denied that Lyndsay had any right to make settlements on the Scotch property—very complicated business. But, luckily for her, Vipont Crooke's daughter, her cousin and intimate friend, had married Darrell—the famous Darrell—who was then at the bar. It is very useful to have cousins married to clever people. He was interested in her case, took it up. I believe it did not come on in the courts in which Darrell practiced. But he arranged all the evidence, inspected the briefs, spent a great deal of his own money in getting up the case—and, in fact, he gained her cause, though he could not be her counsel. People did say that she was so grateful that after his wife's death she had set her heart on becoming Mrs. Darrell the second. But Darrell was then quite wrapped up in politics—the last man to fall in love—and only looked bored when women fell in love with him, which a good many did. Grand-looking creature, my dear, and quite the rage for a year or two. However, Mrs. Lyndsay all of a sudden went off to Paris, and there Montfort saw Caroline, and was caught. Mrs. Lyndsay, no doubt, calculated on living with her daughter, having the run of Montfort House in town and Montfort Court in the country. But Montfort is deeper than people think for. No, he never forgave her. She was never asked here—took it to heart, went to Rome, and died."

At this moment the door opened, and George Morley, now the Reverend George Morley, entered, just arrived to join his cousins.

Some knew him, some did not. Lady Selina, who made it a point to know all the cousins, rose graciously, put aside the slippers, and gave him two fingers. She was astonished to find him not nearly so shy as he used to be—wonderfully improved; at his ease, cheerful, animated. The man now was in his right place, and following hope on the bent of inclination. Few men are shy when in their right places. He asked after Lady Montfort. She was in her own small sitting-room, writing letters—letters that Carr Vipont had entreated her to write—correspondence useful to the House of Vipont. Before long, however, a servant entered to say that Lady Montfort would be very happy to see Mr. Morley. George followed the servant into that unpretending sitting-room, with its simple chintzes and quiet book-shelves—room that would not have been too fine for a cottage.

CHAPTER X.

In every life, go it fast, go it slow, there are critical pausing places. When the journey is renewed, the face of the country is changed.

How well she suited that simple room—herself so simply dressed—her marvelous beauty so exquisitely subdued. She looked at home there, as if all of home that the house could give were there collected.

She had finished and sealed the momentous letters, and had come, with a sense of relief, from the table at the farther end of the room, on which those letters, ceremonious and conventional, had been written—come to the window, which, though mid-winter, was open, and the red-breast, with whom she had made friends, hopped boldly almost within reach, looking at her with bright eyes, and head curiously aslant. By the window a single chair and a small reading-desk, with the book lying open. The short day was not far from its close, but there was ample light still in the skies, and a serene if chilly stillness in the air without.

Though expecting the relation she had just summoned to her presence, I fear she had half forgotten him. She was standing by the window deep in reverie as he entered, so deep that she started when his voice struck her ear and he stood before her. She recovered herself quickly, however, and said with even more than her ordinary kindliness of tone and manner toward the scholar—"I am so glad to see and congratulate you."

"And I so glad to receive your congratulations," answered the scholar, in smooth, slow voice, without a stutter.

"But, George, how is this?" asked Lady Montfort. "Bring that chair, sit down here, and tell me all about it. You wrote me word you were cured, at least sufficiently to remove your noble scruples. You did not say how. Your uncle tells me by patient will and resolute practice."

"Under good guidance. But I am going to confide to you a secret, if you will promise to keep it."

"Oh, you may trust me; I have no female friends."

The clergyman smiled, and spoke at once of the lessons he had received from the basket-maker.

"I have his permission," he said, in conclusion, "to confide the service he rendered me, the intimacy that has sprung up between us, but to you alone—not a word to your guests. When you have once seen him, you will understand why an eccentric man, who has known better days, would shrink from the impertinent curiosity of idle customers. Contented with his humble livelihood, he asks but liberty and repose."

"That I already comprehend," said Lady Montfort, half sighing, half smiling. "But my curiosity shall not molest him, and when I visit the village, I will pass by his cottage."

"Nay, my dear Lady Montfort, that would be to refuse the favor I am about to ask, which is that you would come with me to that very cottage. It would so please him."

"Please him—why?"

"Because this poor man has a young female grandchild, and he is so anxious that you should see and be kind to her, and because, too, he seems most tenacious to remain in his present residence. The cottage, of course, belongs to Lord Montfort, and is let to him by the bailiff, and if you deign to feel interest in him, his tenure is safe."

Lady Montfort looked down, and colored. She thought, perhaps, how false a security her protection, and how slight an influence her interest would be, but she did not say so. George went on; and so eloquently and so touchingly did he describe both grandsire and grandchild, so skillfully did he intimate the mystery which hung over them, that Lady Montfort became much moved by his narrative, and willingly promised to accompany him across the park to the basket-maker's cottage the first opportunity. But when one has sixty guests in one's house, one has to wait for an opportunity to escape from them unremarked. And the opportunity, in fact, did not come for many days—not till the party broke up—save one or two dowager she-cousins who "gave no trouble," and one or two bachelor he-cousins whom my lord retained to consummate the slaughter of pheasants, and play at billiards in the dreary intervals between sunset and dinner—dinner and bedtime.

Then one cheerful frosty noon George Morley and his fair cousin walked boldly, en evidence, before the prying ghostly windows, across the broad gravel-walks—gained the secluded shrubbery, the solitary deeps of parkland—skirted the wide sheet of water—and passing through a private wicket in the paling, suddenly came upon the patch of osier-ground and humble garden, which were backed by the basket-maker's cottage.

As they entered those lowly precincts a child's laugh was borne to their ears—a child's silvery, musical, mirthful laugh; it was long since the great lady had heard a laugh like that—a happy child's natural laugh. She paused and listened with a strange pleasure. "Yes," whispered George Morley, "stop—and hush! there they are."

Waife was seated on the stump of a tree, materials for his handicraft lying beside, neglected. Sophy was standing before him—he, raising his finger as in reproof, and striving hard to frown. As the intruders listened, they overheard that he was striving to teach her the rudiments of French dialogue, and she was laughing merrily at her own blunders and at the solemn affectation of the shocked schoolmaster. Lady Montfort noted with no unnatural surprise the purity of idiom and of accent with which this singular basket-maker was unconsciously displaying his perfect knowledge of a language which the best educated English gentleman of that generation, nay, even of this, rarely speaks with accuracy and elegance. But her attention was diverted immediately from the teacher to the face of the sweet pupil. Women have a quick appreciation of beauty in their own sex—and women, who are themselves beautiful, not the least. Irresistibly Lady Montfort felt attracted toward that innocent countenance, so lively in its mirth, and yet so softly gay. Sir Isaac, who had hitherto lain perdu, watching the movements of a thrush amidst a holly-bush, now started up with a bark. Waife rose—Sophy turned half in flight. The visitors approached.

Here, slowly, lingeringly, let fall the curtain. In the frank license of narrative, years will have rolled away ere the curtain rise again. Events that may influence a life often date from moments the most serene, from things that appear as trivial and unnoticeable as the great lady's visit to the basket-maker's cottage. Which of those lives will that visit influence hereafter—the woman's, the child's, the vagrant's? Whose? Probably little that passes now would aid conjecture, or be a visible link in the chain of destiny. A few desultory questions—a few guarded answers—a look or so, a musical syllable or two exchanged between the lady and the child—a basket bought, or a promise to call again. Nothing worth the telling. Be it then untold. View only the scene itself as the curtain drops reluctantly. The rustic cottage, its garden-door open, and open its old-fashioned lattice casements. You can see how neat and cleanly, how eloquent of healthful poverty, how remote from squalid penury, the whitewashed walls, the homely furniture within. Creepers lately trained around the door-way. Christmas holly, with berries red against the window panes; the bee-hive yonder; a starling, too, outside the threshold, in its wicker cage. In the background (all the rest of the neighboring hamlet out of sight), the church-spire tapering away into the clear blue wintry sky. All has an air of repose—of safety. Close beside you is the Presence of home—that ineffable, sheltering, loving Presence—which, amidst solitude, murmurs "not solitary;" a Presence unvouchsafed to the great lady in the palace she has left. And the lady herself? She is resting on the rude gnarled root-stump from which the vagrant had risen; she has drawn Sophy toward her; she has taken the child's hand; she is speaking now—now listening; and on her face kindness looks like happiness. Perhaps she is happy at that moment. And Waife? he is turning aside his weather-beaten, mobile countenance, with his hand anxiously trembling upon the young scholar's arm. The scholar whispers, "Are you satisfied with me?" and Waife answers in a voice as low but more broken, "God reward you! Oh, joy!—if my pretty one has found at last a woman friend!" Poor vagabond, he has now a calm asylum—a fixed humble livelihood—more than that, he has just achieved an object fondly cherished. His past life—alas! what has he done with it? His actual life—broken fragment though it be—is at rest now. But still the everlasting question—mocking, terrible question—with its phrasing of farce and its enigmas of tragical sense—"What will he do with it?" Do with what? The all that remains to him—the all he holds!—the all which man himself, betwixt free-will and pre-decree is permitted to do. Ask not the vagrant alone—ask each of the four there assembled on that flying bridge called the Moment. Time before thee—what wilt thou do with it? Ask thyself!—ask the wisest! Out of effort to answer that question, what dream-schools have risen, never wholly to perish! The science of seers on the Chaldee's Pur-Tor, or in the rock-caves of Delphi, gasped after and grasped at by horn-handed mechanics to-day in their lanes and alleys. To the heart of the populace sink down the blurred relics of what once was the lore of the secretest sages—hieroglyphical tatters which the credulous vulgar attempt to interpret—"What will he do with it?" Ask Merle and his Crystal! But the curtain descends! Yet a moment, there they are—age and childhood—poverty, wealth, station, vagabondage; the preacher's sacred learning and august ambition; fancies of dawning reason;—hopes of intellect matured;—memories of existence wrecked; household sorrows—untold regrets—elegy and epic in low, close, human sighs, to which Poetry never yet gave voice—all for the moment personified there before you—a glimpse for the guess—no more. Lower and lower falls the curtain! All is blank!

THE LIGHT BURNING BEFORE THE CORPSE.

THE BURIAL OF THE QUEEN OF OUDE.

We have had occasion to allude to the death of the Queen of Oude, which took place lately at Paris. We now give illustrations of the unusual ceremonies to which that event gave rise.

Her Majesty was in ill health some time before she left England. Her recent vicissitudes of fortune, and the anxiety which the recent mutiny in India must have caused, no doubt aggravated her disease. She was known to be in a dangerous condition; yet she refused to submit to the visits of European practitioners. When she went to Paris she was taken alarmingly ill; still she would not allow physicians to be called in until her state became so serious that death was imminent. She then sent for Doctors Cabarrus and Roger. But as her son philosophically said, "If her fate was written, science could avail nothing;" and the physicians, having done what they could to ease her last moments, left her to die tranquilly.

As soon as she was dead the body was taken down to a room on a level with the court-yard of the house. (It should be remembered that most large houses in Paris are built on a very wide lot, and that the centre of the lot is left vacant; so that each house has a private court-yard of its own.) In a room looking out on this yard, the body of the Queen was laid on a bier. The women then proceeded to embalm her. This was the process: The body was placed on a table, and the women, one after the other, poured cold water over it from vases procured for the purpose. This ceremony over, and the body being carefully dried with towels, the face was painted, so as to hide the hideousness of death. A powerfully perfumed preparation was poured into the mouth, which was afterward sealed up with red wax and stamped with the Royal seal of Oude; as also were the eyes, nostrils, and ears. Perfumed ointments were then rubbed upon the body, which was afterward clothed in beautiful and rich garments. The embalming was now complete. The Queen was then placed on a bed, and the Mohammedan funeral rites were proceeded with. A priest and the chief mourners entered the room, now lighted with innumerable candles; prayers were read, and passages from the Koran were chanted, while the chamber was filled with the choicest perfumes burning on every side.

THE FEMALE MOURNERS.

The funeral, which took place a few days after the death, was delayed by a singular accident. According to the Mussulman rites a fire must be lighted "over against" the corpse, and must be allowed to burn out before the corpse is removed. When the funeral pageant arrived at the house, this fire was still alight, and the cortège was obliged to wait several hours till it went out. Then each lady of the household spent some moments in solitary prayer by the side of the corpse.

At length these preliminaries were completed, and the funeral procession commenced. It was grand and unusual even for Paris. The coffin was carried by eight of the chief members of the suite to the hearse, which was entirely covered with silver tissue, and drawn by eight white horses. The hearse was preceded by a carriage containing the priest, and was followed by the Prince Mirza Bahadour, leaning on the arms of General d'Orgoni and Captain Lynch; behind them came about a dozen natives, members of the suite, also on foot, and then a line of ten mourning-coaches, containing various ambassadors and men notable in science and literature. An immense crowd assembled in the Rue Lafitte to witness the procession; and just as the body left the house a number of Indian women of extraordinary ugliness, but dressed in rich and picturesque costume, appeared on the balcony.

When the procession reached the cemetery of the Père la Chaise, where the body was to be buried, a white cloth was spread over the grave, and the people of the family of the late Queen gathered in circle round it. Her son and the priest sat down on the cloth, and proceeded to discuss in a set dialogue the virtues of the deceased. They were talking against time, and her Majesty was eulogized in the most garrulous manner; every virtue which she possessed, and every virtue which she did not but might have possessed, was descanted upon to the fullest extent and in the most elaborate manner. The Parisian by-standers, who did not understand a word of what was being said, got tired long before the talking was over, and went home in knots of twos and threes.

SCENE AT THE GRAVE IN THE PÈRE LA CHAISE CEMETERY.

At length sunset arrived, and the white cloth was removed and the body of her Majesty was duly committed to the tomb. It is said that her son was so much overcome by the first news of her death that he very nearly did himself a mischief in the paroxysms of his grief. However this be, he bore himself very manfully during the public ceremony. His voice did not falter during the utterance of his eulogium upon his mother, and when the dread hour of sunset came, he saw the coffin lowered into the grave and the cold earth thrown upon it as apathetically as any French badaud.

Perhaps the most curious circumstance of these obsequies relates to the inscription on the monument over the grave. It states simply:

"In memory of Malka Kackwar, Queen of the Kingdom of Oude, died Rue Lafitte, aged fifty-three years."

The lapidary artist suggested to the friends of the Queen who ordered the inscription of him that it was usual for the date and place of birth to be mentioned as well as the date and place of death. They referred the matter to the Prince; but neither he nor any of his mother's ladies could tell where the late Queen was born. She was a lady of fortune; and like ladies of fortune in this country, her birth and childhood were matters of impenetrable mystery.

THE CHAPEL CHORISTERS.

"GLORIA IN EXCELSIS!" rang through the little chapel in a clear volume of sound that rose above the accompaniment of the organ, and was just shaded and softened by the flute-like tenor that accompanied that single female voice.

Many of the sunbrowned seamen who worshiped there knew the voice and the singer, and listened the more earnestly, because of her, to the chants and psalms, and the sermon that followed. It was "English Bessie" who came among their wives and children on many a kindly errand, and had always a cheerful word for the sick and desponding. The men called her "a hearty lass," and wished many a "blessing on her honest face." Their wives, in Sunday dress, and proud of the stalwart arms on which they leaned, "thought it shame" that she had not chosen from among the rough and hardy wooers by whom she was surrounded.

Prayer and chant were over, and the still sermon-time came, when Bessie's duties were ended; and she drew the crimson curtain aside to look and listen with the rest. The warm summer sun came quivering from the water through the lance-shaped windows, and lighted up the pale, grave face of the clergyman in his pulpit and the strangely gathered audience.

Some were boatmen, or hands from coasting vessels, whose occupation allowed them leisure for home and its comforts. They were surrounded by their wives and little ones in all the smartness of their Sunday costume, relieved by scarfs or shawls of bright foreign weaving, the gift of some successful relative on a return voyage. The children sat uneasily on the high benches, and looked at the flies on the window, or studied the pictures in their prayer-books, as children will. These were the more regular attendants of the chapel. And there were men whose dress had no pretension to Sunday neatness, who scarcely knew one day of the week from another, except that the seventh was, in some sort, a day of rest even with the hardest captains under whom they sailed—who were there they scarcely knew how or why, from idle whim or vague curiosity, to hear the music or "what the parson would have to say," gathered literally from the highways and by-ways, and compelled to come in.

Heat and cold were alike to them so long as they could lead in the "common praise" and respond to the "common prayer" of those in whom they thus evinced untiring interest—to English Bessie, for the sake of the father and brother buried by one wave from the same wreck; and to the blind man at her side, whose white hands drew such noble music from the organ's keys, while he sang the pure, clear tenor of which we spoke.

He sat with his face turned toward Bessie, as if his sightless eyes longed to know the features of this familiar friend, whom he had never yet seen. His long hair, thrown backward from a forehead that had never known exposure, touched the broad linen collar, turned over a simple ribbon, tied carelessly about the throat. His dress was simple and far from new, but neat, so neat that you wondered to know a woman's hand had not arranged it. Music was at once his passion and his livelihood. For the rest, he had no relatives and no dependence.

It was a singular friendship that had grown up between these two, who met not elsewhere; and when the sermon was done, it was pleasant to see the sisterly care with which she handed him his hat and staff, and led him down the narrow stairs, where he must have groped slowly but for her hand.

"Here is the sill, Richard," she said, "and here the door; and there is the rector waiting to speak with you."

But the quick ear of the blind man discovered another step, and, though he listened to the kindly words of the grave rector, he heard an invitation given and refused where Bessie stood at the door of the vestibule.

"What did he want?" asked Richard, in the quick, excited manner peculiar to him, as his hand was once more placed in that firm, reliant clasp, and she led him over the swaying plank to the shore.

"Steady! There, now you are on the wharf," Bessie said, as she might have soothed an excited child. "Who? What? Allen?"

"Yes, Allen. I heard his voice when Mr. Storey was talking. When did the Bess come in? He has had a quick trip."

"Not very; the usual time. There, now, you do not need my hand any longer."

"Why do you take it away, Bessie? There is a crossing yet, and those piles of lumber."

"Yes"—and she laughed pleasantly—"but you know them as well as I do. You could lead me here."

"I wish I could," he answered below his breath, for the blindness was still a dark horror to him. "But Allen?"

"He only asked about to-night, if I should go to chapel, and—"

"If he could walk with you. When are you going to be married?" he added, abruptly.

But Bessie only pointed out a loose round stone in the crossing, as if she did not hear the question.

"Mother's not so well to-day, and I can not go as far as usual," she said, as they entered a narrow, crooked street. "How bright and pleasant it must look out at the asylum now, with all the roses in bloom!"

"Yet, if one could see them."

"Richard, you are not thankful to-night for what you can enjoy," said the young girl, earnestly. "You have a cheerful home and fresh sweet-scented air and cheerful society."

"Go on, Bessie. You mean 'while you are shut up in this close street with a sick mother, and your bread to gain by your needle.' But then there is Allen!" and the gloomy tone came back again.

"Let him be there," Bessie answered, decidedly, pausing at her own door-stone. "Richard, you sang 'Benedic, anima mea' this afternoon; remember it on your way home. I shall, so long as my mother has a shelter, and I have health and strength to work for her. Take care now, and look out for the carriages and the crossings. I shall have time for a practice hour on Wednesday evening. You may come to tea if you like."

The blind man's staff rang upon the pavement as he went on his lonely way, not knowing that she stood upon the door-stone, and watched for his safety so long as he was in sight. He did not know what should make him so restless and disturbed about this marriage. It was right and natural, and what he could have wished for Bessie. They would be finely paired—the high-spirited, energetic woman and her sailor lover. He so tall, and bronzed, and stalwart, as Bessie's husband ought to be; frank and generous, as sailors ever are.

Richard Langdon, the blind music-teacher, still lived at the asylum where he had studied his beautiful art, with the love and confidence of pupils and teachers. The rooms were of noble proportions, the grounds fragrant with sweet-scented shrubbery, and cool with the shadow of heavy foliage. Here he walked, that still Sabbath afternoon, and thought upon his aimless, joyless childhood, and what if he had had a sister like Bessie to cheer it. There were many hours when his mind preyed upon itself; it had always been so in the pauses of study, but never so much as now.

So he wandered down the rose-walk, listening to the murmur of voices that rose from the playground beyond the garden, and envying the children their Sabbath rest and peace. But his mind would go back to Bessie and their first acquaintance, when she came to offer her fresh, strong, but untrained voice to assist him to lead in the chapel music. His nature was so gentle that her quick, stirring way was not pleasant to him at first: it was not his idea of womanliness. He liked her better when he found how much in earnest she was to improve this one talent, and how grateful for his instructions. Now when they were together he laid aside the timid uncertainty of step and manner trusting to her guidance. When she was married, all these pleasant walks and rehearsals must end, for she would have new duties and companionship and pleasures. No wonder he was restless and disturbed.

The pale, gentle widow had a welcome for him when the appointed evening came; and he sat down near her, in the open door, until Bessie should come in. He could feel the neatness of all around him, and heard the cat purring in the door-sill, and the kettle singing its pleasant evening song in the outer room. It was all so still and homelike to him—though he had never known a home but in his dreams; so different from the clatter of feet through the corridors of the asylum, the opening and shutting of doors, the hum of children conning their lessons, or the discordance of the tortured musical instruments under the hands of unskillful pupils. He wondered if the gay, boisterous sailor would appreciate this quiet rest, so dear to him, and Bessie's invalid mother, with her delicate tastes and instincts.

When tea was over and the household duties were ended for the day, though it was pleasant to hear Bessie go so easily about them, she came, for the first time, and sat down by him on the door-stone, for the house was one of those low, old-fashioned tenements where you step from the street into the dwelling-room at once. The street was still and deserted, save now and then a solitary footstep echoed along the pavement, and died away in the shadows beyond. A massive, but long disused warehouse, built when this narrow street had its great commercial fame and influence, loomed opposite to them, the iron-bound doors and shutterless windows gleaming in the moonlight, an old, decayed, but to Bessie a pleasant neighbor. It was better to sit by her window and imagine the days of its ancient bustle and opulence, than to watch the bad management of some thriftless housekeeper, or her neglected children quarreling on the pavement. To-night, it was especially pleasant to see it so softly shadowed; and she described it to the blind man as she would have drawn the picture of a friend.

And yet she could not draw a portrait of herself that satisfied him. She always turned away with some jest upon her stout figure and heavy features, which displeased and annoyed him, for he never could make her any thing but beautiful in his mind.

"I will ask her now," thought Richard, "before any one has a claim upon her;" and, with quick impulse, he preferred a long-indulged, but unspoken request.

"If you will only let me touch your hair—your face, one instant, Bessie, as I do when I wish to know my friends and pupils better, I shall be more contented when you are Allen's wife. You have been such a dear, true friend to me!"

She took up both his hands, and, stooping, laid them on her bowed head.

"As I thought," he murmured rather than spoke; and his hands shook and trembled, though she was so quiet beneath their touch. "Soft, wavy hair; it is brown, I know, brown, and silken as a child's. The broad, open forehead, that belongs to you, Bessie. I know how your eyes look now, honest and fearless and very truthful; such long lashes, and your cheek so round and smooth! How could you tell me that you were not beautiful!"

"Because I am not," she said, taking his hands again. "And feel how hardened my hands are, while yours are soft and white. It is an ugly contrast, and so are our faces and characters and dispositions," she added, presently.

"I knew—but Allen is manly and hardy and cheerful. I was not always so gloomy, Bessie; truly I was not. But I grew so restless and dependent and homesick—I can not describe it any other way—yet I never have had, and never shall have a home such as other men win for themselves, who do not know how to prize it as I should."

"It is almost time for the rehearsal," said Bessie, as if to lead him from this hopeless mood, "and mother has fallen asleep there upon her pillows. Come, let us go, Richard."

She drew his arm within hers as they rose, and they walked on toward the river, for the chapel was scarcely a stone's-throw. He longed to say more, to tell her all that the touch of that bowed head had revealed to him, how passionately he loved her, how doubly hateful his blindness and dependence were to him for her sake, how doubly solitary his life would always be for having known her and for her care over him; but he struggled with this stormy mood bravely, for he knew he had no right to lay the burden of his misfortunes at any woman's feet, even if she were free to take it up and bear it onward for him.

So they walked on in silence for a little time until they began to hear the soft plash of the incoming tide against the wharves and the sides of the vessels lying at anchor. It recalled the trim schooner Bess and her captain to his mind.

"When are you to be married?" he asked, abruptly. "Soon, I hope."

"Do you, Richard?"

"Yes, it is better to be soon;" and again the strong tide of feeling rushed to his lips. He pressed his teeth into them, so that he should say no more.

"Well, then," said Bessie, her voice trembling a little—he had never known this before—"I am going to make you a strange proposal, not strange, for it is right and best; mother thinks as I do. You are to be my husband, Richard, when I do marry, for you love me as Allen does not and can not, and you need me more than he, as I told him when he asked me to be his wife."

"I, Bessie! Poor and blind! I your husband!"

He reeled as if a sudden blow had been struck, but she upheld him steadily.

"If you do not wish it, Richard, it ends here. You know me well enough in these three years to know that I mean all I say, and that I had only to assure myself of your love before I allowed mine to be seen. You would never have asked this of me: but here I am. I offer myself, my love, and care, and companionship to you, if you will take it. Richard, let me be home, and strength, and sight to you always."

It was well that they had reached the chapel, for the courage with which she had nerved herself was fast forsaking her. By the dim light she saw their rector bending over his books in the vestry, as was his wont when he expected them there. The blind man heard the advancing step and kindly welcome, as he came forward to the chancel, and the sound of other voices in the loft above them.

"Make it real; it is all a dream," he said, and they knelt down together for their pastor's blessing, for he knew all that was in their hearts, and that henceforth the chant of thanksgiving would come from the innermost depths of Richard Langdon's soul—

"Who crowneth me with mercy and loving kindness."

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

BOB PETERS was too bashful to pop the question, but he sent a ring to Clara, with these lines:

"This ring that's inclosed will you please to retain?
May it grace your dear hand when we next meet again;
I'm aware 'tis a trifle, but still it will show
What I tremble to ask, yet am dying to know. R. P."

Now Clara was somewhat witty, and she resolved to punish Bob's vanity. Accordingly, the next day she sent one of the servants with a dainty little note addressed to Mr. Robert Peters, with the ring inclosed. Bob broke the seal, and read as follows:

"If you mean by your trembling that you have obtained
That awful disease, by the 'Faculty' named
The fever and ague, and sometimes the shakes,
I advise you at once to get some quinine—
Take a spoonful or so, and mix it with wine—
Then swallow a dose; it will cure all your aches."

Two young men were examining a case of perfumery; one remarked that "Harrison of Philadelphia had realized a considerable fortune by its manufacture." "Yes," said the other, "no doubt he has; but Mr. Eau de Cologne must have made a great deal more."

In the Court of Special Sessions, recently, a man named Smith was arraigned for stealing a demijohn, containing three gallons of whisky.

"Are you guilty, or not guilty?" asked the clerk.

"Wal, you can call it what you likes; I tuk the whisky, that I admit, and drinked it, too."

"You took it without leave, did you not?"

"I never wait to be asked, when that article's round."

To ridicule old age is like pouring, in the morning, cold water into the bed in which you have to sleep at night.

VERY ENCOURAGING.—A lady consulted St. Francis of Sales on the lawfulness of using rouge. "Why," said he, "some pious men object to it, others see no harm in it; I will hold a middle course, and allow you to use it on one cheek."

THE CHICKEN AND FEATHERS.—At breakfast one morning in that quiet and comfortable old inn, the White Swan, in York, a foreigner made quick dispatch with the eggs. Thrusting his spoon into the middle, he drew out the yolk, devoured it, and passed on to the next. When he had got to his seventh egg an old farmer, who had already been prejudiced against Monsieur by his mustaches, could brook the extravagance no longer, and, speaking up, said, "Why, Sir, you leave all the white! How is Mrs. Lockwood to afford to provide breakfast at that rate?" "Vy," replied the outside barbarian, "you vouldn't have me eat de vite? De yolk is de shicken; de vite de fedders. Am I to make von bolster of my belly?" The farmer was dumbfounded.

Major Brown, some years ago, occupied a seat in the Legislature of one of our Western States. The subject of public improvements was being discussed, and, among the rest, a bill for improving roads was before the House. The Major "spread" himself hugely in favor of the bill. Pointing out the beauties and benefits of roads, "Why, gentlemen," says he, "look at the Mi-chi-gan road, Sir—straight as a bee-line, Sir; and, gentlemen, so straight that you can see a red dog a mile long, Sir!"

A correspondent in Missouri writes that the minister of his parish was holding forth last Sunday on the state of things before the flood, and thus delivered himself:

"My hearers, before the flood the people (like they are at the present day) were divided into different parties. There were then two great parties, denominated the Diluvians and the Anti-Diluvians. Here, in this State, now, we have Bentons and Anti-Bentons. In those days the Diluvians were in favor of the flood, while the Anti-Diluvians were opposed to it. Here the Benton party are in favor of Benton, while the Anti-Benton party are opposed to him." It is very evident that the Diluvians carried the day.

Mrs. T., on reading in a recent paper that a modern writer on gipsies claimed John Bunyan to have been one, remarked that he was most probably a corn doctor!

A journal of the early part of 1852, in an article on the suspension of life in the case of perch and mullet which had been brought in ice from Lake Champlain during that winter, frozen solid, and, on being put into a tub, had come to life as lively as ever, stated: "Our readers will remember that a female convict in Sweden is now in ice, on experiment; and that a man was found lately, in Switzerland, who gave signs of life after being frozen for nine months. The power of stopping while the world goes on may be the next wonder. Ice-houses may soon be advertised with comfortable arrangements for skipping an epoch, or waiting for the next generation."

"Were you ever in Cork?" said the gay Mrs. Jones,
In the blandest of manners and sweetest of tones.
"No, Madam," said I; "though in Dublin I've been, Yet of Cork it is only the drawings I've seen!"

Purpose is the edge and point of character; it is the superscription on the letter of talent. Character without it is blunt and torpid; genius without it is bullion—splendid and uncirculating.

A HARD WITNESS.—The following dialogue, which occurred several years ago between a lawyer and a witness, in a justice's court, not a great many thousand miles from this place, is worth relating:

It seems that Mr. Jones loaned Mr. Smith a horse, which died while in his (Smith's) possession. Mr. Jones brought suit to recover the value of the horse, attributing his death to bad treatment. During the course of the trial a witness (Mr. Brown) was called to the stand to testify as to how Mr. Smith treated horses.

LAWYER (with a bland and confidence-invoking smile). "Well, Sir, how does Mr. Smith generally ride a horse?"

WITNESS (with a very merry twinkle in his eye, otherwise imperturbable). "A straddle, I believe, Sir."

LAWYER (with a scarcely perceptible flush of vexation upon his cheek, but still speaking in his smoothest tones). "But, Sir, what gait does he ride?"

WITNESS. "He never rides any gate, Sir. His boys ride all the gates."

LAWYER (his bland smile gone and his voice slightly husky). "But how does he ride when in company with others?"

WITNESS. "Keeps up, if his horse is able; if not, he goes behind."

LAWYER (triumphantly, and in perfect fury). "How does he ride when alone, Sir?"

WITNESS. "Don't know; never was with him when he was alone."

LAWYER. "I have done with you, Sir."

A lady was requested by a bachelor who was somewhat advanced in years to take a seat on his lap while in a crowded sleigh.

"No, I thank you," said she, "I am afraid such an old seat would break down with me."

"Jury," said a Western judge, "you kin go out and find a verdict. If you can't find one of your own, get the one the last jury used." They returned a verdict of suicide in the ninth degree.

The following is a very clever parody on "Excelsior:"

HIGHER!

The shadows of night were comin' down swift,
And the dazzlin' snow lay drift on drift,
As through a village a youth did go,
A carryin' a flag with this motto—
Higher!

O'er a forehead high curled copious hair,
His nose a Roman, complexion fair;
O'er an eagle eye an auburn lash;
And he never stopped shoutin' through his mustache—
Higher!

He saw through the windows as he kept gettin' upper
A number of families sittin' at supper;
But he eyed the slippery rocks very keen,
And fled as he cried, and cried while a fleein'—
Higher!

"Take care you there!" said an old woman; "Stop!
It's blowin' gales up there on top;
You'll tumble off on the other side!"
But the hurryin' stranger loud replied—
Higher!

"Oh, don't you go up such a shocking night;
Come sleep on my lap," said a maiden bright.
On his Roman nose a tear-drop come,
But still he remarked, as upward he clomb—
Higher!

"Look out for the branch of that sycamore tree:
Dodge rollin' stones, if any you see!"
Sayin' which the farmer went home to bed,
And the singular voice replied, overhead—
Higher!

About a quarter past six the next forenoon,
A man accidentally goin' up soon,
Heard spoken above him, as often as twice,
The very same word, in a very weak voice—
Higher!

And not far, I believe, from a quarter of seven,
He was slow gettin' up, the road bein' uneven;
Found the stranger dead in the drifted snow,
Still a clutchin' the flag with the motto—
Higher!

Yes! lifeless, defunct, without any doubt:
The lamp of his being decidedly out;
On the dreary hill-side the youth was a layin',
And there was no more use for him to be sayin'—
Higher!

If a man's goods and chattels are his effects, is that man the cause of his plate and furniture?

FORTUNE A SALE.—Two of "our" boys, writes a Western friend, Hi Anglo and Mike Walker, while hunting in the wilds of Minnesota. During the long winter evenings they went to work and made up a lot of sun-drives. Being "our" hands at the business, the latter were very thing but handsome, but they were very much interested in what was displayed on them, and in giving their instructions, went in alone. Inquiring of the shopman if he had any knives, he was informed that he had not. Hastening up, he inquired why he did not keep such things, and told him to buy the next dozen he came across and they would settle for him. A dozen did not long pass some time, Dick went in and sold the knives. The shopman is understood to be happy.

A perfumer should make a good editor, because he is accustomed to make "elegant extracts."

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, March 22, 1858.

MARCH of last year was about the culminating point of excessive speculation, accordingly, as the time intervening between the movement this year and then more striking even than in January. The following are the exports made of this port for the two periods compares as follows:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Mar. 20, 1858	$2,506,544	$1,208,964
Corresponding week, 1857	3,054,991	1,809,334

Decrease this year.....$548,447 ..... $600,370

The export of specie was only $116,114. We have no change in the rates of sterling or currency, and the exchange on England has fallen to 107 @ 107¼, at which rate it would pay to import specie freely. Indeed, the drain for export has therefore entirely ceased for the present. Specie continues to accumulate rapidly at the banks. Through the sub-treasury in this city has gained $2,000,000 by the operation of treasury notes issued in January, it is not expected that the Banks will draw this specie out to any large amount. The Bank of England is considerably strong as well as London bankers on the basis of England remains as last reported, but on the Continental points the drain for specie to the gold fields of France has gained five millions since the last statement.

There are decided symptoms of a revival in the Dry Goods and Grocery business, while the aspect of agriculture promises somewhat more activity in the produce line. As yet, however, the improvement in all branches are very limited.

The stock market has declined throughout the week, the prices of many of the speculative securities being nearly 5 per cent. per cent lower than they were a fortnight ago. The depression has been in Rock Island, Michigan Silver Lake, and Illinois Central. The latter is understood to be the manifestation of attempt to unload had carried large parcels of these stocks for long period.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, March 22, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets were in a very hasty for the leading kinds of Breadstuffs up to Saturday, when Flour and Wheat afternoon and evening, still closed buoyantly. Corn was plenty and depressed.... Cotton was less active, and prices favored buyers, and sales were opened quietly and languidly, but at no close they were more sought after at generally firm rates.... The Grocery trade has been decidedly vigorous, and prices have favored selling, especially Sugars, Coffees, and Molasses.... A fair business has been transacted in Fresh Fruits, Provisions, and Seeds, and prices rule firm.... Rice, active for previous days, has been quiet.... The Hay was very moderately dealt in at drooping figures.... Despatches advise of Drug and Chemical markets generally quite attention, both in private trade and in the auction-rooms, at pretty fair prices.... The Leather trade we have been on an extensive scale, and, on the whole, there were sales, and, considering the season, a good many Dry Goods amounted to $657,412 against $1,697,590 the corresponding week in 1857. The imports since the 1st of January have been $11,347,705 against $23,642,831 same time in 1857. Specie continues to accumulate at this port, and the exports of it are comparatively unimportant.... We append a revised quotations for the leading articles:

Ordinary to extra State Flour, per bbl.	$4 25	@ $4 60
Superfine to fancy State Flour	4 65	@ 5 00
Extra Western Flour, per barrel	4 45	@ 7 00
Fancy to extra Genesee, per barrel	5 00	@ 7 50
Superfine to Extra Canadian, per barrel	4 25	@ 5 85
Mixed to Extra Southern, per barrel	4 50	@ 7 50
Fine to Supr Sour Rye Flour, per bbl.	3 00	@ 3 75
Corn Meal, per barrel	3 00	@ 3 25
White Wheat, per bushel	1 18	@ 1 30
Red Wheat, per bushel	1 10	@ 1 20
New Crop Corn, per bushel	65	@ 68
Rye, per bushel	70	@ 72
Barley, per bushel	60	@ 70
Barley Malt, per bushel	80	@ 90
Peas Canada, per bushel	85	@ 85
Jersey and Penn. Oats, per bushel	43	@ 45
Southern Oats, per bushel	38	@ 40
Cotton, middlings, per pound	11⅛	@ 11⅜
Moss Pork, per bbl.	13 50	@ 14 00
Prime Pork, per barrel	12 50	@ 13 00
Country Mess Beef, per barrel	11 00	@ 11 50
Country Prime Beef, per barrel	7 00	@ 8 00
Prime Mess Beef, per tierce	19 00	@ 20 00
Beef Hams, per barrel	17 00	@ 19 00
Cut Meats, per pound	6	@ 7
Lard, per pound	10	@ 10½
Butter, Ohio, per pound	12	@ 14
Western Butter, per pound	14	@ 20
Cheese, per pound	7	@ 9
Rice, per 100 pounds	3 00	@ 4 12
Rio Coffee, per pound	9½	@ 11
Cuba Sugar, per pound	6	@ 7¼
Cuba Molasses, per gallon	23	@ 28
New Orleans Sugar, per pound	6	@ 7
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon	31	@ 35
Syrup Cane, per pound	30	@ 35
Tallow, per pound	9½	@ 10
Whale Bone, per gallon	28	@ 30
Hay, per 100 pounds	60	@ 75
Straw, per 100 pounds	50	@ 60
Crude Turpentine, per barrel	3 87½	@ 4 00
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon	43	@ 44
Common Resin, per 310 pounds	1 50	@ 1 62½

Freights were moderately active. For Liverpool, Cotton, 3-64; @ 5-32d.; per steam, 5-32d.; Flour, 1s.; per barrel; Grain, 6d.; @ 9d. per bushel; Beef, 5s. per barrel; Pork, 5s. 6d. per barrel; Beef, 5s. per tierce, and Heavy Goods, 35s. @ 40s. per ton. For other ports proportionate figures. Ins. steady at ruling rates. Exchanges, in part on Saturday was:

The Live Stock Markets last Wednesday were less active and less firm for Beeves, the supply of which was in excess of the requirements of the trade. Prices, however, were in slack request at drooping rates.... Veal Calves were upraised dull in and unchanged prices.... Sheep and Lambs were moderately inquired for at about former prices.... Swine, also, were less heavy.... The reported Receipts of Live Stock during each of the last two weeks compare thus:

	Week ending Mar. 15.	Week ending Mar. 22.
Beeves	2,277	2,437
Milch Cows	211	195
Veal Calves	565	640
Sheep and Lambs	5,337	5,953
Swine	3,000	3,000

Of the Forty-fourth Street Market supply of Beeves last Wednesday there were reported:

Ohio	773	Canada	3
Illinois	42	Michigan	1
New York	461	New Jersey	3
Indiana	694

The range of prices according to the actual sales of the week for the leading City Markets last Wednesday was as follows:

Four to first class Beeves, per pound	$ 6½	@ $ 10½
Common to ex. Milch Cows, per head	20 00	@ 50 00
Veal Calves, per pound	4½	@ 7½
Sheep and Lambs, per head	5 00	@ 6 00
" per pound	6½	@ 7½
Live Swine, per pound	4	@ 5½
Dressed "	6	@ 7½

The Country Produce Markets are better supplied, with a moderate demand for the leading commodities, no very remarkable changes have occurred in prices, save in Potatoes, which are generally lower.

WHOLESALE PRICES OBTAINED BY PRODUCERS AT WASHINGTON MARKET.

Apples, per barrel	$2 00	@ $5 00
Apples, fancy, per barrel	6 00	"
Pitachos, dried, per pound	15	@ 20
Plums, dried, per pound	15	@ 20
Hickory Nuts, per bushel	2 25	@ 2 50
Chestnuts, per bushel	2 00	@ 3 00
Peanuts, per bushel	60	@ 1 25
Potatoes, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 50
Potatoes, per barrel	3 50	@ 4 00
" sweet, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 50
" sweet, per barrel	3 00	@ 3 50
Onions, per barrel	1 75	@ 2 00
Turnips, per bushel	25	@ 30
Beets, per barrel	1 75	@ 2 00
Cabbages, per 100	4 00	@ 6 00
Parsnips, per barrel	1 50	@ 1 75
Carrots, per barrel	1 50	"
Leeks, per 100 bunches	3 00	@ 4 00
Celery, per 100 roots	1 50	@ 2 00
Garlic, per 100	3 00	@ 4 00
Eggs, Limed, per dozen	9	@ 10
Eggs, Fresh, per dozen	15	@ 16
Butter, per pound	16	@ 20
Butter, Firkin, per pound	14	@ 16
Guinea Fowl, per pair	44	@ 75
Ducks, per pair, tame	50	@ 75
" per pair	1 00	@ 1 25
Turkeys per head	75	@ 1 00
Geese, per pound	9	@ 11
Pigeons, per dozen	2 00	@ 3 00
Prairie Hens, per pair	75	@ 1 25
Partridge, per pair	1 00	@ 1 25
Quail, per dozen	3 00	@ 4 00
Rabbits, per pair	1 00	@ 1 25
Rabbits, each	16	@ 25
Squirrels, per pair	75	@ 1 00
Muskrats, each	6	@ 8
Venison, per pound	6	@ 8

ADVERTISEMENTS.

LECTURES IN THE FRENCH LANGUAGE, AT
THE SPINGLER INSTITUTE,
UNION SQUARE.

A COURSE OF FOUR LECTURES
WILL BE DELIVERED ON TUESDAY OF EVERY WEEK, AT EIGHT O'CLOCK P.M., BY CHARLES GRELLET-DUFRICHE,
Director of the French Institute for Young Gentlemen, No. 48 East Twenty-fourth Street.

SUBJECTS
MARCH 16TH, . . . MAN'S DESTINATION.
APRIL 1ST, . . . MAN'S DUTIES.
APRIL 1ST, . . . MAN'S EMBLEM OR GIRARDIN.
1858, . . . FRANCE.

COURSE TICKETS, $1 50: Single Tickets, 50 cents.
To be had at Lockwood's, 411 Broadway, and at the Institute.

THE OLD DOMINION COFFEE POT.

The lovers of good coffee would appreciate these new and popular machines after being subjected to the mere test of boiling water. They are adapted to the use of the ordinary boiler or biggin; the essential thing, as we discovered as by using all the steam escapes from the process of boiling.

PRICES
1 quart, $1 50; 1½ quart, $1 75; 2 quart, $2; 3 quart, $2 50; 4 quart, $3 75; 6 quart, $3; 10 quart, $4 50. A liberal discount to the trade.
E. P. TORREY, Manufacturer's Agent,
No. 8 Platt Street, New York.

HEALTH!
GRACEFUL AND BEAUTY!!!
Conferred upon the LADIES, by wearing
DR. LOWDEN'S
NEW EXPANSION SKIRT, WITH THE ADJUSTABLE BUSTER
(Patented March 16, 1858),
Which has been decided by the best medical authority to be the most complete article of dress ever produced for the ladies use, the weight being only 12 oz.
THE "EXPANSION SKIRT" HAS RECEIVED CELEBRATED ARTISTS are charged with their trade mark, and none genuine unless so stamped.
For sale at all the principal stores in the United States and Canada.

UP THE MEDITERRANEAN.

PLEASURE YOYAGE
BY STEAMER
MEDUSA,
A. R. LOWDEN, Commander.
The FIRST CLASS STEAMER MEDUSA will sail on SATURDAY, May 1st, at 2 o'clock P.M. on the above voyage, stopping at GIBRALTAR, MALAGA, ALGIERS, VALLETTA, MALTA, ALEXANDRIA, JAFFA (for JERUSALEM), ALEXANDRETTA, SMYRNA, and ATHENS.
No Berths secured till paid for.
For Cabin Passage, with Board, Passage $750.
For further particulars apply to
DUNHAM & CO.,
21 WILLIAM Street, New York.

HUNT, WEBSTER & CO'S
IMPROVED THIRTY-STITCH
SEWING MACHINES.

WE ARE NOW PREPARED TO EXHIBIT the newly-invented and valuable instrument, and would respectfully solicit a call from any person in want of a Sewing Machine whose qualities have only to be tried to be duly appreciated.
We have opened commodious rooms at 499 BROADWAY, for the sale of these machines, and all interested are respectfully invited to examine and decide upon their merits for themselves.
HUNT, WEBSTER & CO.,
No. 499 Broadway, New York.
Or, Fourth and Lincoln Streets, Boston,
No. 839 Chestnut Street, Philada.

RICH CLOTH COVERS
FOR
VOLUME I. OF HARPER'S WEEKLY
ARE NOW READY.
PRICE FIFTY CENTS.

The Trade and Bookbinders will be supplied at TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT. DISCOUNT.

CAUTION.

LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS IN AFRICA.

THE attention of MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS has been called to several spurious Works put forth as the "NARRATIVE OF DR. LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS IN AFRICA." One of these is a gross forgery throughout. It does not contain a single line written or furnished by DR. LIVINGSTONE, bears no resemblance whatever to his genuine Narrative, but is altogether the invention of the fabricator. Another book professes to give, in the language of Dr. Livingstone, a "complete account of his various journeys, omitting only incidental details and scientific matter." These "incidental details" which are omitted form more than one half of the matter in the genuine edition, embracing the most valuable part of the book, nearly all of the characteristic illustrations, and the elaborate Maps, which are essential to a full understanding of the exploration and success of the Author. The place of the genuine illustrations has been supplied by coarse secondhand cuts, bearing no relation whatever to Dr. Livingstone's Book. This mutilated edition is issued mainly for circulation through the "Gift Book" scheme of the publisher, although it is understood that reputable members of the Trade have purchased it, supposing it to be a genuine, unmutilated edition.

HARPER & BROTHERS therefore respectfully caution the Trade and the Public against being imposed upon by these forged and mutilated Works.

The only genuine unmutilated American edition of Dr. Livingstone's Work is that published by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS, printed from an early copy purchased for a large sum from the Author. It contains 754 pages, large octavo, with a Portrait of the Author engraved upon Steel; two elaborate Steel Plate Maps, with Livingstone's Routes colored, and SIXTY-FIVE large Wood-cuts, engraved in the highest style of the Art. The volume is beautifully printed and substantially bound. Price Three Dollars.

TO PERSONS IN THE COUNTRY.

MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS will send a copy of LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, upon the receipt of Three Dollars.

PHONOGRAPHY; or, PHONETIC SHORT-HAND. For Alphabet, Specimen Pages of the Phonographic Magazine for 1858, and List of Works, address BENN PITMAN, Cincinnati, O.

CARPETS! CARPETS!
A!! A!! A!! A!! A!!—ANDERSON'S.—A!!—Anderson, the enterprising carpet-man, continues his system of selling Carpets at a trifling advance on cost. Ingrain, per yard, English, from 50 cts. to $1; Ingrain carpets, $1, 44, 6s, fine; oilcloths, 50, 62½, 75, 87½, $1; $2.50 and upwards; rugs, mats, and mattings, to be sold.
HIRAM ANDERSON, 80 Broadway.

A NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE of Harper & Brothers' Publications, with Terms and Classified Table of Contents, is now ready for delivery, and may be obtained gratuitously on application to the Publishers personally, or by letter inclosing a Post Office Stamp.

The attention of gentlemen, in town or country, designing to form Libraries of Standard or Miscellaneous Literature, is respectfully invited to this Catalogue, which will be found to contain a full and complete list of the valuable and most esteemed works in English literature—comprising History, Biography, Travels, Voyages, Novels, Poetry, Books of Reference, and Text-books, as it has cost the Publishers much time and labor to prepare it, and the cost of similar publications, at least one half.

To Librarians of Public Institutions, Colleges, and Schools, etc., who may not have access to a reliable guide in forming their collections, the Publishers confidently believe this Catalogue will prove especially valuable as a manual of reference.

To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, wherever books are to be ordered, through any bookseller or local agent, applications with remittance should be addressed early, as the Publishers cannot be held responsible for delays.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, New York.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.—A highly concentrated and genuine extract. A searching and full purifier of the blood, it is unequaled, being safe, pleasant, and sure.
Prepared by A. SANDS, M.D., and D. S. SANDS, M.D., No. 100 Fulton Street, New York.
Sold by druggists every where.

ADMONITION.—Our duty to ourselves should enforce on the sick
THE IMPORTANCE of a thorough examination, and from which sick they receive the most unconditional, and positively the latest, Professional office, No. 6 Stuyvesant Building, Canal Street. Price 25 cents a box, with directions.

KISS-ME-QUICK. Exquisite Perfume, distilled from fragrant Violets.
E. D. BABCOCK, Sole Importer, 689 Broadway.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $3 50 A YEAR.

BULWER'S BRILLIANT ROMANCE, entitled "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?" pronounced to be the most powerful of this prolific author's celebrated novelist, by special arrangement with the Author appears in the HARPER'S WEEKLY simultaneously with its publication in England.

TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.
One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) . . 2 00
And an extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS.

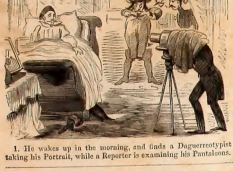
TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.
One Copy for Twenty Weeks $1 00
One Copy for Fifty Weeks 2 50
One Copy for Two Years 4 00
Five Copies for One Year 10 00
Twelve Copies for One Year 20 00
Twenty Copies for One Year 30 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE Subscribers, at Twenty Dollars.

Volume I. of "HARPER'S WEEKLY," handsomely bound in Illuminated Cloth, Gilt Back, will be sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of Three Dollars.

Muslin Covers are furnished to those who wish their Numbers bound at the end of the year. These Covers are neat. Directions allowed to Booksellers and the Trade.

THE VOLUME OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE AND WEEKLY," when taken together, are supplied at FOUR DOLLARS a Volume.



Numbers from the commencement of both the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY can still be supplied. Specimen copies furnished gratuitously. Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest Club rates.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" must be paid at the Office where they are received. When prepaid quarterly in advance, the Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty-six Cents a year on the WEEKLY.

Persons residing in the British Provinces will remit, in addition to the regular subscription, Twenty-four Cents on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty-six Cents on the WEEKLY, for the American postage.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

THE TURKISH ADMIRAL IN NEW YORK.

1. He wakes up in the morning, and finds a Daguerreotypist taking his Portrait, while a Reporter is examining his Pantaloons.

2. Is introduced to innumerable New York Citizens: most of them are, or have relatives engaged in Shipbuilding, and therefore insist on presenting him with Cards, Models, &c.

3. Takes a little Refreshment. (N. B. The Koran contains no Text prohibiting Brandy and Water.)

4. Is delighted by the activity of the New York Firemen. Nearly run over by Fire Company on Side-walk.

5. Goes out for a Sleigh-ride.

6. Goes back to Lunch, and can't eat any thing, in consequence of a pretty Woman sitting on either side of him, and scrutinizing his actions.

7. Smokes his meerschaum under difficulties. Surrounded by a crowd of lookers on, with hats on, hands in pocket, and cigars in mouth.

8. Gets indignant at the infliction, and orders his suite to banish the next intruder. (Turks removing an Alderman's boots.)

9. Refuses to be visible to any body, and places officers at his door with instructions to bowstring any intruders.

BROWN. "So you're going to Marry Old Mrs. YELLOWBOYCE. Well, I think you're a Decced Lucky Fellah!"

JONES. "By Jove, I don't think the Luck is all on my side! If she finds Money, hang it, I find Blood and—haw—Beauty!"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

POSTAGE STAMPS FOR SALE, IN ANY QUANTITY, AT HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE.

PREMATURE LOSS OF THE HAIR.

☞ Which is so common now-a-days, may be entirely prevented by the use of Burnett's Cocoaine. It has been used in thousands of cases where the hair was coming out in handfuls, and has never failed to arrest its decay, and to promote a healthy and vigorous growth. It is at the same time unrivaled as a dressing for the Hair. A single application will render it soft and glossy for several days. For sale by all druggists.

EUROPEAN ACQUAINTANCE: Being Sketches of People in Europe. By J. W. DE FOREST. 12mo. Muslin, 75 cents.

☞ Mr. De Forest has had the rare tact and opportunity to make the guide-books alive, and write only of what he actually saw and heard. Hence his unpretending volume offers the most life-like, animated, and charming pictures of European society.—N. Y. Com. Advertiser.

☞ One of the most readable and entertaining books of travel that has appeared for many months.—Boston Christian Observer.

SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE. The Sad Fortunes of the Rev. Amos Barton.—Mr. GILFIL'S Love-Story.—Janet's Repentance. A Novel. By GEORGE ELIOT. (Original.) 1 vol. 12mo. Muslin. [Ready by Mail, June.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

TO ADVERTISERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A MAGNIFICENTLY ILLUSTRATED PAPER, CIRCULATING IN EVERY DISTRICT OF THE UNION,

Offers unusual inducements to those who desire to bring their business prominently before the community.

1. Only a limited space is devoted to Advertisements.

2. The character and diffusion of the circulation are unequaled.

3. The Paper is generally preserved for Binding.

4. The Advertising Pages are rendered attractive, and can not escape the attention of the reader.

5. None but the most respectable class of Advertisements are admitted.

6. The charges are not as large, proportionally, as those of any other Weekly or Daily Paper.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for Three Months or more.

TERMS.—Fifty Cents a Line.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

VOL. I. OF HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in CLOTH EXTRA, is now ready. Price $1 50.

N.B. This Volume can not be sent by Mail on account of its weight. It will be sent by Express if so desired, freight to be paid by the Purchaser.

TREES AND PLANTS FOR THE ORCHARD, GARDEN, AND LAWN. Can now be transplanted from the grounds of PARSONS & CO. FLUSHING, NEAR NEW YORK CITY.

Their assortment embraces an extensive variety of the choicest FRUIT AND ORNAMENTAL PLANTS, and their stock is very healthy and vigorous. For Catalogues apply by mail, or at No. 54 Wall Street, Second Story.

FUN!!!

HARPER'S COMICALITIES. ILLUSTRATED WITH FINE DRAWINGS BY LEECH, DOYLE, AND OTHERS. CONTAINING THREE HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS.

FIRST SERIES. PRICE TWENTY-FIVE CENTS.

For Sale by all Booksellers and Periodical Dealers.

FAMILY SEWING MACHINE DEPOT. FIFTEEN and FIFTY dollars SEWING MACHINES.

The FIFTEEN DOLLAR Sewing Machine is the best thing machines ever offered to the Public. Fifteen minutes only required to learn to operate upon it. The Fifty Dollar Machine is warranted to excel all other family sewing machines. We challenge the world to produce its equal. THOMAS & CO., 405 Broadway, N. Y.

☞ Agents wanted to sell the $15 machine.

WHEELER & WILSON M'F'G CO'S SEWING MACHINES, OFFICE 345 BROADWAY, NEW YORK. Agencies throughout the Union.

Send for a Circular.

We prefer them for family use.—Tribune.
They are the favorites for families.—Times.
The machine for family use.—Atlantic Journal.
We can not imagine any thing more perfect.—Evang.
Will give entire satisfaction.—Observer.
The best ever invented.—Christian Inquirer.
In looking for the best, we have.—Christian Intel.
Admirably adapted for family use.—Christian Advocate.
We prefer it to all others.—Christian Intell.
Worthy of the highest award.—Sabbath Recorder.

$150 WILL PAY FOR BOARD AND TUITION in the FLUSHING FEMALE COLLEGE. Address Rev. WILLIAM H. GILDER, A.M., President, at Flushing, Long Island.

GROVER & BAKER'S CELEBRATED FAMILY SEWING MACHINES, 495 BROADWAY, NEW YORK. 18 SUMMER STREET, BOSTON. 730 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

☞ These Machines are justly admitted to be the best in the market for family sewing.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES. For all manufacturing purposes SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES are deemed indispensable. The public insist upon having their clothing, &c., made by the SINGER'S FAMILY SEWING MACHINE! Its merits presented for competition, and being arranged with full knowledge of the details of other machines in common use, has avoided or remedied them all. It is the best—because Sewing Machines are required to be easiest to learn to operate. Using one of these machines is an object amusement. Price $100, with iron table complete.

I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. II.—No. 66.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 3, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

CONTENTS.

I. HOW WE FURNISHED OUR HOUSE, WITH AN ILLUSTRATION.
II. EPITHERALIA.
III. THE LOUNGER.
IV. BOHEMIAN WALKS AND TALKS.
V. POESTY'S PHILOSOPHY, WITH SEVEN FINE ILLUSTRATIONS.
VI. THE EARL OF DERBY, WITH A PORTRAIT.
VII. LITERARY.
VIII. DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.
IX. FOREIGN NEWS.
X. SCENES AT THE TAKING OF CANTON, WITH TWO SPIRITED ILLUSTRATIONS.
XI. TREASURES OF THOUGHT.
XII. HEBER FLOYD.
XIII. AN OLD STORY.
XIV. HIGGLEDY.
XV. THE CARNIVAL IN PIEDMONT, WITH A FINE ILLUSTRATION.
XVI. THE CULPRIT JUDGE.
XVII. THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.
XVIII. MARKET AND FINANCIAL REPORTS.
XIX. CONSOLATIVES.

HOW WE FURNISHED OUR HOUSE.

FOR my part I had long ago made up my mind that I would move no more, save into a house of my own. I believe, as I am an honest man, that during the two years of our marriage we had inhabited successively every street in the city, from Bleecker to Forty-fifth; and had never known what it was to remain a month together in the same place. So, as I said, I was tired of so roving a life, and when Carrie proposed, in a meek, timid voice, as though she was dreadfully afraid of shocking my feelings, that we should go to housekeeping, I seized the dear girl in my arms, and kissed her till, as she declared, her collar was quite spoiled.

It was no matter of extraordinary difficulty to find a house. Thanks to the revulsion!—the ill wind that, like other ill winds, blew some good to some few fortunates—we were enabled to find a small house suited to our means in a convenient situation. A bargain was soon struck, and we entered into possession of our empty house. We felt so proud—Carrie and I—in the house that was all our own, that for the first week we spent all our spare time in pacing up and down the great, empty, dusty rooms, and peopling them with imaginary pieces of the most costly furniture. We quarrelled vociferously over the furnishing of the drawing-room (remember I had only some $1200 in all to spend on my furniture); Carrie insisting that a tapestried Brussels with yellow brocatelle suit would do very well, while I was immovably fixed in my preference for blue damask, ormolu, and a carpet with a single gigantic pattern. She preferred pier-glasses; I thought oil-paintings, exclusively by the first native artists (did we not owe it to ourselves to patronize art?) were far better adapted to the adornment of the walls. The first time I think I ever made Carrie cry was when I insisted on the furniture of our spare bedroom being rose-wood instead of a "cottage ash," green and gold.

However, after a few days of this castle-building, we were forced to betake ourselves at last to the serious business of filling our house with something more substantial than the sumptuous furniture over which we had quarrelled; and this time, I flatter myself, we went about the business in a methodical way. We had so much money; therefore if we spent so much on the parlors, so much on the bedrooms, so much on the kitchen, so much on the dining-room, and so much on the stairs, there would be left— Well, there wouldn't be much, though our estimates had been made with the most severe frugality.

But, as Carrie remarked, by going to auctions we could buy every thing for a mere song; and taking up the Herald, she read me an advertisement to the effect that that day, at the hour of ten in the forenoon, D. Humbug, the well-known auctioneer, would sell the entire furniture of a wealthy family going to Europe; said furniture consisting of "fine tapestry carpets, three-ply and ingrain oils; to rose-wood parlor suits in brocatelle; oak buffet, oak extension tables, chairs, etc., in suit; rose-wood bureaus, rose-wood and mahogany centre, pier, and fancy tables; rose-wood and mahogany secretary and library book-cases; French plate pier and oval mirrors; a superior line of fine oil-paintings in rich gilt frames; mahogany and rose-wood bedsteads; spring and hair mattresses; beds and bedding; gas chandeliers and fixtures; together with a large assortment of new furniture, cutlery, crockery, plated and silver ware; the whole to be peremptorily sold without reserve, and worthy the attention of housekeepers and the trade."

This was evidently the thing we wanted; so we hastened to the address, and found ourselves in a motley a crowd as I had seen for a long time. There were a number of old women, among whom we recognized several editions of Mrs. Toodles; one or two young couples like ourselves, bent, apparently on house-furnishing; a number of crossgrained looking men, who scowled fiercely at the furniture, as though they wanted to know what business it had there, and whether they couldn't afford to buy it twice over if they wanted; a Jew or two gazing with appreciative eyes at the silver-plate; two or three Irishmen, laden with furniture and plates, which they contrived very cleverly to break at regular intervals, and quite a number of persons who, to my eyes, seemed confirmed members of the "Upper Ten."

The first article which was put up to mile was a lot of lavakin wine-glasses. There were sold cheap enough, my wife said, to one of the Mrs. Toodles. Then followed a Brussels carpet. Carrie nudged me as if to say, "Here is our chance." So, when it was put up, I bid, boldly, five shillings a yard. I was in a mortal agony for some time afterward for fear it should be knocked down to me; but one of the cross-grained men, after staring at Carrie and me, bid sixpence more, and, in spite of Carrie's appeals, I let him have it. It was knocked down to him; I discovered afterward that it was full of holes.

A clock, a fine French clock, was the next article offered. Would any gentleman start it at twenty dollars? No gentleman volunteering, the auctioneer magnanimously announced that he would take fifteen, or even ten. These offers eliciting no response, the clock was at last put up at a dollar. Carrie asked me how I thought it would look on our chimney-piece, and, jumping at the thought, I nodded.

"Two dollars!" shouted Humbug.

"Four!" cried another of the cross-grained individuals.

"Five!" said I, in the excitement of the moment.

"Six!" shouted my opponent.

"It's perfectly lovely," whispered Carrie in my ear; and, yielding to the suggestion, I nodded again.

"Seven dollars!" croaked the auctioneer; "an article which cost the manufacturer twenty-five—who'll say ten?"

No one said ten; but Mrs. Toodles, by my side, squeaked, "Seven and a half;" the auctioneer, watching my face, received, or pretended to receive, a bid from the crowd, then turning to me, said, "Say ten, and it's yours." I said "ten!" mechanically, and down fell the hammer.

I confess I felt relieved. The ice was now broken. I had begun to furnish my house. So I had no backwardness in bidding for a small, round table, with a stain on the top and a wound of some gravity in its single leg: or for several extremely nice-looking chairs, on which we were not allowed to sit; or for a quantity of porcelain—or, as Humbug called it, "real Sevres china;" or for many more articles besides. I made some purchases. I thought a great deal of them at the time—more, perhaps, than I do now. I bought four buckets (Carrie said that buckets were quite necessary in a house, and called me "disgusting," with a pretty blush, when I asked what would she do with four?); they had the misfortune to need constant caulking. I bought a bedstead, but as it couldn't be taken to pieces, and the door was too small to let it in whole, I gave Humbug a dollar to let me off that bargain. I bought a set of fire-irons—" quite lovely," Carrie said; they were in an advanced stage of oxydation. I would have bought more articles but that my attention was attracted to the conduct of one or two of the cross-grained men. They made a desk-set as me, and bid on every thing I wanted. The man who had opposed me on the clock seemed to want also buckets, beds, fire-irons, crockery—every thing, in short, which we required.

"Perhaps he's furnishing too, dear," suggested Carrie.

He didn't look like it. He made his bids as often by signs as to works, looking wistfully at me, and at the fountain. After the sitting, I overheard Humbug order him to "go and gather up them glasses, and be smart about it." From which I was led to suspect collusion between them.

AN AUCTION OF SPLENDID HOUSEHOLD FURNITURE, TO BE SOLD WITHOUT RESERVE.

We collected our purchases—a singular assortment to be sure (not as Carrie said, every thing must have a beginning)—had them carted to our own house, and rested from our labors. We put the clock on the chimney-piece (by the way, I ought to have said that it didn't go, and didn't seem ever to have gone for the matter, for I discovered, on its works), sat down on two of the buckets—which answered well enough for seats, however uncomfortably they may have been as buckets—and came to the conclusion that a few days more of such work would enable us to double our house, both easily and economically. Carrie wouldn't hear of any imputations upon Humbug or my self-denial.

Next day, before I was up, Carrie had found, as she said, the "very place" for us to go and buy the rest of our furniture. It was an auction room, in 234 Street, of the "entire furniture of a wealthy family about to retire to the country"—a delightful hint in the advertisement intimated that the retirement of the family aforesaid had been rendered necessary by the late revulsion, and that every thing would consequently be sold "without reserve."

I was struck on entering the house with the air of newness which distinguished the whole array of furniture. Carpets, chairs, tables, étagères, sofas, beds, bureaux—nothing appeared to have been in use before.

"No doubt, dear," said Carrie, when I drew her attention to the fact, "the family were very careful of their furniture. It is a lesson to us."

Strange to say, with few exceptions, the auctioneer was surrounded by the very articles which we had met the day before. The cross-grained man were there in great force; and the very fire thing that we had seen was knocked down to my yesterday's rival on the clock question. One of the party, who sat modestly in the vestibule of the auctioneer, bought, at the start of the auction and at very high prices, three drawing-room sofas and two splendid étagères; though, as Carrie remarked, what a great, coarse, vulgar-looking fellow like that could do with brocatelle suits it was hard to discover.

I found myself bidding on a bedstead which struck us as very convenient. It was a neat affair, and being knocked down to me when the thought flash-ed on Carrie's mind that it came from the room of the

I asked an Irishman, who appeared to be assisting the auctioneer, to unscrew one of the sides. He made me the request honestly, but with a frown. I then noticed, to my horror, that it was the same bedstead which I had bought the day before at the house of the wealthy family going to Europe. Light was dawning on my mind. I took the presentation of which a few of the remaining pieces of furniture without telling Carrie; and, having bought a set of kitchen ware, four chairs, a chiffonnier, and a dust-pan, we returned to our home.

On the following day, the sale we attended was one of the "furniture of a leading clothing dry-goods-consul." At a glance I noticed that the company were the same as on the previous day, and a hint or tour of inspection enabled me to say positively that the chief articles of furniture were the same as those which I had already seen sold twice.

In passing the auctioneer's desk my eye fell on a narrow slip of paper. I blush to say I read it. It ran thus:

"Received from Peter Funk, Esq., auctioneer, forty dollars for three days' rent of the house, No. —— Street, for his furniture auction.

The house was vacated; the furniture contributed by several furniture makers of the neighborhood, the "wealthy families" and "leading citizens" were creatures of imagination.

Carrie desires me to add that the moral of my story is that young people who want to furnish their houses should go to a respectable furniture dealer, and not seek great bargains at auction sales, especially when they are advertised as being sales of the household furniture of rich families going to Europe.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 3, 1858.

AMERICAN CREDIT ABROAD.

A GERMAN paper, published at Augsburg, has commented on an article intimating that we go to Europe to borrow money which we do not mean to pay, and that we are, in short, a nation of swindlers. Papers in this city, of course, without motive, have republished the article without comment.

The fact is, that, in the general crash of the last year, no nation did so well by its creditors as the United States. With remarkably few exceptions, every bond and every coupon due in this country was paid at maturity. At a time when merchants in London, Hamburg, Berlin, and Frankfort, could not raise money to pay their notes, the interest on our State, county, city, railway, and other corporate securities was promptly and fully met. It would have been possible to enumerate several securities on which there has been a default. But these have never ranked among our first-class securities. The danger of default was duly taken into account by the purchaser when he bought them, and discounted in the price he paid.

When a man buys a seven or eight per cent. bond at fifty, he has no business to complain if now and then the interest is not paid. Money is not worth fourteen or sixteen per cent. in this meridian; and when a man buys a security at a rate of interest he must run a certain risk. The bonds on which defaults have occurred were bought on the ground that no risk invariably been sold in the market at so low a price that the purchaser could afford to be cheated of his interest one out of every two years, and yet find the investment satisfactory. For such a purchaser to rail at this country because he does not get "the face of his bond" is absurd. Cui vult emptor.

Whatever newspaper men may say the United ed States must, eventually, become the Banker of the world. We can profitably use money for this we pay seven and eight per cent., and can give ample security for its repayment. Nor is there any prospect that we shall cease to enjoy such opportunities of profitably employing within the next half century. Until this continent is fully peopled, it will always pay us to borrow money, and even to pay seven per cent., who shall be able to pay back, after a certain interval, principal and interest.

In Europe and Asia are high rates of interest. Many large fortunes are wholly invested at three and three and a half. As the immense harvests of the precious metals increases, our superior capacity for employing capital will become generally known; when it is, the money will come to us from many a home. They will all buy into our securities or lend money out here: for by thus doing, that large class of capitalists who live upon the interest of their money will find their income doubled. And sensible men, who do not try to get exorbitant rates of interest, will never have reason to complain of our want of faith.

The state of commercial affairs at present—declining exports—steady exports—exchange on London at two per cent. discount—constant and steady accumulation of bullion—these are the gradually developing industry and increased production—all this points to the state of things which the young among us are destined to see. Shortly, the establishment of the United States as the financial centre of the world, and the Banker for the Bank of England, France, Germany, South America, Russia, China, and the East Indies.

THE CONDITION OF MEXICO.

Our latest advices from the Mexican States describe the Zuloaga Administration as being on the point of dissolution, and the whole fabric of government as tottering to its fall. Every traveler who ventured ten miles from a large city was certain to be robbed; not a few had lost their lives in the endeavor to save their property. Business of every kind was at a standstill; many of the mines, situate, unhappily, in disturbed districts, had been abandoned; the import trade, the duties upon which alone served as security for so many loans, was almost annihilated. Zuloaga, who had not any thing to lose was trying, not to employ, but to hide his means; money was now so valuable that to a gentleman than lent out upon interest. Nor did there seem to be any decent prospect of a better state of affairs. The officials, finding that they might as well submit to compulsory spoliation as sustain the Zuloaga Government at present unsupported by money, were assuming an attitude of neutrality in the pending civil war. No prominent resident citizen presumed to aspire to the rank of Dictator. From his retirement, the ancient reprobate, Santa Anna, was hankering after the power he had lost; but neither he nor any one else had as yet had sufficient faith in him to warrant the supposition that he was likely to succeed again. There was a vague impression that Miramon was about to make a movement with a view to the recovery of the debt which Mexico owes them; but no overt measures had been taken, and the general impression was, that common sense had not entirely departed from the Spanish peninsula, and consequently that the Spanish fleet would never be executed.

Strange to say, in all these revolutionary proceedings we never hear a word of the action of the United States Government, or even of the influence of the representative of this country. We hear of English influence, of French suggestions, of Spanish threats; but the United States appears to have no Asiatic power for any control they exercise over Mexican politics.

The Mexicans have now had nearly forty years' experience to form conclusions. During that period they have essayed at least three distinct and antagonistic forms of government. They have tried monarchy, and every species of its natural term; the career of each and every Government since Iturbide has been alternately despotic, empiric, nor under a democratic, nor as a republic.

The only experiment which remains, to be tried is a foreign protectorate. The Papal States would not have been a safe residence for any man of means, for many years past, but for the tacit protectorate exercised by France: Mexico is in the same condition.

The time has not yet come for the incorporation of Mexico with the States of this Union. But events call for preparatory steps toward that consummation. Mexican anarchy is also a positive injury. It damages the prestige of republican institutions. It sets an unwholesome example to our southern frontiers. It injures our material interests by closing to us the shortest available road to our California possessions. For our own sakes vigorous steps should be taken to terminate the existing confusion in Mexico. Even those steps should be it were difficult to say; but if ANDREW JACKSON were President of the United States he would very soon discover good grounds for the inauguration of a policy which would culminate in the establishment of stable government in Mexico and in the development of the boundless resources of that magnificent country.

THE CANAL QUESTION IN THIS STATE.

NOTWITHSTANDING the assurances which were given at the time the last canal loan was sanctioned by the people, to the effect that no more money would be needed for the completion of those great lines of internal communication, it now appears that, unless a further sum of five millions dollars be granted to complete the work of enlargement, the enormous expenditure which have been expended during the past five years will prove to have been thrown away, and the design of the enlarged canal system will be defeated.

Of course, however we may grumble at the additional outlay, there is but one opinion among all far-seeing men as to the expediency of completing the canals on the enlarged scale. The work has progressed so far, the advantage of the enlarged canals is so obvious, and the necessity of retaining within our borders the traffic which our neighbors are straining every nerve to wrest from us so palpable, that no person can for a moment consider or slander the ground that we ought to abandon the work, and leave the canals in their unfinished state. However the money may be raised, and whether whatever restrictions it may be spent, all parties are agreed upon the propriety of raising and spending it on the canal enlargement.

Whensoever the question shall have received deliberate attention at the hands of our politicians and the press, there will be a decided a majority in favor of raising the amount by tax as there is now in favor of completing the enlargement. Many financial schemes have been suggested. A few persons have proposed to cripple the work by the issue of Railroad Bonds, Baltimore, and Montreal at our expense, by buying additional tolls on the freight carried over the railroads in question. This foolish scheme has met with no more favor than it deserved; and other projects for taxing banks and making the State's deposited deposits in sound banking situations have been equally scouted. The sense of the Legislature and that of the mass of sensible persons throughout the State are in favor of the completion of the canals by means of an ordinary State tax, to be submitted to the people for their final approval. This, doubtless, will be the plan adopted.

But when the law to that effect has passed, it may well be a matter of inquiry how long the canals are to be a senseless burden to the State, and a source of perennial corruption at Albany? It stands to reason that the canals are used notoriously by each successive dominant party for corrupt political purposes. Had the canal revenues and the sums which have been raised by loan been honestly and economically applied, no further loan would now have been required. Some of the ingenious methods of this corruption, and of the constant appeals to the people for means to enlarge, continue, or repair the canals, many persons are inquiring whether the time has not come for the disposal of the canals to a private company. The States of Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Pennsylvania have all found it unprofitable and unsatisfactory to hold the canals. Why are we exposed to be an exception? Would it not be better to close the avenue to further expenditures and more corruption by taking means for the sale of the canals as soon as possible?

THE LOUNGER.

ON WITH THE DANCE!

MCKEAN, the Governor of Pinchem—Mazard, with his salutory fiddle, is at hand.

Determinant, the flutist, whose name is, of course, a humbug, and Mazard, the hautboyist, or the hautboy, or however the boy hauts, of all capitals, are busy as only waiting for Lent to be over to blow us all out upon the floor, and round and round in the dizzy waltz.

Ah, me! Blessed be the Times Bosses waltz of my kind which he can send all over the country, until Saturday night, hand-organ, and church choirs conspire to swell the lofty strain, he may be very sure of success. If not, he must see to his pulls and his wires.

If the Lounger were a raven he would croak that they could not be very successful. In Paris they are so, because they are the naturalia of the demonde. In Rome they are so, because the Italians are an intriguing and festive people, and because every mask is an absolute concealment.

But how will they do for New York manage it? The nobility will sit in the boxes and look on, as they do at charity and military balls. The common may will put on fake noses, wigs, black visors, and clashed cloaks. Some will perhaps try to drain courage from the bottle, and some do not. But where will be the delicious daring, the wild excitement, the novel, the wit, the humor, the atmosphere of Carnival, the mystery, the romance, of Paris and Rome!

If the Lounger were a prophetic cycle, he would say that a masked ball at the Academy would be like a genuine masquerade as the reception of Mohammed Pacha was like a real civic ovation.

But he hails the advent of Carnival, and the beginning of promenade concerts, and wheels his chorist and musicist. He wonders whether Mr. —— will work the expansive weathercock in his jetty ringlets earling about an aquiline nose—whether he will have learned all the mysteries of fingers—and sinks, at last, exhausted, in negligent but effective grace, in a capacious arm-chair.

Thus he soothes of Mazard, but ooh senses, Julienne!

THE REVIVAL.

NOT even a Lounger can help seeing the unusual interest in the great religious movement of the moment. When, at high noon, in the densest business part of the city, swarms of men are hastening in various directions, and on observer learns that they are not going to the bank, and that they are in all the hurry to save their credit—but their souls; and when, for the first time in his experience, he learns that in a Christian country the Christian churches are not closed for six days in seven, but are open; that they are not attended by a few old women listening to a nap, but thronged with multitudes of eager and excited people—the Lounger, we say, will admit that, as this Lounger did, follow the crowd and observe the scene.

It was in Burton's old theatre that the Lounger went, on the day when Mr. Beecher was to lead the services. The crowd extended from the door in the street showed him that he had little chance of getting inside of the building. In fact, there was not room for even a tenth part of the people packed in the vestibule, and long over the tops of doors, and in the passages, and in the dressing-rooms, and stood patiently where they could neither see nor hear, in the hope that somebody would presently be driven out by the heat and crush, and a key for a hundred people to fill the space in which one was squeezed. There was a constant crowd around on the rim of the crowd. Our fellow-citizens who could only put their noses over the shoulders of those who stood next to the sidewalk, looked for a few years of that position, and withdrew. But every body within the doors seemed to be waiting and listening.

Suddenly a rich, full sound of singing poured out from that vast throng of people. The great audiences were singing a hymn to one of the well-known tunes. Over the heads of the crowd about the inner doors the dimness of the interior was visible; figures were discernible, but very indistinctly. They were all listening, they said, and seemed to be joining in the singing. It rung out boldly and solemnly, and then suddenly died away. The sound of a clear, earnest voice followed. It was impossible to recognize the voice or distinguish the words. But those who did the utterance turned to a church, and men and women were praying and singing hymns.

Following the current of the crowd, the Lounger crossed the Park to the Fulton Street meeting. There were the same crowds and the same scenes. The sounds of prayer and exhortation and singing were all mingled, and the crowd were constantly coming up and down the stairs. In one room a clerk was praying; in another an old sailor was exhorting; in another two or three women were singing.

In the street the shops were open, the drays and carts passed, the busy crowd hurried along on the sidewalks; truckmen were swearing, boys shouting, and the evening-man closing over all with his solemn refrain of "Extra-ra-ra-ra-ra!" It was a soft spring day, and it was a pleasant thing to see how many of the merry men and women gates turned back, so that, even in William Street, a bold boy might have sat upon the grass.

Will the fact that the Lounger is in the city on every man asks himself. Will the spirit of prayer which now abound in William and Fulton streets, in Nassau and Maiden Lane? There is always, of course, a certain amount of hysteria in every thing; which is developed more or less by every other strong excitement. Superstition is found in all classes of society. Ignorance, but in candid man can believe that this revival is only a morbid enthusiasm. Admitting every thing that is questionable, and that will probably be undoubted fact, confirmed by experience, that men and women will be really better. If such a meeting as that at Burton's can touch an erring woman as the writer of the following letter was touched, who shall smile or sneer at the Revival? The letter was read at the theatre on Wednesday.

"I am one of those who have not a father or mother —or brother. Have had a husband and other near relations. I have still abandoned. I am yet in a hopeless condition. I have prayed to God to forgive me, even as only the woman of Samaria may reveal himself to my soul. Will you pray that my eyes may be open who art in heaven, when you pray? And when you pray for me remember that I am a woman, surrounded by the hautiousness of unprincipled men, and kept as by the pitiless prejudice of our own sex. MARINA."

A WORD FOR WOMEN.

THE letter of Marilda is a satire of other women, and that the great financial crash trembled, in its consequences, to every quarter of society, however unbooked and remote. A man who has made a million may make a million, and when his riches take their natural wings we wonder only how soon he will catch more. But when a woman who gets twenty-five cents a day for making shirts suddenly finds there are no more shirts to be made because people who wear a fresh linen bosom every day must economize, a dreadful incentive is opened before her. Mr. Mayhew, in his work upon the peer of London, which is more exciting than Eugene Sue's "Mysteries of Paris," mentions poor neglected Lucien Wheeler, who, even when he had work, were not enough to save them from starvation, and who were forced to choose between their children's death and their own slavery. Heed 'e "Song of the Shirt" and "Bridge of Sighs"—the two most passionate cries for human misery in literature—are parts of the dreadful story of the life and the death of needlewomen. Now comes the sewingmachine, asking from those who had nothing that which they had, and the condition of these poor women every where is more hopeless.

A series of lectures is to be delivered in the city during the month of April, in which the whole subject of women, in their social, industrial, and legal relations, will be considered. The tongues of the speakers will be loosed upon the Child Question, upon this profoundly important theme. There is plenty of complaint to women in America—plenty of readiness to give a well-ordered woman a seat in an omnibus, and a pretty woman a front place at a theatre; but there are many questions to be answered before we can say that women are as justly placed in society as they are profitably protected. The lectures are upon a subject of universal interest; the lecturers are Mr. Brady, Mr. Curtis, Rev. Mr. Osgood, Rev. Mr. Bellows, and Rev. Hon. Eli Thayer; and the topics to be discussed by them are "Women and her Legal Disabilities," "Fair Play for Women," "Woman and her Work," "Woman and the Elective Franchise," and "The Benefit to Woman of Organized Employment." The immediate occasion of the lectures is the assistance of the Sisters of Charity throughout the Union. We do hope they may do something, not only to help prevent the ills that leads to such letters as that of "Martha," but to excite a more general and public interest and sympathy in the question itself.

ART CONVENTION.

Some of our readers have lately met in convention at Washington. The moment selected—that of the very crisis of the Kansas debate—was not a very promising one, but it was, doubtless, unavoidable. Old Mr. Peale was elected president. He delivered a lecture upon Washington's character, and Dr. Bellows an address, before the Convention. Report states that there was a crowded and fashionable audience, much candidating for office in the place, more interest was manifested by the public than could have been anticipated.

The object of the Convention seems to have been to take measures in some way to cultivate amusing of action and an elevation of taste, and to enable the artists of the country from which might proceed a remunerative employment for their labor, and the works of art commissioned by the Government. In other words, as the manufacturers of the country want to get rich, they ask Congress to appropriate to paint the pictures for the country. To accomplish this result two ways are suggested, which, we have, doubtless, urged by the speakers. One is, to paint better pictures than the artists of other countries; the other is, to sell equally good pictures for a cheaper price.

That is, without question, the cotton-spinning view of the members from all parts of the country, who have no taste for, nor knowledge of, pictures. The Capital of Washington is quite full of artists—so is the Vatican at Rome. Probably the honorable members would find it difficult to tell, practically, between the merits of the two galleries. If the artists mean to make it a matter of national pride that the pictures in the American Capitol shall be painted by American artists—that is at least, patriotic. But it will be a third step in the proceeding, not indicated in the strictly cottonspinning view? For instance, might not the public taste itself be cultivated as well at the seat of Congress controlled, with a view to the ulterior knowledge without which encouragement will remain, as they are now, mere matters of lobbying? And is it not a very good way to cultivate public taste to collect and exhibit good pictures, by whomsoever painted?

It will, however, be a matter of satisfaction to every body interested in art to know that the artists have begun to move in the matter. The method of tagging on a commission to paint pictures to the tail of an army bill, or a vote of thanks to Brigadier-General Bomb, is all very well in its way, but that a Committee of Congress has advised with a body of men who understand the subject, and that Chairman of the Committee of Commerce would hardly venture to report a bill without some consultation with merchants; and the Committee on Fine Arts, or whatever Committee has the matter in charge, could not do better than follow a wise example.

However, as for the active co-operation or assistance of artists there may be both a question and a question—a doubt whether it is very likely or possible, and a doubt whether artists will ever be benefited by such association. That artists should have their guild, like mechanics and musicians, and all other workmen, for the purpose of mutually helping pecuniary fortunes and worldly comfort, is not just as possible. But that they accomplish any other kind of result by it? Is this opinion connected at Washington likely to do more than benefit some particular artist, or some class of artists, having American Art itself untouched? Will there be any less favoritism, lobbying, and ignorance than now?

The Lounger speaks on both sides, because he is really an inquirer, and not a judge.

WHO IS THE GREATEST MAN IN THE WORLD?

Who is considered the greatest living man in the world? We must omit, of course, the mute inglorious Miltons and gems of purest ray serene. But who among men, whose names are familiar, is probably conceded to be the greatest man? The verdict of the Future will doubtless be very different from ours! Probably the brilliant court of Leo Tenth, the head of the world of civilization at that time, did not imagine the refractory and brawny monk of Wittenberg was to overtop all men in his age, and lead the world to future ages. But, for all that, we have a right to our opinion.

Is it the inventor of the electric telegraph? Is it Louis Napoleon? Is it Dickens? Is it our venerated Chief Magistrate? Is it Humboldt? If it be he who has even most and most accurately read the various departments of human knowledge, must it not be the latter? If it be he who has the most universally popular mind, must it not be Dickens? If it be he who has made the most practical forces of the world, must it not be Morse? If the most successfully audacious and the most contentedly prosperous, is it not Louis Napoleon? If it be the President of the United States, must it not be one—some one—of these? And who?

We are inclined to think that Humboldt would carry the largest vote if the world could be polled. His life long study seems to be to collect facts. His services to mankind have lain happily in a sphere where envy could not reach or malice, and in whom results only the world is interested. Then what a book to Cosmos! How ripe with wisdom, how rich with experience! What a mine, with the life of current events, of lofty thought, and of humane sympathy!

A palm-tree in a botanical garden first awakened in him the longing to travel and explore. The transplanted siren sang to him of the tropics in which she was born, and his journeyings began before old age had set in to chill his spirit. They are over now. In his ninetieth year the old man is still active and busy; fresh in mind and firm in body; going to balls and concerts—at war at the ball in honor of the young Prussian bride—and inviting all the worthies, as it is the custom of European soirées, from ten years ago the Lounger can think of, to his great housewarming. Speaker of "the dead of the eighteenth of March," is Berlin. He was never a politician, nor an actor in public affairs, except to be the "Friend and Counsel of the King of Prussia; but he was understood to sympathize with the popular feeling, and was with the popular movement. His plate was always placed at the King's table. In the country palace of Tegel, which he built, there is the chamber of Humboldt, and Germany knows him with a kind of reverence which is the next best to reverently, although but for a short time. It can not be long before we shall have news of the death of a great and good man, and it is, perhaps, the most greatest interest that the last letter he will probably ever write to this country will be that which was addressed to the President of the American Institute, whom Humboldt supposed to be Judge Talmadge. Humboldt, we trust, may receive the very happy, although it may be very literal—but how genial and pleasant that will be!

"BERLIN, February 21, 1858.

"MR. PRESIDENT,—Through the kindness of his Excellency Mr. Wheaton, the representative of the United States at Berlin, I have received the interesting volumes of the Transactions of your Academy of Sciences in addition, and I beg, Mr. President, of that noble and patriotic institution to express to it my heartfelt gratitude. I feel, for the honor done to me by this benevolent remembrance of my native land, that I am indebted to your beautiful and powerful country ever since the time of Franklin, and I am proud to be one of your honorary members.

"Condensed to accept kindly this assurance from an old man—almost an octogenarian—of the homage and respect of your very humble and very obedient servant,

"A. L. HUMBOLDT."

"THE CITY OF THE GREAT KING."

WHOEVER has traveled in foreign lands feels a secret longing kindled in his heart by the returning spring. It was kindled in the Lounger's heart again, and his heart starts with it. Memory is no less strong than hope, and while the latter looks forward or forward he sees alluring images that beckon him on.

The season are not melted yet among the Alps; but already tables are placed upon the Boulevards in front of the cafés, and the sidewalks are thronged all the street; already the chestnut in the garden of the Tuileries is in bloom, and Easter bonnets begin to blossom at every corner. The "height of the season" is beginning, for stout John Bull prefers his gallia in the spring, and Jonathan in the autumn; garks will be a few weeks later! What a city to wander over, exploring and exploring in the golden weather! How many memories must we have! And how they ought to! But on the southern slopes of the Alps memory is not the only guide. There are camelias at Isola Bella, the grass of the villa Pamphili is blue with violets; there are soft intimations of blue sky opening in the gray veil of March. But in Naples!—see in Hispania, nulle etre!

Beyond the Mediterranean lies the sandy banks of the Nile—on the desert—among the almond-groves of Damascus—on the solemn hills of Jerusalem—in the little Bethany where the sisters received Lazarus at the plain of Esdraelon toward the sea-shore such purposes and such associations as these! The Lounger himself—the joy of the whole earth—this is the very moment of the year. You may sit now upon the Mount of Olives, and look down, as it vibrates, gray of the mazzein; you may watch the delicate green of the leaf upon the fig-tree, and see the sun go up over the walls to the silent, gray Mount of Olives; or into the city upon the heavy pile of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. You may see all that, you will come down, and thread your way through the narrow streets of the bazaars, and sitting at the door, mingle in the most motley and remarkable coronary of Christendom.

Even those who have not traveled have the kindest interest in travel; love to listen to travelers; and believe that one day they shall see as well as hear. But the universal interest of Christendom concentrates upon Jerusalem. No other city—not Athens, nor Rome, nor Damascus, nor Paris, nor London—has such a profound and mysterious charm as the "City of the Great King." The interest of the study of Jerusalem is inexhaustible. America had contributed one of the most valuable and learned treatises upon the subject in the work of Dr. Robinson; and she now adds another in Dr. Barclay's "City of the Great King." It is a complete cyclopedia of Jerusalem; an invaluable vade-mecum for the traveler, and a body of facts for the student. The Doctor, who was a missionary, and a scientific man, enjoyed peculiar opportunities of research and investigation. His work is amply provided with maps, plans, and pictures; and the author has his own theories about excavations and surveys, which he submits with skill and vigor, but with what justice a wiser than the Lounger must decide. He is not only a practical forces of the world, must it not be Morse? If the most successfully audacious and the most contentedly prosperous, is it not Louis Napoleon? If it be President of the United States, must it not be one—some one—of these? And who?

We are inclined to think that Humboldt would carry the largest vote if the world could be polled. His life long study seems to be to collect facts. His services to mankind have lain happily in a sphere where envy could not reach or malice, and in whom results only the world is interested. Then what a book to Cosmos! How ripe with wisdom, how rich with experience! What a mine, with the life of current events, of lofty thought, and of humane sympathy!

A palm-tree in a botanical garden first awakened in him the longing to travel and explore. The transplanted siren sang to him of the tropics in which she was born, and his journeyings began before old age had set in to chill his spirit. They are over now. In his ninetieth year the old man is still active and busy; fresh in mind and firm in body; going to balls and concerts—at war at the ball in honor of the young Prussian bride—and inviting all the worthies, as it is the custom of European soirées, from ten years ago the Lounger can think of, to his great housewarming. Speaker of "the dead of the eighteenth of March," is Berlin. He was never a politician, nor an actor in public affairs, except to be the "Friend and Counsel of the King of Prussia; but he was understood to sympathize with the popular feeling, and was with the popular movement. His plate was always placed at the King's table. In the country palace of Tegel, which he built, there is the chamber of Humboldt, and Germany knows him with a kind of reverence which is the next best to reverently, although but for a short time. It can not be long before we shall have news of the death of a great and good man, and it is, perhaps, the most greatest interest that the last letter he will probably ever write to this country will be that which was addressed to the President of the American Institute, whom Humboldt supposed to be Judge Talmadge. Humboldt, we trust, may receive the very happy, although it may be very literal—but how genial and pleasant that will be!

"BERLIN, February 21, 1858.

"MR. PRESIDENT,—Through the kindness of his Excellency Mr. Wheaton, the representative of the United States at Berlin, I have received the interesting volumes of the Transactions of your Academy of Sciences, and I beg, Mr. President, of that noble and patriotic institution to express to it my heartfelt gratitude. I feel, for the honor done to me by this benevolent remembrance of my native land, that I am indebted to your beautiful and powerful country ever since the time of Franklin, and I am proud to be one of your honorary members.

"Condensed to accept kindly this assurance from an old man—almost an octogenarian—of the homage and respect of your very humble and very obedient servant,

"A. L. HUMBOLDT."

"THE CITY OF THE GREAT KING."

WHOEVER has traveled in foreign lands feels a secret longing kindled in his heart by the returning spring. It was kindled in the Lounger's heart again, and his heart starts with it. Memory is no less strong than hope, and while the latter looks forward or forward he sees alluring images that beckon him on.

The season are not melted yet among the Alps; but already tables are placed upon the Boulevards in front of the cafés, and the sidewalks are thronged all the street; already the chestnut in the garden of the Tuileries is in bloom, and Easter bonnets begin to blossom at every corner. The "height of the season" is beginning, for stout John Bull prefers his gallia in the spring, and Jonathan in the autumn; garks will be a few weeks later! What a city to wander over, exploring and exploring in the golden weather! How many memories must we have! And how they ought to! But on the southern slopes of the Alps memory is not the only guide. There are camelias at Isola Bella, the grass of the villa Pamphili is blue with violets; there are soft intimations of blue sky opening in the gray veil of March. But in Naples!—see in Hispania, nulle etre!

Beyond the Mediterranean lies the sandy banks of the Nile—on the desert—among the almond-groves of Damascus—on the solemn hills of Jerusalem—in the little Bethany where the sisters received Lazarus at the plain of Esdraelon toward the sea-shore such purposes and such associations as these! The Lounger himself—the joy of the whole earth—this is the very moment of the year. You may sit now upon the Mount of Olives, and look down, as it vibrates, gray of the mazzein; you may watch the delicate green of the leaf upon the fig-tree, and see the sun go up over the walls to the silent, gray Mount of Olives; or into the city upon the heavy pile of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. You may see all that, you will come down, and thread your way through the narrow streets of the bazaars, and sitting at the door, mingle in the most motley and remarkable coronary of Christendom.

Even those who have not traveled have the kindest interest in travel; love to listen to travelers; and believe that one day they shall see as well as hear. But the universal interest of Christendom concentrates upon Jerusalem. No other city—not Athens, nor Rome, nor Damascus, nor Paris, nor London—has such a profound and mysterious charm as the "City of the Great King." The interest of the study of Jerusalem is inexhaustible. America had contributed one of the most valuable and learned treatises upon the subject in the work of Dr. Robinson; and she now adds another in Dr. Barclay's "City of the Great King." It is a complete cyclopedia of Jerusalem; an invaluable vade-mecum for the traveler, and a body of facts for the student. The Doctor, who was a missionary, and a scientific man, enjoyed peculiar opportunities of research and investigation. His work is amply provided with maps, plans, and pictures; and the author has his own theories about excavations and surveys, which he submits with skill and vigor, but with what justice a wiser than the Lounger must decide. He is not only a practical

Bohemian Walks and Talks.

MUSARD.

FLORENTINO[1] has, in one of his latest feuilletons, a great tribute for the Musardines, now that Musard has gone to the "country of the Yankees." Every line that Florentino has had on his pen since October, the condition of its customers is truly pitiable. Who forgets the fiery sign in front of the estrade? Who does not remember the various occult games and sports that were practiced in the antre-rooms of the concert, in which every thing except Latour himself seemed to be to transfer all the small change from your pocket to that of the keeper of the table? The numerous photographs of Musard and his lieutenants in various shapes; the innocent-looking pouponne in their midst? Who forgets the delicious and affable orgiac de table who told you to "move on" with as air that could not be resisted, and who did it with as air that could not be disputed? What a charming lounge! What a delicious place for the enjoyment of the post-prandial cigar! Then, the bosquets, or each side into a garden, one could either listen to the music quietly or promenade, or get away into a quiet corner of the garden where the melody came softened like the murmurs of a waterfall. Paris is generally boisterous—there is too much out of doors about it; but the Hotel d'Osmond had many a sly flirting corner. The price of admission was only nominal—one franc—and every one went. I have seen some of Hall Columbia's proudest and fairest daughters interchange vows in the Musardines.

And the concert itself. It is charming. In front stands Musard, in evidence to him who was called the king of the quadrille, and whose subjects remained faithful under the Empire, the Restoration, Louis Philippe, and the Republic. Musard, under all these political fluctuations, held his undisputed despotic sway. The respectable persons above-mentioned attempted to govern the heads of the people. But Musard, more sensible, knew that most Frenchmen can be better ruled through their heels than their heads, and his sway was as absolute upon a rock. The Prince Musard, now in New York, once had the whole city mad, as Florentino has marked to young Fouth the other day, he is "not to be underrated." Tall and thin, with fine profile and good eye, he wears his hair long, in the gymnastic way, and thoroughbred. He leads the orchestra with the utmost coquetry[2]. Bad Musician he can not go wrong. He has no grand flourishes with his bâton—no sweeping waistcoats or flashy cravats of the fashion of the king of the French—and, Julien—but the Prince Musard soars as if he had just plunged in upon the perfect Quadrille, and seems to exercise a gentle superintendence over it, and to exchange friendly greetings with the audience, which is composed almost entirely of old friends. Such is Musard as he appears to the lounger upon the Boulevard des Italiens. His entertainment the only dreary place from the Place de la Concorde to the Boulevard de la Madeleine. It was the Nina's Garden of Paris, as Nina's Garden was when it had a whitewashed board fence on the Broadway side.

What Musard will do among us barbarians I don't know not. He will undoubtedly organize a good orchestra, and conduct it well. The rest is the public's affair.

SALTER.

SALTER has been making a great deal of fuss about town. He has given a concert. Well, then, you must know that Salter is a person from Vienna, and that Salter plays upon the piano. Salter is an imitator of the school of Liszt. Salter, they say, although not at all handsome, has made a great, fierce among some of the "set" of the saloons of the gentle Cockatilla, who is now receiving his levée at the fashionable hour of Ladies." Poor Cockatilla! Salter now reigns in thy stead. The amateurs are a good deal bothered about Salter. They don't exactly know whether he is good for any thing or not. He has great facility of execution, and produces great effects, does Salter. He can do every thing with the piano, Salter can. No man could do more with the keyboard than does Salter, and yet man could do more it would be of no consequence.

THE SPRING BONNETS.

Reverend readers, arrived in town last week, from the interior of Hamilton county, where railways, skeleton skirts, defrauding bankers, and other metropolitan follies have not hitherto penetrated, Miss Bastics had to make a few small purchases, and, of course, her mother went with her. A very handsome body from Hamilton county purchases in Broadway. It was just the time when all female New York was rushing with the utmost fury to the Spring-ering. "It is our opening day." Poor Bastics found herself entirely swamped in the current of crinoline. The shops were crowded with angels who went hallooing about from place to place, chattering and laughing like houris in the Prophet's garden specially." In the confused murmur that came to his ear Bastics heard, "Yes, ma'am, that thing?" "Two dollars 75" "revival;" "the other;" "the old brute knocked him out of the house" "I thought heaven were going out this year;" "I drank laudanum in her chamber;" "two ounces;" "good gracious! what a shawl!" "and a bonnet to match!" "and such!" "he married now?" "got two wives in Italy!" "stretch!" "dog, beast!" "I am glad of it myself!" "stood sticking in somewhere;" "yes, dear;" "and thing of—" "how cheap!"

No wonder that Bastics was completely carried away by all this chattering, and so far bewildered as to crush out of the fair one's mind all power to know whether he stood on his head or his heels. He thought there was a great deal of talking and silence each, for ma, Matilda Ann (the female hope of the family), and Araminta Jane (the young person from Broadway) seemed to know each other handily as if you hear of a revolution in the political atmosphere, and a great combined movement to the right of woman to have "new bonnets from York," you'll know what caused it. These openings, whether of theatres or stores, are always dangerously expensive.

THE LAST MATINEE.

The Opera matinée was a beneficent invention for those persons who had nothing to do, no one to do it with, and no where to go to do it with on the day; except ladies, that class here is not very large. People who come from the country to the highest state of beatitude if they can be permitted to sit in the "offices" of their hotels, with their feet higher than their heads, while they smoke, chew, and expectorate till dinner-time, and in the evening they go to the theatre or opera.

Had the matinée been more frequent, these luxurious might have been seduced away from their customary; but the Opera matinée was a novelty, and the populace it was "nipped in the bud."

But, alas! such is always the case. Whoever had a gazelle that didn't "up and die?" The dance of Calypso and Ketarye, in morning dresses and half prices, were charming. At least so they do on Saturday there was a great gathering of the "fifty thousand," the good, under the charge of the Academy to hear Formes, Johannsen, & Co. sing Flotow's Martha. The affair was too brilliant for description. It makes me feel tears to think how blessings brighten as they take their flight. You will not intrude upon a sacred sorrow, and so I will again return to dignified reticence, silent to weep, not as one who can not be consoled, but as one who has hope in the Bohemians and the dancers, may yet give us a morning performance for two. Dy. de la Frusa, e. o. o.

POMPEY'S PHILOSOPHY.—[IMITATED FROM THE FRENCH.]

I.
WHERE queenly Richmond from the hills
Looks down on James's roaring river,
Hard by Gallego's monstrous mills,
Where pocket-boats their freights deliver,

II.
Upon a bale of Yankee hay,
Half dreaming in the warm sunlight,
A ragged boatman, basking, lay—
Pompey the pop-eyed was he hight.

V.
If I'd a dollar of my own,"
He murmured, as he scratched his wig,
"When I gits back to Jefferson,
I would invest it in a pig.

VI.
A sow 'twould be, of Berkshire breed;
I'd build a pen near master's barn,
That she might never lack for feed—
For master he has heaps of corn.

IX.
From master, then, my time I'd buy
(He thinks this nigger is a fool,
And sell him cheap); then I would try
To set me up a cart and mule.

X.
I'd quickly come to Richmond town,
And cut a swell with my new team;
All day I'd truck it up and down,
And money 'd pour in like a stream.

XIII.
Low louted Pompey to the ground,
And, as his staring eyes waxed bigger,
He grinned and chuckled, "I'll be bound
I knows a gent'man by his figure."

XIV.
He grinned to north—he grinned to south;
He turned his grinning face t'ward Beckett's,
And put the dollar in his mouth—
A negro's substitute for pockets.

III.
Upon his shock of glistening wool
He wore a hat without a crown,
And, scantly-covered at his skull,
His shapely feet hung dangling down.

IV.
A merchant who was passing near
Heard Caffey thus soliloquize:
"Wittles down here is 'mazing dear;
A lazy nigger I despise.

VII.
There she would thrive, and, in due time,
Would pig a dozen, or fifteen;
And when these were in order prime,
In market here they'd soon be seen.

VIII.
The money that this pork would brag
I would lay out in market truck;
And in three years or more, by jug!
I'd have a hatful—with good luck.

XI.
In three years more—or maybe two—
I'd be both free and rich together;
And would retire, like white folks do,
Eat, and do nothing whatsomever."

XII.
"Here!" quoth the merchant. Pompey started.
"See Fortune present when you call her;
Such good designs should ne'er be thwarted;
Go! make your fortune—here's the dollar."

XV.
His dreams forgot, by instinct drawn,
He wends his way to where he wot of—
A place to colored boatmen known,
But which the city guard knows not of.

XVI.
'Twas near the hour of evening gray,
The thoughtful merchant homeward sauntered,
His quondam friend upon the way,
All drunk and reeling, he encountered.

XVII.

"Ah! wretch, this can not be excused!
To aid your fortune by your thinking;
But you my kindness have abused,
And spent the day in lawless drinking."

XVIII.

"Good master!" cried the goggle-eyed,
Striving to mantle his confusion—
"I've put them notions all aside,
And cogitate to dis conclusion!

XIX.

"That way we thought of takes so long,
I wish to die my freedom under;
Now all the world to me belong—
I 'nvested master's gift in licker!"

LORD DERBY, PRIME MINISTER OF ENGLAND.

We present our readers this week with a portrait of Lord Derby, the present prime minister of Great Britain, and one of the most famed orators in England.

It has been said of the highest nobles of England that there is no position in the world to be compared to the one which they occupy. The remark may well be applied to Lord Derby. Descended from one of the oldest of the great families of England, fourteenth Earl of Derby, he enjoys by right of mere birth a rank higher than genius or any possible success in life can win for their possessor, and equal, if not superior, to any station in the world, the kingly estate alone excepted. Endowed with wealth so large as to be wholly independent of pecuniary considerations, he has never felt the debasing influences which thoughts of money-getting engender, and his mind has always been free to devote its whole energy to the pursuit of high and exalting objects. Born of a race which has for generations made statesmanship its trade, he has enjoyed advantages, in point of elaborate training, hereditary experience, and cunningly-devised schemes of education, such as fall to the lot of no men in the world save a few of the class to which he belongs. Such a man may well provoke the envy of the ambitious; and if to this accidental good fortune he add the common merits of a quick intelligence, an aptitude for oratory, and very reputable powers of application, his good luck seems too astonishing to be real. Such has been the fortune of the present Earl of Derby.

When in 1809, at the age of twenty-one, he became competent to take his seat among the members of the British House of Commons, his grandfather, the Earl of Derby, presented him to Stockbridge, which constituency was in the Earl's pocket, and therefore naturally returned his nominee. He made his mark in Parliament by several brilliant speeches within a few months after his appearance in the House of Commons, and soon took a prominent place among the Whig leaders. He was known at this time as Mr. Stanley, his grandfather being alive, and his father enjoying the title of Lord Stanley. He sat in Parliament successively as member for Stockbridge, Preston, and Windsor, and acted with the Whig or Liberal party. His later elections were due entirely to the influence of that party, and his promotion to office—he became Secretary for Ireland under Lord Grey—was wholly due to the favor in which he stood with the Liberal leaders. In his official capacity he contrived to win more general unpopularity than any Secretary for Ireland before or since. No doubt, at the time, it was very difficult, if at all possible, for an English minister to administer the affairs of Ireland so as to satisfy its turbulent and short-sighted people. Mr. Stanley certainly managed to render himself hated by them, and not even appreciated by the people of the sister isles. There are many persons who remember him best by the name of the "scorpion Stanley," which was frequently bestowed on him by the arch-agitator O'Connell.

THE LATE EARL OF DERBY, PRIME MINISTER OF ENGLAND.

In 1834 there appeared to be a prospect of the Whig party breaking up. The Reform Bill, on which they had rested their claims to public support, had become a fact, and the Tories once more loomed in the distance as a formidable opposition. Mr. Stanley who had done so well by his connection with the Liberals, and whose national reputation rested on the share he had taken in their great reforms, judged that the time had come to shift his colors; and, on the occasion of a party measure introduced by Earl Grey, boldly seceded from the Whig camp, and went over to the Conservative or Tory party. The question of free trade—which in England means the question whether breadstuffs shall be taxed or no—was coming up, and the Whig liberals took the ground that the poor should be enabled to buy bread as cheaply as possible, the Tory conservatives that the farmers should be protected from competition with foreign agriculturists by a tax on foreign breadstuffs. Mr. Stanley took the side of the latter. He maintained, in a number of ingenious speeches, that it was the duty of Parliament to support the farmer—that is to say, the landed aristocracy—at any cost; that the consideration of cheap bread for the poor was of insignificant moment in comparison with the maintenance of rents and the honors of the landed proprietors. Holding these views, when the Whigs unluckily broke down after their victories in 1833 and the following years, Mr. Stanley was called to the cabinet of Sir Robert Peel, and under that chief filled the office of Colonial Secretary.

When Sir Robert Peel had the manliness to confess that he had been all along wrong, and that the protective duties on foreign breadstuffs ought to be repealed in order to give cheap bread to the poor, Mr. Stanley was one of the members of his party who deserted him. He held out to the last in favor of the agricultural—that is to say, the aristocratic—interest; and when Sir Robert became prime minister in 1846, and proceeded to repeal the Corn Laws, Mr. Stanley—who now became, by the death of his grandfather, Lord Stanley—took a leading part in opposing him.

From this time forth Lord Stanley was recognized as one of the leaders of the Protectionist Party in England. In one sense he was the leader of that party. He was the only chief it had who was capable of contending in Parliament against the chiefs of the Free-traders, and his rank and the prestige of his name gave him a marked advantage over the other Conservative leaders.

In the year 1851 his father died, and he duly succeeded to the title of the Earl of Derby. This settled his position. He became the leader of the party which advocated the reimposition of protective duties on foreign breadstuffs; and, in virtue of that attitude, enjoyed the unbounded confidence of the landed aristocracy of England. Accordingly, when in that year Lord John Russell found himself incapable of carrying on the government of England, he recommended Lord Derby as his successor, according to established usage. Unfortunately, when the latter tried to form a cabinet, he could not find men enough of the proper stamp to aid him in the work of carrying on the government, and declined the honor. A twelve-month afterward he was more successful. Another defeat of the ministry compelled the Whigs to hand over the government to their opponents; and this time Lord Derby became prime minister, with a number of his Protectionist friends to support him, and a small minority of Parliament to see him through.

It was thoroughly understood that, now that Lord Derby had attained the post which had been throughout life the dearest object of his ambition, he would bestir himself actively to carry into effect the designs which it had been the purpose of his life to favor, and which had won for him the position which he held among the landed aristocracy of the realm. It was confidently expected that he would at least attempt to reimpose protective duties on foreign breadstuffs. Instead of this he deliberately bestowed his attention on the best method of extending and consolidating the free-trade measures of his opponents, which it had been the aim of his life to defeat, and whose passage had clustered round him the thew and sinew of his supporters.

Partly in consequence of the disgust created by this second tergiversation, and partly from the inherent absurdity of the Tory platform in modern England, Lord Derby was soon compelled to resign his power, and to fall back upon the position of head of the Tory opposition. He remained in that attitude for several years. During these years he faithfully adhered—in all respects save the free-trade question—to the entire platform of the Tories. Especially was he noted for his strenuous and eloquent opposition to every bill which contemplated in any the least degree to extend the political rights of the people. Any extension of the suffrage, he argued, could not but be fatal to British institutions, and to the permanency of the British empire; and accordingly he opposed with all the power that was in him, in the House and out of the House, with speech and writing, at all times, in all places, and in all ways, with a tact or resolution which could by any possibility lead to an enlargement of the number of parliamentary electors, or to any expansion of the political privileges of the working-class of England. He was known throughout the British empire as the champion of the existing electoral law, and as the resolute opponent of popular suffrage.

During the Russian war he remained in dignified obscurity. Not until the past few weeks has any opportunity offered for his display of attention to his peculiar views. In the early part of this year, some acrimonious feelings having grown out of certain insolent disputches sent to England by the French Government, the Palmerston ministry were sacrificed in the endeavor to stand by the Emperor of the French. The Radicals, representing on this occasion the low hordes and hosts in England, opposed the concessions which the Government was prepared to make to the French; and Lord Derby and his conservative followers joining them, they succeeded in overthrowing Lord Palmerston, and forcing him to resign his office.

The old Whig leader accompanied his resignation with a recommendation to the Queen of Lord Derby as his successor. Lord Derby formed a Cabinet out of his old Tory - Conservative - Protectionist - anti-reform associates, and assumed the direction of the affairs of the country. He has duly inaugurated his administration by announcing that one of the first measures which he will propose to Parliament will be a bill to enlarge the list of electors.

His life has been a succession of bolts; he seems only to have sought office in order to repudiate his principles, and to give the lie to his professions. The ultimate fate of such a politician must be the same in England as it would be here: he will be driven from office with as much derision at every leading event of his life has elicited contempt.

Lord Derby married, in 1826, Emma Caroline Wilkinson, daughter of Lord Skermersdale. His eldest son, Lord Stanley, is one of the most rising politicians of England; he is liberal in his views, and is classed as "the most American" of the British statesmen of the day.

LITERARY.

It is now some time since we have seen the name of Donald G. Mitchell, Esq., on the title-page of a new work; and here we have it on the outside of an agricultural address which is delivered before the Connecticut Agricultural Society.

Here are no reveries of a bachelor but the plain matter-of-fact teachings of a practical farmer. The address is refreshing. It is an error among the deacons of this sort of public speech. It is polished and artistic, while it is frank and hearty in tone. Mr. Mitchell speaks like one who knows what he talks about. He has hard toys at "gentleman-farming," as it is called; throws cold water on the slanders of high-priced imported stock; recommends thrift, economy, and common-sense rules, in this forcible and telling way:

"Yes shall we find fault and cry saying you are nothing for looks; you do care for looks; you always have cared for looks. For what else did you, who need only a small house, build one of two stories, and set it off with white clapboards and with green blinds, and perhaps a cupola? For what else, in the days that went before your marriage with that very respectable woman, your wife, did you paint the house and seat and rig at your sister-cellars?

"Ay, we all care for looks, each man in his way. But I would counsel you to give less heed to the shirt-collars, and more to the flowers that unless you do lose to the green blinds and the cupola, where you never go, and more to the books and pictures about your family rooms. Do not build houses open to go to once a year; do not stifle yourself in small kitchens for the sake of a parlor that is only occupied once a month to put your dead friends and kindred out in, saving society. Make your living room the large, sunshiny, comfortable, cheerful room of the house. Let the winter's noon stream into it, warm and golden. Let the fruits of autumn, and the flowers and blossoms of summer, which your daughters' hands have gathered, reside and grow upon the mantle. Let there be pictures on the wall which shall keep ever in your eye their lessons of Faith, lessons of Courage, lessons of Charity. Make it altogether such a place as your friends shall delight to linger in, and your children's hearts cleave to—fondly—always. Let there be no sham about your house; no shoddy furniture, no flimsy curtains, no cheap carpets which look as if they were made for a scene and abominable affectations as any concomitants of either. Let all your furniture be of a substantial and even a typical sort, typical of comfort, typical of refinement."

Apropos of addresses, we have received one delivered in the old Representatives' Hall at Washington by Edward M. Gallaudet, on the occasion of an exhibition of the pupils of the new National Institute for Deaf Mutes, which is under his charge at the Capitol. The address is simple and eloquent, and appeals strongly to the country for the support of this enterprise. Mr. Gallaudet is the son of the late Rev. Thomas H. Gallaudet, whose fame in the same benevolent work is world-wide.

Carter & Brothers publish Hymns of the Church Militant—a collection made by Miss Warner, whose taste is excellent, and which will prove itself acceptable to all who desire a general collection of hymns without reference to church books. We find many ancient favorites here which have long ago escaped out of the ordinary hymn-books.

Another delightful collection of songs is published by Randolph, and entitled Little Songs for Little People, than which we know no collection more judicious or more complete. Many a house will ring with the music of these songs sung by the voices that are purest and pleasantest of all in the world; for if they do not sing in harmony, the little ones sing in perfect melody, and oftentimes it is far more cheering to hear their voices than would be a full orchestra or a perfectly trained choir.

Carter & Brothers publish in their Fireside Library series Passing Clouds, or Love Conquering Evil, an excellent little book for young people; and also The Roby Family, or Battling with the World, which is a conclusion to "The Giant Killer," a little book that many of our young readers will remember with pleasure. The lady author of these books has become very popular with the little folks; and as her lessons are unexceptionable, her books are desirable additions to the juvenile literature of the day.

One of the most valuable books of the past week is a new edition of the Rev. Dr. Riggs's Manual of the Chaldee Language, thoroughly revised by him, and forming now the only reliable work of its kind. To clergymen and Hebrew scholars in general we need not commend this book, but to general students of language we shall do a favor in directing their attention to it. Much interest has been manifested of late in the study of the Shemitish languages, both in England and America. Dr. Riggs has returned from his long residence in the East with perhaps a more complete understanding of those languages than any American scholar; and although his work is small, its condensation, simplicity, and clearness sufficiently evince the long study and careful labor which have enabled him to produce it.

John P. Jewett & Co., of Boston, issue new editions of their Hand-books of Iowa, Minnesota, and Kansas and Nebraska, of all which we have before spoken. That of Kansas contains too much political matter that does not belong in a hand-book, but it contains also much interesting and valuable information for emigrants and others.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, March 22, in the Senate, Senators Stuart, Bayard, Broderick, Douglas, and Toombs spoke on the Kansas question.——In the House, on motion of Mr. Stephens, and after debate by Messrs. Stephens, Phillips, Stanton, and Hughes, the witness Wolcott was handed over to the law for trial at the criminal court on the indictment found against him. The Deficiency Appropriation Bill being then taken up, speeches on Kansas were made by Messrs. Garnett, Bishop, Pottle, Morris, Abbott, and Kellogg.

On Tuesday, 23d, after a speech on the Kansas question by Senator Green, that Senator moved the following amendments, which were carried:

First—Strike out of the preamble and substitute, "Whereas, the people of the Territory of Kansas did, by a convention of delegates called and assembled at Lecompton, September 4, 1857, form for themselves a Constitution and State Government, which said Convention having asked the admission of the Territory into the Union as a State, on an equal footing with the original States," etc.

Secondly—Add to section 2, ninth line, "That nothing in this act shall be construed to abridge or infringe any right of the people, asserted in the Constitution of Kansas, at all times, to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think proper—Congress hereby disclaiming any authority to intervene or declare the construction of the Constitution of any State, except to see that it is Republican in form, and not in conflict with the United States."

The vote on the last amendment was 31 to 25. Senator Pugh then moved, and it was carried, that the Federal laws, if not inapplicable, be extended into the State of Kansas, and a judicial district be formed as in Iowa. Senator Crittenden moved his amendment, in substance that the Lecompton Constitution be submitted now to the people of Kansas, and if approved of, that the President admit Kansas by proclamation; if rejected, the people of Kansas to call another convention and frame a new Constitution. This amendment was lost by 24 to 34. The amended Bill to admit Kansas with the Lecompton Constitution was then put and carried by 33 to 25.——The House, on assembling, went into Committee of the Whole on the Deficiency Appropriation Bill, and speeches on Kansas were made by Messrs. Kellogg, Singleton, Howard, Barnett, Blair, Wortendyke, and Potter.

On Wednesday, 24th, in the Senate, Senator Seward presented New York resolutions against Lecompton. Senator Wilson introduced a bill authorizing the construction of an electric telegraph to Utah. Various petitions were presented—among others, two for a relief (i. e., bankrupt) law. A resolution was adopted instructing the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the expediency of suspending the Territorial laws of Utah. Senator Iverson, from the Military Committee, reported back without amendment the bills for the employment of a regiment of mounted volunteers on the Texan frontier, and for the calling out by the President four additional regiments of volunteers. Several unimportant memorials were reported and resolutions considered, when Senator Gwin proposed to take up the Pacific Railroad. After discussion, the Minnesota Bill was taken up in preference, and some discussion between Senators Seward, Pugh, Bates, and others followed.——The House having gone into Committee of the Whole on the Deficiency Appropriation Bill, speeches on Kansas were made by Messrs. Clark of Missouri, Granger, Clark of New York, Kilgore, Stewart, and Buffinton.

On Thursday, 25th, anti-Slavery resolutions were presented from Maine by Senator Fessenden (in spite of objections from Senator Mason), and from New York by Senator Seward. Various private bills were considered. The Committee on Commerce reported back without amendment the bill for a uniform code of international marine signals. The Minnesota Bill having been taken up, speeches were made by Senators Toombs, Brown, Wilson, Johnson, Mason, and Crittenden.——In the House, some conversation took place between Messrs. Stephens, Campbell, Washburn, and Montgomery as to the day on which the vote on the Kansas question should be taken, but no result was reached. The Deficiency Appropriation Bill having been taken up, speeches on Kansas were made by Messrs. Peyton, Grow, Reilly, Thayer, Moore, Washburne of Illinois, Davis, Dean, Boyce, Covode, and Robbins. In the course of the debate it was understood that Mr. Stephens would, on the Thursday following, move to take up the Kansas Bill, and would move the previous question.

On Friday, 26th, the Senate not being in session, the House was occupied with the Lecompton Constitution, and speeches on the subject were made by Messrs. English, Smith of Virginia, Davis, Marshall, Palmer, and Morris.

On Saturday, 27th, the Senate not being in session, Mr. Seward of Georgia presented the report of the committee in Matteson's case, to the effect that it is inexpedient to take further steps for his expulsion. After conversation between Messrs. Seward and Craige the report was agreed to by 96 to 69. Mr. Glancy Jones, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for expenses incurred in collecting the revenue from customs, and repealing all laws authorizing their payment on the Pacific coast out of the revenue before being paid into the Treasury. Also a bill modifying the act of 1857, relative to the safe-keeping of the transfer and disbursements of the public revenue, so as to authorize the disbursing agent with the sanction of the head of his department, to hold money and pay it directly to the person to whom payment is to be made, without first depositing the same in the Treasury. The Kansas question was then taken up and speeches thereon made by Messrs. Shaw, Morris, Smith of Virginia, Burnett, Lane, and Hall.

REPUBLICAN REPORT ON LECOMPTON.

We gave, in a former number, the substance of the Majority and Douglas Reports of the House Committee on Kansas. The following is the point of the Republican minority of that Committee: They claim that "the Lecompton Convention could not make a valid Constitution:

"1. Because, whatever inherent power the people may possess, Congress refused all legal authority to the Territorial Legislature to call the Convention, though urged by President Pierce;

"2. Because the Legislature which created it was itself the creature of fraud and foreign invasion, and that this usurpation was never consummated by the acquiescence of the people;

"3. Because the Act of that Legislature, passed February 19, 1857, to 'provide for taking a census and the election of delegates to a Convention,' was never fairly executed. The census was incomplete, the registry was incomplete, the apportionment was incomplete, and the number of delegates assembled was incomplete;

"4. Because, through the nefarious apportionment, the threatened exclusion from the polls unless coupled with the payment of a tax to support a Government imposed upon them by high-handed outrages, through lack of all confidence of protection at the polls from violence and fraud, the majority did not and could not participate in the election of delegates, and it was therefore composed of a mere faction entitled to no regard;

"5. Because the most noted delegates pledged themselves to submit their work to the ratification or rejection of the people—thereby securing their election—and afterward betrayed their trust, and did not so submit the Constitution;

"6. Because it is not, in fact, the work of a majority of the Convention;

"7. Because the legislative, judicial, and executive powers conferred upon John Calhoun transcended the power of the Convention, and their exercise was entirely illegal, and therefore null and void."

They also deny that the Lecompton Constitution is acceptable or satisfactory to the people of Kansas.

DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS ON LECOMPTON.

Mr. Cochrane issued a notice on the 27th ult. for a democratic caucus to be held in the hall of the house at half past seven o'clock that evening. At the appointed time between sixty and seventy members were present. Mr. Cochrane was called to the chair, and Mr. Seward, of Georgia, was appointed secretary. Mr. Stephens, of Georgia, stated the object of the meeting to be to confer together—the Lecompton and anti-Lecompton Democrats—and see if some arrangement could not be made to unite the discordant elements. He was ready to hear any suggestion from those gentlemen upon this Kansas difficulty. He had never yet been able to ascertain what those gentlemen desired. He, for one, was for unity and harmony, and desired above all things to preserve the party intact; and he believed it could be done if a proper spirit was manifested. Mr. English, of Indiana, then offered the following resolution:—

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed by the chair, to consist of ten Lecompton and ten anti-Lecompton Democrats, whose duty it shall be to confer together, and ascertain whether any thing can be done to secure harmony and concert of action in reference to the question of admitting Kansas into the Union; and that said committee report the result of their deliberations to this caucus, for its consideration, on Tuesday evening next, at 8 o'clock, to which time the caucus will adjourn."

The resolution was adopted.

THE PHILADELPHIA POST-OFFICE COMMITTEE.

The Investigating Committee on the Philadelphia Post-office has met at Washington. Mr. Campbell, late Postmaster-General, was examined, and completely exculpated himself from any connection with the transaction. Mr. Allibone was also examined. He testified that $23,000 was paid to Mr. Miller as a reward for his services in consummating and securing the contract. The price paid for the building and site was $250,000. The whole amount was paid into the Bank of Pennsylvania, in gold, from the Philadelphia mint. The committee meet again soon, when Mr. Miller will be examined.

LATEST NEWS FROM UTAH.

The War Department has received dispatches from the Utah Expedition to 1st February.

Colonel Johnston's letter is of such a character that it is deemed advisable not to permit a copy of it to be made for publication, although it is said that nothing of particular interest has transpired since the last advices. The health of the officers and soldiers is represented as good.

COLONEL JOHNSTON'S VIEWS.

Colonel Johnston writes officially on the 20th January as follows: "My information respecting the conduct of the Mormons since is that their troops are organized to resist the establishment of a Territorial government by the United States, and in furtherance of that object they have erected works of defense in the mountain-passes and near Salt Lake City. Knowing how repugnant it would be to the policy or interest of the government to do any act that would force these people into unpleasant relations with the Federal Government, I would, in conformity with the views also of the commanding General, on all proper occasions, have manifested in my intercourse with them a spirit of conciliation, but I do not believe that such consideration for them would be properly appreciated now, or rather would be wrongly interpreted; and in view of the treasonable temper and feeling now pervading the leaders and greater portion of the Mormons, I think that neither the honor nor dignity of the Government will allow of the slightest concession being made to them.

"They should be made to submit to the constitutional and legal demands of the Government unconditionally—an adjustment of existing difficulties on any other basis would be nugatory.

"Their threat to oppose the march of the troops in the spring will not have the slightest influence in delaying it; and if they desire to join issue, I believe it is for the interest of the Government that they should have the opportunity."

AN EXPECTED MORMON ATTACK.

The correspondent of the St. Louis Leader writes: "On the 8th inst. we had quite a little excitement in the shape of an expected Mormon attack. Colonel Bee sent me out in charge of a small patrol early in the evening, to proceed up Black Fork and search the scrub and bluffs in the neighborhood for a Mormon camp, which was reported to have been seen by some individual, whom we hope to see some day soon properly rewarded for making such asses of us. It was very dark, no moon, and the pleasure of wading over sage brush and rocks, on a January night, among the Utah mountains, with a couple of feet of snow on the ground, must be tested to be appreciated. I went about fourteen miles or so at a rattling pace, saw nothing, found no fresh trails, and returned to camp, where I learned that two other larger parties under Lieutenant Deshler, 10th infantry, and Lieutenant Bennet, of the volunteer battalion, had started immediately I had left camp; the former returned on the following day, after a fatiguing night march, but the latter was out five days, the men carrying rations for that time. It was pretty hard licks walking over these plains in deep snow and camping out at night with only a single blanket for bedding and tent. Many of the men were more or less severely frost-bitten. Their reconnoissance was also unable to discover the least trace of any enemy."

A BALL IN CAMP.

He adds: "While some of the army were thus roughing it out, another portion of it, the non-commissioned officers of the 10th, got up a ball and supper in their camp, and many of our sergeants, corporals, and men of the volunteers attended. How it went off I don't know, as, though I have a pretty fair appreciation of a really genuine absurdity, still the idea of a ball in this confounded region, without the faintest attempt at any thing almost in the feminine line, was a leetle too rich. As far as I remember of what I heard, it ended in a perfectly free fight, involving the loss of the supper and the destruction of the grub, etc., being the only return made to a large majority for the $5 which they paid for their tickets.

CAPTURE OF A SPY.

"On the day following a gentleman came into the camp at head-quarters in the most free-and-easy kind of way, perfectly affable and communicative, and all that sort of thing, stating that he was a persecuted individual who had escaped from Salt Lake City, and offering for sale butter, eggs, and milk, luxuries unheard of, and assuming the air and manner, as far as possible, of a friend to the States and the army, and a jolly good fellow into the bargain. His career in this part, for which nature never intended him, was cut short as summarily as there is every reason to hope his existence will soon be, though not by the intervention of a rope, but of Major Porter, Assistant Adjutant-General, and a file of men with unpleasant revolvers ominously cocked. The interesting but misguided provider of the aforesaid dainties proved to be a notorious Mormon, called Cherokee Jim, alias Thomson, a regularly-commissioned 'destroying angel;' in other words, a blood-thirsty, murderous fanatic, who, like the Thugs in India, offered human sacrifices to the object of his adoration. He was immediately accommodated with bracelets and anklets to match, and put into the guard-house of the Fifth regiment, in which appropriate locality he still flourishes, and, it is to be anticipated, will flourish until he can be tried. Strong suspicion has arisen that the Mormons have spies, and good ones too, in our midst. Cherokee Jim asserts that they know every thing that passes, and I, for one, believe it."

PERSONAL.

Colonel Johnston, commanding Utah army, has been appointed Brevet Brigadier-General by the President.

Mr. Harris has been removed to Judge Douglas's house, as it is more comfortable than his lodgings. It is feared that he is far gone in consumption.

The Turkish Admiral and suite have accepted an invitation to visit the Red River of the North, which is the western boundary of Minnesota, the principal object being to see the valley of the river and to engage in hunting the elk and buffalo. It is proposed to make the trip in July. It is said that Vice-President Breckinridge, Senators Fitch and Rice, Messrs. Becker and Cavanaugh, representatives from Minnesota, and ex-Governor Medary will accompany the expedition.

Wolcott, the Middlesex Mills man, has been released on bail, and has gone to Boston. The bail is $2000, and Willard of the hotel is his bondsman. It is believed that through informality in the indictment this will be the end of that farce.

The New Orleans correspondent of the Galveston News writes that Colonel Lockridge was expected to leave for Texas on the 24th ult., with the intention of revolutionizing Northern Mexico, and that many Northern men and considerable means are engaged in the enterprise. A letter from Colonel Lockridge to the News confirms the statement.

Colonel Benton is confined to his bed, with cancer of the stomach. He works upon his Abridgement of the Congressional Debates as steadily as ever, and hopes to live long enough to finish it.

Mr. Edward F. Underhill, of this city, has started a revolutionary, fiercely progressive paper, called the Movement. We hope it may move in the right direction.

Governor Wise has written the following letter to the editor of the Vicksburg Whig:

"Richmond, Virginia, Wednesday, March 3, 1858.

"Dear Sir,—My opinion is that Virginia will never allow the remains of Washington to be removed from Mount Vernon, except to her own monument to his memory at Richmond. That she will, if they are not removed, never cede Mount Vernon to the Federal Government, and that she ought never to do so.

"Respectfully, your obedient servant,

"Isaac M. Patridge, Esq." "Henry A. Wise.

At an Assembly in this city the distinguishing feature of the evening was the Balmoral Schottische, in which all the ladies upon the floor appeared in the scarlet jupon, with the dress looped up over it, a la Queen Victoria. The reporter announces the tout ensemble as agreeable as the costume was jaunty, coquettish, and unique.

The Mayor of Louisville has ordered the arrest of Captain Travis, who had advertised to shoot an orange from the head of a boy, in that city, on a wager of $1000, in evidence of his skill as a pistol-shooter. Complaint was made by many citizens, who were incensed at this wanton trifling with human life.

A Washington letter-writer says that the bar of one of the fashionable hotels in that city has taken $21,000 for drinks in the past fourteen months. During several of these months the city was comparatively tenantless. This enables us to make a sort of approximation to the sum total of Congressional expenditure for fluxions.

Dr. Haight, we are happy to say, was, at the last advices, at San Antonio, about 22 miles from Havana, and so much improved in health that he had discontinued the use of medicine, and had been visiting the sugar plantations on horseback.

Mr. Polk, former minister to Naples, when he was recalled, remarked to a lady: "My brother Jim being President of the United States, it was necessary we should all become diplomatists, and you see what a fool I have made of myself."

Mr. N. P. Willis went to a christening at Mr. James E. Cooley's, and thereon writes as follows: "Among the celebrities were Dr. Taylor, the patrician pastor of Grace Church, who performed the service; Governor Hunt, with the couchant lion behind his easy smile; the historian Bancroft, locomotively ahead of the train of thought with which you were trying to come up with him; Count Gurowski, the exotic American author; Church, the Ossian-painter of Niagara, with a face corroborative of his inspired picture; Professor Greene, so long our scholarly Consul at Rome; Tiemann, the believed-in Mayor of our great cosmopolis; several of the best-known manufacturers of public opinion; and last, not least, the country's distinguished tree-champion, who has so happily moderated the thoughtlessness of the American axe. In the way of 'bright particular stars,' the most admired shining for the evening was done by a constellation from the North—a Boston mother and her two superbly beautiful daughters. It seemed but a day to me, as I looked upon them, since the mother herself was a fair young school-girl—just those daughters' age.

"For the rest of the evening's events—how charmingly the band played as the supper-room was thrown open; how têtes-a-têtes went on in the cozy library; how Morris and Willis renewed their vows of eternal fidelity over the chicken-salad; how Palmer's exquisite marble bust of Cooley's daughter was admired; how it waxed late; and how we wished the sweet infant whose baptism we had witnessed all manner of warm blessings, as Brown received us under the cold starlight of out-doors, and called our carriage with his pleasant fiction of 'good-night,' though it was morning—for all this, please call on your memory, my dear Morris, while we leave it to the reader's accommodation."

The Albany Statesman furnishes the following small-talk about New York society for the information of the rural districts:

"Now that Lent has caused a temporary cessation in the general festivities of the so-called fashionable world—especially of the Episcopal and Romish Churches—readings at private houses are coming in vogue, at which from fifty to a hundred of Eve's fair daughters assemble to listen to the interpretations of the best specimens of 'pure old English undefiled.' Miss Sedgwick, of hereditary intellectual fame, following in the wake of Miss Kemble Butler, whose career here was a success financially as well as oratorically, has given quite a number of these readings. With most attractive presence, a well-modulated and sympathetic voice, and thorough cultivation, this lady has inspired great admiration; reading-days of her own selection having been arranged for at the houses of Mrs. President King of Columbia College, Mrs. George Bancroft, Mrs. Parish, and other leaders of the 'upper ten.' The scene at one of these readings is represented as quite striking—with the number of private carriages, the ladies dressed in full visiting costume, and the absence of the male element—so pleasant occasionally, as one of the fair spectators naively remarked. The 'occasionally' was slightly emphasized, of course; but certainly this new style of entertainment is an improvement upon the balls and parties, which, this winter, it is true, have been rather less frequent than usual."

The Times says that "Ex-President Santa Anna, accompanied by his family, embarked on the 12th instant, at Carthagena, on board the British mail steamship Clyde, for St. Thomas and Havana. He was, doubtless, en route for Mexico."

A Chinaman visited the fish-market at Sacramento, and paid $2 50 for the privilege of throwing overboard forty-five fish. In explanation of this singular notion, he stated that on that day, a year or two since, he was wrecked with some eighty of his countrymen and thirty white men; that he was the only Chinaman that survived, and that he then made a vow that he would release forty-five fish on each succeeding anniversary of the day.

HOW CAPTAIN DURHAM MADE HIS ESCAPE FROM MARSEILLES.

Captain Durham, of the Adriatic, has published an account of his escape from Marseilles, in which the affair is thus described: "Learning that the Adriatic would not be taken possession of until the full extent of the loss by the Lyonnais could be ascertained, he improved the interval in devising the means of escape. He engaged a caulker and had her caulked all around for about five feet above the water's edge, under the pretext that she was so open, when the mistrals should set in she would sink right there in the harbor. Captain D. thinks there were no suspicions from this movement; for in the 'noise and confusion' of the caulkers' operations he and an assistant were quietly weaving the running rigging on board, and getting ready for sea. They worked at this business about three hours every night—say from nine o'clock till twelve—when there was much noise, and it was so dark no one could either hear or see what they were doing. What provisions they got were put on board another vessel, and from thence transferred to the Adriatic during the night. The crew were also shipped for another vessel, and subsequently taken on board the Adriatic, when they were so much intoxicated as not to be conscious of what was going on.

"Captain Durham commenced getting ready to haul out about nine o'clock on the evening of the 8th January, his force consisting, besides himself, of Captain ——, the two mates, and a boy. The vessel lay in the middle tier, about half-way up the harbor, with both anchors ahead, and moored with a hawser astern. They bent the two topsails and main-topmast staysail where she lay. The vessel ahead of the Adriatic was made fast to the chain, and when the Adriatic slipped they let go the fast of the other vessel, and hove her right into the middle of the harbor ahead of her. When the captain awoke and found out his situation, and that his vessel was adrift, there was no end to his imprecations against 'the d—d Yankees.' Captain D. had no time to spare to his 'sacres,' but got clear of him as soon as he could, and hauled down the harbor nearly to the guard-ship, when he stopped to take on his crew and to make sail. The crew were got on board by four o'clock on the morning of the 9th; they then set the topsails, and putting four oars in the boat, put her ahead until the vessel got steerage way.

"When the Adriatic got abreast of the guard-ship, her boat came off and demanded the fort-pass of the former. Captain D., when asked for his pass, replied 'Prennez garde la,' and threw the officer a small bit of paper with two sous wrapped up in it. The paper and money, however—whether by accident or design the Captain does not say—went over the boat and into the water, sinking to the bottom. The officer of the guard-ship then inquired for the name of the vessel, when Captain Durham sang out that she was the American ship Luna, that had cleared the day before. Nothing more was heard from the official, and the Adriatic proceeded on her way."

FRIGHTFUL TRAGEDY IN CALIFORNIA.

A terrible tragedy took place at Grass Valley on Sunday, February 21, in which the family of Michael Brennan, consisting of his wife and three children, were poisoned by him with Prussic acid, after which he committed suicide in the same manner. Mr. Brennan was the agent of the Mount Hope Mining Company, and had formerly been a phonographic reporter for the press in this city. Pecuniary embarrassment is said to have been the occasion of the dreadful deed.

HOW THE DEED WAS DONE.

The Alta California says: "We have lying before us a letter written by a lady of that town to a friend in this city, which gives so well-connected a narrative of the affair that we avail ourselves of the privilege of making the following extract:

"'Mrs. Brennan did not tell the girls to go to church, and the cook heard Mr. B. ask Mrs. B. if the two servants were not going. Mrs. B. said, "You know the cook (Delia) is not well." The nurse, Kitty, went to church, and the cook took the two eldest children out to walk. Mrs. B. then took the youngest child in her arms, and walked up and down the veranda until he came and took it from her, when she went and laid out the children's clothing ready for their bath when they came back from the walk. The last the cook saw of Mrs. B. was when she left the veranda and went into the house. It is supposed that he did not tell his wife that he had lost heavily, and was deeply involved, more than ten minutes before her death. As she was totally unacquainted with her husband's financial condition she knew nothing of his embarrassment; and when he told her of his situation and what he meant to do with himself, the shock caused her to feel faint, and she laid down on the sofa. At this time he handed her a glass of claret, with the deadly poison in it, which she drank, thinking it was only wine, and that it would revive her. A loaded pistol was on the table, for use in case she had not drank the wine. After drinking she clenched her hands and struggled some, when he put the pillow over her face and smothered her; then saturated a piece of sugar with the poison and fed it to the child. When the cook returned he took the eldest child, a girl, and administered the sugar to her. He then called the boy, Bobby, into the room, but he ran out, crying, "Oh! mamma!" but the father followed him, calling him his little man, took him up in his arms, carried him back, gave him some sugar, and smothered him. The girl, who was preparing lunch in another apartment, did not think any thing unusual of these actions. After killing the entire family the father secured all the doors and sat down to write, but hearing Martineau come he stepped out, and, holding the door in his hand, told him the girls were at church, and that he would not bother about lunch, but have dinner at five o'clock. He said Mrs. Brennan was not well, and had laid down. In the letter he wrote, he said he wanted Martineau, the secretary of the company, to be sure they were all dead.'"

WHY COUSINS SHOULD NOT MARRY.

In the annual report of the Superintendent of the Kentucky Institution for the Deaf and Dumb is the following argument against the marriage of cousins:

"From ten to twenty per cent. of deaf mutes are the children of cousins. It is greatly to be regretted that the law forbidding the marriage of first cousins did not pass the recent Legislature. These marriages are violations of the law of nature, as is evidenced by the affliction visited in almost every case upon their offspring in deafness, blindness, and idiocy—and ought to be a violation of human laws also. The commonwealth has a clear right to protect itself against these ill-starred matches, whose offspring it has to sustain, frequently for life. It may be hoped that this important subject will not escape the action of our legislators many years longer. It is confidently believed that, by forbidding marriage of this kind, and by proper attention and care of infants laboring under the disease stated, the number of deaf mutes in the community might be diminished by one-half in a generation."

A CHASE AFTER A SHARK.

The Norfolk Argus contains the following: "A gentleman and servant, a stalwart negro, went fishing for rock on the Bay shore. The big darkey, after wading out, tied the line around his body. Soon an old shark came along and swallowed the bait, and Sambo held the line. The powerful fish, however, drew him gradually out in deep water by a rapid movement, tightened the line and dashed furiously out from the shore, followed by the darkey, who alternately disappeared beneath the waves and rose to the surface, grabbing at his knife as he rushed on with almost lightning speed in the wake of the shark. He was seen at the distance of nearly a mile, entirely beyond the reach of assistance, and a victim of his own hazardous daring and imprudent temerity."

A BLACK MAN SOLD AT AUCTION IN BOSTON.

The Boston Courier states: "Messrs. Barbour & Son sold at auction yesterday the old wooden buildings at the corner of Sudbury and Portland streets, to make room for improvements. The auctioneer stated that he should sell to the highest bidder the buildings and their 'contents,' with the exception of the bricks and stone, but was quite surprised, if not alarmed, upon being subsequently informed that one of the buildings contained a negro tenant at the time of the sale. The black man, it is said, was once a Southern slave, although a free man at the present time. This little incident created considerable merriment, as the auctioneer is known to be somewhat ultra in his Anti-Slavery views."

A CLERGYMAN BURIED ALIVE.

A letter dated Holland, Erie County, Pennsylvania, March 15, says:

"A very afflictive dispensation of Providence has taken place within twenty miles of this place. A Presbyterian minister named Reed was going to attend a meeting of the Presbytery. He stopped overnight with another minister at a private house. Mr. Reed was taken with a fit in the night, and it was supposed he had died. The other minister being in a hurry to get to the meeting in season had him buried the next day. On his return from meeting he left word at Oxford that their minister was dead and buried. His friends went immediately to get his remains and bring them to Oxford, when, to their great sorrow, they discovered that he had been buried alive. The cover of the coffin was split, and his shroud was completely torn off and he turned nearly on his face. He was a bachelor, and a very worthy man. His dreadful death is much lamented."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

SETTLEMENT OF THE DISPUTE WITH FRANCE.

In Parliament, on 12th, Mr. Disraeli, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, said he would take the earliest opportunity of stating that within the last hour her Majesty's Government had received a dispatch from the French Government in answer to the dispatch addressed to them by her Majesty's Government, and he had great pleasure in announcing to the House that those painful circumstances which had unhappily for a time subsisted between the Governments of the two countries had entirely terminated; they had been terminated in a spirit friendly and honorable, and in a manner which he believed satisfactory to the feelings, as he was sure they would be conducive to the interests and happiness of both countries. As soon as her Majesty's permission had been obtained, it would be his duty to lay the correspondence upon the table.

THE COURT CAMARILLA AGAIN.

A gossiping correspondent of a London paper tells the following anecdote of the troubles which beset Lord Derby's accession to office:

"One story flying about was, that there was a 'Bedchamber Plot,' that the Duchess of Sutherland would not budge in favor of the Duchess of Manchester, and that Lord Derby was going to throw up the cards in consequence. The Whigs played that game in 1835 with great success—Sir Robert Peel, in consequence of his ladies not being accepted, having declined to form a Government. But it could not be done again; common sense could not afford it. With a very youthful female sovereign on the throne, it was a political consequence that she should be surrounded by a Court at least not hostile to her Minister, and the public sympathy of the time was with the youthful Queen, hesitating to bring a host of strange Tory dames about her. But Victoria Regina is rather an elderly, sensible person by this time, and if a Minister insisted on his bedchamber women, her Majesty would undoubtedly have to give way. It is, however, a question whether the time has not come to omit these great ladies in a 'crisis.' The world has very little idea how they hunger for pay and place, and the social advantages of a court position; and their fuss gives rise to many an intrigue and affects many a vote. But is it not time to put a stop to such a system? Why, because Lord Palmerston is out and Lord Derby is in, should the Duchess of Sutherland give up her rooms, and leave off scolding the maids in charge of the robes at the palace? The female officers about the court ought to be abolished altogether. Some suggestion of this kind may have been very appropriately urged by the Queen, and hence the gossip about a difficulty at the Court. But Lord Derby seems not to have had the courage to undertake the innovation. Rupert ran away from a charge of crinoline—and no wonder."

DEPARTURE OF DR. LIVINGSTONE.

The Pearl, screw-steamer, having on board Dr. Livingstone, sailed on 10th ult. from Liverpool. There were also on board Mrs. Livingstone and her little son; Captain Bedingfield, R.N., Government surveyor and nautical commander of the expedition; Dr. Kirk, of Edinburgh, botanist and medical officer; Mr. Thornton, geologist; Mr. Rae, engineer of the launch; and Mr. T. Baines, artist, who now goes out for the purpose of sketching the country passed through, and the inhabitants, animals, and plants met with in the research in Africa. The Pearl will proceed up the Zambesi as far as her draught of water will permit, and, after disembarking her passengers, stores, and launch, steam direct for the island of Ceylon, whither she will be employed by the East India Company for the purpose of carrying the mails from the main land to the steamer contract boats at Point de Galle. She has been fitted up with a lifting screw, and every other recent invention, for the purpose of procuring speed. The launch which the Pearl takes out is for the purpose of facilitating the navigation of the shallows of the River Zambesi.

ANOTHER ACCIDENT FROM WEARING HOOPS.

Another instance of the dangerously combustible nature of that article which is just now the "delight of the fair sex," has occurred at Tunbridge Wells. Three young ladies were at a party, when one of them rose from her seat, and passed by the fire-place. Presently one of her companions espied her dress on fire, when an excited scene was enacted. The second young lady called out to the first that her dress was on fire, and rushed to the door to alarm the house. The lady "on fire" seized her, and thus her dress was ignited also. The crinoline was flaring away, when the shrieks of the fair unfortunates brought one of the other sex to their assistance, who tore off them the ignited parts of their dress. After he had, as he thought, placed them out of danger, the lady whose dress first caught fire when she passed the fire-place, discovered that her garments were still on fire, and she rushed to the door, but was prevented from going out by the third young lady. She was then hurried away to the bath, and finding no water in it, the gentleman placed her under the tap, and saturating her clothes with water, succeeded in extinguishing the fire. One of their arms was severely burned. The floor of the room caught fire from the burning pieces thrown on it, but it was soon put out.

THE WORKING OF THE NEW DIVORCE ACT.

The Leader tells the following story: "The operation of the New Divorce Act is beginning to be illustrated in a marked manner. An application which was made at Exeter a few days ago deserves attention. A Mrs. Catherine E. Bond applied under the 20th and 21st of Victoria, cap. 85, for protection for herself and property against her husband and his creditors. The wife stated that her husband had deserted her without reasonable cause for nearly five years, during which time she had supported herself by letting furnished lodgings. She had heard nothing of her husband until June last, when he returned to her in a state of utter destitution, and out of charity she permitted him to sleep under her roof, and to take his meals in the kitchen. Very recently it has been ascertained that during the time of the husband's being away he had married another woman, and he is now in prison awaiting his trial for the bigamy. Meanwhile, the man's creditors have applied to Mrs. Bond for payment of her husband's debts, and she is threatened with ruin. The notable feature in this case is, that the fact of the wife having consented, even in charity, to permit the husband to return beneath her roof, is held to have condoned for the previous desertion, and to have rehabilitated the husband in all his previous rights and authority; and there is but one hope for the security of the poor woman whose tender-heartedness prevented her from shutting her door in the face of the man who had deserted her—the fellow will, very probably, be convicted, and there will then be no difficulty in affording her protection."

A COMFORTABLE FAMILY.

A London paper gives the following list of offices held by a noble family in England: "The Marquis of Normanby—our Minister at Florence, and high in Austrian favor. The Earl of Mulgrave (son of the above peer)—just appointed Governor of Nova Scotia.(?) The Hon. Charles Phipps, C.B., Colonel in the army (brother of the marquis)—Keeper of her Majesty's Privy Purse, and Treasurer of the Household to the Prince Consort. His son, Charles—page of Honor to the Queen (which will soon procure the boy a commission in the Guards, worth £1200). His son-in-law, Captain Sayer, Deputy-Assistant Quartermaster-General at the Horse Guards. The Hon. Edmund Phipps (second brother of the marquis)—Commissioner of Encumbered Estates in the West Indies (usually resident in Italy). The Hon. Augustus Phipps (third brother of the marquis)—Rector of Euston-cum-Barnham, Suffolk, and Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen."

FRANCE.

REVOLUTIONARY OUTBURSTS.

The Moniteur, of the 11th March, says that, on the 24th Feb., arrests were made in various parts of France, which defeated culpable projects, and led to the discovery and seizure of arms, ammunition, and compromising correspondence. The arrests, however, have been exaggerated. They are limited to fifty principal ringleaders at Paris, twenty at Lyons, twelve at Marseilles, and four, on an average, in forty other départments. In spite of this precaution a gathering took place in Paris on the night of the 5th of March; but firm and vigilant measures caused it to prove abortive, and led to twenty new arrests.

The Moniteur states that, at Chalons, on the 6th March, forty men surprised a small post of infantry. They then attempted to get possession of the railroad station, crying, "Vive la Republique!" Driven back, they occupied the head of the bridge to interrupt communication with the barracks. The officers, who live in the town, cut their way through, and the garrison also turning out, the rioters were dispersed. Fifteen were captured.

The affray which took place at Chalons was, indisputably, part of the plan of systematic agitation.

The Patrie gives further details of the revolutionary attempt at Chalons, showing that the mob took the infantry post by surprise, and seized nearly all the arms. The rioters were subsequently subdued by a strong military detachment, and many arrests were made.

FURTHER PARTICULARS.

The Patrie publishes further particulars. It says: "We have received from Châlons-sur-Saône some new details relative to the revolutionary attempt of which that city was the scene on the evening of the 6th. Favored by the darkness and by a heavy fall of snow, the rioters, preceded by some individuals of an inoffensive appearance, proceeded first to a small infantry post in the Rue de Beaunes. At some distance off the majority of the mob halted; those who formed a sort of advance-guard went up to the sentinel, who was instantly surrounded and disarmed, in spite of his resistance, while one of the assailants put his hand on his mouth to prevent his raising an alarm. After this first success the remainder of the rioters rapidly advanced on the guard. The soldiers, half-asleep, could not prevent the seizure of the arms which were placed in the gun-rack near the door, but the sergeant in command had time to draw his sword and seize a few of the muskets, which he distributed among his men, ordering them to load immediately. The rioters, who had possessed themselves of arms, then left the post, and went to the railway station, where, as the Moniteur announced, they were energetically repulsed. Meanwhile the officers of the garrison had received information in a café, where they were accustomed to assemble, of what was going on. They went forthwith to the sub-prefecture, in order to take forcible possession, if necessary, of the representative of authority. Seeing that every thing was tranquil there, they went to their barracks, situated on the other side of the river, taking with them some soldiers whom they had met strolling about; but on arriving at the bridge the rioters disputed their passage. Thereupon the officers and soldiers, sword and bayonet in hand, cut their way through, not without wounding several of those who attempted to oppose them. On the other side of the bridge appeared almost immediately the military commander at the head of a strong detachment coming from the barracks. At sight of these soldiers the rioters fled in all directions, while the soldiers occupied the Hotel de Ville, the sub-prefecture, and the approaches to the bridge. As a peculiar incident of this affray, it was noticed that some of those who took part in it wore tin-plate cuirasses beneath their clothes. The greater part of the insurgents were arrested, and the rest no doubt will soon be in the hands of justice."

NAPOLEON'S MANIFESTO ON THE ENGLISH DIFFICULTY.

A pamphlet has just been issued at Paris in regard to the refugee difficulty between France and England. It is entitled "L'Empereur Napoleon III. et L'Angleterre;" and the Paris correspondent of the Times says, though it is the work of an eminent publicist, a member of the Council of State, yet the inspiration has been derived from the highest sources. The document treats of Napoleon's career since he was elected President; refers in glowing terms to the Anglo-French alliance, its results, and the earnest desire of the Emperor for its continuance; and then enters at great length into the refugee question, and shows the danger the French Government is constantly running from the machinations of the French refugees in London, winding up with an appeal to the English Government and people not to be led away by false interpretations, and expressing a hope that the alliance will firmly stand the trials which it is undergoing. The manifesto was regarded as a State paper, and attracted general attention in France. It is said to have produced favorable impressions; but in England the reverse was the case.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE BETTER ADMINISTERED IN FRANCE THAN IN THE UNITED STATES.

An "eminent member of the New York Bar," in the course of a letter to the Evening Post on the trial of Orsini, makes the following striking remarks:

"Whatever may be thought, in the United States and in England, of the political system of France, no reproach can justly be made against their criminal proceedings. A criminal prosecution is for the purpose of ascertaining the guilt or innocence of the accused, and the French pursue this investigation with perfect fairness. In the United States it is not so. Criminal trials are not there fairly conducted. The accused has largely the advantage of the Government which accuses him; and besides he has, I regret to say, generally the sympathy of the public; and, in consequence, many of the guilty are turned loose to renew their outrages upon society. In France the judges are independent, and therefore fearless and learned in the law; the rules are inflexible, and are, moreover, not all made to facilitate the prisoner in covering up his guilt. It does sometimes happen in this country, as in the Jeufosse case, recently tried, that the guilty escape; but it is rare that the feeling of the community takes the side of the criminal. How many murderers are annually acquitted by corrupt or incompetent juries and courts in the United States! And yet we boast of the perfection of our government!"

A SET OF LIVING CHESSMEN.

The Paris correspondent of the Times says: "In the new opera of M. Halevy, the Magicienne, which is about to appear at the Grand Opera, a game of chess will be played by the corps de ballet. In this animated game the dancers will be dressed in the costume of the various pieces of the chess-board, so that chess players in the audience can follow each move. For the invention of this singular interlude, M. Mazilier, chef de dance, claims the priority. But it seems that the same thing has been done at Mobile, in Alabama. At Mobile there is a society of anonymous young men, who meet once a year for a masquerade. This year this society ordered their costumes from Paris—it is thus that the circumstance is known here—and these costumes represent an old German tableau on an old bridge at Munich, which has been popularized by lithography and photography. The picture represents the genius of good and the genius of evil, sitting face to face, with a large chequer-board between them, on which they play the destinies of humanity. Satan moves the black pieces, of which each represents a vice. The white pieces, representing virtues, are moved by his adversary."

LAMARTINE A PLAGIARIST.

The correspondent of the Philadelphia Bulletin says: "Another literary quarrel has been furnishing amusement to the public lately. A very few years ago, M. Lamartine published 'Graziella,' as a work of his own. It is now proved beyond dispute that the events and the personages were all borrowed, without consent of the real author, from 'Charles Barimore,' a novel published by M. de Forbin, in 1810. Had this been all, M. Lamartine could only be accused of plagiary, but he had proclaimed himself not only the author but the hero of 'Graziella;' he had given it to the public as 'an ower true tale,' the incidents were those of his own life, the story was that of his love and his tears! And behold! the love and the tears of M. Lamartine are the love and the tears of somebody else! M. Lamartine proclaimed himself the seducer, the destroyer, of a lovely creature who never existed, save in some one else's imagination! All tender-hearted sentimental readers were indignant, but very glad to know it was all true, and M. Lamartine accepted with contrite heart the responsibility of a sin he had never committed. The last line in his book was: 'Forgive me, I have wept!' His sin and his repentance proved very profitable; each drop of those same tears was coined into bright pieces; innocence would never have paid so well and had such a run. M. Lamartine chose to remain under this load of sin, until forcibly relieved, and cruelly declared not guilty! A curious farce to be acted by a great poet and a statesman."

THE EMPRESS JEALOUS OF AN AMERICAN LADY.

He tells the following story: "An anecdote, of which the heroine is an American lady, has recently been put into private circulation. The lady, celebrated for her personal charms and her husband's wealth, was a very welcome and very frequent guest at the Elysée, in the days of the Presidency; indeed, her reception there on all festive occasions was so warm that she thought fit to withdraw from attentions that were becoming too marked. When her host took unto himself a wife, Mrs. —— thought the danger was over, and again became a guest at all the court balls. About two years ago, however, the invitations ceased suddenly, and all applications for tickets remained unanswered. The lady was exceedingly annoyed, and took great trouble to ascertain the cause of her disfavor. But, finding her efforts and inquiries unavailing, she courageously determined to seize the first opportunity that offered of demanding satisfaction for what she considered a gratuitous insult. Fortunately France and the United States did not declare war on each other on this momentous question—the lady was her own champion. At the fancy and masked ball of Mr. Fould, Mrs. —— appeared as La Dame de Pique. Her dress was composed of alternate stripes of white satin and crimson velvet, on which were numerous black velvet spades surrounded by gold cord. The head-dress, composed con amore by Felix, consisted of a crimson velvet tiara, around which the trefoil leaves of the spades in black velvet, each adorned with a large diamond as a drop of dew, figured as fleurons. The lady was resplendent. Among those who surveyed with admiration this beautiful and portly Queen of Spades was one domino, between whom and her Majesty a little ball-room flirtation arose. Finding they were closely watched by another mask, the stranger proposed a walk through the saloon, to which Mrs. —— readily assented. The conversation commenced with a remark that, though she did not appear to know him there, they were old acquaintances. Where had she been traveling these two years? Nowhere. She had remained in Paris. Ah! then, why had she not added the charm of her presence to the court balls? And why had she chosen that dress? Here Mrs. —— could no longer contain the explosion of her griefs. She recounted her mortification to this domino, whom she insists she did not know. He replied there was some woman's work in all this, and at any rate she should no longer be the Dame de Pique. She should have invitations to all the balls. The finale was, the gallant stranger revealed his august features, the lady gave a flower from her bouquet in exchange for the promise, which has been faithfully kept, and so ends my, or rather her story, of which the reader may believe as much as he chooses; my own opinion I reserve."

STORY OF A KISS AND A KICK.

The correspondent of the Boston Transcript is responsible for the following:

"A few evenings since, at Madame de R.'s, it was proposed to play an unpublished comedy, the production of one of our most successful dramatic authors. The subject was excellent—the rôles all very good—but there was one which no person would consent to take—that of a young man who gives a kiss to a beautiful woman, and receives a kick in return from the beauty's husband. Every one wished to give the kiss, but no one would consent to receive the kick—and this same kick, being an excellent comic element, made a point in the piece not to be suppressed. The comedy was about to be laid aside, when a young man, lieutenant in the cavalry of the imperial guard, consented to take the rôle, and receive the kick in public, provided, however, it was dispensed with at rehearsals, which was naturally agreed to.

"Madame de N. took the rôle of the young wife, receiving the embrace of the lieutenant. M. de N., her husband, acted the part of husband in the play.

"At the first rehearsal M. de N. said,

"'It is understood the kick is to be omitted at rehearsals, and it follows that the kiss be also omitted.'

"'I do not consent to that!' exclaimed the lieutenant. 'This is the only condition on which I submit to the humiliation I must undergo before the public.'

"'But consider,' continued M. de N.

"'Oh, the jealous monster!' exclaimed all of the ladies.

"'Nonsense—jealous!' cried the wife.

"In short, M. de N. in vain endeavored to be heard—it was decided the kiss should be given, and the kick omitted.

"The rehearsals lasted over a month. Already our lieutenant had given his thirty-eighth kiss—he had been present at every rehearsal, and the rehearsal was always preceded by an excellent breakfast. The husband, dissatisfied with the manner with which the kiss had been given and received, promised himself an exciting revenge on the evening of the representation. At last the important day arrived—the last grand rehearsal had taken place, and the lieutenant had given Madame de N. his thirty-ninth kiss—but a few hours more and the comedy would be presented to the public. M. de N. sharpened his foot. At six o'clock, as Madame de R. was giving the last glance at the arrangements of her theatre and salons, a servant presented her with a note, which she opened and read as follows:

"'MADAME LA COMTESSE,—I am in despair at what has occurred, but I feel it will be absolutely impossible for me to embrace Madame de N. in public. I had hoped I should be able to overcome my miserable bashfulness—but my timidity triumphs. I renounce new efforts, which would be useless, and take flight. I have exchanged positions with one of my brother officers in Africa, and at the moment you receive this I shall be far from Paris. Believe, Madame la Comtesse, in my very profound regrets and my despair. Present my heartbreaking excuses to Madame de N.; and receive the assurances of the highest respect, etc.,

"'LE VISCOUNT DE T.'

"The comedy, naturally, was not played, but replaced by another."

HOW M. DE X. WON HIS WIFE.

He also tells the following story: "One of the most brilliant balls costumés of the season was given recently in the superb salons of Madame de X., Faubourg St. Honore. Madame de X. has been married but a few years, and the circumstances attending her marriage are singular enough to be worthy of record.

"This lady, formerly Mademoiselle B., an opulent heiress, was about to marry a Portuguese gentleman—Marquis de F.—presented by her family, for whom she had neither love nor aversion. The day of the wedding Mademoiselle B. entered the salon in bridal costume, and approached the mirror over the fire-place to arrange a part of her head-dress. Her dress took fire, and in an instant she was enveloped in flames. The guests present uttered cries of horror and fear, and many rushed from the room. The Marquis fell fainting in an arm-chair. A young man, M. de X., a friend of the future husband, caught the young girl in his arms and succeeded in extinguishing the flames, not, however, without being severely burned himself. The wedding was postponed, but the adventure had its important consequences. Miss B. was disgusted with her effeminate fiancé, who, in the moment when she most needed his aid and assistance, had betrayed unpardonable weakness. M. de X. merited her gratitude, and even something more. 'He has presence of mind, courage, and fortitude,' she said; 'he has suffered for me—he has saved me; I owe him a recompense—I will marry him.' This decision was irrevocable. The Marquis was dismissed, and M. de X. had the happiness of marrying a charming wife, whose least merit is the possession of a large fortune."

HOW TO SET A DISLOCATION OF THE VERTEBRÆ OF THE NECK.

A little girl, nine years of age, of Fournols, a commune in the department of Puy-de-Dome, was amusing herself with "see-sawing" on a plank, her brother being at the other end. He suddenly got down, and the little girl was thrown off by the jerk, and fell on an obstacle, which caused the luxation of the sixth cervical vertebra. Dr. Missoux being called in, he immediately recognized the case as one in which any violent effort to replace the vertebræ would inevitably cause the death of the patient; he therefore resolved to effect it gradually, by fatiguing the muscles, and causing them to relax of their own accord. A plank was procured, and a square block of sufficient thickness placed at the end of it by way of a pillow; the patient was then laid on the plank, so that her head, which was immovably thrown backward, rested on the block. There was, therefore, an empty space between her spine and the plank; the weight of the chest and shoulders was solely supported by the dislocated vertebral column. By degrees the resistance of the muscles, which was the chief obstacle to the restoration of the bone to its natural position, diminished, the head slowly returned to its place, and in about an hour and a half the muscles had so far relaxed that the dislocated vertebra slipped into its place again by itself. The patient could see, move, and speak as before; nevertheless, she was kept in bed for a whole month by way of precaution, and is at present perfectly recovered.

ITALY.

THE EARTHQUAKE AT NAPLES.

A letter dated the 19th says: "It is nearly certain about 40,000 victims is the result of the earthquakes. In Basilicata hundreds have perished from hunger and by lock-jaw. Two other shocks, rather severe ones, happened in Calabria, and one near St. Germano, announced by rumbling noises, but causing no damage. The Pope has given 3000 ducats for the unfortunates of the earthquake; and the club of the horse-races, at the head of which is the Conte d'Aquila, gave the sum of 2000 ducats that was to have been spent for the next spring meeting. The sum subscribed by the English here is about £1000. After much discussion, it was settled that Dr. Strange and two other English gentlemen (residents) should go to distribute the money themselves, instead of giving it into the hands of Government."

ANOTHER DREADFUL CALAMITY.

Another sorrow has fallen upon Salerno. No sooner has the panic occasioned by the earthquake begun to cease than the population are again alarmed by another sad event. The tooth of St. Matthew the Bishop, one of the precious relics of the Church, has been stolen. It disappeared during the agitation consequent on the late disaster, and this incident is only another proof of that moral disorder which is often perceptible in times of great social distress. The Bishop has ordered the excommunication of the sinner, but to no effect; processions with torches have been made, all equally useless; the precious relic, which has saved Salerno from so many misfortunes, is not to be found.

MEXICO.

PROGRESS OF THE REVOLUTION.

We have dates from Vera Cruz to the 21st ult., with advices from the City of Mexico to the 16th. It is very difficult to obtain reliable information, but the following is probably pretty near correct: Several battles had been fought between the Constitutional forces and those of the Zuloaga Government. The latter claim a triumph, but it don't amount to much.

General Parrodi had retreated before General Osollos, of the Zuloaga party. Pronunciamentos were still the order of the day, but the Government of Zuloaga seems to be generally gaining ground.

The City of Vera Cruz was under martial law. The forces of Zuloaga were on their way there, and a hard battle would probably be fought somewhere between the City of Mexico and Vera Cruz.

REBELLION IN SONORA.

A letter by the overland mail, via El Paso and San Antonio, to Lieutenant Mowry, dated Arizona, Feb. 7, states that General Gandara, the leader of the rebellion at Sonora, has been entirely successful, having defeated the Government troops in several battles. At the last accounts Gandara had surrounded Peschiera, the Governor, so as to cut off all hopes of escape. Gandara had also ordered all the prisoners to be massacred, and proclaimed that he would hang Peschiera if taken.

Other letters say that the Fort Yuma and El Paso wagon-road was progressing finely.

The people of Rio Grande were much interested in the success of the Arizona bill to admit them as a Territory.

REVOLUTION IN VENEZUELA.

The Herald contains the following statements:

"PANAMA, March 17, 1858.

"On my arrival here I found the news widely circulated of a revolution in Caracas, in behalf of General Paez. It is said that the people rose, proclaiming him (Paez), and that Monagas was besieged in the Plaza de San Pablo, with his personal guard, fighting for their lives."

"CARACAS, Feb. 27, 1858.

"We are now in earnest, and the outbreak will commence this month in Valencia and Porto Cabello."

A SCENE IN THE ATTACK ON CANTON BY THE ALLIED FRENCH AND ENGLISH.

ATTACK ON AN ENGLISH MAN-OF-WAR'S BOAT IN A CREEK NEAR CANTON.

THE ATTACK ON CANTON.

THE foregoing illustrations represent a scene in the recent attack on Canton by the allied French and English troops, and an attack by Chinamen, in a creek near Canton, on an English man-of-war's boat containing the famous Lieutenant Pim, and the correspondent of the Illustrated London News, Mr. Wurgman. The American reader will easily look for the stars and stripes among the combatants. Our people were, for the last accounts in the week, kept out of the fight.

We have already given in the news columns the story of the attack. We feel that we can not do better than add the following extracts from the correspondent of the London Times. Referring to the first assault, he says:

"Captain Key's guns, and four French field-pieces under Lieutenant de Vaisseau Vezzi, from behind the village, were battering away at the walls, and kept down all but the occasional distance of thirty feet, and the shells and rockets from the Dutch Folly and the ships in the river were, from an unseen distance, bursting along the whole line of fortifications. The orders were that the assault should be made at nine o'clock, but the time had been all night in the open; they were drawn up at daybreak in position, and the interval between the French and English added to their impatience. However we may censure the system of it would be a small amount of courage to continue to crowd these walls, and ply their hidden assailants with guns, and grape, and musketry, rockets, while these shells were bursting over their heads, and these guns were crowding their embrasures and the riflemen were dinging their deadly bullets through the loopholes. Twenty minutes before the appointed time the French advanced guard, and of course the English could not be kept back. They had crossed the ditch, and were clambering up the wall, before the scaling-ladders could be brought up.

"Meanwhile the Chinese had been tumbling down all sorts of missiles, but when the Allies were once upon the walls the great body of them fled. They poured down into the city and fired from the streets; they dodged behind the buildings on the ramparts, and aimed their cumbrous matchlocks from behind them. A few single encounters took place, and the ground was won to the left of the gate, and hurry to the right to sweep the wall upward toward the hill. Helter-skelter, away they went, driving the Tartars down in front of them and before them along the wall, until, some hundred yards in front, they came upon a new set of scaling-ladders, who were just accomplishing another escalade."

The first attack only effected the destruction of the fortifications. The troops were not allowed to enter the city. A week afterward orders were given for the assault upon the city itself. This was on the 5th January. The Times correspondent says:

"At half past seven o'clock in the morning, while the rain was still falling, three columns of English red-coats penetrated into the city down three narrow streets, while a detachment of four hundred French sailors, with a gun, were advancing along the wall to our right. They are all soon lost to sight, and we must imagine as well as we can how if we would see more. There is heavy firing on our left, and of course we hurry there first. It is only Colonel Jamieson's men disembarking at the fort. Let us speed away to see what the General's party are doing. They meet with no resistance except from the intricacy of the streets. But they have lost their way, overshot their mark, and, in the labyrinth of narrow ways, can not find the yamun they are in quest of. Colonel Holloway's detachment of four companies are more successful. They have marched rapidly down the street, and they have paused for a few moments before a closed gateway. It is only a passive resistance. The pioneers, with a few blows of their axes, open a way through the obstruction, as they have done at a barricade which is erected a little beyond, but is not manned. The people look on from their doors, and the Chinese very waters-beaten in the mud fly to the rear of the troops, just as though nothing uncommon were passing. Few Tartars arrive at the cross-road where one street strikes the Street of Benevolence and Love—a fine broad avenue in the map, a hovel-crowded alley, no doubt, in reality. Here Colonel Holloway detaches Captain Parke, with three companies, to the left, with instructions to advance and seize the treasury, while he leads the rest of his men round to the right. A hundred paces bring him in front of the yamun of Peh-kwei, the governor of the city and provinces. Like the house of all Chinese yamuns, it is a shabby square, with a wall on one side, whereon a gigantic beast is painted. The vast doors of the yamun, whereon two great lgures like those of Magog are daubed, front this monstrous effigy. This is the place ultimately in the Colonel's instructions 'Quick!' is the word. A rush from the pioneers, and the battered doors move open with unexpected ease. 'Front face!' cries the Colonel, and in a moment the red-coats are four abreast, and advancing at the double up a broad and straight causeway in the middle of an immense court-yard —trees and shrubs on either side, the commonplace buildings forming the right and left sides, and a huge barn-shaped pavilion closing the space in front. In appearance for a few seconds of the structures, antics are thrown out, and, while the main body is marching on, every spot is searched.

The success of the attack was complete. We have already stated that the whole city was occupied almost without resistance, and that the Governor Military Commandant was reinstalled in his post under the authority of the British and French Plenipotentiaries. Our picture will tell the remainder of the story.

The other illustration may be best described in the language of Mr. Wurgman, the London Illustrated News correspondent, who was, as we said, one of the principal actors in the tragedy depicted. He says:

"On the morning of the 14th, at about 10 A.M., the second gig of the Hesperus gun-boat left the vessel with a crew consisting of eleven men of the lower decks, accompanied by Lieutenant-Commanding Bedford Pim, myself, and my assistant-man, as interpreter —in all fifteen. The object of the expedition was partly recreation and partly information. We proceeded about a couple of miles up a winding creek, opposite High Island, and brought up near the town of Sai-Lau, 15,000 inhabitants. Two large Chinese war boats had visited previously. Two men were left in charge of the boat; the remainder landed. Nothing suspicious was observed, and we passed quietly and unmolested into the town. A Celestial told us that fifteen-man-that the day of the 10th of January, 1858, was a Monday. Lieutenant Pim, with some of his men, charged at this moly, and thereby made good the retreat of all the party. Before this, the moment were in the boat than the enemy kept up a smart fire of jingals, wounding one man in the leg; they brought a small cannon to bear upon us: the balls whistled over our heads, others struck the boat, and the brickwork in the wall, the yells, screams, and gesticulations of the infuriated mob were truly appalling. Our fire must have made sad havoc at the masses were so dense. The creek being both narrow and shallow, paddles were used to propel the boat. Numbers commenced firing at us from the banks. Our men, however, managed to keep their assailants at bay. We had arrived at a point where a large tree and a group of houses, standing on the bank, afforded our enemies cover: the brickbats from the house-tops and jingals from the beach rained death and destruction upon us. The gunner and two men fell dead upon the spot, the former sitting next to me. Several also were wounded. Their sharp crics of agony were heartrending, as they received a ball, or another jagged slug, and dropped the paddle they were no longer able to lift. We were, in the shortest minute of locomotion, the boat came to a stand-still. During the whole of the above trying period Lieutenant Pim was the life of the party. His strategems of the boat, encouraging his men, and occasionally shouting at the enemy, the ammunition being handed to him by myself. He had been wounded early, but I did not know until afterward that he had received in his left thigh. Under these circumstances it is not to be wondered at that the men who were both decided to leave the boat, and try to escape an inveritable death (for these 'braver give no quarter) by crossing a paddy-field, at the edge of which we might be seen by the Allies. Both Lieutenant Pim refused to quit the boat, still thinking we had a chance to land a short distance lik amidst the thick hail of bullets. The interpreter, who had hitherto shown immense pluck, seeing all hope gone, was for leaving the boat, swimming to the water, and gained the paddy-field; while the boat was soon deserted by all but Pim and myself. Lieutenant Pim, who urged me to run. I did so, and from personal experience, can assure you that the paddy-field is not much better than the boat, for any one would seize for locomotion. Every step I was up to my knees in mud. I was on the creek, and, in a fainting state, arrived at the river side, swaying my red sash to the Nembis as a signal of distress. I felt perfectly safe, when once on shore, to my having on a Chinese dress, and being unarmed, for I had thrown away my pistol but a knife. Two more men were killed. I parted the body of one, Pim's coxswain, from the boat, and left him on the bank. At last I had the happiness of seeing the Nembis's boats pulling off to our rescue. Lieutenant Pim was in the bow of the boat, faint, away as hard as he could. At length the Chinese must have thought we were all dead, for ceased to put off in their sampans, and we proceeded at our leisure. I was left in sole charge of powder to show their leader; which caused sufficient confusion to enable my self and Pim to reach the friendly child. The decapitation of the corpses took some time, and, thank Heaven! it was accomplished. Now the Nembis's boats, although closely followed by braves the whole way. Thus, out of a party of fifteen, five were killed, and seven wounded—one since dead. It was very awful, but most picturesque. The Chinese were in great force, and looked on all in the kindest manner. I turned it between blankets, at 1 was wet through with my agnatic fluid and Pim to reach the ship I was covered.

"The boats of the Nembis, with a party of marines, went up the creek and did a little 'peppering;' but not a trace of our second gig was found. Her crew had undoubtedly been taken and recovered in the paddy-field. He was immediately buried on High Island. The next day, Lieutenant Colin Stewart, of the Nembis, having in the mean time communicated with the Admiral, received his instructions to proceed with the boats' crews and marines to the creek, and, if necessary, to proceed to shell the town. Next day the boats of the squadron and boats-launches mustered about 250 men. They met with a most determined resistance, but succeeded in destroying a large fleet of war junks. Admiral soldiers swarmed—the hills were covered—but a few rockets and shells from the boats soon disbanded them, and prevented them cutting off our retreat, as was their intention. The blue-jackets then set fire to the place; but a Chinese town is rather difficult to destroy, the houses being swell built of splendid grey brick, and the roofs being the only part combustible. However, the smoke rose high in the air, and the 'brave army' came safely out of the conflict with only four wounded. The most melancholy part was to see the women, with small feet, hobbling up upon their wooden clogs. They seemed to know that our men would not touch them, for they walked right past them. Some unfortunate children, likewise, having lost themselves, were wandering about without parents. The fire in a number of the Chinese must have been great, for they at one time charged us, but were checked by a well-directed volley, and put to flight at the point of the bayonet. It is a mystery to me how they manage to hit with their jingals, for they never fire from the hip, as you see in the sketch, and never from the shoulder, as we do. At the end of the week, where they expected we would land, they had erected a battery of tubs filled with mud, into which they had placed heavy jingals with immense touch-holes. However, we disappointed them by landing in an entirely opposite direction. Lieutenant Pim was the day of the 10th, member. Next morning we went down to Hong Kong with the wounded. A very comfortable place was erected for them on deck with poles, from which their cots were suspended, the whole covered by an awning to prevent the rays from of it. We created quite a sensation in Hong Kong. The Banterers were received on board the Hercules hospital-ship, and are now doing well."

TREASURES OF THOUGHT.

If thou hast thrown a glorious thought
Upon life's common ways,
Should other men pass by and learn aught,
Fret not to lose the praise.

Great thinker, often thou shalt find,
While folly plunders fame,
To the rich store the crowd is blind,
Nor knows thy very name.

What matters that, if thou uncoil
The soul that God has given,
Not in the world's mean eye to toil,
But in the sight of Heaven?

If thou art true yet in thee lurks
For fame a human sigh:
To Nature go, and see how works
That handmaid of the sky.

Her own deep bounty she forgets
In full of purpose still;
Nor glorifies herself, nor sets
Her flowers above her weeds.

She hides, the modest leaves between,
She knows not why, her fruits;
Her richest treasures are not seen
By any eye but God's.

Accept the lesson. Look not for
Reward; from out thee chase
All selfish ends, and do not more
Than to fulfil thy place.

HELEN FLOYD.

HELEN FLOYD was sitting alone in her own chamber one day in the afternoon. The window was open, and there was just motion enough in the air to stir the hovering vines that clustered round the casement, to break the sunlight streaming through into flecks and spots and wavering lines of radiance. A stray beam danced around the brown head of the young girl, now brightening into sunny splendor the brown shades of her hair, and then of some waving leaves, and crept it using, passed in glitter still more vividly on the golden frame of a miniature that she held in her hand.

It was the face of a young, handsome man, full of eagerness and impulsive feeling, and stamped in every moulded line with the impress of an ardent, passionate, sensitive, yet most loving and chivalrous nature. It was just the face to win a woman's love, especially young and romantic women, to whom life is all poetry and passion. And indeed its original had already possessed all the warmth and tenderness, all the faith and trust of Helen Floyd's pure heart. For, though the miniature had been only loving, first quickened to new life and gladness the gentle spirit as unconscious before of its womanly quality and tenderness as a bud ere dawn that she had only lived in the joy of his love.

Her head was bent over the look of joy at this time either in her attitude or the expression of her face, as she gazed upon the picture of her lover. She sat upon a low chair in a listless, careless way, with a drooping head, and large sorrowful eyes fixed upon the picture. The miniature for all tears that dropped slowly, one by one, upon it, and upon the loose letters that lay in her lap. There was a listless drowsiness in her whole attitude, in her whole manner, that revealed the presence of some grief far deeper than tears.

"Tribes light as air which move
Pitcairnian beliefs beats that law."

A light laugh broke on the door, to-day, startled her from her meditations, whatever they might have been, and she made an impulsive movement to hide from the eyes of the picture; but checked immediately as a stately-looking lady entered the room, followed by a fine-looking, and stately-looking girl in an arm-chair opposite the girl. It was an old-fashioned, high-backed chair, its dark oaken frame and its cushions of faded red damask contrasting antique, flowered stuff; and its whole effect seemed to be to give an appearance of importance to the girl who sat in it. She was tall and erect, not above middle age, with a face that was regular in its handsome outlines as a statue's, yet just as cold and proud; and as exceeding stateliness of dress and manner.

There could have been no greater contrast than between her and the sorrowful, shrinking girl at her feet. Helen's tender, timid eyes had caught no ray from the calm, bright orbs that looked so haughtily upon them, and her soft, delicate, girlish features with their loving, trustful expression, bore no single point of resemblance to the coldly-chiseled face above her. Just as unlike were the inner countenances of the two, just as different were their heart and mind, as is face and look; and yet the proud lady was Helen's mother, and Helen was her only daughter.

There was no word spoken between them for a minute. Helen folded her hands upon her lap, and sat still without looking up; and Mrs. Floyd gazed at her quietly. Presently she said, in a calm, clear voice that sounded well with her face,

"You are acting very strangely, Helen. I conclude that this position is assumed according to your promise, and have given you more than sufficient time to prepare it. Yet here you are, dreamy, and gaze there before and after, irresolute still, and have not as much as copied the note which I left with you."

"Because I can not, mamma, I can not!" the girl exclaimed with sudden passion, lifting up her hazey eyes with a half-startled, half-imploring expression. "I never can send such a letter as that—so hard and cold, so false and unkind to Harry Arlington. I wonder how even you could write it, mamma!"

"Then write for yourself," said Mrs. Floyd, calmly. "Tell the truth in your own way, if mine does not suit your fastidiousness."

"If I tell the truth in my own way, I shall say, Come back to me; I do not care what you have done, or what is said of you; I love you better a thousand times than ever before!"

"Helen!" said the lady, and suddenly proceeding, "Mrs. Floyd retorted, in the same icy tone, "to say nothing of its exceeding wisdom and filial obedience!"

"But, mamma!"—Helen dropped her head upon her knees with a pitiful cry—"you know, you, I can not give him up! It will break my heart if you make me do it! Why must I? why must I?"

"I have intimated that reason is to others. Helen, that it seems idle to do it again. Still if you can not understand yet, I will repeat once more my reason for insisting upon saving you from ruin. In the first place you are my only child, the one object I have to live for to love, and I can not help loving you although I meet so little return."

"Mamma, you are cruel to say that," Helen interrupted, vehemently. "You know I love you, as much as my daughter could. And you are not answering my question fairly."

"I intended," said Mrs. Floyd, "to answer it fairly and candidly, but if by 'fairly' you mean give up Henry Arlington; I reply, because I am not willing to give you up to what would be the ruin of your happiness. Your happiness, your well-being, your peace of mind, present and future, are the concerns of my life. I have no other desire and purpose in living than to secure them as certainly as I can; and for this reason I am willing to purchase even a short-lived misery now than to see all shipwrecked by a worthless man. Yes, do not interrupt me, mamma, says Helen's cheeks flush, and her lips spring apart as if to make some reply. "I know the protest you would make, and, in spite of your partial affection, that is not the less a worthless man. He is an undutiful son, a heedless husband, a reckless parent, and a selfish, dissipated idler. He has so disgusted his uncle by his evil conduct, that Mr. Curtis has disinherited him, and now, rejoicing in their fate by one of the finest estates in the country, he has no fortune. He has squandered that in his profligacy, for the sake of wild hunting parties, and all manner of senseless dissipation: showing entirely no regard for your reputation than his own. And, lastly, if all these evils did not exist, he is still, by his conduct to you, proving himself unworthy. He knows no bounds when once it is excited, the last time in the world I can come I would consent to intrust my only daughter."

"You consented once," Helen murmured, as her mother paused for a just.

"Because I did not know him then as I do now," she said, sharply. "He had not yet revealed his true character."

"Oh, mamma!" Helen exclaimed, eagerly, "that is not true. He has revealed his true character as he seemed to us then; only now, he is not himself. I know what he means by these things, what things lately, but it was because they tormented him so—his mother and his uncle. Mr. Curtis is a stingy, cross-grained old man, and Mrs. Arlington literally only because he refused to leave his property to her profession, and because he chose to go to his uncle's factor, his overseer, his slave, on a rice plantation in Georgia! Who could blame Harry for rebelling at the mistake they made him if he had gone, just for the sake of his uncle's money? and so cruelly and unjustly disinherited him, just as soon as you heard of his misfortune, you treated him so coldly, and would not let me see him, or even write to him, that it is my wonder that he was tortured and stung by every body's unkindness, and driven into doing what he never would have done otherwise? Oh, mamma, every body has been unjust to Henry, and now you are trying for the greatest thing of all, to part him forever, maybe; when you might save him, if you would!"

She stopped, out of breath with her vehement speaking, and closing with passionate sobs which shook her whole frame. Her own fond, impulsive heart must have been moved by the fervor and eloquence of her appeal, and her remembrance of her grief and supplication; but it had no effect whatever upon Mrs. Floyd. She smiled, half in pity, half in contempt, as one would smile at a child's fleeting, unreasonable sorrow, when Helen, quite unable to control herself any further, hid her face and cried aloud, bitterly and despairingly. She did not disturb her until the first outbreak of her weeping had exhausted itself; then she merely bent over her, and laid her hand upon her head, saying coldly and calmly, but not unkindly either, and caressing it as one would a grieved child's.

Helen did not yield to this unwonted tenderness at first. The blow had been too cruel, every nerve quivered too keenly with the agony of one moment, once, even by any thing so rare and so precious as her mother's caresses. But her nature was too childlike and too dependent to resist it long, as Mrs. Floyd very well knew; and Helen presently lifted her head and laid it upon her mother's knee, half in penitence, half in trust, but still more with an eager hope of some final relenting, that would restore happiness—even though after a long probation—to herself and Henry. In this upbraiding hope, and unclouded by the recent bitterness, which still lingered upon her throbbing temples, she ventured to make one more appeal, untried before.

"Mamma, will you do this one thing for me? and then indeed I will ask nothing more. Write my Henry for a while; do not make me give him up entirely; let him have a few words every day-and-by, when he has atoned for all that he has done wrong. He will see the justice of being put upon probation, as long and severe as you please, mamma, we can bear it—and I know he will be so sorry that it will seem like a new life to bring him back to himself, and the time will come when you will be proud of Henry Arlington for your son! It is no matter if he has been Mr. Curtis's wealth: he will make wealth for himself, if he only has an object to work for, and I am the future. And I—oh, mamma! I will be so patient; so obedient; I will love you as I never loved you before, if you will but grant me one request!"

Fear Helen! How little she knew the rock she was trying to melt! All her unconscious and pleading awaited no more to turn Mrs. Floyd's purpose than a child's sand-fortifications would avail to check the progress of some great tide-wave. She began to feel it herself when she saw the hard look settle again upon her mother's face, the expression of stateliness with which she drew up her proud figure in the fine old carved chair, and the dignified displeasure with which she withdrew her hand from Helen's hair, even before the words came which took away the last shadow of hope from the poor young heart.

"It is impossible," Mrs. Floyd said, rigidly, "to consider such a plan for a moment. It was undignified and unmaidenly in you to propose it, and I should be injustice to all parties concerned to prefer to be reminded; it can only result in misery to you and to me, and you will understand that henceforth all communication, of whatever nature, is at an end between you."

She stooped, as she spoke the final sentence, to gather up the shawl which still lay on the floor beside her's lap. Helen suffered her in silence, but her grasp tightened upon the mistress, as if she would not resign it but without another effort. Mrs. Floyd did not appear to notice her, however. She tied up the letters composedly, and placed them in the envelope which she took from the table; then said, simply,

"I am ready for the picture now, Helen, and the ring;" and Helen, knowing how vain and useless resistance would be, could only obey, though she was like a rending of body and spirit to yield up these last tokens of her life's happiness so utterly and so bright!

She turned away from her mother and walked to the further end of the room, where Mrs. Floyd had buried herself in putting up the little packages and writing the cruel letter which was to accompany it. Her child she took onward, or speak again, even in reply to Mrs. Floyd's question, "Did she wish to see the letter she had written?" and then the door left the room. But when she was alone with her own sorrow and grievous sense of error—with the fond broke all bounds of restraint; and for long hours, till the May afternoon waned into twilight and darkness, Mrs. Floyd grew from time to time at the abandonment of her despair, in passionate crying and wild words of resistance and remonstrance which, in truth, had no purpose, but only served to relieve the pent-up storm of her soul.

It was no more unusual or unnatural episode with her, this engagement with Henry Arlington. Young as she was, she had already seen and known among many her's; but her heart had gone out to him in a self-unconscious, all-absorbing love, which was returned by him in kind with such a fidelity as a man can ever return such entire devotion. Her mother had given her sanction to every thing in the first place; for Henry Arlington was an eligible mate, in all important respects, for her beautiful but elderly-portioned child's hand. His family and connections were unexceptionally aristocratic, and his fair prospects, if not those to his rich uncle, more than satisfied Mrs. Floyd's ambition. So the course of true love ran as smoothly as a quiet stream through summer meadows for many months; and Helen found this earth such a sweet paradise to her that she scarcely thought of heaven at all of any other.

The first shadow was cast by Mr. Curtis, a cynicus old invalid, who had so little interest in his own life that he could not bear to see others enjoy it any more. He said that Henry ought to study in foolish passages with a sweet-heart; that his profession was a mere excuse for doing nothing sensible, and that, finally, ending, indeed, in a demand that he should absent himself entirely, for the space of a year, from his promised bride, and go to take charge of some Georgian plantations belonging to the old man. Henry refused, of course, indignantly; and then followed a series, of petty persecutions from his mother and uncle, the conclusion to which was a threat of disinheritance unless he should accede to their wishes.

It was at this time that Mrs. Floyd began suddenly to discover many objectionable traits in the young man, unknown hitherto, and to impose limits and restraints upon his intercourse with Helen which his pride and sense of right could ill submit to. He said and did things, perhaps even that in themselves, but not to be wondered at under the circumstances, which still further widened the breach; until by the time it became known that Mr. Curtis had really disinherited his nephew, Mrs. Floyd had fully made up her mind that Henry Arlington was no longer a desirable husband for her daughter, and that the engagement must be dissolved without delay.

How her determination succeeded in the accomplishment of her purpose, as far as Helen was concerned, we have already seen. As for Henry Arlington, he could not submit as patiently to a decree so cruel and unjust. He came, and came again and again, in vain; Mrs. Floyd's drawing-room day after day was denied to him, and the positive admission of betrothal ring which Helen had vowed to wear until his hand should place another in its stead, he demanded back as soon as he could write a letter, her own sign if he consented to this thing; but it was no use! Mrs. Floyd was inexorable in every meeting, and all his wrathful indignation availed nothing against her cool persistence in denying it. Lest Helen was on no way at his command, leaving wildly against her bonds, but just as visibly and he was to open every door but the one, and nothing but an increase of the rage and bitterness which he had brought with him.

Helen from her secret room felt at the window caught just one glimpse of his white face, right with a fearful passion, as he turned from the door and round a turn in the avenue. Then he bounded on in a mad gallop, down through the double line of poplars that stretched to the gate, over it, and on with one wild leap, and cut into the open road, as Helen eyes and her sinking eyes could no longer reach him.

That night Helen was stricken with brain-fever, and for days and weeks had no consciousness of any body or any thing around her. She only lived over the agony of that last interview, repeating unless repetition—saw only the white face of her lover as that one glance had revealed it, and heard only the mad gallop of the flying hoofs forever ringing and echoing in her brain.

Whether over-doing was the part she had acted and the misery she had wrought, or any momentary relenting from her hard purpose, ever entered into Mrs. Floyd's heart, I can not tell; but I do not know they were never made evident. She nursed her daughter with the utmost devotion, however, as though she would bring her back from the very gates of the grave; and her care, under God's providence, was finally rewarded by Helen's recovery, although there had been at times but little hope of such a result. It was a long, slow process of life and health and strength were coming back slowly but surely, she was still the most faithful nurse, watchful, and patient, and tender, as the most lovingly-demonstrative mother could have been. But her daughter's heart, though it was still true to its trustiness, never mentioned Henry Arlington's name, and least of all sought to have any thing changed or renewed from her first determination.

Nor did Helen speak again of what had passed. After the delirium of fever was gone, and Henry Arlington's name never passed her lips, and her own memory, whatever it might have been, was dumb as a word or "ah" of her mother. Whatever her mother requires was accomplished unquestioningly, ever she requested was granted in the same way. At her wish, she went again into the old life of social observance, and resumed her position in society, and as the summer advanced, consented to go from city to watering-place to another, just as Mrs. Floyd desired.

Nor was it all mere outward docility. Helen's real aim and object was to make herself unconscious to have neither power to resist suffering nor to spring up with any new strength for it. Her heart was crushed, body and mind, by one blow, and she did not try to rise from her utter prostration. Subdued and heart-broken as she was, she was a helpless puppet in her mother's hands to be worked as she saw fit. Once, however, she did make a faint attempt at resistance. It was when Mr. Emerson Dennis, a young planter whose wealth was sufficient to satisfy Mrs. Floyd's fullest, most ambitious sole for her hand. She refused at first with some energy to many several times, determining to say one else, be the suitor who he might. But Mrs. Floyd was no way daunted by this outbreak; she had conquered in a harder battle than this, and did not for for victory now.

So it ended just as she chose that it should. Helen gave up the contest in a sort of weary indifference, saying to herself, "What matter? I am not holy myself, and I shall not be, I suppose. Perhaps I may die all the sooner."

So the engagement was made, therefore, and announced; and Mr. Dennis, who had scarcely wit enough to know whether he got a willing bride or not, came and went, and played the part of devoted admiration for hours together, and brought her all that means of beautiful and costly gifts which she took without even looking at; and, finally, beginning to wish for something a little more satisfactory, arranged with Mrs. Floyd for the marriage-day. Helen submitted to her mother in this also, as in every thing else, and the preparations were settled to take place in the first week of September, little more than three months after poor Henry Arlington had been so hopelessly dismissed.

Helen was sitting in her chamber the afternoon before the wedding, on the same low seat, and in the same place, as on that afternoon in May when for the last time she dreamed over Henry's miniature and letters. There had been little, if any, change in the aspect of the room since then. There was the frame unshadowy white lace, and the same fringed curtains, the dressing-bureau strewn with dainty toilet appliances, the rosary table full of gifts, the wardrobe loaded with books.

The same engravings hung upon the wall, the same delicate Bacchante vase bore its burden of fresh flowers upon the work-stand near her, and the antique carved chair stood in the same place as when her mother had sat upon it, as on a judgment-seat, to pass sentence on her lover.

There was little change in Helen's appearance either, except when you looked more closely, and saw how thin was her form, and how vividly the slender veins was traced upon her thin hands and transparent temples. She sat in the same drooping way, in the same sorrow of utter grief, only now there was more weariness, less passion, and less despair. A few days more, and she will lay for the making of bridal favors, and through an open door, leading into an inner room, were seen heaps of pearl and satin, and soft white tarlatan folds, and the many laces, and ribbons, and flowers, for the bridal ladies.

But Helen's thoughts were far away from all these things, and neither were they wandering in any of the glad or sad reveries of an expectant bride. A vague presentiment had taken possession of her heart, and was absorbing her whole soul to-day—the echo of flying hoofs which had haunted her brain ever since she watched Henry Arlington's horse leap away from the door more than months ago. She tried to drown it—to put it away from thought as unnecessary; but the sound would burst with all the vividness of reality, until Helen, at last, sprang to the window, almost believing that she would see the well-remembered scene enacted again. But there was not a living thing in sight, and not a sound to be heard except the rustling of water, stirred the motionless stillness of the calm September afternoon.

She leaned her head against the sash in a sort of vague disappointment, and then the echo, which had been but in her own memory, returned again, and far away at first, but gradually increasing with a sense of nearness, until she no longer doubted of its actual existence elsewhere than in her own mind. It grew rapidly more and more distinct, and Helen, in a sudden fear of being overheard, as she had not felt for months, leaned far out of the window, straining every faculty of sight and hearing to seize the first appearance. For the horse well who the horseman was, as well by the mysterious security in her soul as by the instinct of her own eyes, when, at last, she saw Henry Arlington riding, in her full view, up the poplar avenue toward the house.

She waited until he had passed almost directly under her window, and then until the first impulsive waves of the piazza hid him from her sight as he rode on to the front entrance. Then, without pausing to reflect upon the absurdity she was going to do, but full of a strange excitement which led her on almost unconsciously to her own act, she hurried out of her crept noiselessly down stairs, and, before any one else had seen the unwelcome visitor, herself met him in the door, and led him into the house.

Her mother had gone out for a drive, the drawing-room was empty and silent, and Helen led the one to interrupt the strange interview thus obtained between herself and her lover, who was also as cruelly been wronged. Alas, that there was so little hope now—so little comfort or peace to be won from such an interview! It was but the last of reproaches, eg explanations, or prayers—too late for saying their own appearance. Her self and entire, and mutual forgetfulness—if that were possible!

And yet he poured out passionate entreaties—he knelt at her feet—he clasped her in his arms—he claiming her for his own by all the sacredness of vows and truth, which demanded that she should go from this false marriage and go with him, while there was yet time to escape from her own lifelong wretchedness, and redeem his own utter ruin. He told her how he had spent himself since they were parted in vain—how he could see her again, or communicate with her in some way; how he had been twice denied admittance to the house; how the servants had been returned unopened; how he had striven, by all ways and means, open and secret, but to send one word to her, and yet in all had failed. And now, when by a very Providence he had been allowed to find her, would she have the unutterable weakness and cruelty—would she dare to remain, and perjure her soul forever with lying vows to another man!

And so, from one wild adjuration to another—with mingled threatenings and supplications, tears and imprecations—until Helen, who had neither physical nor moral strength to front such storms, and whose short-lived energy had already given way to weakness and terror, fell down, fainting, at his feet—crushed by a violence which she could neither resist nor entreat.

He was as wild in his sorrow and self-reproach when he had been taught a lesson in the remission of her; and could not access himself sufficiently, or lavish enough tenderness upon the unconscious form. The swoon lasted but a little while, however; it was only a momentary suspension of vital power, and Helen soon recovered again. She rose up presently from the sofa where he had laid her, while he was still chafing and kissing her hands in his remorseful love, and tried to leave him; for she knew that she must put an end to his interview, or she could not keep her senses much longer. But he held her back, pleading.

"One word more, Helen! Let me ask you once again for the very last time! It is not too late—we are alone yet—will you go with me?" and waited for her answer with such a look in his face as it gives once might have worn who waited for the word which should bring him death or life.

But Helen shrank away from the look, and hid her eyes, with a piteous cry: "I can not—I dare not, Henry! Oh, why will you kill me so cruelly when you see I am dying already?"

Then he released her. "I will not, Helen," he said, with a strange, forced calmness. "It is all over now, and you shall never be troubled again by any word of mine. I will only speak one more. God-by!"

He stooped and kissed her, as if involuntarily, and then walked firmly past her out of the drawing-room into the hall, and from there to the piazza, where his horse stood, champing the bit and pawing up the gravel with his hot feet in impatience to be gone. Helen followed him, mechanically, obeying a blind impulse, though her feeble strength scarcely could support her. She leaned against the low rail of the piazza, and watched him as he untied the reins and gathered them up, and took some trifling readjustment of girth or bridle. Then he laid his hand upon the pommel of the saddle, as if about to spring into his seat, but turned suddenly on the piazza, and found Helen, and she saw that he held his right hand to his heart, as if he heard him call her name. "Look, Helen!" and under that impulse she looked. It was the flash of a pistol; the blinding flash, the loud, startling report, echoing and reechoing in fearful vibrations of sound through the breathless stillness of the afternoon, and Henry Arlington fell dead almost at the very feet of the woman in the world he had loved so fatally.

The ring of the horse's hoofs, as he galloped riderless and terrified down the avenue, blended strangely with the still lingering echoes of the pistol-shot; and Helen, herself, was unconscious of the distracting carriage-wheels on the graveled drive as Mrs. Floyd returned from her airing.

She was leaning back on the cushions, more handsome and stately than ever in her complacent and well-satisfied meditation. All her cares and anxieties for her daughter were nearly at an end; her highest ambition was realized in the fact that she be mistress of the most elegant establishment in the country, besides being connected with the most aristocratic families; and herself, thanks to her simplicity and unbounded admiration of Mr. Dennis, would look at Oak Lawn, practically, and in triple grandeur, as she did now on her own domain. As for Helen, she had made affair with Henry Arlington—Ah, well! it was all over now, thanks to her good management. Certainly she had much reason to congratulate herself on, dear sweet!

Much, truly, in a fearful way! Far more than the proud lady dreamed of, as her swift steeds bore her on straight to the spot which had just witnessed the deed of horror! There he lay at he had fallen, the first object which met her eyes as she descended from the carriage. Dead as she had wronged—tortured to frenzy and despair—driven to death and death! And beside him, with his left arm clasped around his head, and his crimson lips clinging to the ghastly mouth, was the daughter for whose happiness, as the highest and purest of mind" she had so successfully labored. Truly, she had much cause for self-gratulation in so fair seeing all her schemes!

There was no wedding the next day, nor any ever after, as far as Helen Floyd was concerned. The soft white satin robe, the rich laces, the gauzy, shimmering veil, and the bridal wreath, all lay away in some old chest or bureau, there to lie unseen until the fashion of them should change. And Mr. Dennis's pearls and diamonds, and multitudinous costly gifts, found their way, by-and-by, back to Oak Lawn—even as poor Henry Arlington's ring and miniature had returned to him.

Neither did Helen die, though night and day—in alternations of frantic anguish with blank, dreary despair—she prayed for death to put an end to insensory and feeling. She lived, and through months, nigh years, heart-broken and hopeless; and her mother, Mrs. Floyd, lived to see the need to dwell upon the retribution of a proud and evil heart. I have told a true history, and the moral needs no showing.

AN OLD STORY.

I.

KNEE-DEEP in leaves, in the autumn woods
I follow a path I know:
Withered is all the life the turf was green,
In the bright days long ago.

II.

The pathway led to a forest bower,
In the leafy days of June,
Where the gay winds sang and the flowers bloomed
In the light of the harvest moon.

III.

The winds sang sweet, but sweeter still
A voice sang at my side—
The voice of a girl I dearly loved,
And who should have been my bride.

IV.

She married another, cold and grand;
And they live in splendid state—
He jingles his wealth, and waves his hand—
A man of wealth and "weight."

V.

But I thought when, the other day, we met,
Her heart returned to the days
When a boy and girl went hand in hand
Through the leafy woodland ways.

VI.

We sat all alone for an hour, in talk;
Then I rose and went my way,
And came to the woodland path I know,
In the twilight wan and gray.

VII.

Knee-deep in leaves, in the autumn wood
I live in my youth once more;
And the hollow trees are roland in green,
As they were in the years before!

VIII.

And here, in the silent forest bower,
A maiden sits by my side—
A maiden I loved, who loved me,
Who should have been my bride!

Miscellany

WOMAN'S INFLUENCE OVER MAN.

THE instant a woman tries to manage a man for herself she has begun to ruin him. The lovely creeper clings in its feebleness with grace to the stately tree; but if it outgrow, as if to protect or conceal its supporter, it speedily destroys what it would otherwise adorn. When the serpent had persuaded Eve that she should deduce her husband to take her advice, and become as knowing as herself, she no longer felt herself made for him, and both for God, but rather that he was made as admire her. When she prevailed, they soon thickened about their plight gloom, and the fatal law was lost sight of by both. One grand purpose of woman's power over man's heart, now that both are fallen, is to be unobstructed and self-forgetful. A man who loves a true-hearted woman aims to realize in himself the qualities he admires and loves and reverence. They mutually put each other in mind of what each ought to be to the other; for in the formation of a happy character, the love and reverence of the virtuous feminine character is essential. One must seat us in the other's love the realization of the character desired. Hence the pathos-ity of true love: a woman's love cannot create a character that would otherwise be lost forever. If once mutual respect depart, then farewell the love that can alone sustain it in wrong; then farewell the heart-rest, without which life becomes a delirium and an agony. It is to be feared that woman is now more tenaciously than man, her slight surpasses she so far as she is wise in showing it. In expressing her, without at the same time showing her, her faith in the inherent dignity of man, however obscured, she may help him to see it, and consequently exciting a reckless sense of his own worthlessness, together with a hatred of her forgiving patronage. When man hates himself, woman is to blame. Give him time, and he will love that, and that only, to him to save him.

THE GREAT MR. CAMPBELL.

CURRETTA, the poet, after he had acquired fame, went into the Highlands, indulging many curiosities to know whether his name had found its way over the mountains, and into the glens of his native land. On an occasion he modestly inquired of an old lady if they knew any thing of Mr. Campbell in that quarter? "Know Mr. Campbell!" answered she knows Master Campbell here." Now, thought the poet, this is true fame! "I am Mr. Campbell," he said. To the old lady's surprise, "Then," said she you really and truly the great Mr. Campbell?" The poet began to speak up to the true "Mr. Campbell" before he would appropriate it to himself. This startled the worthy matron, and led her to ask, "But are you the great Mr. Campbell, the shoemaker?" This question dissolved all the vision.

THE MAN WITH THE IRON MASK.

AMONG the many stories which clothe around the "Iron Mask," there is one which I can not refrain giving you. In the days of Louis XIV. a lady in captivity—these days in which the prisoner, whether from fancy or memory, was thus described, "as of handsome face, middle life, fair hair, and a pale complexion, and beautiful voice"—there was a lovely prisoner in the fortress of Pignerol. Of course she was the daughter of one of the officials, as her name was Julia de Beaugrie. The mysterious prisoner fell in love with the lady; was taken his last from his window; and what feminine heart could resist a prisoner who had the misfortune to love? The father gave his consent—they were married at an altar erected in the dungeon, and the devoted wife shared the captivity to the last lifetime. Two little infant sons could not, however, be weaned near the unfortunate mother, and were sent secretly to Corsica under their maternal name of Bonaparte. From them sprung the Bonapartes, who are therefore fourteen years of the date of a conversation at St. Helena, it was mentioned to Napoleon by a gentleman present that he had come to him to tell the above story, and to the mountain from thence that Napoleon was a lineal descendant of the Iron Mask, and thus the legitimate heir of Louis XIII. The gentleman had laughed all the whole story, which he said he had rather very angry: he maintained that the marriage could easily be verified in the registers of a parish of Marseilles, which he named. The Emperor said that he had heard the same story; and that such was the love of the man's wife, that she would not for his own cause to have substantiated ceremony of the kind for the credulous multitude.—Miss Bremer's Letters from Cannes.

HABITS.

LIKE dukes of whom the fall unperceived upon the earth, the seemingly unimportant habits of life succeed one another. As the sons gobble together, so are our habits formed; and like the child in a fable, ed to the pile produces a sensible change; no single action ruins, however it may exhibit, a man's character; but as the tempest hath its origin in the breath of the mountain, and overwhelms the inhabitant and his habitation, so proceeds upon the elements of mischief, which pernicious habits have brought together for imperceptible accumulation, may overthrow the edifice of truth and virtue.

MODERN VANDALISM.

MR. MACAULAY, a few years since, uttered at Edinburgh the following remarkable observations on the Vandalism then prevalent, and not unlikely to be hereafter revived, in parts of Europe: "I remember," said he, "that Adam Smith and Gibbon had told us that there would never again be a destruction of civilization by barbarians. The food, they said, would no more return to cover the earth; and they seemed to reason justly, for they compared the immense strength of the civilized part of the world with the weakness of that part which remained savage, and asked from whence were to come those Huns, and from whence were to come those Vandals, who were again to destroy civilization? Alas! it did not occur to them that civilization itself might engender the barbarism who should destroy it. It did not occur to them that the worst heart of great capitals—in the very neighborhood of splendid palaces, and churches, and theatres, and libraries, and museums, vice and ignorance and misery might produce a race of Huns hircer than those who marched under Attila, and who were impotent on destruction than those who followed Genseric."

IDLE VISITS.

THE idle are a very heavy tax upon the industrious when, by their importunities, they rob them of their time. Such persons beg their daily happiness from door to door, as beggars their daily bread, and, like them, are importunate and full of stuff. A mere gossip ought not to wonder if we dismiss signs that, entering, he has overstayed; for we are indebted for the honor of his visit solely to the circumstance of his being tired of himself. He does not at home until he has accumulated an insupportable load of canui, and then sallies forth to distribute it among all his acquaintance.

HOME DIFFICULTIES.

THE house-mother has her troubles nye, be she never so gifted with that blessed quality of "faculty" which is to do it cheerfully. It is not pleasing for lazy ladies to get breakfast over at that regular hour they hear what is to be done in the kitchen, or going for the day; nor for unarithmetical ladies, who have always reckoned their accounts by circumference to burn that "Missis is never in time" and laugh at her complaints of their unpunctuality. Nor is it very pleasant for a sensitive mistress of invalidence of waste; "Missis never knows about any thing." She may lecture from the very highest heights and cleanliness—"Just put your head into her room and see!" For all moral qualities, good temper, truth, kindness, and above all, conscientiousness, if there are deficient in the mistress of a family, will be reflected in servants, or children, or any members of the family circle.

THE PINKS OF PROPERTY.

"THE pinks of a people," says the manly Dr. Chalmers, "are of far more worth" whom I can not bear—the pinks of fashionable propriety—whose every movement is regulated by a code of movement is unexceptionable; but who, though versed in all the categories of polite behavior, have not a particle of soul to animate their bodies. What is left but their manners may be abundantly correct, while the elegance is without the grace, and gracefulness is every position, not a genius out of place, and not a step that would not look the measure of the step that would not look the measure of the reverent sanctity. This is all very fine; but what I want is the heart and the grace. I want the benevolence that will not let a sprain ease and animation around it—the eye that speaks affinity to all. I want the countenance that is a mission, and tells every man in the company to be confident and happy." This is what I conceive to be the object of the text, and not the unmeaning formality of those who walk by rule, and would make the whole of human life to a wire-bound system of aniary and constraint.

A LITTLE DISSERTATION ON KISSING.

THE first oddity that comes in my way is a remark in a newspaper, that kissing is a salutation, because they are made of nothing, and they are sound——a very convenient thing to show-by—and the next is the definition of a "buss." Thus "buss, to kiss; rebuss, to kiss again; pluribuss, to kiss whom it pleases to term it." Now, to kiss the hand instead of the lip; blunderbuss, to kiss the wrong person; and omnibuss, to kiss the whole of the room; orbuss, to kiss in the dark. Evidently the country girl who wrote to her lover had been kissing him on her head. A young gentleman was to escort her a mile or two, and not wishing to "make conversation," he said, "Mary, this!" But Mary, blushing to the eyebrows, drew back, and, with downcast modesty, replied, "Oh, George! not right here in the street!"

CULTIVATED WOMEN.

SURELY, said, beautifully, "Women govern men; but a reader thought that they govern are enlightened, so much the more shall we be. On the cultivation of the sweet of woman depends the wisdom of men. It is by women that Nature writes on the hearts of men."

THE CRINOLINE.

WHAT does all this grumbling spirit echo from? My own conviction is that it is not at our taste in dress which is making feeling. Every day we can see their wives and children well dressed, but they can not buy pretty clothes. Every day we can see the gentlemen are in a state of looking at; but, grumble as they like, they must pay for it. It is not the crinoline that is the offender. It is the crinoline that is the subject of the clergyman, the lecturer, the leader, the rake, and the buffoon. And why all this? It can not be on the ground of cost, for the price is only 4s. 6d. for the best. It can not be on the ground of room in the theatre for a lounge. Joe pays 4s. admission for a box. Joe pays his turn for the waiter and porter, for which Charles pays 4s. Afterward they go and have some brandy, which costs 2s. 6d. And they have smoked 1s. 6d. worth of cigars during the evening. It is in this way the men spend their money, which is as much ours as theirs, if we had our rights. What they spend upon themselves out-of-doors in three or four days in this loose manner-of-course way would buy a handsome dress for me. The word "extravagance" is confined to us. Only turn the tables. If we chance to take up an illustrated paper, the same idea is pictorially brought under our eye in every variety of form. The fashionable editor of the Sunday newspaper "brings forth out of his treasure things new and old," by placing a Bible and a crinoline next to next. A lady chanced to lift her petticoat with her dress a little too high, and Mr. Punch heard the young countrymen say, "Bill, what is that?" "I don't know, unless it be fire-works!" Can any thing be more insulting? Because what we spend in dress is ours, and what the men spend is not, we are to be grumbled at, persecuted, and called extravagant. Now, I don't know what they spend upon themselves, and suppose we were to criticise them as they do us, how would they like it?

ILLUMINATION.

THE art of conversation consists in the exercise of two fine qualities. You must originate, and you must appreciate—you must possess at the same time the habit of communicating and listening. The union is rare, but beautiful.

DR. WATTS'S HYMNS.

WHEN DR. Watts was a young man and a candidate for the ministry, the congregation in which he officiated was that of Mr. Rother's family, one of whom child did not eschew all pulmonly, were obliged to go from home. During the time the collections of Stensbald, or Barton, or other like rhymesters, such as existed in that day. The collection did not belong to the standard which the devotional feeling and poetic taste of the young student's mind had long since hinted his discontent, he was challenged to produce something better. Accordingly, on a subsequent Lord's day, the service was commenced with the following stanzas, which, it is said, struck the reader with the most solemn astonishment. The hymn were doubtless encountered to, will be perused with a redoubled glow of pious and poetic exultation. This is a genuine Congregational hymn, by which pious hearts instantly welcomed it attests the peculiar and unequaled merit of Watts as a sacred oral writer:

"Behold the glories of the Lamb
Amidst his Father's throne:
Prepare new hosours for his name,
And sing his worthy praise;
Let elders worship at His feet,
The Church adore around,
With vials filled with odors sweet,
And harps of sweetest sound.
Those are the prayers of the saints,
And these the hymns they raise:
Jesus is kind to their complaints,
He loves to hear our praise.
Now to the Lamb that once was slain
Be endless honors paid;
Salvation, glory, joy, remain
Forever on Thy head.
Thou hast redeem'd our souls with blood,
Hast set the princes free;
Hast made us kings and priests to God,
And we shall reign with Thee.
The worlds of nature and of grace
Are put beneath Thy pow'r;
Then shorten Thy appointed days,
And bring the promis'd hour."

Such is the tradition, and we have no reason to question its truth. But more remarkable than the composition of the hymn is the alacrity with which it was received. Instead of "no sing" song," that they entrusted the author to repeat the service—"Hi, the next morning Sunday after Sunday, a sufficient number had been contributed to form the basis of a book.

ALPHABET OF PROVERBS

A GRAIN of prudence is worth a pound of craft.
Boasters are cousins to liars.
Cowards die many times before their last agonds.
Denying a fault doubles it.
Every thought, as God said, was wounteth herself.
Foolish fear disdains danger.
God sends meat, but the devil cooks by our own hands.
He has hard work who has nothing to do.
Idleness is the root of all evil, and the key to it lies here.
Knavery is the worst trade.
Learning makes a man fit company for himself.
Modesty is a guard to virtue.
Not to be contradicted is the way to shorten it.
One hour to-day is worth two to-morrow.
Proud knights are poor men in their faces.
Quiet conscience gives quiet sleep.
Talent is to Tact what reason is to instinct.
Small faults indicate a great thieves that let is greater.
The bought that hear most hang lowest.
Upright walking is the safest walking.
Virtue and happiness are mother and daughter.
Wit comes without expectation than they find.
You never loss by doing a good turn.
Zeal without knowledge is a runner without light.

EMBLEM OF FRIENDSHIP.

THERE with double flowers are too often the emblem of friendship—there is plenty of blossom, but no fruit.

TO A PAIR MAIDEN.

Let fops prefer whom I look at thee,
I wish I could be young and free;
But bold at once, oh! who could be?

THE CARNIVAL IN PIEDMONT.

ROME and Paris have been from time immemorial the especial seats of carnival; every one is familiar with the Roman extravagances, the gay costumes, the harum-scarum balls, which celebrate the approaching season in the capitals of ancient and modern civilization. Our engraving bears witness that other cities are now endeavoring to compete for the pre-eminence in the matter of joyeuseté in carnival time; it represents a scene in the principal street of the chief city of Piedmont—Turin.

Those of our readers who have seen Turin need not be told that the Via di Po is the Broadway of that fine city. Those who may remember that among the streets which cut the Via di Po at right angles none can compare, in point of eminence and splendor, with the Via di Porta. At the intersection of these two streets the fast men of Turin perpetrated the most audacious and successful feats we ever seen.

A timber frame-work, upward of thirty feet in diameter, rose from the gallery, or balcony, at the second story of the houses on the Via di Po, tapering upward, and bearing in form an exact resemblance to the metallic enlargements at present in favor among ladies. The circles and cross-bars of the modern hoop were mortised into the walls of the adjacent houses, and the whole fabric must have been constructed by labor and ingenuity. It was covered with a most brilliant petticoat, white, with pink flowers and garlands of green, and surmounted by the Brobdignagian effigy of a modern dignata, with an ermine mask, a voluminous cravage, and a most exquisite assortment of bonnets, the tem of the garment and the top of the balustrade on each side of the Via di Porta. It is said that it would hold 300 persons, who occupied by the contrivers of this huge burlesque, chiefly artists, who armed with their pencils and lamp-black, the bastets of bonbons to within a tantalizing distance of the mouths and noses of the promenaders below.

The exhibition took place on Dimanche Gras—a day, according to our Protestant notions, singularly selected for such a spectacle. Before daylight on that Sunday morning the upholsterers succeeded in completing their work. With the early dawn men were seen scrambling over the rafters and beams which composed the understructure of the petticoat and hoop. To them numerous artisans and flowers were hoisted up from beneath, and the ornamental portion there was subjected to hammering—horrid cruelty!—of the petticoats of the Goddess of Crinoline to her too substantial support. At an early hour in breakfast was over that of the day began. People thronged the streets; and the windows and balconies were crowded to witness the inauguration of the statue begun. The fabric, represented in our engraving, from under the lens of Mr. Mayall's photographic perfection, was extremely lively. The nibbles were numerous, but it seemed difficult to get a good bite—not an account of the shyness of the fish, but because the bait was rarely allowed to come within less than a tantalizing distance of their jaws. Numerous carriages, full of the most grotesque masks, and several extensive omnibuses, crammed inside and outside down the street, confining themselves, for the most part, to the Via di Po, which was the centre of the diversions of the day.

There seem to have been but few persons at Turin who did not join, in some way or participate in the enjoyments of the day. It is said that the King was in the midst of the revelers, disguised in a domino. A number of young people dressed as millers, with sacks full of lime beans, belonged to the fast fraternity. Numerous bands of musicians disturbed conflicts with the populous without the least fear of compromising their dignity. The editor of the leading newspaper of Turin was present in the garb of an inquisitor, with a body-guard—probably composed of printers' imps—dressed in the dress of Crouts. It is even whispered that the great diplomatist—Count Cavour—improved the occasion by his visit to share in the revelry in the cousins of Adlea, bearing, not the world, but Piedmont, on his shoulders.

For some reason or other we have never been able to realize the European carnival here. In other lands they have a season of revelry, rufflany rowdies, of foreign and native origin, that make the night a universalis wrong—a night of murders, rapes, and savage assaults. These persons have no notion of license without brutal blackguardism. Even the Roman or Parisian carnival attempted here, each of these men would commit crimes enough before the night was over, to justify his being hanged half a dozen times over. And the knowledge of the existence of such a class with such propensities effectually restrains the quiet people here from taking part in any public festivities which are not thoroughly under the control of the police.

The carnival at Paris is undoubtedly a scene of much disorder and vice. But it may well be questioned whether the vice would not occur independently of the carnival. The great mistake of society the carnival is the occasion of a general renunciation of the laws of morality and the restraints of decency. And it is to be remembered that these are not remarkable for their respect for morality at any other period of the time. For, and a much larger,than the carnival is a pleasant holiday—a season when the cares of business and the troubles of everyday life may be forgotten in gayety, frivolity, and genial society. There are many people in Paris who never have any real holiday in the course of the year—that is, during the carnival. Others, again—strict men of business, yet men of some means, do not so enslave themselves the whole year through—take their holidays at regular intervals, but never for more than most at home, when the police feign to sleep, and even the laws are quietly set aside.

Mardi Gras in Paris—who that has ever enjoyed it as Parisians do can ever forget it? The procession, in the morning, with its grotesque and good-humored followers, and the witty comments which it elicits; the jolly dinner at some cheap restaurant, with its oeufs au beurre noir and boeuf gras, and with just enough wine to exhilarate without intoxicating; the balls in the evening—first, at some grand house, where every one is primed to the muzzle with dignity and insolence, and then at some harum-scarum assembly, where every one is half fellow well met, and where the most extraordinary things may be done and said without lending to any result; the dance, with Mussard leading the orchestra, and a galop to ébranle that any luckless wight who trips has no slender chance of being trampled to death; the supper, with wit and less mots, and songs in the morning; and then the quiet hours of sleep, without headache or confusion—these are scenes which are peculiar to Paris. At all events, they seem the greatest fun of any we capacity here. Carnival thus far is an exclusively European institution.

THE MONSTER LADY OF CRINOLINE AT TURIN.

THE CULPRIT JUDGE.

A TALE OF THE BENCH AND BAR.

In one of the Western States I was once a prosecuting attorney. The settler's axe was then familiar music, and the prairies away from the woodland had not yet heard the screams of the steamwhistle. All branches of society, of trade, business, and professions were in a transition state. Of course the judges were not men of vast learning or of rare character; and, lest I appear vain, I may add, that the lawyers were by no means Chief Justice Taneys!

The Judge who traveled circuit with us in the counties round about the city of ——— had been in early life a horse-jockey, and had gained a large amount of tact, knowledge of men, and of human nature, and of circumstances that would stand him or him in his legal walk. At the West he had been a member of the first Constitutional Convention in our State, and, being a good talker and of quick natural intellect, had shone in the debates. Of course it was natural that, as he was able to be, he should claim to be able to expound it. And at the first election after the State was admitted it was chosen a Judge.

I never liked him. With all his affability and apparent kindness of manner, there was in his composition an understrata of cunning that I suspected and became wary of. He had been indicted when he should have sought my confidence, but I replied it, and, except in court, we were little together. Many times the civil side of him he gave me a favorable charge on facts, or acquiesced in my law when I felt that I was wrong. Not recalling him why he thus sought to get the winning side of me.

I suspected him of knavery. When prisoners were convicted, and he had the discretion of punishment, his sentences were oddly inconsistent. He fined when he should have imprisoned, and confined when a nominal punishment would have answered the justice of the case. But I could not get my clew, and with the populace he was regarded as a man of rare integrity and firmness of mind.

Once night, at the inn in the little village of Washington, where a court was to be held, I went to my "bunkroll of" bedroom for an afternoon nap, and was soon fast asleep, when I was aroused by a confused murmuring, that, after I was thoroughly aroused, I perceived to come from the adjoining room—one occupied by the Judge.

"He is committing his Grand Jury charge," said I to myself, "and I should a strange one—viz: 'The bootle is most used up of the old stripe.'"

Now "bootle" is a flash term used by counterfeiters, and I was attracted now by the processing attention. As I sat up on the bedside a ray of light came through a chink of the board partition. As a man, honest would have forbidden a "peep" as an officer of the law, prudence commanded it. So reasoning myself exculpatory and closely to the "wall," or the boarded separation, I looked through the "peep" and was instantly interested at a table with a sinister-looking man, who wore a pair of remarkably black whiskers; and the two were engaged quite a while in close colloquy. I listened, but not another word was spoken for some time. I saw the counterfeit bill taken from pike, and the Judge placed one in his pocket, the other remaining on the table. The man then drew off his boots, divided the third pile between each boot in the midst of it, and then again placed them on his feet. "Next the table," said "the bootle and rend it to the proper place." His sinister companion gave a reassuring nod; they shook hands; the stranger left the room cautiously; and the Judge then sat down to some papers. I continued to look for several minutes, but he appeared absorbed in his duties, when, just as I was about quitting my point (fearful a point of observation discovered), and taking out his roll of bills placed them up the chimney! and then continued his reading.

I must say my blood ran cold, for a grave suspicion had often crossed my mind that he was a fraud; but I never suspected him of being so concerned with the drawers, trappers, and traders who occasionally made bad money their commodity. Nor, as I sat collecting my thoughts, could I conceive it possible, when I remembered how severe he was often upon those he pursued as counterfeiters' money, and how earnestly and solemnly he always in his charges in such cases declaimed against the enormity of offenders who substituted a spurious currency for a good one. I therefore concluded that the word "bootle" was a counterfeiters' "cant stuffing," must relate to some other kind of offence, connected with which I now felt assured he must be.

Steadily going and carefully descended the stairs and entered the bar-room. The heavily-whiskered man was seated at a table reading the last Cincinnati paper, as calm and placid as if he were the Methodist minister of the village. I sat down, and pulling out a box-paper proceeded to read it, but I was glancing over to top at the stranger. His eye did not wander from the particular point of the paper, nor did the sheet after several minutes turn; it therefore concluded he was not reading but was reflective. I continued to catch his eye, but could not. I next thought of trying the demeanor of the "bootle," so making in my mind some excuse relating to my official duties, I again went up stairs and knocked at his door. "Come in, pleasant voice, in an unembarrassed tone, cried, "what is it?" and I entered. After getting through my excuses and business, I said, in a careless tone, "What have you been doing all the afternoon, Judge?" He answered, just as carelessly, "Going through my charge, and a decision or two I have to make on to-morrow. As yet, I have not seen any one since I arrived."

The last lie was an unnecessary one, as I knew its falsity, for he needed not to have asserted the fact—an immaterial one. This, therefore, the more confirmed my suspicions; because I had found these immaterial assertions to be always made by witnesses when they are committing perjury, just as cowards withhide to keep up their courage.

We continued chatting until the bell rang for tea, but not a tone nor an act betrayed that the Judge was troubled or uneasy. We went down stairs together and began our meal. The whiskered stranger sat opposite, but he and the Judge were to each other as if they had never met. One or two table civilities passed between them, but they were accompanied with freezing politeness, somewhat unusual in our Western way of life. All this satisfied me that the counterfeiting was of the big; and I resolved while at the table to furnish myself with some evidence. I finished the meal first, and went into the Judge's bed-room, and groping to the chimney in the dark felt for a loose brick, found it, and discovered a roll of bills. I took out one or two pieces, and replaced the balance handy and left the room.

Nothing more occurred that night worth narrating, but the next day in Court I found on the calendar the case of a man who had been indicted and held to bail for counterfeiting, and had been out on bail.

"What does this mean?" I asked of the clerk. "I did not authorize the trial, nor am I prepared with witnesses."

"Judge C——— ordered it on last term for this day," answered the clerk, "and produced your recognizance."

"My request!" stammered I.

"Yes, your name is on it," as he handed me a piece of paper bearing in my writing the words, "Give Judge C——— his request. I remembered, now I had written it when the prisoner's counsel had recall the apparently trivial circumstance which had prompted it.

Just then Judge C——— entered, and Court business began. The case in question being called, I arose to produce the book and a desk, into which he usually retired, and thither I followed him.

"Judge," said I, as I opened the pocket-like the voice of a man under severe ague, so terribly was I wrought up by the excitement of the moment, "a circumstance has come to my knowledge which bad once been hoe, answered: "Sure, honey, I never think of it. Do you know the man, or have them?" "No," replied the other. "Why," says Pat, with a look of knowing wink in his eye, "behave they're full of holes on the other side."

"Extremely ingenious," said Mr. Senebare.

That means with switch, and hard restraint, to stay a woman's will, that is disposed to go astray.

SPENSER.

Once on a time I had a humble kin'd,
Whom want was too ill-favoured to be mind'd;
Said I, "My love, I fain would kiss you ofuse.
But hang it, you've got a beard, and so have I, Sir."

Of the whole population of England and Wales in 1851, one person in 19 was named Smith, one in 76 was named one in 315 a Williams, one in 148 a Taylor, one in 182 a Brown, and one in 193 a Davis.

If wine be poison, so is tea, but in another shape, What matter whether one be killed by cognac or pogue.

It is said that the Baron Rothschild, on the first day of peace, dared not touch what they supposed were true bonding—till the next, and that he ascribed his forbearance, the first time they seized on a quantity of gunpowder, to the fact that he had been "under fire" before, expecting to reap a plentiful crop of combustion by the following day—which he done away five hundred.

The following is the title of a pamphlet, in verse, written for benefit of the Rev. Mr. Spurgeon's fund, and the Pipes shattered content their cure who idly listens to bass and baritone—"Lord, by a valley of the shadow of death Saved from Mount Helicon." It is, perhaps, the earliest book ever published in Greenland.

To succeed, a man must be steady. A mechanic, or artizan, who is invariably making holidays, festivals, and saint days, cannot be a successful man. He will soon become a drunkard, and be ruined. Steadiness is the sure credit and character; the spender distresses the vision and the heart—the steady winner hears no curses from over lawyer and lower, subsisting on accidental jobs and precarious meals. Steadiness, or industry, follows the same course, and sinks into a similar condition. He leads a life of dull, monotonous labor, and a dawdling waste of the money he started with soon vanishes, paper takes the place of bullion, and embarrassment finally ends in ruin, in a bankruptcy court.

Chief-Justice Pakefield, as he was commonly called, was a native of Ireland, and had left it in Warren and Mississippi. On one occasion some mischievous boys had thrown Tiger Bone him, charged with theft, to the dog of John Fleicherson, by pulling turpentine on his tail. The judgment of the Court was set forth in the following entry: "The evidence in this case having been heard, and the Court being satisfied that neither of the premises, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the defendants be fined in the sum of three dollars each, and that they severally enter into recognizance, in the sum of three hundred dollars each, with good and sufficient sureties, for the good dogs of the State of Mississippi, and especially toward the dog of the said Fleicherson."

A writer, deficient in personal beauty, said to Sheridan, "I wish I could withdraw my countenance." "Do!" "Many thanks for the favor, Sir," replied the confidant, "but I'll be hanged if I can afford it."

A printer out in Arkansas, whose office is ten miles from any other building, and who has only one style of handbill of a tree, advertises for an apprentice. He says: "Any boy from the country preferred."

"Mr. President," said a member of a school committee out West, "I rise to get up, and am not backward in come forward in the course of education." "Sit down, Sir," for elfinction, I might have been as ignorant as yourself, replied President.

A lady made a complaint to Frederick the Great, King of Prussia, "Your Majesty," said she, "my husband treats me badly." "That is one of my business," replied the King. "Then I will speak ill of him." "Ah the lady, "That," replied he, "is none of your business."

Old Jerry Dowse, out in California, was reuting the other day, when a neighbor called to see him. In the course of the conversation, neighbour Clark threw out a feeler on the pipline, and it was feared that the emigrants would not like it. "Don't you know?" said Jerry. "No." "Well, I'll tell you. You don't know? Don't you know? Then, and received from each a negative answer. "Well, I'll tell you. Because they're a mighty uncommon a growling and a grabber, and is very bad on grass."

"Have more than thou showest;
Speak less than thou knowest."

Once on a time I had a humble kin'd,
Whom want was too ill-favoured to be mind'd;
Said I, "My love, I fain would kiss you ofuse.
But hang it, you've got a beard, and so have I, Sir."

Of the whole population of England and Wales in 1851, one person in 19 was named Smith, one in 76 was named one in 315 a Williams, one in 148 a Taylor, one in 182 a Brown, and one in 193 a Davis.

If wine be poison, so is tea, but in another shape, What matter whether one be killed by cognac or pogue.

It is said that the Baron Rothschild, on the first day of peace, dared not touch what they supposed were true bonding—till the next, and that he ascribed his forbearance, the first time they seized on a quantity of gunpowder, to the fact that he had been "under fire" before, expecting to reap a plentiful crop of combustion by the following day—which he done away five hundred.

The following is the title of a pamphlet, in verse, written for benefit of the Rev. Mr. Spurgeon's fund, and the Pipes shattered content their cure who idly listens to bass and baritone—"Lord, by a valley of the shadow of death Saved from Mount Helicon." It is, perhaps, the earliest book ever published in Greenland.

To succeed, a man must be steady. A mechanic, or artizan, who is invariably making holidays, festivals, and saint days, cannot be a successful man. He will soon become a drunkard, and be ruined. Steadiness is the sure credit and character; the spender distresses the vision and the heart—the steady winner hears no curses from over lawyer and lower, subsisting on accidental jobs and precarious meals. Steadiness, or industry, follows the same course, and sinks into a similar condition. He leads a life of dull, monotonous labor, and a dawdling waste of the money he started with soon vanishes, paper takes the place of bullion, and embarrassment finally ends in ruin, in a bankruptcy court.

A man with knowledge, but without energy, is a house with windows, but without doors. A man with energy, but no knowledge, a house dwelt in, but unfurnished.

RECONCILIATION.

"Is that Ethel still out, Yesterday!

I've an idea what O'clock.

Johnnie Gray!

I only know the sun shines bright,
Though yesterday he dead and gone,
And through the fields I feel delight
The light comes dancing as before—
Johnnie Gray!

The evening follow'd glowing noon,
And driving clouds obscured the moon—
Johnnie Gray!
But night is past, and morn is here—
The fields are greener, and the air is clear,
The rose and lily gleam with dew—
Johnnie Gray!

Few things are more injurious to a horse than late hours. It is by no means necessary to stay until the small hours at night, in order to accustom a steeplechase to leave at a reasonable time. Dr. Kitchener always hung up in the stable-door opposite the horse's head the following celebrated Tuesday evening conversazione, "At seven o'clock, a clergy."

It is a popular fallacy to think that you can make pork out of pig-iron, or that you can become a shoemaker by drinking shorty-cobblers.

An old toper, after indulging quite freely in his accustomed beverage, amused himself in mounting a revolutionary horse. The animal suddenly reared, and the toper found himself unseated in a most pitiful plight. Gathering himself up cautiously as his situation would allow, he shook his fist at the horse, and said, "You wise animal, did you see me kick that 'ere boss?" "Why, no, dad, the boss kicked you." "Kicked me, did he? Dog on 'im! I'm glad he's totally busted. Third one, there's four!"

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRIDAY EVENING, Monday, March 29, 1858.

THE foreign trade of the port for the past week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Mar. 27, 1858	$3,503,851	$1,155,764
Corresponding week, 1857	4,567,659	1,954,940
Decrease	$1,063,808	$799,176

The export of specie was very small, only $53,120. The amount in Bank and Sub-treasury, including the California section of the latter, can not be less than $40,000,000.

Money is as plentiful as ever; indeed, the demand from the stock-brokers having fallen off, in consequence of the failure of the Stock Exchange, the supply appears more embarrassed than they have been to use their means. Exchange on England rose a trifle to 107¼, at which rate it would pay to import specie into this country from Europe.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, March 29, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets during the past week have been rather quiet for Flour and Wheat, but pretty brisk for Corn, which has ruled steadily in favor of buyers, and Corn, though a shade higher than a week ago, is excited downward. Other kinds of Breadstuffs were depressed and heavy. The receipts were small in value, in view of the partial resumption of internal navigation, receivers were free sellers, ... and stocks in all cases were less extensive, and the market closed irregularly . . . . Provisions were in fair request, and prices did not vary remarkably. . . . The transactions in Coffee, Teas, and Molasses have maintained a fair degree of activity, and has been done. Prices of Sugars slightly declined.

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT OF PRODUCTS AT WASHINGTON MARKET.

Apples, per barrel	$2 75 @	$4 50
Apples, dried, per pound	6 @	7½
Peaches, cured, per pound	12 @	13
Plums, dried, per pound	10 @	10
Hickory Nuts, per bushel	1 00 @	2 75
Chestnuts, per bushel	2 00 @	2 25
Peanuts, per bag	1 50 @	1 75
Cranberries, per barrel	14 00 @	15 00
Potatoes, per bushel	1 00 @	1 50
" per bushel	1 00 @	1 50
Onions, per barrel	3 00 @	3 50
Cabbages, per dozen	1 00 @	2 00
Turnips, per bushel	62 @	87
Beets, per bushel	50 @
Cabbages, per 100	4 00 @	6 00
Parsnips, per bushel	75 @
Carrots, per barrel	1 75 @
Leeks, per 100 bunches	4 00 @
Celery, per dozen	1 75 @	1 50
Garlic, per lb	25 @
Eggs, Limed, per dozen	8 @	10
Eggs, Fresh, per dozen	12 @	14
Chickens, per pound	11 @	13
Fowls, per pound	10 @	12
Guinea Fowl, per pair	50 @	62
Ducks, per pair	75 @	1 00
" per pair	1 00 @	1 25
Turkeys, per pound	15 @	18
Geese, per pound	9 @	10
Pigeons, per dozen	1 75 @	1 50
Prairie Hens, per pair	62 @	75
Partridge, per pair	62 @	75
Quail, per pair	50 @	62
Hunting Pigs	1 25 @	1 50
Rabbits, per pair	25 @	25
Hares, per pair	31 @	44
Sparrows, per dozen	8 @	10
Venison, per pound	8 @	13

ADVERTISEMENTS.

SARTAROE! SARTAROE!! SARTAROE!!!

EVERY BODY IS READING IT,
AND ALL ARE PRAISING IT.
WASHINGTON IRVING HAS RECOMMENDED IT HIGHLY.

SARTAROE: A TALE OF NORWAY.
By J. A. MAITLAND,
Author of "The Watchman," "The Wanderer," "The Diary of an Old Doctor," "The Lawyer's Story," &c

Complete in one volume, neatly bound in cloth, for One Dollar and Twenty-five Cents; or in two volumes paper cover, for One Dollar.

Read what the ILLUSTRIOUS WASHINGTON IRVING says of it.

SUNNYSIDE, Dec. 12th, 1857.

I have repeatedly, through the press, given a general apology for a want of promptness in my replies to my almost innumerable correspondents. The literary tasks on which I am engaged, increase all the more rapidly as I can devote to the pen as my advanced period of life, so that I find it impossible to cope with the mass of letters with which overwhelms me.

I read your work with interest and satisfaction. It is written in a good style, is graphic in its details, and gives animated and interesting pictures of scenery, manners, and characters in Norway. Different members of my family have derived both pleasure and information from the perusal of it. I think, therefore, that it will prove a successful publication, and that you will be encouraged to pursue your literary career.

Wishing you a prosperous career,

I remain yours very respectfully,
WASHINGTON IRVING.

J. A. MAITLAND, N. Y.

Published this day, and for sale at retail or wholesale, at T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS',
No. 306 CHESTNUT STREET, Philadelphia.

The ORIGINAL of the above LETTER, in Mr. Irving's own hand-writing, can be seen by calling at PETERSON'S.

☞ Copies sent per mail, free of postage, on receipt of price.

F. DERBY & COMPANY
Will exhibit their first delivery of
NEW SPRING GOODS
for gentlemen's clothing,
FROM MONDAY, MARCH 29.
Not often equaled by the display of former years, and at economical prices.
57 Walker Street,
near Broadway.

A WORD OF ADVICE.—When you are sick, you should use Brandreth's Pills. Read advice of Dr. Maxwell and Dr. Lull, to be had at Dr. Brandreth's office gratis. Thousands who die might live if Brandreth's Pills were used in time and moderation. Principal office 293 Canal Street. Sold also at 196 Bowery, corner of Houston Street, 112 Bleecker Street, 241 Seventh Avenue, 377 Broadway, corner of Canal Street, 175 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, and 124 South Sixth Street, Williamsburgh.

THE REASON WHY!
A CAREFUL COLLECTION
OF
THOUSANDS OF REASONS
For things which are daily occurring around us, are impartially understood.
A book of CONDENSED SCIENTIFIC KNOWLEDGE for the MILLION. By the Author of "UNCURRENT THEORIES."
It is a handsome 12mo volume of 250 pages, printed on fine paper, bound in cloth, gilt, and embellished with a large number of WOOD-CUTS, illustrating the various subjects treated of. . . . Sent by mail, postage paid, to any address, free of postage.
The Philosophy, Cause and solution of THIRTEEN THOUSAND Matters of Facts in Nature's Arcana, Phenomena, some of which, on their first discovery, have startled the world, and others, though less, from seeming to be of the most unfathomable, when we inform the reader that the INDEX OF CURIOSITY RECQUIRING FORTY COLUMNS OF FINE TYPE.
PUBLISHED BY FOWLER AND WELLS,
No. 15 AMOS STREET, NEW YORK.
Also, for sale by all Booksellers in the country.
Copies of the above book sent by mail, on receipt of $1, to any Address, free of postage.
RELIABLE AGENTS WANTED to canvass for "THE REASON WHY," and "UNCURRENT THEORIES." Address to the PUBLISHERS.

UNIFORM WITH DOCTOR ANTONIO.
Just Published from the London Edition,
LOVE AND INTELLECT.
A volume by EUSTACE, Author of "Doctor Antonio" and "Lucretia Borgia." With many spirited illustrations, by John Leech, of the London Punch. Thus, elegantly printed, uniform with the rest of Mr. Ruffini's other works. Price $1.

Opinions of the London Athenæum.

"The style is crisp and sparkling, and there is an air of refinement about the whole which is very pleasing, and which gives it a crowning grace. It is full of humor, and the illustrations by Leech are capital."

Sold by Booksellers every where.
The above work will be sent by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price, $1.
RUFFINI'S DOCTOR ANTONIO.
Ruffini's Beatrice, No. 110 Broadway, New York.

GIFT BOOKS! GIFTS!
A Gift, worth from 25 cents to $100, delivered with every Book at time of sale.
Our new Catalogue of Books embraces all the Standard Works of the day in every department of Literature.
Our Gift Enterprise is unequaled by any Concern to Agents, and also a full explanation of our business, mailed Free to all who send their address.
EVANS & CO.,
439 Broadway, New York City.

A PRIZE for EVERYBODY who subscribes FOR THE
NEW YORK DAILY PRESS,
A BEAUTIFULLY
ILLUSTRATED
FAMILY NEWSPAPER.
THE NEW YORK DAILY PRESS is the organ in one of the largest and best literary papers of the day, the SATURDAY EVENING POST, and is edited by the STAFF of that PAPER. It is ably conducted, RELIABLE, and BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED every week.
THE DAILY PRESS will be sent to subscribers for the following terms:

1 Year	$6 00
6 Months	3 00
3 Months	1 50

Single copies, 4 cents.
The Prizes to be distributed are comprised in the following list:

1 United States Treasury Note	$1,000
2 United States Treasury Notes	500 00 each.
5 United States Treasury Notes	100 00 each.
10 United States Treasury Notes	100 00 each.
10 Patent Lever Hunting-case Watches	100 00 each.
10 Gold Watches	75 00 each.
20 Gold Watches	50 00 each.
30 Gold Watches	40 00 each.
100 Gold Watches	25 00 each.
500 Ladies' Gold Watches	15 00 each.
1,000 Gold Pencil Case Watches	10 00 @ 12 50 each.
1,000 Gold Guard, Vest, and Fob Chains	5 00 each.
1,000 Gold Pens and Pencils	5 00 to 15 00 each.

Gold Lockets, Bracelets, Ear-rings, Breast-Pins, Cuff-Pins, Sleeve Buttons, Rings, Shirt Studs, Gold Keys, Gold and Silver Thimbles, and a variety of other articles worth from 50 cents to $15 each.
The distribution of the above, in the presence of the public, the subscriber's name will be entered on our subscription books, and a ticket with a number corresponding with that number will be forwarded, within one week, to the subscriber, by mail or express, post-paid.
All communications should be addressed to
DANIEL ADEE, Publisher, No. 111 Centre Street, N. Y.

PRIVATE INSTITUTION FOR IMBECILE CHILDREN.—Parents and guardians of mental peculiarities prevent their education under the control of competent teachers.
The Institution is now in operation for years, and merits the attention of all interested in the welfare and education of unfortunate children. Address
GEO. BROWN, M.D., Superintendent, Barre, Mass.

GROVER & BAKER'S
CELEBRATED
FAMILY SEWING MACHINES,
495 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
AND
18 SUMMER STREET, BOSTON,
730 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

☞ These Machines are justly admitted to be the best in the market for family sewing.

LECTURES IN THE FRENCH LANGUAGE,
AT
THE SPINGLER INSTITUTE,
UNION SQUARE.
A COURSE OF FOUR LECTURES
WILL BE DELIVERED ON THE EVENING OF EACH WEEK, AT EIGHT O'CLOCK P.M., BY
PROF. ELIE CHARLIER,
Director of the French Institute for Young Gentlemen,
No. 46 East Twenty-fourth Street.

SUBJECTS

MARCH 18TH,	MAN'S BE STAR.
" 25TH,	CHATEAUBRIAND.
APRIL 1ST,	MADE BIBLE DE GIRARDIN.
" 8TH,	GENIUS.

Course Tickets, $1 50; Single Tickets, 50 cents.
To be had at Lockwood's, 411 Broadway, and at Christern's, 793 Broadway.

CAUTION.

LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS IN AFRICA

THE attention of MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS has been called to several spurious Works put forth as the "NARRATIVE OF DR. LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS IN AFRICA." One of these is a gross forgery throughout. It does not contain a single line written or furnished by DR. LIVINGSTONE, bears no resemblance whatever to his genuine Narrative, but is altogether the invention of the fabricator. Another book professes to give, "in the language of Dr. Livingstone," a "complete account of his various journeys, researches, only incidental details and scientific matter." These "incidental details" which are omitted form more than one half of the matter in the genuine edition, embracing the most valuable part of the book, nearly all of the characteristic illustrations, and the elaborate Maps, which are essential to a full understanding of the explorations and travels of the Author. This work, in fact, is a compilation, and has been supplied by course scoundrel hand cuts, bearing no relation whatever to Dr. Livingstone's Book. The cheapest edition is designed mainly for circulation through the "Gift-Book" scheme of the publisher, although it is understood that respectable members of the Trade have purchased it, supposing it to be a genuine, unmutilated edition.

MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS respectfully caution the Trade and the Public against being imposed upon by these forged and mutilated Works.

The only genuine unmutilated American edition of Dr. Livingstone's Work is that published by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS, printed from an early copy purchased for a large sum from the Author. It contains 754 pages, large octavo, with a Portrait of the Author engraved upon Steel; two elaborate Steel Plate Maps, with Routes colored, and Forty-five large Wood-cuts, engraved in the highest style of the Art. The volume is beautifully printed and substantially bound. Price Three Dollars.

TO PERSONS IN THE COUNTRY.

MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS will send a copy of LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, upon the receipt of Three Dollars.

TO ADVERTISERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A MAGNIFICENTLY ILLUSTRATED PAPER,
CIRCULATING IN EVERY SECTION OF THE UNION,
Offers unusual inducements to those who desire to bring their business prominently before the community.

1. Only a limited space is devoted to Advertisements.
2. The character and diffusion of the circulation are unequaled.
3. The Paper is generally preserved for Binding.
4. The Advertising Pages are rendered attractive, and can not escape the observation of any reader.
5. None but the most respectable class of Advertisements are admitted.

The Terms of Charges are not at large, proportionally, as those of any other Weekly or Daily Paper.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to advertise in three Numbers or more.

TERMS.—Fifty Cents a Line.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

EGYPT AND PALESTINE, Illustrated by 77 brilliant Photographs, by F. FRITH, JR. Three hundred copies of these splendid photographs have been obtained, of the rare and beauty of form, with unobtainable excellence of light and shade, and in addition there will be given, in each part, a large and beautiful photographic view, nine inches by seven. Every view will be accompanied by a short letter-press, written by the Author. Subscriptions received by E. FRENCH, 439 Broadway, and by Booksellers generally. PUBLISHED BY VIRTUE, EMMINS & CO., 26 John Street, New York.

DIESSE & LUBIN'S FRANGIPANNI. Extract and Perfume from the Flower. The Perfume, Soap, Sachet, Incense, Pomade. Exquisite in fragrance.
DUFUY, Chemist and Importer, 630 Broadway.
Sold also by the principal druggists in the City.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.—With will speedily purify the blood, remove all unhealthy humors, and restore perfect health to the vitality of blood and constitution.
Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 Fulton Street, New York.

"CONSTARS' RAT, ROACH, &c., EXTERMINATOR!
"CONSTARS' BED BUG EXTERMINATOR!
"CONSTARS' ELECTRIC POWDER!
(The GREAT VEGETABLE REMEDIES known.)
☞ Sold by all Druggists and Dealers every where, at wholesale by the Proprietor, and at private circular to Druggists.
When known, and a test is desired.
☞ On RECEIPT OF ONE DOLLAR, Constar will send, postage paid, to any address in the U. S., a sufficient quantity to destroy all the vermin on any premises.
☞ Address as before to
CONSTAR'S PRINCIPAL DEPOT,
No. 1 Barclay Street, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER,
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE COPIES A NUMBER: $5 00 A YEAR.

BULWER'S BRILLIANT ROMANCE, entitled "THE CAXTONS: A FAMILY PICTURE," presented in the masterpiece of this polished, witty, and learned novelist, by special arrangement with the Author, appears in HARPER'S WEEKLY simultaneously with its publication in England.

TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.
One Copy for One Year $2 00
Two Copies for One Year 3 00
Three or More Copies for One Year (each) 2 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Five Subscribers.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.
One Copy for Twenty Weeks $1 00
One Copy for One Year 2 50
Five Copy for Two Years 4 00
One Copy for One Year 2 00
Twelve Copies for One Year 20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 40 00
An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Twenty or Twenty-five Subscribers.

 Persons living in the City of New York wishing to Harper's Weekly left at their houses, will please send their names to the publication office, or to the Carrier in charge of their district.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

THE REAL APRIL FOOLS—THE SUBSCRIBERS TO GIFT ENTERPRISES.—(The reader will admire the admirable intellectuality of the faces.)

1. HOW THE NEW YORK MERCHANTS RECEIVED THEIR COUNTRY CUSTOMERS LAST YEAR.

2. HOW THEY RECEIVE THEM THIS YEAR.

MR. JONES'S MOTHER-IN-LAW, ON THE OCCASION OF THE BIRTH OF HER GRANDSON, COMES TO SPEND A COUPLE OF DAYS OR SO WITH HER SON-IN-LAW.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

TO SOUTHERN AND WESTERN MERCHANTS.

WM. BUCHANAN MACKENZIE is now exhibiting, in his spacious Millinery Rooms, a most superb collection of choice PARIS BONNETS, among which are several of very rare design and quality.

WM. B. MACKENZIE,
294 & 296 Canal street, Granderis Building

FAMILY SEWING MACHINE DEPOT.
FIFTEEN and FIFTY dollars
SEWING MACHINES.

The FIFTEEN DOLLAR Sewing Machine is the best cheap machine ever offered to the Public. Fifteen minutes only required to learn to operate upon it. The FIFTY Dollar Machine is warranted to excel all other family sewing machines. We challenge the world to produce its equal!
THOMAS & CO., 405 Broadway, N. Y.
☞ Agents wanted to sell the $15 machine.

HOUSEHOLD WORDS.
A MAGAZINE
CONDUCTED BY CHARLES DICKENS,
Author of "Pickwick Papers," "Oliver Twist," "Martin Chuzzlewit," &c., &c.

Published by the Subscribers in monthly parts, from the advance sheets, under sanction of the London publishers, and by special arrangement with them.

"Household Words" is not below the best literary production now published. Each monthly number contains Original Articles by some of the most eminent of modern writers. Among the Contributors to its columns are

CHARLES DICKENS, MRS. GASKELL, LEIGH HUNT, AND and a host of others of equal celebrity.

Every article published in "Household Words" is Original.

Terms $3 a year, strictly in advance, with a beautiful present to every yearly subscriber.

Circulars sent, post-paid, on application.
Address JANSEN & CO.
139 Nassau Street, New York.

HAIR THAT IS DRY,

☞ Hard, and Stiff, may be rendered soft and exceedingly flexible, by the application of BURNETT'S COCOAINE. For dressing the hair and promoting its healthy growth, it is unrivaled. For sale by all druggists.

MYSTIC HALL SEMINARY FOR YOUNG LADIES, 5 miles from Boston. Calisthenics, Horseback Riding, Salt-water Bathing, &c. For Catalogue, address MRS. T. D. SMITH, Principal, Boston, Mass.

PHELAN'S BILLIARD TABLES AND COMBINATION CUSHIONS
SALE ROOM 704 and 706 BROADWAY,
MANUFACTORY 45 AND STEERS, N. Y.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.
For all manufacturing purposes SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES are deemed indispensable. The public limit upon having their clothing, &c., made by them. SINGER'S FAMILY SEWING MACHINE is the latest presented for competition, and being arranged with full knowledge of the defects of other machines for similar uses, has avoided or remedied them all. It is the handsomest Sewing Machine ever made, and the easiest to learn to operate. Using one of these machines is an elegant amusement. Price $100, with iron table complete.
I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway, New York.

KISS-ME-QUICK. Exquisite Perfume, distilled from fragrant flowers.
E. DUPUY, Druggist and Importer, 202 Broadway.

WHEELER & WILSON MF'G CO'S
SEWING MACHINES,
OFFICE 343 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
Agencies throughout the Union.

Send for a Circular.

We prefer them for family use.—Tribune.
They are the favorites for families.—Times.
The machine for family use.—Advocate & Journal.
We can not imagine any thing more perfect.—Transcript.
Will give entire satisfaction.—Observer.
The best ever invented.—Christian Inquirer.
In looking for the best for these purposes, we would advise it with confidence.—Chronicle.
We advise it with enthusiasm.—Christian Intelligencer.
Worthy of the highest award.—Sabbath Recorder.

BURNETT'S COCOAINE.

☞ A compound of Cocoanut Oil, &c., for dressing the Hair. For efficacy and agreeableness, it is without a rival.

It prevents the hair from falling off.
It promotes its healthy and vigorous growth.
It is not greasy or sticky.
It leaves no disagreeable odor.
It softens the hair when hard and dry.
It soothes the irritated scalp skin.
It affords the richest lustre.
It remains insensible to effort.
It costs fifty cents for a half pint bottle.

A single application renders the hair one number how still and dry soft and glossy for several days. It is unrivaled by all articles used or to be thought of and cheapest Hair Dressing in the World. Prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston. For sale by all druggists.

$150 WILL PAY FOR BOARD AND TUITION in the FLUSHING FEMALE COLLEGE one year. Address Rev. WILLIAM H. GILDER, A.M., President, at Flushing, Long Island.

PHONOGRAPHY; OR, PHONETIC SHORTHAND. For Alphabet, Specimen Pages of the Phonographic Magazine, and List of Works (free), address ISAAC PITMAN, Cincinnati, O.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. II.—No. 67.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 10, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

CONTENTS.

I. HON. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, WITH A FINE PORTRAIT.
II. LECTHIAIR
III. THE LOUISIANS.
IV. MURAND AND THE PARIS MARCED BAKER, WITH A SPIRITED ILLUSTRATION AND A PORTRAIT OF MURAND.
V. LITERARY.
VI. DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.
VII. FOREIGN NEWS.
VIII. WASHINGTON FROM A MOHAMMEDAN POINT OF VIEW (BY A CONSCIENT MEMBER OF THE TURKISH ADMIRAL'S SUITE). WITH SEVEN FINE ILLUSTRATIONS.
IX. LOVE'S CURE.
X. A STRANGE STORY OF A THIEF, BY CHARLES READE.
XI. BELWER'S GREAT STORY "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?"—CONCLUDED.
XII. TRAVEL NOTES IN BIBLE LANDS, WITH TWO FINE ILLUSTRATIONS.
XIII. MISCELLANY.
XIV. THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.
XV. MARKET AND FINANCIAL REPORTS.
XVI. CONFIDANTES.

HON. ALEX. H. STEPHENS, OF GEORGIA.

ONE of the ablest and the oldest members of the House of Representatives, and decidedly the most remarkable in personal appearance, is Alexander Hamilton Stephens, who represents the eighth Congressional district of Georgia, which comprises the City of Augusta and the fertile region about it. He was named Alexander after his grandfather, who served in the celebrated force defeated under Braddock, and afterward in the campaigns of the Revolution with the troops from Pennsylvania, where he resided, and from whence he removed to Georgia in 1783; and Hamilton after a favorite preacher who was much beloved in that State. His father, Andrew B. Stephens, was a planter of moderate means and industrious habits; his mother (Margaret Grier) was a sister to the famous compiler of Grier's Almanacs, as celebrated at the South as were those of Thomas at the North. His mother died when he was an infant, leaving him with four brothers and one sister, of whom only one brother now survives.

Mr. Stephens was born on the 11th of February, 1812, on his father's plantation at Tallisferro, near Crawfordville, in Tallisferro [pronounced Tolliver] County, Georgia. When in his fourteenth year his father died, and the homestead was sold, his portion of the entire estate being about five hundred dollars. With a commendable Anglo-Saxon love of his ancestral acres rarely witnessed on this continent, Mr. Stephens has since re-purchased the original estate, which comprised about two hundred and fifty acres, and has added to it about six hundred. Here he resides, and all his affections are centred at this rural and life-cherished home.

After the death of his father good friends offered to give young Stephens a classical education, and he accepted their aid, but only on condition that the money advanced should be considered a loan. In nine months he completed his preparatory studies, and entered the University of Georgia, at Athens, in 1828. He had little taste for any study except the Latin classics, but applied himself with such diligence that he graduated in 1832 at the head of his class. His health had been seriously impaired, but he immediately commenced teaching a public school at Madison, by which, with subsequent employment as a private tutor, he earned sufficient money to repay in full the sums advanced by his friends to defray his collegiate expenses. Then, in the hope of recruiting his health, he made a tour on horseback through the picturesque mountain region of Georgia, which the pen and the pencil of Mr. Richards have so admirably illustrated.

In May, 1834, Mr. Stephens commenced the study of law in his native town, without the aid of any teacher. His health was miserable, yet he struggled forward, was admitted to the bar, and in less than twelve months was engaged in the most important cases in the county. His eloquence had a powerful effect upon the juries which he addressed, enforcing as it did arguments of admirable simplicity, legal weight, and perspicuous exhibition of fact—showing a mind deeply imbued with the science of his profession. Few, if any, members of the Georgia bar have exhibited talent of a higher order, a genius of more vigor, a legal acumen of deeper investigation.

In 1836, while dangerously ill with congestive fever, Mr. Stephens was elected a member of the Georgia Legislature, in the lower branch of which he served in 1837, '38, '39, and '40. His forensic talents and sound judgment soon gave him weight and influence in that body. Among his first, if not his very first effort, was a successful championship of the Georgia Railroad, against which there was a powerful opposition, but which all citizens of that State now acknowledge was the first step toward the prosperity and influence she now enjoys. In 1841 he positively declined a re-election, wishing, if possible, to obtain health.

In 1842 he was persuaded to accept a seat in the State Senate, where he again distinguished himself both in debate and in the unostentatious but most important task of forwarding the public business. It is rare that a public man possessing a high order of oratorical talent has those habits of indefatigable application and persevering industry so necessary in the committee-room; yet in Mr. Stephens these great and useful qualities are admirably harmonized. A matter intrusted to his care, either officially or by friends, is always carefully examined and never neglected.

In 1843 Mr. Stephens was, without his knowledge, nominated as a candidate for Congress, to fill a vacancy. He "took the stump," and, after a most exciting political contest, was elected. The House of Representatives was then generally graced by gentlemen of unquestionable honesty, finished education, and statesmanlike ability, and among these Mr. Stephens soon became prominent. He was a member of the Whig party in its palmy days, and his speeches at home carried the State. Nor was he ever backward in attending conventions and meetings in other parts of the country when his health permitted him to gratify the earnest invitations extended him.

Since the dissolution of the Whig party Mr. Stephens has acted in the House with the "Men of the South;" but the constitutional light of his powerful mind shines brightly among the disorganizing spirits around him and commands respect. In the present era of faction, selfishness, or suspicion, no one has whispered an accusation of selfish motives, sordid purposes, or disgusting intrigues against Mr. Stephens. He has served prominently on the most important committees, and effected the passage of the Nebraska Bill through the House when even the warmest friends of the measure despaired of accomplishing that end. The opponents of the act were endeavoring to defeat it by continuing the debate until the expiration of the session, and they would have succeeded had not Mr. Stephens moved to strike out the enacting clause, and thus shut off debate. This parliamentary achievement gave Mr. Stephens a high reputation as a successful "tactician," and the Administration was, doubtless, well pleased at his appointment as chairman of the present Committee on Territories, and subsequently as chairman of the special committee to which the Lecompton Constitution was referred.

Mr. Stephens is most distinguished as an orator, although he certainly does not look like one who can command the attention of the House at any time, on any topic, and so long as he may desire to speak. His health, as we have previously remarked, is very feeble—indeed, he has been, apparently, at death's door since childhood, having been afflicted with four abscesses, and a continued derangement of the liver, which gives him a consumptive appearance, although his lungs are sound. He has never weighed over ninety-six pounds; and to see his attenuated figure bent over his desk—the shoulders contracted, and the shape of his slender limbs visible through his garments—a stranger would never select him as the "John Bunch-ish" of our time, more dreaded as an adversary, and more prized as an ally in debate, than any other man in the national House of Representatives.

The style of Mr. Stephens's oratory is decidedly florid, with occasional bursts of keen satire and scintillations of brilliant wit as he passes, meteor-like, from topic to topic—building up his solid argument step by step. Every point has been so carefully studied that no trace of study is perceptible as he dashes along, apparently discovering (by a glance so rapid as to seem intuition) new views of the subject which common capacities struggle laboriously to comprehend; and he brings forward those which favor his cause in so strong a light that the gorgeous illumination of his rhetoric casts unfavorable truths into a shadow of oblivion. Above all, he never allows his position to delay public business by making a speech merely for effect at home—satisfied, probably, that his constituents know well that he will not only faithfully represent their wants and their wishes, but will worthily set his part in advancing the prosperity of this glorious confederacy of States.

HON. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, OF GEORGIA.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

Mr. Stephens is a most amiable, agreeable gentleman, possessing refined tastes, and (although a bachelor) fond of social enjoyment. He is a most devoted friend, ever ready to serve those whom he considers worthy of his powerful support, and never cherishing resentment. Above all, he possesses what Bulwer terms "the heart which kindles and refurnish—its sense counts revive—an enlightened Christian virtue and intelligent piety." Those who are led by sectional prejudices to think that he has often gone astray in political opinion will only to know him to be proud of his personal friendship.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 10, 1858.

THE RUMORS OF WAR BETWEEN ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

THE week has been enlivened by rumors of a war between England and France. The New York Herald, in a series of elaborate articles, has argued that it is Napoleon's best policy to quarrel with England, in order to retain the affection of the anti-English military and agricultural classes of France; and the money collected of the latter, and the news in the London Commercial Advertiser of this city, has not only predicted a war between the Allies, but with less sagacity than might have been expected from one so experienced, has actually fixed the period at which the first outbreak of hostilities might be expected to occur. Six months must pass the Interval of peace which the money editor at first conceded to the world; on second thoughts he changed his mind, and with English inconsistency sustained the maritime powers of Europe to go to war in sixty days.

Even admitting the general ingenuity of the arguments put forth in the New York Herald, there is absolutely no ground whatever for entering at the moment which that print puts forth. The first essential requisite for a war between England and France—and there is such a thing, indeed, sine qua non belli—nothing like one. There is no clear, well-defined issue of any kind between the two governments. Even the risks for nothing which England does not concede; England, it need not be said, has no demands to urge. On the contrary, of the measures and the indignation naturally caused by the atrocious attempt of the Rue Lepelletier, the ministers of the Emperor of the French have spoken in terms of Gallic emphasis their surprise that the laws of England did not repress conspiracies which have their lurking-places and in attempts upon the Emperor's life. The demand which was simultaneous with very horrible instances of dictation on the part of the French to the governments of Belgium, Switzerland, and Piedmont, roused a manly feeling of indignance on the part of the English, which is represented it, and demanded explanations. Those explanations have been tendered in the most candid manner by the French Government; the Emperor has withdrawn his demand, and left the minister regardless of the matter of the "loyalty of the English people." Thus the matter stands; and even a Calipso could not here discover the least basis for a quarrel.

More than this, passing over the frothy verbiage of the press, we have substantial evidence of the mind of both these countries. The commercial classes in both countries for a maintenance of the alliance. The British Army and Navy Club, headed by the corps of a second son of the Punch had been sent under cover of the Club envelopes to the French Colonels, have offered a reward of fifty pounds for the capture of the author of the outrage. The Frenchman Bernard, very slenderly tainted with suspicion of being connected in this last conspiracy, has been arrested in London, and held for trial. M. de Persigny, one of Napoleon's oldest friends and closest counsellors, has seized this opportunity to draw still closer the ties which bind him to England. The Emperor of the French has sent a note to aid the English in their quarrel—with which the French have nothing to do—against China. Lord Stanley is growing so fat as may be regarded as one of the leading minds in the new Ministry, declares emphatically, in his late address to his constituents, that, regarding the menacing greatness of Russia and the United States, the only safety for Western Europe is in the unshaken alliance of the two great powers. Lord Derby, his father, inaugurated the policy of a close alliance with the French Emperor during his ministry, in which Lord Malmesbury, the Foreign Minister, is Napoleon's intimate personal friend.

In opposition to these mere facts, to what does the gabble of this or that French or English newspaper amount?

There are other practical considerations which show the absurdity of expecting a war between England and France. England could best afford it, as being distracted by no internal elements of disturbance. But when it is remembered that, in addition to the expense of a Chinese war, England is engaged in a military operation in India which will cost some sixty millions a year—nearly as much as our entire expenditure—how can it be supposed that she will embark, on a point of honor, in another war, which would cost ten times as much? As to France, the idea of a war with England would be the ruin of the Empire. In six weeks, as the Herald says, there would be nothing left of the Napoleon dynasty. Ten millions of pounds—a mere baguette for the British Government—would take away from the Emperor his Canrobert, Leduc Rollin, and Louis Blanc at their head, would upset the Empire in a fortnight, and the Emperor knows that the Emperor and his advisers are blind to a contingency which is so palpable to us?

THE SETTLEMENT OF THE MORMON AFFAIR.

WITHIN the next thirty or forty days it is likely that the Mormon trouble will be brought to an end, one way or another. General Johnston, it is to be presumed, will not wait either for further instructions or reinforcements, but on the first of spring will move his forces, and, making Fort Bridger a basis of operations, will proceed to invade the settlement at Salt Lake, and to take immediate possession of the city. If the Mormons are going to fight, it is likely that the first battle—probably a decisive one—will take place in the Salt Lake valley. From all accounts the spring throughout the country, and especially in the West, is going to be earlier than usual, and it is not likely that the Utah army will remain at Camp Scott no longer than the weather compels them to stay there.

There is a report in the papers that Major Ben M'Culloch and one or two other gentlemen are about to be accredited to Governor Young as Civil Commissioners, with power to effect a compromise. We do not believe that Mr. Buchanan will commit any such folly as to send agents to the Mormons for any such purpose. In the first place, there is but little likelihood of any envoys to be hereafter dispatched commanding any scene of their labors, or sure to be of any service; furthermore, there is not the least probability that Brigham Young would receive any commissioners upon hostile overtures. It is abundantly evident from his late Message, from the legislative proceedings which have taken place in the Mormon Legislature, and from the language of the Mormon hierarchy, as reported in the Deseret News, that their intention is to be prepared for a struggle, and that they will not be deterred from their purpose until recourse be had to arms.

There is another reason why we believe that the President will send no Commissioners to Utah. Civil commissioners, accompanying an army on hostile service, has not only seldom been felicitously a nuisance. Whatever they can do can be done as well by the general commanding, if he be fit for the post. The civil interference is negotiate as well as to fight. If he is competent to command his army, he is better competent to make the ultimate work of negotiation than any one else. Moreover, all experience shows that civil commissioners, while having an army, and empowered to conclude a peace or a truce, are certain to thwart and embarrass the military operations. The old rule of imperium in imperio, which is well calculated to damage the success of the whole enterprise.

As we have said, we do not look for a pacificatory having under his orders certain forces, military and naval, as is to be the case in China; but for unsparing condemnation if such was to be the case in the late operations against Russia in the Crimea. But to carry on a war by the agency of a soldier, civil commissioner time to repoint civil functionaries with power, at their discretion, to oppose and counteract him, is to endanger the success of the undertaking. It is the largest ill parties conceived. Our Mexican experience should surely protect General Johnston from the mischief of encumbrances in his camp lording it over him and controlling his movements.

GIFT ENTERPRISES.

THE undertakers of the schemes popularly known as Gift Enterprises have issued manifestoes against the Mayor and police for arresting their agents, and declare that it is impossible to be heard that, in this free country, they can not be suffered to delude the public without molestation.

It is, perhaps, doing them too much honor to follow them in their line of argument; but, for the benefit of the public, it is time to warn it against these enterprises are defended is this: They claim that the manufacturers of books, jewelry, and pianos expend their capital "upon an enormous profit on their wares; that they, dog-in-the-manger-like, keep all this profit to themselves; whereas the gift enterprise people, with sagacious liberality, propose to divide profit with their customers, the share of the undertakers of the enterprise being "plunked" in hard cash, while that of the customers is handed over in the shape of gifts. For instance, Mr. Ap Williams gets up a gift enterprise. He offers to sell gold rings at a dollar apiece; but, besides the ring, he proposes to give to every customer a good milk cow. And when you say to Ap Williams, "My good fellow, how can you afford to give me a cow as well as a ring for the price of a ring?" he answers, triumphantly, "The reason is that I am sharing profits with you on the ring." In other words, he avows that he makes so enormous a profit on his rings that he can afford to throw cows into the bargain.

Now, according to Ap Williams's own showing, he must be a monstrous rogue. If his profit on the ring is so great that he can afford to throw in a cow to boot, then every body who wants rings had better deal with Tiffany or Ball and Black, who don't pretend to make such huge profits on their sales. And if Ap Williams does not make a huge profit as to enable him to afford to throw in the cow, then, on the face of it, he intends to break faith with his dealers, and defraud them in some way or another.

This talk about monstrous profits made by manufacturers, and selfishly monopolized by them, is all nonsense. Prices are the product of demand and supply; in other words, they are stimulated by competition and restricted by competition. If there be a general demand for gold rings on the part of the public, persons who have gold rings to sell will realize profit on the sale of them; but those profits will be curtailed by the necessary tendency of each vender to undersell his neighbors. If, for instance, Ball, Black, & Co. undertake to make more than a fair profit on gold rings, Tiffany & Co. will immediately undersell them, and drive them out of the market. The very fear of this will prevent Ball, Black, & Co. from getting any higher price on their rings than fair trade warrants. So with all other articles of commerce. In every highly active commercial community, it may be taken for granted that every common article of merchandise is sold by the regular dealers at as low a price as it can be sold, after adding thereto the usual fair commercial profit.

To suppose, therefore, that any member of dealers can, in the long run, make, and, under pretense of sharing profits with their customers, undersell the entire manufacturing community, is absurd. If Ball, Black, & Co. could have been undersold in rings, Tiffany would have done it. If Stewart could have been undersold in pottery, no doubt dealers would have done so years since. And parties who now pretend to furnish the public with rings of any kind at the regular prices, and to give a bonus to customers besides, may be boldly set down as intending to defraud them.

CLOSE OF THE INDIAN WAR.

BY the next mail from India we shall probably hear that the famous rebellion which has attracted so much of the world's attention during the last twelve months has been finally crushed. At the time our latest advices left Sir Colin Campbell had completed his beautiful arrangements for the subjugation of the remaining insurgents. For some weeks he has been laboriously engaged in chasing the various flying bodies of mutineers into Lucknow, in clearing and occupying the principal roads leading to that city; and in gathering a sufficient force to make a vigorous assault upon it. The preparations were nearly complete when the last mail left; the head of his army had already crossed the Ganges; and with all human probability, between the 24th February and 1st March, the great battle was fought which settled the fate of the mutiny.

Until Sir Colin Campbell arrived in India the operations of the British troops undirected the genius and the energies of the Briton for heroism and gallantry, but hardly added much to their fame as strategists. The attack on Delhi, which was launched with an handful of troops who took part in it, was not, in a military point of view, a judicious operation; it would have been far better to have invested the mutineers in Delhi, and to have waited, before attacking them, till the besiegers had force enough to close all avenues of escape. Then, one can really picture to stand how no man of heart could resist the imploring appeals of the noble garrison of Lucknow to march to their relief, no doubt but it was a military point of view, a sad error in Havelock and Outram to cut their way through that city at a loss of so much their force.

Only Sir Colin Campbell has committed not the smallest error. All his operations have been characterized by caution, coolness, and skill. The manner in which he retrieved the disaster of Wyndham, the splendid manœuvring which enabled him to extricate the Lucknow garrison from their wretched prison, and afterward to withdraw his own force, comparatively without loss, to Cawnpore from the best foreign critics the remark that he is the first general England has had since Wellington. It may now be safely predicted of him that he will destroy Lucknow, and administer to the Sepoys such a punishment as will remain a terrible tale in Indian story for generations to come, almost without any loss. He understands—what so many old generals do not—that to moderate times the brunt of fighting should be done with big guns, and that if you can hit your enemy while he can't hit you, you must win in the end. The disproportionately large force of artillery which he has, and the Minie and the Enfield rifle, will make an end of the Lucknow Sepoys before they have an opportunity of showing their skill as marksmen against Sir Colin's force.

UNITED STATES INTERESTS IN CHINA.

THE New York Times sneers at Minister Reed for his neutral attitude in the pending contest in China, and sarcastically suggests that he should make love to Lord Elgin for an invitation to accompany him to Pekin as his guest.

This notion is very natural and proper in the mouth of Englishmen, to whom the co-operation of the United States in the Chinese war would be of some benefit; but why any American authority should desire to see this country involved in a quarrel which does not concern us, which would cost us much money, and might not yield any return, is not so easily perceived.

The United States went to war with China without any particular cause. Lord Palmerston was glad enough to divert attention from domestic embarrassments by summoning the vindication of the petty wrongs of Mr. Consul Parkes. In the end, it is quite possible that the war will prove a gain to civilization and commerce; though it must be admitted that the prospect at the present time is not overwhelmingly encouraging. The Chinese don't seem to want any thing of us, and it is not easy to perceive how we can get what we want from them on whose part we have to get it at present. However, the changes which may grow out of the war may develop new commercial opportunities; if we have nothing to obtain the entry of the great rivers. We may, therefore, entertain sympathy for the cause which the French and English are espousing.

But between this sympathy and active co-operation with the belligerents there is a wide gulf. The Chinese would do well to take the grounds on which it can be traversed. We have no quarrel with the Chinese. No causal of cause has been enabled. How can we, in the face of an intelligent world, and with our reputation as a peaceful people, make war on a nation which has done us no wrong?

As to our duty as a leading member of the family of nations, and a co-partner in the great work of promoting civilization and commerce, we have chosen our field—Japan. Perhaps we have not done as much in that field as we might; no doubt there is yet glory to be reaped at Jeddo by future sailors and diplomatists. But till we fail there, is it best that we should confine ourselves to the Japanese empire, and leave the Chinese quiet to those who have a legal right to thrust in their knife. The Times would do better, in suggesting a more liberal appreciation than by taunting the Administration and Mr. Reed with an inactivity which could not be abandoned without injustice and folly.

THE CASE OF ALLSOP THE REFUGEE.

IT seems quite certain that the Englishman Thomas Allsop, who gave the order for the destruction of the steamer which carried Orsini and the Emperor of the French, is, or has been lately, in this city in concealment.

It seems also beyond doubt that the city has the honor to contain half a dozen French and English detectives, on the scent of this Allsop.

If it be true that the British and French Governments have sent detectives after Allsop as far as New York, the next thing for them to do is to get for them a search-warrant. They will never reclaim him from this country. And it is much to be feared that the British Government make themselves very active in the matter, the powerful protection of our Metropolitan Police may prove inadequate to shield them against the wrath of the foreign exiles.

THE RAILROAD QUESTION.

MR. MORAN, the President of the New York and Erie Railway Company, has returned from Europe, and has obtained there ample money to save that great enterprise from immediate ruin. He has obtained, it is understood, four millions of dollars, one half payable in unsecured bonds of the company, the balance in cash. By suspending for a time certain work of improvement and extension which were in progress, the Erie Company will, with this timely aid, be enabled to meet the present crisis.

Taken in connection with this fortunate consummation, we may note the adoption, on the Hudson River and the Harlem railways, of certain reforms and economies which are alone equivalent to a fair dividend on the stock of both. The policy of economy which has never yet been abolished, has so sensibly curtailed its expenses that, with a good business this year, it may pay as handsome a dividend to its proprietors as the New York Central itself.

Similar improvements are going on in other railroad companies. But the policy of sacrificing the permanent interests of the road to the payment of immediate returns on the stock has generally been abandoned; the Rock Island road, for instance, which, under the old system, would infallibly have paid its regular April dividend, even if it had had to borrow the whole of it, now wisely proposes to leave it unpaid, and keep the balance of earnings in store for the next dividend day. Other Western lines—the Cleveland and Toledo, for instance—have manfully ameliorated that fiery dog no end; and now any more dividends on their stock until their whole floating debt is extinguished.

This, at last, is a step in the right direction. Whatever may be the ultimate fate of our railways as money-making enterprises, there can be no question of the folly of the old system of borrowing money to pay dividends on stock, of paying dividends when the company will not pay them, and of thus carrying a steam floating debt at usurious rates of interest. The least that can be said of such policy is that it was dishonest. It now remains to be seen which of our railways—those great creators of wealth, and prosperity, and commerce, and civilization—starved with the aid of honesty and economy, be raised to the rank of permanently and fruitfully dividend-paying enterprises.

THE LOUNGER.

BELLES-LETTRES.

"MRS. GREENE presents her compliments to the Lounger, and wishes to know whether he considers it proper that she and the Misses Grundy should attend the ball to-night about to be given at the house of Mr. Mussolf. During the residence in Paris, Mrs. Grundy was presented at the Tuileries at the late French Opera, at which she saw a great many gentlemen in fancy dress, if not without, very many young ladies in—in short, trousers. If that is to be the costume expected at Irving Place, it hardly becomes Mrs. Grundy to state that she shall on no account conform to the regulations, and that Mr. Grundy and Grundy will wear sacs at his own discretion, the Misses Grundy will wear trousers."

"An early answer will oblige."

—The Lounger hastens to present his respectful compliments to Mrs. Grundy, and to express his sense of the honor done him by the inquiry of the most influential lady in society. He will, however, excuse in him to advertence a suggestion to the very Queen of Society, and, excepting that he considers her request a command, he should not dare to be so abimited to listen to her own instructions.

In the present case, the unlucky genius of our fashion and good manners, the Napoleon of the Opera, has not only told us who Musard is, and what is meant by the name in his, and in other capitals swell Mr. Jullien is, and what "supreme elegance" of manner distinguished the great conductor, and how not to frequent Musard is not to know Paris—not only has Napoleon told us all these things, with an ease and splendor of style which surpass even the charm of the novel and interest, ing truth of romance, but he has added, with a subtlety worthy of Walewski himself, a description of masks, and the details of their construction; also the characteristic dress of dominos, and even the sly stroke, betraying his just opinion of his public, that the whole "gathering together of the black ash for the domino is used in its natural breadths!! Could the skill of Napoleon go further? And when you have used your silk as a domino, Mrs. Grundy, Napoleon insinuates that you can make it into a gown—of course, "much lower dresses."

But further than this, and bearing directly upon your question, he states that ladies will be admitted only with gentlemen; that bouquets will be allowed to mask; and that thus the utmost respectability will be preserved. In fact, if you read what appears, from his animated circular, that they are to be so very moral that a visit to the balls will be essential to moral respectability!

Now here, with deference to Mrs. Grundy, is something delightful. Here is morality and only made easy, but respectable. The arrangements are to be precisely the same as in Paris and other Continental cities, and Mrs. Grundy knows the respectable the bal masqué is in those places.

She will observe, however, that the excesses for demi-vierges are not stipulated in the case of Irving Place. In that matter they will doubtless consult each other and Mrs. Grundy. But as that lady has now expressed her opinion, the Lounger ventures to state boldly that none will be worn.

He would therefore, in fine, humbly and under correction, suggest to Mr. and the Misses Grundy to take a box—or reserved seats in the balcony—merely, of course, to look on." Under the kind care of Napoleon, who is perfectly conversant with the elegant habits of European society, the scene will doubtless have quite a foreign air. The young gentlemen—who will certainly be generally in the crowd, with the most careless smiles upon their faces and their hats under their arms—instead of being spoken to by the bal masqué is a very delightful amusement, really quite innocent, and altogether the best way to set a power in society which can make it unfashionable.

GUILLOTINED.

On the morning of the 13th March Orsini was awakened at six o'clock, and at five minutes past seven his head fell into the fatal basket. He died calmly, exhorting his companion to patience: having written a letter of farewell nearly four years previously to his children; and having throughout behaved like a hero and not like a criminal.

Over his bloody grave one word ought to be said, and one thing remembered. Orsini is one of many thousands in Europe who believe that every man who is subject to a government ought to have a voice in the government; a doctrine not very strange to those who live in the country of Lexington and Bunker Hill. When, therefore, any one man, by murder and treason, overthrows the government and disfranchises all the rest, they regard him as the common enemy of the state, and not to be removed like any other murderer or bandit. Orsini, indeed, was not a Frenchman, but Louis Napoleon was helping to do in Italy what he does openly at home. In striking at him, therefore, Orsini considered that he was destroying a dangerous enemy of the race. He had no personal object to gain, and having failed in his blow, he has submitted gallantly to the penalty.

The policy he adopted may be always an unwise policy. But to say that he was a bad man, and justly be executed as a murderer, Charlotte Corday undoubtedly assassinated Marat, is not moral to be enforced upon the world from her soulful is, not that even tyrants should not be murdered, but that Orsini would not be murdered, were Napoleon sits to-day in the Tuileries, and Orsini him buried in some Potter's Field. The attempts bury writes about atrocious attempts at assassination, and even Walter Savage Lander says that he can not approve murder. Does Napoleon? Therefore, think that only an attempt is atrocious, but that whoever assassinates is worthy of England's sympathy and alliance? Is Landor unable to approve Orsini's guilt, such as it was, and able to applaud Louis Napoleon's long career of crime?

Louis Napoleon is to-day an Emperor, and Orsini is a beheaded patriot; but is there any fact in contrast for the last time, ask yourself which of the two you sincerely believe to have been the greater criminal and the more dangerous to society?

W. C.

SHAKSPEARE'S Sonnets were entered upon the books of the Stationers' Company by Thomas Thorpe, with the famous dedication, "To the only begetter of these ensuing sonnets, Mr. W. H." In like manner the Lounger desires to dedicate this notice of his "Saloon" to Mr. W. C., the only begetter of the ensuing remarks, which suggests the more sesquipedalian style of Dr. Johnson. After a physical description, which, the personal difference of barbers, W. C. presents:

"Gentleman, if you wish to frequent a hair-dressing saloon where cleanliness, and quietness, and politeness rule—where the comfort and satisfaction of the habitue are made the subject of every care—where you may have a chin into gentle slumber upon the easiest of chairs, and blissful visions as to the efficacy of razors and the mildest of perfumed soap—where gentle hands lull and soothe by their manipulations, and where the mirrors and grotesque are conjured into fashion and beauty during your momentary unconsciousness—where, in fine, there is a reputation to maintain, and he will maintain it bravely."

The Lounger means to put all this fine promise to the proof, and if he finds that W. C. is "a true man," as well as poet, he shall be further introduced to the public.

THE MORMONS.

It is announced that a brother of the late Dr. Kane, whose father was a personal friend of the President, has been sent to Utah on a peace mission to the Mormons. Mr. Kane has been among them before, and has had opportunities to observe his visit, in which he speaks of them more kindly than they are generally mentioned.

There seems to be no way of ascertaining what the Mormons really feel and want, than to send some man to live among them, and share into their city, to converse with them. Soldiers in a hostile camp, fearful of starving or freezing, will by silence or evasion baffle every endeavor for the chance of brilliant exploits than of settling difficulties, or even of ascertaining their intentions. Nobody appears to know the intention of the Mormons. Mr. Brigham Young wishes a great many furious speeches about him, and perhaps says what he but then they know the enemy is moved up. They must know that the Mormons will not surrender; they must either go into exile or be annihilated.

They can not appeal to any sympathy. There is no reason why they should not hear another view of it. Editorial lines. As yet they have been subject to no clear opposition, and in their own country these mischieves always inflict upon culprits; and that moral contempt on the part of the world which always attends criminal or pernicious folly.

These things, and the consequent considerations, could be made clear to any man of ordinary intelligent and friendly man, like Mr. Kane, that it is to be hoped he is charged with such a mission. As to creating them by force, by fighting or starving, it is impossible under our institutions. That policy gurney kept breed a great many more young men which might come in conflict with the laws in many ways, is more than likely. But if civilization is not able to hold its own against barbarism, it is not what we have all taken it for.

MRS. ANSCHÜTZ FARTINGTON

MRS. FARTINGTON tried to mop out the sea when the tide was coming in, and when the admirable conductor of our Opera tried to stem an encore the other evening. The house thundered and clapped and stamped in order to hear Mlle. Formes repeat an aria in the Messiah. The conductor looked sulky, and cried encore to such folly. Bang, bang went the house; bang, bang went Mr. Conductor Anschütz to begin the next movement. The house stamped, and cried encore! Mr. Conductor Anschütz kept his back turned, and waved his baton to the forces. Formes smiled, the chorus men perplexed; but the house was not perplexed, neither was the good Anschütz. The house grew obstinate, and the conductor wrathy.

"Who the dickens are you?" cried the House, in imagination, to Anschütz.

"You darned Yankee blockheads!" thundered Anschütz, in his heart, to the House.

"Bang! bang! We will have that tune again!"

"Bang! bang! I'll be whopped if you do!"

The contest waxed warm. Anschütz, at last, turning his burning face to the house, the unlamayed, but furious and disgusted, conductor cried out:

"It isn't artistic to encore in sacred music!"

Unhappy Anschütz! Had you dare to insinuate that the free and enlightened were guilty of an inartisticality? Then sing, O Muse! how dreadful was the rage of Britons, until some Talleyrand behind the scenes did what no statesman has yet been able to do with Lecompanies and Anti-Lecompanies—namely, settled the difficulty, by announcing that the wind of the trumpeter would not sustain him through it, but that necessary for the accompaniment to Formes's song. It was wisely done—but the House knew that no one touched it the compromise. He threw down his baton and was forceful, but unconquered. Yet even he was at length quelled and returned.

What a deadful thought, that we are an unartistic people! What a call for more, that we ought to restrain our appetites! Perhaps, with Mr. Ullmer telling us what masks are, and Mrs. Anschütz Fartington vigorously laughing up ignorance of artistic proprieties, we shall gradually get to be a presentable public.

IT'S OPERA.

To write an opera, to compose the various parts, and score them for an orchestra, is, of itself, a wonderful thing. But to achieve the performance of a work by good singers, in a fitting house, before a proper audience, is a good fortune reserved for few composers. Auber and a painter depend mainly upon themselves. The one writes a book, and, by the help of a few pots of ink, a few sheets of it is printed; the other paints a picture, and he can put it in his window for the world to see. But a musical composer must wait for the public only after a crowd of other people, any one of whom may do him and his work irremediable injury.

It was, therefore, with a real perception of the case that Mr. Fry, in his little speech after the production of his opera of Leonora evening, paid a just his gratitude to the artists. He, better than any body else, knew what they had done for him.

And we—the public, the great critical audience, that sat in dignified judgment upon the quality and claims of that work of a gentleman, about which musician—we owed them the great enjoyment which attends a fine singer's interpretation of a work, and the exquisite skill and care with which they executed it. Madame La Grange has never sung more admirably than in the crude and elaborate music of her rôle of Leonora. Her crisp, clear, and yet rich voice, her finished execution were never more pronounced or more pleasing. D'Angri, too, did her part with conscience and care. Lassier was excellent as Florestan—Lind Florestan is a tenor, and tenors are always lumpish as such.

But Formes is the great Italian work. His character and treatment it is exclusively Italian. The instrumentation is learned and skilful. The music itself is harmonious, and in itself it would belie than melodious; that is to say, the airs have the harmonies of accompaniment to themselves, if they do not seem to be distinctive tunes. People will not be heard whistling them, and hand-organs grinding them, and young Misses laughing them upon piano.

But for that, it is a much better work than most of the Italian operas, except those of the best musicians. It tastes of the composer's studies, as all the earlier works of genius do and ought to do. It is clear enough that he has a natural musical sympathy with Bellini, and a thorough appreciation of the finest sweetest of the Italians breathes throughout Leonora. But there is more vigor and variety in management than in Bellini's; and it is wonderful how the only original specs of any promising claims that have been produced in New York.

The audience received it most kindly. Of course there were the friends of the composer present. There should be the composer's friends to whom he brings out an opera? The applause was pleasant to hear; and the whole evening was altogether very pleasant to see. It was a good beginning; and no one there but hoped that, before long, we should all be summoned to hear another work of a musician whose talents and claims are no longer unrecognized even in his own country.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

THE title of Dickens's novel, which has now been so long in course of publication from advance-sheets in the Weekly, has undoubtedly often enough suggested to the reader the question propounded by itself. But let every man who has or has not read the first or the first chapter of the part published to-day.

Bulwer is too skilful a literary artist to make a blunder. The author and reader may differ about his genius, they can never quarrel over his mastery of mere execution. His novels are not anecdotes or, or impromptus, written from time to time; they are carefully planned and ably elaborated. He has a plot, and he knows what it is, and where it is going, and how it is coming out, and what part every character is to play in it. The opening chapters of the present tale all the personage cause on with the air of intelligent performers. The story-telling power was as evident, and the profound love and enjoyment of his work by the author himself was as clear, as in a novel by Sir Walter Scott.

The address to the reader in the present number is of peculiar interest. Bulwer anticipates the question already hinted, and answers the inquiry. What he has done is to write the first chapter of this chapter is an intricacies, and that the whole MS. is in the hands of the publisher, having been completed on the 22d of January. He then proceeds to tell us what his principles of literary composition are: that the method of publication, whether serial or otherwise, can have nothing to do with the character of the work in the hands of a conscientious author; that it is not to be written number by number, as the voracious press may require, but must be well understood by the author from the beginning.

The reader will remember that, after the completion of "Caxtoniana," Bulwer was evidently assisted in having written in such a slip-slop, hit-and-miss style as to leave taken the idea of the Caxtonian from the fall of an old building in London, which occurred during the progress of the work. So, whoever attacks Dickens may be said, in the vulgate, to wake a Tartar. He wrote a reply to the article, in which he stated, after having surrounded the critic with all the thin-lights and rockets of his humorous sarcasm, that in fact, if the reader would look at the notice, when the first chapter he described the house in question, and in such a way as to allow his intention of tumbling it down in the last chapter to be probable, he was expected, from the beginning.

Bulwer also tells us that, being concluded, the work can not be supposed to refer to any of the present political questions, and the personages who have been associated, and that, in truth, he should not have himself to mingle practical politics and art under any circumstances.

However widely we may differ from his philosophy of literary art, and whatever opinion we may have of his literary power and position, nobody can question that Bulwer stands with Dickens and Thackeray in the third English novelist in popular estimation. His audience is doubtless, larger than that of Thackeray's, and probably not so large as Dickens's. For more than a quarter of a century he has been one of the most noted and prolific of English writers; and the appearance of his address this week is not without a pathetic interest.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—INTELLIGENCE to the ladies is the following from a correspondent with an unpleasing name:

"FAN FREAK, Esq.

"DEAR LOUNGER,—Having seen some advertisements, you permit strangers sometimes to address you, allow me to send you a few remarks on a subject which has greatly exercised me, in common with very many others—I mean the monstrous expansion of the ladies' skirts. The fashion has reached the country, Sir, and is inflating every part of it with crinoline. Even the churches have entered the most voluminous extravagances of Broadway. Not until we all get to one house. It seems the fashion has been splendid in various parts of Europe. It has infinitely exceeded in reading some remarks to the Queen of Spain, on this subject, in illustrating vestis pejorum in the conquests which his sovereign has made in the Netherlands.

"Pass, Sir, with deference to your judgment, whether this extravagance is not the result of the crinoline skirt. It takes it into its head to exaggerate, in the same proportion, another article, which, with the hoop, is indeed its cotton, in some cases, for its graceful outline, what a Spanish writer calls its pudor and its impudicitia.

"I propose, Sir, to remonstrate a sum for the dress which may help to bring it to a reasonable size all over before. Some mischievous Frenchman christened it the 'Petit de Tais.' Faith, that on it, and past it round, and it is round what we shall see. This, Sir, you say, is no doubt the origin of the name Farthingale, which our etymologists have been so long seeking that the French troops of those days were really 'pièces de resistance,' and not the flimsy, watch-spring contrivance of our times. Farthingale was again corrupted into Vertugale, which is not very far from Farthingale. But, Sir, I propose a much better derivation. Farthingale is a translation, or rather also by a Frenchman, of Petit de Tais. We have the 'ill' of no account in a Frenchman's pronunciation, and the matter seems to be settled. But the old tales on the monstrosity, dear Lounger.

"The Italians called the thing 'Guard' infante,' which also shows that it was a substantial affair in those days. It has become a question of focus with our young ladies would by no means approve.

"Yours, very truly,

"OLD BACHELOR."

—A. SAVAGE, Tobacco Worm, must not expect to squirm with impunity over a BROADSHEET. In reply to his letter of the 3d inst. we have to say, the Lounger has received a note from MISS MELINDA, of which he subjoins the most striking portions. He shows from it that MISS MELINDA BROADSHEET is an earnest and doughty antagonist:

"FRIEND LOUNGER, * * * * It appears strange to me that the Editor of HARPER'S WEEKLY should be the object of our common Creator, who can be so devoid of all decency and propriety of taste and conduct as to vilified, and whose love of the world will permit him to come out boldly and defend so unjustly the cause of the most odious. * * * * It is my impression, however, that your correspondent A. Savage is the class of young men whose every-day happiness consists in looking upon themselves as very gentlemanly, and considering while himself as the very pink of the 'delectable world' between the 'dental attachments,' into the 'delica' adieus, selects for himself the most conspicuous position, and, while persisting in retaining it, stares every respectable lady out of countenance. He makes her ashamed of compelling her to wade through the 'virtues of Virginia's most profusely scented weed,' before she can be kept in the other. This 'indignant worm' asks if it 'is to be taken for a fact that not one gentleman knows of more than a dozen 'different-scented abominations' every hour in the day;' as vitiating the sense of smell that this 'round appendage' might as well come in contact with a lump of sarcastics as with the delicate jessamine, for all the harm it would occasion. I will now leave this 'Savage Tobacco Worm' to enjoy his favorite weed, sincerely hoping that our style of dress may not entirely exclude him from his rightful place in some good church, where he may be led to see the error of his ways, repent of his sins, and be cleansed of his abominations.

"TRULY YOURS,

"MELINDA BROADSHEET."

A MASKED BALL AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC AT PARIS.

MUSARD AND THE PARIS MASKED BALLS.

Now that we have Monsieur Musard here in the flesh, and that there is a striking prospect of masked balls being given at the Academy of Music, the opportunity is favorable for a brief glance at the historic Musard, and at the theatre of his fame, the masked balls at the Academy of Music at Paris.

If Louis Napoleon were shot down to-morrow in the Boulevards, there might be a change in the upper-crust of the French Government. But if Musard were killed, all Paris—and, especially all Bohemia—would fly to arms. For Musard is the darling of the Parisian people, from the Quartier Latin to the Quartier Breda; members of the Council of State pique themselves on knowing him, and the famous Rothschild tenant of a garret in the Rue d'Amsterdam to the co-occupant of a grenier in the Rue du Faite St. Jacques, pay him, as he sounds his own, homage which words can but faintly depict. Once upon a time there was a rumor in Paris that a haughty Englishman had shot Marie in a duel; all Paris was on the alert, and it needed no common firmness on the part of Monsieur Guizot (then were the days of Orleans royalty) to avert an instant rupture between the allies; had the rumored mishap befallen Monsieur le Prince Musard, not even the European concord have withstood the cry for instant war upon perfide Albion.

Several fair correspondents demand of us a biography of Musard. It can not be written. He leads orchestras—that is all. There is nothing more to be said. It is probable that he had a father and mother. The chances are that, unlike Topsy, he was born, at some time, in some place or other. There is reason to believe that he underwent an apprenticeship, of some kind or other, to the calling which he now follows with such marked success. But, considering the doubt which envelops these matters, the world has gradually settled down to the opinion that he was born, like Minerva, armed with a bow in one hand and a fiddle in the other, and equipped, cap-à-pied, in French broadcloth, with a stupendous tie crossing his neck and sticking out on either side; that his first movement was a signal to the hautboy to burst forth, and his first cry an energetic "Allons, Messieurs!" to a full-bodied orchestra; and that, as he was full-grown and ripely experienced when he came into the world, so he has never grown any older since then. His portrait corroborates this latter view; let us be content with it.

Our colleague, the Bohemian, has drawn a graceful sketch of Musard at his concerts at the Hôtel de Osmond; to us he is more interesting at the Académie de Musique on a masked ball night.

Paris, as every body knows, abounds with masked balls during the brief season which intervenes between the commencement of the year and the first days of Lent. Masked balls are given at every one of the eighteen theatres of Paris, at several of the public ball-rooms, and at a number of private houses. It has been calculated that an experienced ball-goer might spend every night of January and February at a masked ball, without going twice to the same place. But the greatest of all the masked balls takes place at the Academy of Music on each Saturday evening.

It commences at midnight—that is to say, on Sunday morning. The reader must bear in mind that our Sabbath is a very different institution from the Sunday of Catholic countries; that in France, for instance, while the devoutly-inclined go to mass, and so forth, all classes consider it a holiday—a day of enjoyment and pleasure. It is the great day for theatres, balls, and all kinds of amusements. And the Parisians deem the first hours of the Sabbath fitly spent in revelry at the grand bal masqué at the Academy of Music.

The doors are usually opened at eleven P.M., as soon as the Saturday evening's performance has ended, and the theatre has been prepared for the ball by the removal of the seats, and so forth. The parquette and stage are thrown into one, and a beautifully smooth floor presented to the dancers. The premières loges (first circle) are thrown open; but the boxes, as well in that tier as in the one above, are let that night at an open night rate.

There is a legend that in times long gone by ladies in good society used to attend the masked balls in the Academy, and dance, and flirt, and intrigue with all manner of fashionable cavaliers in gay costume. We imagine this was before the deluge, or, at all events, before the conquest of Gaul by Julius Cæsar. Within the memory of the oldest sane inhabitant of Paris, no ladies—save on occasional hair-brained girl, or a very dashing and reckless married woman—have graced at the masked balls of the Academy otherwise than as spectators. The scene is very brilliant and striking, and persons in good society frequently wish to see it. When this happens, they take a box; the ladies equip themselves in black dominoes, and are conducted by their friends to their box, whence in safe obscurity they overlook the revelry of the evening. Even this participation in the masked balls at the opera is becoming obsolete, in consequence of the peril which its curious, modest-looking woman on entering that scene of revelry. Speech is free at masked balls in Paris. You may whisper what you like into any lady's ear. You may pluck her arm as she passes. You may jostle her. Redbeards avail themselves of all these licenses, and ladies who have once gone through the ordeal of making their way from the door to a box seldom feel inclined to renew the attempt.

Nor could it be otherwise. The joint and secret of a public masked ball is perfect license. Not one out of a hundred persons assembled knows his neighbor. If these persons are to enjoy themselves, they must dispense with the formality of introductions, and treat every one—male and female—as if they were old acquaintances. More than this, the mask, like charity, covers a multitude of sins. Though men, at the Academy balls, are not permitted to wear a mask throughout the evening, the reverse is the rule with regard to ladies; they are not allowed to unmask. Sorgons de rafi patrol the room during the evening, and expel every masked male and every unmasked female they find. Now the mask is a perfect wall, from behind which any liberties may be taken. Under cover of a mask, ladies will say things which they would rather die than utter with unveiled countenance. The widest experience of masked balls at Paris decides that the gravest inconvenience of those gatherings arises from the license of the ladies. The men—gentle and polished as the bulk of Frenchmen are—can easily be managed. But no police force that has ever been organized has been enabled to control the exuberant spirits of the female maskers.

MONSIEUR MUSARD.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

Beginning at midnight, the masked ball at the Academy lasts till five or six A.M. Between two and three the respectable visitors begin to thin out. At four there are but few boxes tenanted. This is the time of the grand rond, when Prince Musard loses his senses in the excitement, and two thousand dancers tear round the dancing hall in a frantic ecstasy, realizing the name which has been given to the pas, the "Horses Galop." Woe to the luckless wight who trips in that fearful "galop"! Before he knows that he is down, a dozen couples have passed over him, and hundreds more will trample him as they rush furiously on. If he has had the good luck to fall near a body of policemen, they will charge and rescue him by sheer force—signalling the orchestra to stop. But if, as is usual, there are no guardian angels within reach, he must take his chance, happy if he merely escapes with a few bruises, or even an occasional broken bone, where some have been trampled to death.

Refreshments are ex right at the masked balls at Paris. It is considered proper to invite your partner to partake of a bottle of Champagne at an adjoining restaurant. Persons have been known to make as many sorties from the ball with a view to being refreshed in this manner, as Colonel Inglis's gallant garrison did at Lucknow. The consequence may be imagined. Between six and seven, squads of policemen enter the ball with stretchers and vehicles resembling wheel-barrows. They gather together the killed and wounded, as the porter is said to do at the door of a Virginia editor's sanctum. These who, after copious applications of cold water and stick, are able to walk, on reaching the fresh air are mercifully released; the balance are generously provided with lodgings, at the expense of the state, in the nearest corps de garde.

The sober survivors of the ball usually sup between five and seven in the morning. At such suppers scenes are enacted which recall the most scandalous episodes of the Regency. For the first time since midnight the ladies unmask themselves. Strangers who have fallen half in love with exquisite creatures in tights and Greek costume, or in the freshest demi-deshabille attire, then discover that their charmer is a sober female of forty, who has a propensity for turkey and oysters, and vainly endeavor to drown their disappointment in adulterated Champagne. Those who have been more fortunate—who have spent the evening in the company of friends, or who have made conquests—are left by their gay and satisfaction to the same fountain; and by eight in the afternoon—men and women—are in a fit condition for bed and rodawater.

To the unsophisticated observer—the man of plain common sense and virtuous habits—the most melancholy spectacle in the world, next to a masked ball at the opera, is the funeral of a dear friend. He enters the hall soberly, in due black, with irreproachable gloves. He knows nobody; if he attracts an acquaintance, the latter is too busy to attend to him. No one speaks to him but suspiciously neglected dames, and hungry little musicians who beg for confectionery and Champagne at the commencement of the acquaintance. Every body dislikes him. The gayer the surroundings are, the more people laugh in his neighborhood, the more serious he grows; the dashing maskers who hurry past him enliven his dullness by pleasant inquiries as to whether he personates a grave-digger, or whether he is aware that his wife and sister are jolly enough under-ground.

The funeral of a friend—such the great Dejeuner has appeared to his country has long been held to be the most powerful argument against immorality which was ever adduced. Those who have tried a masked ball from beginning to end, who have gone there alone, and resolutely endeavored to enjoy themselves, will certify that it is quite as efficacious a remedy against dissipation.

Monsieur Musard, we say, intends to inaugurate the era of masked balls in this country. He is to give one or more at the Academy of Music. One of two things; either they will be as dull as many of our great parties in Fifth Avenue, or they will be as licentious and indecorous as the masked balls at Paris. There is some prospect that the latter alternative will be the true one. We have in New York a set of demoralized men and women, extending from the pickpocket order up to the coarse bully who deals in groceries or dry goods, and from the nameless outcast to the loose dweller in an elite bowling-house: these persons will find a congenial sphere in masked balls. But they will not keep up a warm excitement, as the Parisians do, for several hours on a stretch, without drunkenness, violence, such coarse and brutal language as the lowest Parisian never uses, and all manner of savage developments. And the chances are, if we have a masked ball here, that it will be a scene of such immorality and profanity, and disgrace of all kinds, as even this vicious city has never known before.

LITERARY

We have seldom met with a book of its class which embodied so many excellences as THE HAPPY HOME, by Kirwan, published by Harper & Brothers. The name of the distinguished author is always a guarantee for a bold, unflinching, faithful delivery of the truth; and in this little book he has added to these qualities the experiences of a careful parent, and the affectionate opinions of one who knows what it is to love and be loved at home.

The volume is a manual of home duty. Its instructions and advice are such as all parents will thank him for, and all children who read will appreciate and approve. There is something irresistible in the style of Kirwan. He deals with sledge-hammers, and he does it well, but they fall as nonchalantly as sow-dukes. He ridicules or he praises, overthrows an opinion or builds up a theory, and all is done forcibly, eloquently, and satisfactorily. Not the least merit of his writings, and of this book in particular, is the fact that the whole volume of two hundred pages is contained the whole pith of some twenty books on the same subject, by as many Protestant divines who have from time to time written on family and home duties and pleasures. This essentially the book for parents, and will find its way into thousands of houses to make them happy homes.

Not long since the congregation of the Fifth Street Chapel, in Boston, invited six clergymen, of as many denominations, to preach in succession in their chapel, each one giving the reason for the faith that was in him. The sermons, six in all, were as follows, severally, such questions as "Why am I a Universalist?" "Why am I a Trinitarian Congregationalist?" "Why am I a Methodist?" etc. These sermons are now collected and published by John P. Jewett & Co., in Boston, in a handsome volume. It would have been in better taste if the congregation, or committee, or whoever superintended the publication, had omitted the preface, which appears to be a somewhat lame eulogy of the Pitts Street Chapel congregation. We find ourselves somewhat puzzled, after reading it, to know what the people there do believe on religious subjects. But that aside, the volume is interesting and curious, as presenting the views of the several denominations side by side, as held and taught by some of their most eloquent and distinguished men. Very many persons are desirous of possessing a compendium of denominational views—some book which will tell them what different churches hold and why they hold it. This seems to be such a book.

Carter & Brothers publish with remarkable quickness of succession book after book of sound orthodox character, and they select, also, with excellent judgment, works whose intrinsic interest, and literary merit also, makes them valuable. Their last issue is Ministering Children, a story of English life, in which the way that children may do good in the world, and be "ministers" of kindness and mercy, is exquisitely set forth. This story has passed through thirty editions in England. The present is finely illustrated with twenty cuts, from designs by Birket Foster, and others, and makes altogether one of the best children's books of the day.

Carters also publish a Memoir of Captain Hammond, one of those gallant men who fell at the storming of the Redan. We have had time only to read the accounts of the preparation, mental and bodily, for that assault—the taking of the Sacrament by some who thought that death was probably before them—and then the three days' battle, at the end of which Captain Hammond was seen at the head of his men in the heart of the enemy's works, where he fell under their bayonets. This is well told, with skillful touches; and we judge favorably of the character of the rest of the book from this. The Crimean war has given us some admirable biographical subjects, as well of religious as of other general character. We recur at this moment again to an admirable book—English Hearts and Hands—which every one should read. It is a most excellent and interesting little volume.

A volume of Transatlantic Sketches, by Professor Kelland, published in Edinburgh, is remarkable for the small amount of matter necessary to make a book out of. Here is a story which he heard related on board the steamer by a Yankee who is somewhat celebrated for large stories:

"I remember one Silas Gray, a queer fellow, a citizen of the world, who, when he heard a traveler's tale, always chimed in with one more extraordinary still. Such as this: Did you ever go to the Rocky Mountains? Well, I wonder at that. You may be sure you don't know the world. My ancestors came from there, and in my younger days we used often to talk about an old uncle that was living there about a century ago. He was a crack shot, and when he came down to see grandfather brought a particular long gun with him. I thought I might as well go and see what they had done with the old man. Well, do you know, that district is so remarkably healthy, high up in the air, that people never die. They get old and shriveled, and lose their faculties pretty much, and then the neighbors tie them up in a sack, and ticket them, and hang them up in the church. So when I got to the place I went to the church, and asked the man that had charge if he knew what had become of my old uncle. The man said he didn't know, but if I would come along with him we'd see. So we went round and examined the sacks, a precious lot of them. Sure enough there was my uncle's name on one. So the man asked me if I wished to speak to him. I told him I wanted particularly to do it. Well, he took down the sack, and inside there was my uncle as dry as a mummy. He put him into warm water, and after a while the old man began to open his eyes and sneeze. At last, says I, 'Well, uncle, can you speak?' and he said he could. So I began to chat with him about our relations. The old man presently tired, and began to yawn. Says he, 'If you have any thing particular to ask about I guess you had better make haste, as I am getting tired and want to be hung up again.' 'Well, then, uncle,' says I, 'I do just want to know what became of a particular long gun you used to have.' 'Look,' says he, 'under the thatch at the northwest corner of the house, and you'll find it.' 'Thankee, uncle,' says I; and we tied the old man up again."

A new poet has appeared in England. Mr. William Morris publishes The Defense of Guenevre, and other poems, which possess very high and refined merit. Some of them are not without obscurity, but others are exceedingly beautiful.

The new Cabinet in England is composed of men not unknown to literature. Lord Derby is author of "Conversations on the Parables." Disraeli is, of course, well known. Lord Manners is a poet; and several other members of the Government have published works.

A bookseller in London, Edward Truelove, has been committed by a Bow Street magistrate for publishing a pamphlet on Tyrranicide. The pamphlet is understood to be a defense of the propriety of disposing of tyrants by any means—a doctrine which, however wrong and unrighteous it may be, certainly ought not to disturb the Government of England. America seems to be the only country of free political discussion.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, 29th March, in the Senate, Senator Fitzpatrick announced that the Vice-President had been obliged to leave for the South. A president pro tem. was voted for, and the following was the result: Fitzpatrick, 28; Fessenden, 12; Hamlin, 1. Senator Fitzpatrick was accordingly conducted to the chair by Messrs. Slidell and Dixon. The Minnesota Bill being taken up, after remarks by Senators Hunter, Pugh, Fitch, Collamer, Simmons, Trumbull, Polk, and Brown, Mr. Mason's amendment to allow Minnesota only one representative in Congress was lost by 41 to 8; and Senator Wilson's amendment to allow one representative now, to order a new census forthwith, and to base the representation thereon hereafter, was carried by 22 to 21.——The House having gone into Committee on the Deficiency Appropriation Bill, speeches on the Kansas question were made by Messrs. Hill, Wade, Ready, Gooch, Taylor, Olin, Bennett, and Wilson.

On Tuesday, in the Senate, various unimportant memorials and reports were presented; among others, a resolution from Senator Hunter, which was adopted, directing the Military Committee to inquire into the expediency of establishing a national foundery at Alexandria, Virginia. Senator Johnson introduced a bill to introduce economy into the printing department of Congress.——The House having taken up the Printing Deficiency Bill, speeches on Kansas were made by Messrs. Sandidge, Walbridge, Leidy, Davis, Clay, Campbell, Harlan, Underwood, and Hoard.

On Wednesday, in the Senate, Senator Douglas presented the Constitution of Oregon; also petitions from the Territory of Dacotah, praying for a Territorial organization. Some unimportant reports and petitions were presented. The Minnesota Bill having been taken up, speeches thereon were made by Messrs. Polk, Iverson, Fitch, Doolittle, Bright, Mason, Green, and Pugh; and the following amendments were put and voted upon: Mr. Doolittle's, to allow Minnesota two representatives, lost by 20 to 33; Mr. Fitch's, to allow three representatives, lost by 14 to 36; another, by the same Senator, to allow two representatives this session, and three when her census shows sufficient population, lost by 19 to 27; Mr. Iverson's, to allow two till the next census, lost by 23 to 26. On motion of Mr. Benjamin, this last vote was reconsidered, and Mr. Iverson's amendment was finally adopted by 29 to 21.——The House having gone into Committee on the Deficiency Bill, speeches on Kansas were delivered by Messrs. Stevenson, Gilmer, Mills, Burlingame, Parrott, Zollicoffer, Niblack, Groesbeck, Trippe, Morse, Hatch, Marshall, Hughes, Tappan, Letcher, and Walton.

On Thursday, in the Senate, the Army Bill was taken up, and Senator Hunter moved that in lieu of four regiments, the bill should read two regiments exclusive of the Texas regiment. After remarks from Senators Iverson, Pugh, Cameron, Houston, and Douglas, the motion was carried by 28 to 14. Further conversation ensued between Senators Iverson, Pugh, Johnson, Crittenden, and others, and the bill was reported to the Senate, the verbal amendments being concurred in by 25 to 10. Further discussion of the principle of the bill then ensued between Senators Hale, Wilson, Cameron, and Brown, and the bill, as amended, passed by 41 to 13.——In the House, a resolution was offered by Mr. Maynard, directing the Committee on the District of Columbia to inquire whether life and property are properly protected in the District. Mr. Haskin insisted on the expulsion of a newspaper correspondent who had, he said, maligned him. This being the day fixed for the vote on the Kansas Bill, Mr. Stephens moved that it be taken up. It was read once. Mr. Giddings having objected to the second reading the question was put: Shall the bill be rejected? Yeas 95, nays 137. The bill was then read a second time. Mr. Stephens gave way to Mr. Montgomery, who offered the Crittenden substitute, as amended by the Anti-Lecompton Democratic Conference, proposing to admit Kansas into the Union, and to refer the Lecompton Constitution to a vote of the people; in the event of its rejection by them, a Convention to be called to form a new Constitution. It also allows one member of the House of Representatives until the next Federal census. Mr. Quitman also offered a substitute, which is the same as the Senate bill, with the omission of the declaratory clause "that the people shall have the right at all times to alter or amend the Constitution in such manner as they think proper," etc. Mr. Humphrey Marshall wished to amend the Senate bill, but Mr. Stephens refused to yield the floor, and demanded the previous question. The vote was then taken on Mr. Quitman's amendment, which was lost by 72 to 160. Mr. Montgomery's substitute was then put and carried by 120 to 112.

The following list gives the vote in detail:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Andrews, Arnold, Bennett, Billinghurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Clark (Conn.), Clark (N. Y.), Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Curtis, Damrell, Davis (Md.), Davis (Ind.), Davis (Mass.), Davis (Iowa), Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Eddy, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Hall (Ohio), Hall (Mass.), Harlan, Harris (Md.), Harris (Ill.), Haskin, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Kunkel (Pa.), Lawrence, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, M'Kibben, Marshall (Ky.), Marshall (Ill.), Matteson, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Morris (Pa.), Morris (Ill.), Morse (Ma.), Morse (N. Y.), Mott, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ricaud, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Shaw (Ill.), Sherman (Ohio), Sherman (N. Y.), Smith (Ill.), Spinner, Stanton, Stewart (Penn.), Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Washburne (Wis.), Washburne (Me.), Washburne (Ill.), Wilson, Wood—120.

NAYS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocock, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Clark (Mo.), Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Craig (Mo.), Craige (N. C.), Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis (Miss.), Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Furnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, Jones (Tenn.), J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Kunkel (Md.), Lamar, Landy, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, M'Queen, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Millson, Moore, Niblack, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Searing, Shaw (N. C.), Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Smith (Tenn.), Smith (Va.), Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, Stewart (Md.), Talbot, Taylor (N. Y.), Taylor (La.), Trippe, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Wright (Ga.), Wright (Tenn.), Zollicoffer—112.

Applause being heard in the galleries, Mr. Keitt moved that they be cleared. The bill as amended was then passed by 120 to 112.

On Friday, April 2, the Kansas Bill, with the House amendments, was taken up, and Senator Green moved to disagree. Speeches were made by Senators Bigler and Pugh against, and by Senator Douglass in favor of, the House amendments; after which the vote on Senator Green's motion was taken and the motion was carried by 32 to 23.——The House having gone into committee on the Deficiency Appropriation Bill, speeches on the Utah rebellion were made by Messrs. Jones, Lovejoy, Faulkner, and Phelps.

FAILURE OF THE DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS.

The caucus of Lecomptonites and Anti-Lecomptonites met in the Representatives Hall on 29th March. Mr. English moved "that the admission of Kansas is upon the fundamental condition that the people now have, and may at all times exercise, the right of altering, amending, or changing their Constitution at pleasure." This was voted down by the Administration Democrats, and the caucus adjourned sine die, having effected nothing toward a compromise.

LATEST NEWS FROM UTAH.

We have news from the army of Utah to the 16th of February. The health of the officers and men was excellent, and they were unremittingly engaged in preparations for a forward march, which it was expected would take place about the 20th of May. It was supposed that Captain Marcy, with his mules and escort from New Mexico, and Russell and Major, with an ox train of 115 wagons, would soon reach Fort Bridger. The grass on the plains was as far advanced as in May of last season. Several hundred recruits had arrived at Fort Leavenworth, and preparations for the early starting of reinforcements continued unabated. Some had already gone on—Colonel Hoffman's command of four companies and two hundred mule trains having been met two hundred miles west of Fort Leavenworth.

The only apprehensions of Colonel Johnston relate to his supplies, which will not last longer than the first of May. An attempt was being made at Fort Laramie, where there is a supply for four months for three thousand men, to send on a train to Fort Scott as early as possible. Colonel Johnson does not propose to enter Salt Lake City, via Echo Canon, but will make a detour to the north. The opinion is entertained that the Mormons will adopt a guerrilla mode of warfare, and that it will take a couple of years to subdue them. One great difficulty relating to the occupation of Salt Lake City by our troops lies in the fact that all army supplies must come from the States.

COMMISSIONERS FOR UTAH.

It is understood that the President will appoint Commissioners to proceed to Utah to endeavor to induce the Mormons to yield obedience to the laws, in order to avoid, if possible, the shedding of blood. The Commissioners will represent the determination and force of the Government to reduce them to subjection, and will endeavor to impress upon them the uselessness of opposition. It is said that Governor Powell, of Kentucky, and Major Ben M'Culloch, will be the Commissioners.

MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT OF WASHINGTON.

In view of the nightly scenes of ruffianly violence in Washington, the Chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate, Mr. Brown, is preparing a bill to establish an efficient police for Washington, which he will bring before the Senate immediately. The features of the bill have been agreed upon, unanimously, by the committee. The police will be called the "Auxiliary Guard," and will consist of one hundred men, in uniform, with a commissioner-in-chief, a captain, and four lieutenants. The captain and lieutenants will be mounted. The cost will be about one hundred thousand dollars a year. The President will be empowered to add to this force one hundred or more on any emergency. A small portion of the appropriation proposed will be a secret service fund, for the employment of detectives, if necessary. The whole will be under the Interior Department.

PERSONAL.

A correspondent of the Times writes: "Colonel Benton is about closing his long and eventful career. He is almost the last of the old veterans—the men who were in the height of their glory during the days of Jackson, and who then made the whole country ring with the echo of their contending blows. He has been confined to his room for the last few weeks. In the pleasant weather of February he was often to be seen riding slowly, upon his splendid black horse, along the Avenue, keeping near enough to the sidewalk to enable him to recognize and return the courteous salutations of the many friends he was sure to meet. But he soon became too feeble for this, and was scarcely ever out of his chamber. Now he is confined to his bed almost entirely, suffering a great deal of pain, but bearing it with characteristic fortitude, and, in spite of it all, working incessantly at what he styles his magnum opus, the abridgment of the Congressional Debates. He has completed the work nearly to 1850, and says he only hopes to live long enough to bring it down to the present time. His familiarity with the more recent discussions of Congress renders the labor comparatively easy, and three or four months of comparative health would enable him to bring it to a close. But it is very doubtful whether this will be vouchsafed to him. He suffers from an internal cancer, and it may end his life almost at any moment. He is cheerful, resolute as ever, and especially glad to see his friends. His indomitable courage is conspicuous in the incessant vigor with which he continues to work. His review of the Dred Scott decision was written under intense suffering, and in spite of pain he persisted in having every proof-sheet ready for the mail by which his publishers would expect it."

It is rumored that Allsop, the English fugitive, has arrived at Washington, with the purpose of ascertaining what the views of government are on his extradition, if demanded.

Among the passengers by the steamer Columbia, which sailed on Saturday for Charleston, South Carolina, were the Hon. Edward Everett, Hon. Edward West, Surrogate, and Hon. Florence M'Carthy, Judge of the Marine Court. The two latter gentlemen have gone on a short trip South for the benefit of their health.

Juarez, who is contending with Zuloago for the government of Mexico, has sent a Minister to the United States. He arrived in the Tennessee, and it is understood is on the way to Washington. The Zuloago government has been recognized by our Minister in Mexico, and therefore the embassador of Juarez can not be recognized here under the present condition of affairs.

Lieutenant Beale, of the Camel Wagon-road Expedition, arrived at Washington last week, and reported himself at the War Department. The success of the Camel experiment has inclined the Administration to further use of them, and Congress will be asked to make an application of $25,000 to purchase additional supplies. Partial arrangements are already made, and a contract agreed on by the Secretary of War. It is also determined to appoint a Commissioner to go to Africa and make a treaty by which permanent supplies can be procured from that country instead of Arabia.

Ex-Governor John S. Peters, of Connecticut, died at Hebron on 20th ult. He was a member of the Assembly, as Senator or Representative, for several years, and Lieutenant-Governor from 1827 to 1831, when he succeeded Gideon Tomlinson as Governor, holding the office two years. In 1833 he was defeated by Henry W. Edwards; and he has not since appeared in political life except as a Presidential elector. He was a pleasant, gentlemanly man of the old school, of fair abilities, and of considerable reputation as a physician. He must have been over eighty at the time of his death. The funeral took place Friday noon.

Hon. David S. Reid, of the United States Senate, who has been detained in Richmond for two or three months by sickness, has left for his home in North Carolina. His health is improving, and he hopes to resume his duties in Congress shortly.

Hon. Charles Sumner left the Brevoort House on Friday morning for Washington.

His Excellency Count Sartiges, the French Minister, arrived at the same house on Thursday evening.

A New Orleans correspondent of the Herald says: "I called on ex-President Comonfort to-day. He has leased for several months the fine mansion known as the Leseps House, near the United States Barracks, some two miles below the city. There, surrounded by groves of orange-trees and magnolias, he is leading a life of quiet retirement. He spoke with regret, but without bitterness, of recent and present events in Mexico. He will probably not visit the North at present. The filibusters are here and in this vicinity in force, awaiting the grand trial which is to come off next month. General Walker went to Mobile a few days since. General Henningsen and Captain Fayssoux are also here, with Anderson, Lockridge, and others. They are confident not only that they will not be convicted, but that, in the revelations that will be made during the trial, they will knock the Administration 'higher nor a kite,' if a nolle prosequi is not entered, which, it is said, they fear will be done. After they have finished the Administration, I am informed they look to ulterior operations on the Rio Grande. The steamer Fashion having been bought in under the Sheriff's sale for $200, is now on the floating dock at Mobile, where she looks as bright as a new pin."

Among the arrivals by the St. Louis at Aspinwall, from New York, says the Panama Star of March 20, was Thomas Francis Meagher, the distinguished Irish journalist and orator, on his way to Costa Rica, for the purpose of collecting materials for a work and a series of lectures illustrative of the resources, the social and political condition, the institutions and commerce of that little state. Mr. Meagher is accompanied by Señor Ramon Paez, the eldest son of the celebrated and venerable General Paez, of Venezuela, who will not only be his companion on this trip, but his co-assistant in his proposed literary and scientific labors. Señor Paez is highly accomplished as a linguist, botanist, geologist, and naturalist, and has won considerable reputation as a draughtsman and painter. These gentlemen bring with them a splendid photographic apparatus, and letters of recommendation from Señor Molina, the Costa Rican Minister at Washington; Señor Yrizarri, the Guatemalan and Nicaraguan Minister; Royal Phelps, the consul-general for Costa Rica in New York; and from other influential citizens.

It is reported that since his arrival in this country, on a certain occasion, a lady was admiring an elegant Cashmere shawl worn by the Turkish Admiral. He gallantly took it off his shoulders, and laid it upon her own to witness its effect, or perhaps momentarily to gratify her vanity. The shawl was a magnificent one, costing $4000 or $5000. Imagine the surprise of the Admiral, when she blushingly courtesied to him, and moved gracefully off with the coveted shawl as—a present!

The Rev. Dr. Monod is returning North from his Southern tour. He has had a series of pleasant receptions.

Governor King has nominated General Duryea, of Brooklyn, as Major-General, vice Aaron Ward, resigned.

Charles H. Brown, of the Atlas Bank, Boston, died April 2, after a short illness.

T. B. Cumming, Secretary and Acting Governor of Nebraska, died on the 23d ult.

Rev. Mr. Kalloch has arrived in Kansas, and entered in a law partnership with John L. Pendery, formerly of Cincinnati.

On Friday evening a small box or case was left on the door-steps of the residence of a prominent city official in Boston, and upon the contents being examined, a note was first discovered bearing the following lines:

"Oh, take me in, and use me well,
For in this house my father dwells!"

Further investigation revealed a brazen image of an infant, or something very much resembling such an article.

Since the enterprise of C. E. Todd & Co., in Broome Street, was broken up, over 6000 letters, addressed to the proprietors, have been taken from the Post-office. These letters contained over $8000. The money has all been sent back to the writers, with the following note from the Mayor:

"Inclosed you will find the sum remitted by you to C. E. Todd & Co., who have been arrested in this city. Be on your guard against all gift enterprises, lotteries, and all other bogus schemes, as they are intended to defraud only the unwary. Daniel F. Tiemann, Mayor."

Captain Leonhart, who has figured in the disturbances in Kansas, was shot on Thursday night, 18th instant, at Geary City, by the clerk of a grocery store, who revenged himself for a blow inflicted by Leonhart.

Thackeray is said to have joined the editorial staff of the London Times.

THE TURK'S GREAT HUNTING EXPEDITION.

The Herald correspondent says: "The announcement of a party having been formed to accompany Rear-Admiral Mohammed Pacha and suite for an excursion to Minnesota, this summer, has created quite a sensation among the foreign attachés and other pleasure-hunters in Washington. Besides Vice-President Breckinridge, Senators Fitch and Rice, Becker and Cavanagh, Representatives from Minnesota, Governor Medary, Dr. Coleman, Representative elect from Dacotah, there will be a large party from Washington, and among them many of the Foreign Legation. The beautiful lakes and prairies of Minnesota, abounding with fish, game, and the buffalo, will afford such novelty and excitement to the distinguished Turk, other foreigners, and the whole party as can not be found in any other part of the world. It is proposed to start in July, and to go to Breckinridge, near the dividing line between Minnesota and Dacotah, at the head of the navigation of the Red River of the North, and at the junction of the Bois des Sioux, or Sioux Wood River, with the Red River, or Otter Tail River. This will be the head-quarters of the party. Only imagine Mohammed Pacha and suite, and these scented gentlemen of the Foreign Legations, on a buffalo hunt on our magnificent prairies of the far West! What a chance for their health, after the dissipation of Washington society and city life! and then twelve or fifteen hundred miles of railroad continuously to travel, through great cities and highly cultivated States, with all the magnificent scenery of mountains, lakes, great rivers, which for thousands of miles bear produce to the ocean, and the immeasurable prairies, how will these strike our visitors? Doubtless they will exclaim, 'God is great,' and this is a 'great country!' Speaking of this Western country of Minnesota and Dacotah, I may mention that there is a project being developed to connect by a canal, less than a mile in length, two of the lakes of Minnesota, one connecting with the waters of the Mississippi and the other with the Red River of the North, by which a continual chain of communication will be opened between the Gulf of Mexico and Hudson's Bay—between the tropics and the arctic zone—through the interior waters of this continent. Let the Turkish Rear-Admiral see these things and understand this fact, and he will apostrophize Allah and say, this is a 'great country!'"

SALE OF THE COLLINS STEAMSHIPS.

The steamships of the Collins line—the Adriatic, Baltic, and Atlantic—were sold at auction last week by order of the Sheriff. They were sold together, and brought $50,000. The liens on the property amount to $657,000. The vessels are valued at $2,500,000. The purchaser was Dudley B. Fuller, of the firm of Fuller, Lord, & Co., iron merchants.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT.

In the House of Commons, on the 17th, notice was given of a bill to limit the duration of Parliament to three years. Lord John Russell's Oaths Bill was considered in Committee—the various clauses were agreed to, and the report was ordered to be brought up on the 22d. The Lords were not in session. On the 18th, in the House of Lords, the case of the Cagliari was debated, but without bringing to light any thing not already known. In the House of Commons the state of affairs in India claimed attention. Acts of cruelty to the Sepoys were strongly denounced, and a spirit of justice tempered with mercy was advocated on all sides. Mr. Disraeli, in reply to a question from Mr. Crawford, indignantly repelled the insinuation that Lord Malmesbury's dispatch to Count Walewski had been submitted to the French Government for approval before it was officially communicated. After some debate, leave was given to bring in a bill to disfranchise the electors of Galway on the ground of bribery. On Friday, the 19th, in the House of Lords, Earl Derby stated, in reply to an inquiry, that Government would not be parties to any measure which would impair the efficiency of the system of education established for half a century in Ireland. The East India Loan bill was finally passed. In the incident debate upon it, Lord Ellenborough said that, in future, it would be necessary to keep up in India forty battalions of European infantry, ten of European cavalry, and a large force of European artillery. In the House of Commons, General Peel said it was in contemplation to give a medal for the capture of Delhi. Nothing else of importance transpired.

INSTALLATION OF THE NEW GOVERNMENT.

The members of the new Government took their seats in the House of Commons on the 12th: the first day the House had met since the re-elections consequent upon the formation of the new Administration. The following took the oaths: The Right Hon. B. Disraeli, the Right Hon. S. H. Walpole, the Right Hon. Lord Stanley, the Right Hon. J. W. Henley, the Right Hon. Sir J. Pakington, the Right Hon. Lord J. Manners, General Peel, Lord Lovaine, Sir F. Kelly, Mr. Cairns, Lord H. Lennox, Mr. Adderley, Mr. Whitmore, Mr. S. Escourt, Right Hon. G. C. W. Forester, and Mr. Inglis. Lord Palmerston took the seat generally occupied by the leader of the opposition. Lord John Russell sat on the first seat on the floor immediately beyond the gangway, beside Mr. Roebuck.

A LETTER FROM ALLSOP.

Mr. Simon Bernard has been committed for trial on a charge of complicity in the late attempt to murder the Emperor of the French. In the course of the examination before the magistrate Mr. Bodkin put in a letter in Allsop's handwriting, and addressed to the prisoner, which was found at the residence of the latter. It commenced "My dear Doctor," and contained the following passages;

"I am glad to find difference of opinion limited to a single point. Differences of opinion exist in every army, but unity is necessary for action. However, I have every confidence in the future. The abominable miscreant of the 2d of December seems to have reached his culminating point. Have you seen the withering contempt with which Smith O'Brien alluded to the Queen kissing this unconvicted felon? He is not likely to give much more trouble, even if he should escape the retribution he so richly merits. If I was in California now, I would double the amount offered by Landor to the man who should perform an act of justice toward that most wretched caitiff. It is a poor consolation to know that he is obliged to drink before going abroad to drown his fears. He must be killed, and with him the system he feels it necessary to keep up. I shall feel pleased to hear of Orsini's progress. Be kind enough to assure Orsini of my warmest sympathy and affectionate regard. Yours, fraternally,

"THOS. ALLSOP."

WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR ON ASSASSINATION.

Referring to the letter from Allsop, given above, Mr. W. S. Landor writes a letter to the Times, in which he says: "Never have I countenanced any assassination whatsoever. Assassination I consider as the basest of crimes—tyrannicide as the sublimest of virtues, it being self-immolation for a man's native country. Beyond that country it would be murder. It strikes him down who hath subverted its laws and stands above them on their ruins. Now, whoever is above them is out of them; in one word, an outlaw.

"The Emperor Napoleon is the most legitimate sovran in the universe, having been chosen by a greater number of suffrages than ever was one before; whereas the wretched and infamous government which he overthrew annulled those which itself had recently called forth and consecrated. It was not he who planned and executed the invasion of the Roman state, the sister republic coming by stealth in the garb of amity, and perpetrating an assassination a hundred-fold more extensive than the Parisian. No, it was not he; it was those small, restless, wriggling creatures which showed their heads out of their burrows in the crevices of the old republic. It was politicians like Lamartine and Changarnier—first-rate in chatter, second-rate in literature, third-rate in public confidence. These people had abjured all ambition, all encroachment, all interference with the territory or government of other nations; yet attempted to wrest Savoy from Sardinia.

"So far am I from desiring the overthrow of Napoleon, I should regret the loss to Europe of the most energetic and sagacious potentate that ever governed any portion of it, excepting the great Protector and the great Stadtholder. To England the loss would be peculiarly deplorable, since we may rely on him, and on him only, for the continuance of peace.

"Personally, I never had any intimacy or connection with democratic strangers; I detest and abominate democracy, the destroyer of republics. Let me never be confounded either with the enemies or the partisans of Napoleon. Frequently, and for many years, I enjoyed his conversation, and I heartily wish him a long life and a long succession. He knows enough of me to be convinced that I care little for rank, for power, or for popularity, and that it is quite enough for me to be as retired and obscure as any man in England."

INTERNATIONAL BICKERINGS.

It is stated that Mr. Roebuck has received a challenge from the Count de Ligny, an officer in the French army, for his language in regard to France.

Caricatures from Punch having been sent to certain French Colonels, in the name of the Army and Navy Club in London, the Committee of that Club offer a reward of £50 for the name of the party who has been guilty of the insult.

A LETTER FROM LADY HAVELOCK.

The Mayor of Birmingham has received from Lady Havelock, in reply to a vote of condolence passed by the Birmingham town council, a letter in which she says:

"The high encomiums you have been pleased to pass upon the heroic deeds of Sir Henry Havelock, as a soldier and a general, and the exalted terms in which you have spoken of my beloved husband as a man, are like sweet incense to my broken, afflicted heart; not merely because the praises of those we love are ever precious to us, but because I am so well aware that the portraiture of his almost perfect character is by no means overdrawn, and the experience of more than eight-and-twenty years of domestic happiness only serves to strengthen this opinion. But I thank my Heavenly Father that, even in this crushing and unexpected bereavement, I have many sources of comfort. Our gracious Sovereign has provided bountifully for my wants, my sons are nobly following the bright example of their father, and my two daughters are my best earthly treasures. A shade of regret might intrude if I were to reflect on the altered prospects of my fatherless children; but I can not for a moment indulge in vain regrets, for our Heavenly Father ordains all things for the best, and I have too much confidence in my husband's countrymen to suppose that they can ever cease to take an interest in the children of Henry Havelock. May I beg you will do me the honor to convey my heartfelt thanks to the corporation of Birmingham, and to believe me, with every feeling of respect, to be yours very gratefully,

"HANNAH S. HAVELOCK.

"J. RATCLIFF, Esq., Mayor of Birmingham."

FRANCE.

THE EXECUTION OF ORSINI AND PIERRI.

The execution of Giuseppe Andrea Pierri and of Felice Orsini, condemned to the punishment of parricides by the decree of the Court of Assizes of the Seine, on the 26th February last, took place on 13th ult. at seven o'clock A.M., on the Place de la Roquette. The sentence of death passed upon Carlo de Rudio has been commuted into that of hard labor for life. Gomez and Rudio will be shipped off, at the close of the month, on board the Adour for Senegal, and from thence they will be transported to the pestiferous swamps of Cayenne, which are less speedy, but as remorseless instruments of destruction as the guillotine which they congratulated themselves on escaping. The wife and daughter of Rudio will be permitted to accompany him in his exile.

THE SCAFFOLD.

"This morning the weather was bitterly cold, and the ground wet, from the snow which had fallen. The sky was covered with clouds of a slate color, and under that dismal canopy dark gray mists, transparent like funeral crape, were drifting about. The streets in the more distant part of the city were deserted, but as you neared the quarter contiguous to the prison, detached squads of sergens de ville might be seen moving toward the same direction, the occasional flash of bayonets in the gaslight was discernible, and nearer still the vague mass, without form or outline, and heaving to and fro, showed that the awful moment was approaching. Now and then a butcher's or a market gardener's cart, with its red lamp in front, rolled heavily along, and with difficulty made its way through the crowd. Many of the spectators had brought their breakfasts with them; they had their loaves under their arms, their pipes in their mouths. Some men were grave and serious, and spoke in a low tone of voice; others jested and laughed, and many observed that the prisoners well deserved their fate. About 15 paces from the gate of the prison the scaffold was erected, and on it rose the instrument of death, the name of which recalls so many terrible associations. There it stood on its platform like a ladder without steps—the block with the hole for the head to enter, at the lower end; at the upper the heavy knife of triangular shape, with its edge like a razor's; hard by it the shell for the body after decapitation, and in front the basket for the head; the cord by which the blade is kept suspended, the frame-work painted a dull red, just discerned in the dismal glimmering of a winter's morning, all presented a most hideous spectacle.

HOW THE CONVICTS PREPARED FOR DEATH.

"Precisely at six o'clock Orsini and Pierri were awoke from their sleep by the governor of the prison, who then announced to them that their hour was come. The Abbé Hugon, chaplain of the Roquette, and the chaplain of the Conciergerie, were present. They heard mass and received the Communion with respect, if not devotion. Soon after they were taken to the room called de la toilette for change of dress. When the convicts entered the chambre de la toilette, they were placed at different extremities of it, with their backs turned to each other. There were two assistant-executioners—one from Rouen, the other from Caen—besides him of Paris. These lost no time in preparing the convicts for the scaffold. During the dreadful operation Orsini remained calm; and though he was not so loud and contradictory as during his trial, Pierri was somewhat excited. The strait-waistcoat interfered with his gesticulations, but he hardly ceased talking for a moment. When the executioner was pinioning him he asked that the fastenings should not be drawn too tight, as he had no intention of escaping. The cold touch of the steel on his neck when the scissors cut off his hair, so as not to interfere with the guillotine, for an instant appeared to thrill through him; but he recovered himself when he found that his beard was left untouched. He thanked the executioner for letting him die with his face as became a man. When the hood, to which the vail which covers the features of the parricide is suspended, was put over his head, he is said to have laughed, and attempted a joke about the figure he must cut. At this moment he turned his head and perceived Orsini; he saluted him gayly, and asked how he was getting on. He was interrupted by Orsini, who was himself undergoing the same operation with the same sang froid as if he were under the hands of a valet dressing for a party, with the words, 'Be calm, be calm, my friend.' Pierri's tongue ran on, however. The assistant proceeded to strip him of his shoes, for in pursuance of the sentence they were to proceed to the scaffold barefooted. The man appeared to hesitate, but Pierri encouraged him to proceed, and assisted him as much as he could, still talking. The operation being over, and the toilet complete, he turned toward the turnkey and asked to be allowed to embrace him. This request was complied with. The moment of moving now came, and the Abbé Hugon cried out, 'Courage!' 'Oh! I am not afraid—I am not afraid,' he said; 'we are going to Calvary!' and in a sort of feverish excitement he repeated to himself, 'Calvary, Calvary!'

ORSINI'S CALMNESS.

"Orsini was, on the other hand, as calm and tranquil as his fellow-convict was excited. He spoke little; but when the governor of the prison and some of the officers approached him he bade them, in a low tone of voice, farewell. The turnkey of his cell announced to him, in a tone of regret, that his last moment was come. Orsini thanked him for his sympathy. His hair was also cut away from his neck, but he underwent the operation without flinching. At the moment when the hood was put on his head his face, which up to that moment was calm and impassible, became flushed for a moment and his eye lighted up.

THEY ASCEND THE SCAFFOLD.

"The prison clock struck seven; before the last sound died away the door leading to the scaffold opened as of itself. The Abbé Hugon entreated Pierri to profit by the few moments still left to collect his thoughts and assume a calmer attitude. He promised to be calm, but said he should chant a patriotic hymn; and it is said that he actually began to sing the well-known 'Mourir pour la Patrie.' Leaning on the Abbé Hugon he mounted fifteen steps of the scaffold, still repeating the verses of the song.

"Orsini was supported by the chaplain of the Conciergerie, and his calmness never abandoned him for a moment. When he appeared on the platform it could be seen, from the movement of his body and of his head, though covered with the vail, that he was looking out for the crowd, and probably intending addressing them. But they were too far off. The greffier then directed the usher to read the sentence of the Court condemning the prisoners to the death of parricides. The usher, who was an old man, over sixty, was evidently much moved at having to perform his duty, and he trembled as much from emotion as from cold as he read the document which no one listened to.

THE KNIFE FALLS.

"After this formality was terminated Orsini and Pierri embraced their spiritual attendants, and pressed their lips on the crucifix offered to them. They then gave themselves up to the headsman. Pierri was attached to the plank in an instant. He was executed first. The moment his vail was raised, and before his head was laid on the block, it is affirmed that he cried, 'Vive l'Italie, Vive la Republique!'

"Orsini was then taken in hand. His vail was raised, and his countenance still betrayed no emotion. Before he was fastened to the plank he turned in the direction of the distant crowd, and, it is said, cried 'Vive la France!' It was but five minutes past seven when the second head fell into the basket. A cold shudder ran among those whose attention was fixed upon what was passing on the scaffold, and for an instant there was deep silence. It passed off, however, very soon. When all was over men went to their work, and parties who had gone together to the spot from distant quarters of the town hastened home to breakfast. The morning was becoming clearer every moment. The troops began to move as if about to leave the ground. The guillotine was lowered and taken off; the crowds gradually thinned; some few groups still lingered about the spot; but the cold was bitter, and the snow began to fall, and in a few hours the place was deserted."

THE FEELING AMONG THE CROWD.

A by-stander says: "When the dead, dull sound of the falling of the knife upon Orsini was heard, it was responded to by an immense but smothered reply of 'Vive la Republique!' I can not properly describe this; it was like a gigantic mutter; it was not a cry or a shout, but it sounded like the breath of the sigh of thousands of human lungs. It was well appreciated by the authorities; for, on the instant, the soldiers raised the most disorderly clatter imaginable; struck their horses, so as to make them plunge and kick, shook their arms, and contrived that the popular whisper should be stifled without being literally put down. But the words, 'Vive la Republique!' must have been clearly audible to every one." In addition to this my friend says—"I purposely went home on foot, threading my way slowly through the groups wherever I found them thickest. I am bound to admit that every where I heard expressions of sympathy and admiration for Orsini, whose crime seems utterly forgotten, while only the effect produced by his courage and generosity toward his associates remains. Pierri's name I did not hear once. The attitude of the populace was, I should say, extremely menacing, for it has the marks of a hate and thirst for vengeance seated too deep for words. All the remarks I heard were made in an under-tone, as though a police spy were dreaded at every instant."

THE BODIES.

"Orsini has left a will, in which he begs the Government will permit his family to transport his remains to England, that they may be laid beside those of several of his companions in exile. This request he had preferred before his death. A lady applied at the Roquette prison for permission to comply with the last wishes of the deceased; but as she was not furnished with proofs of her relationship, her request was declined. It is even doubtful whether it would be granted under any circumstances; and even were it granted, it is said that the heads of both Orsini and Pierri were steeped in vitriol after death, that no prying Madame Tussaud or insinuating Claudet might, would, or could photograph the features, which may be stamped upon the banners of democracy in future times."

ORSINI'S LETTER TO HIS CHILDREN.

In the year 1854, when about to start on the desperate mission which led to his arrest at Hermannstadt, and confinement in the citadel of Mantua, Orsini intrusted the education of his daughters to his brother and uncle, and to the former addressed a letter, some passages of which are of interest at the present time:

"MY DEAR DAUGHTERS,—These few lines, together with two little hearts, which contain two locks of my hair, will be consigned to you when I am alive no longer; you will also receive a portrait greatly resembling me. The vicissitudes of Italy do not permit me to watch over your education myself, and I have not had the sweet pleasure to caress you in your most beautiful period of youth.

* * * * * * *

"First, believe in God! I have a firm conviction of His existence. Second, possess unalterable principles of honor! Mark! I do not mean malleable and material principles; no, but those which are universally recognized as such by all people and nations, which do not alter with the changes of time, of country, of governments; I mean those principles which are eternal truths, absolute, immutable, not depending on any one's caprice.

* * * * * * *

"When the true principles of honor have taken root in you, as I have explained, and that they are considered by you as the basis of public and private morality, you must necessarily be lovers of your country, honest, affectionate toward your parents, pure in your youth, pure and faithful to your husbands to whom you may be married; in fine, loving toward your children, and adorned with the finest qualities which can be desired in women destined by God and nature to embellish the life of man and to render his existence less miserable.

* * * * * * *

"Give ear to these words which your father composes with tears in his eyes. I hope that you may never suffer the lightest of the misfortunes experienced by me, the least of the disappointments in friendship. If you marry, be careful how you make your selection; let him be honest, honorable, a lover of his country; let his heart be large, and let him be capable of true friendship, and be careful to return it on your part with conduct equally noble and an affection equally pure. Be faithful to the husband whom you select for your life-companion; let the very thought of infidelity strike you with horror; destroy yourselves rather than fall into that fault; an error like that nothing can ever remedy; the pardon which might be conceded does not remedy the evil; in you remains an eternal stain, in the husband an eternal rancor—an eternal remembrance of your guilt, of your dishonesty. Take care of yourselves, and keep this as a general maxim, that the greater part of men are bad and wicked; and lastly, in leisure moments cultivate your minds with pleasing and moral reading, which will have the effect of guiding your minds early toward good, and nourishing you with the fruit of wisdom!"

THE EMPEROR'S APPEARANCE AT THE OPERA.

On Wednesday, 17th ult., for the first time since the attempt of the 14th of January, the Emperor and Empress visited the French Opera in the Rue Lepellitier. The correspondent of the Times describes the precautions taken on the occasion. For about half an hour before his Majesty arrived the streets were completely cleared; no group of persons was allowed to remain opposite the entrance. A chain of sentinels was stationed on both sides of the pathway, and the middle of the street was patrolled now and then to keep it clear. The Emperor's carriage was preceded by five or six Lancers, with an escort of about twenty or thirty; not more than the ordinary number followed.

THE SPY SYSTEM AT PARIS.

The London Times draws a fearful picture of the extent to which the spy system is carried in Paris. It says:

"We hear of professional spies of every apparent rank in life, from the well-dressed gentleman to the workman in his blouse; we hear of lorettes paid for information concerning those with whom they associate; we hear of hotels and restaurants being frequented by persons whose duty it is to listen to the conversation of suspicious visitors, and to endeavor to draw them into an expression of opinion. But the worst feature of all is the encouragement of domestic treachery by the corruption of private servants. No one can be secure that the man who brushes his coat or the woman who attends on his children is not in correspondence with the police. We are not repeating any gobemouche gossip; we are stating facts proved beyond a doubt, and commenting on practices which are not even denied." Our contemporary proceeds to show that sedition will be generated by this intolerable omnipresence of the police; that every advance of the new power will necessitate a still further extension; that such a system of government for a high-spirited nation is full of danger to the Emperor and to the world; and it asks, "Why should Napoleon III., after all his exploits and his glory, prepare for himself the old age of Tiberius?"

HOW THE EMPEROR ESCAPED ASSASSINATION.

It is stated that on 14th January the Emperor's carriage interiorly was lined with sheet iron, a circumstance which, after all, must have been the most important in saving his life. It is probable that all the imperial carriages are thus lined. It is generally believed, too, from the remarkable difference in size presented by his Majesty's person when at home and in the street, that he wears concealed armor whenever he goes out.

THE EMPEROR'S RECKLESSNESS.

A letter from Paris gives the following account of the Emperor:

"Yesterday he was in the Bois de Boulogne without escort, and was walking about with the Empress and the Imperial Prince. I happened this afternoon to be a witness to the almost rash way in which he sets at naught precautions which most men in his situation would be likely to take. Passing through the Tuileries gardens, between three and four o'clock this afternoon, I saw the Emperor alone, standing on the steps of the little staircase leading from his study to the reserved garden, which is only fenced off from the public promenade by a railing not more than forty yards from the palace, and a railing which any body might jump over. For at least a quarter of an hour he remained alone, leaning on the banisters in an attitude of contemplation, with his legs crossed, and smoking a cigar. The day being very fine, thousands of people were walking in the gardens, and great numbers leaned over the railings to stare at him. When at length, being summoned by an usher to give audience to some one, he went into his study, he left the outer door open. Whatever may be said against him, truth commands one to say that pusillanimity is not one of his characteristics."

THE DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE.

The diplomatic correspondence exchanged on the subject of Count Walewski's dispatch by the English and French Governments is reproduced by the Paris journals, and pronounced by them highly satisfactory, as far as the integrity of the alliance is concerned. The Pays and the Courrier de Paris, however, alone publish leading articles on the subject. Both articles bear certain traces of irritation. The Pays says: "Lord Malmesbury was aware of the real meaning of Count Walewski's dispatch of the 20th of January; and if he desired an explanation it was only in order to fulfill the conditions which placed the new Cabinet in power. This species of compromise between the necessities of policy and the conscience of statesmen is readily understood in England, but in France it has ever been severely judged; and these compromises form the principal motive of the disrepute into which Parliamentary government has fallen in France."

HOW THE RED PETTICOAT FARES IN PARIS.

The Times correspondent says: "The Aberdeen, or Balmoral petticoats, seem to have created in America more or less confusion in the minds of the critics. These petticoats were very common here a year ago, but were then exclusively worn by Englishwomen of fashion. The present winter they are sold in all the shops, and are worn by Frenchwomen as well. But the Frenchwomen who wear them do so for economy and not for fashion; and the consequence is that fashionable Englishwomen are forsaking them, and they will soon fall exclusively into the hands of the petite bourgeoisie."

LAMARTINE IN TROUBLE AGAIN.

Lamartine finds himself at last forced to sell his hereditary and acquired landed property at Mâcon, in order to save from grave loss the friends by whose aid alone he has for some years last past been able nominally to hold it. It is certainly high testimony to the worth of the man that, on the announcement of this determination, his townsmen and some other friends and admirers, more than four hundred persons in all, have proposed to him to take the charge of the sale, and so arrange it as to produce for him the greatest possible benefit beyond a sale conducted in the ordinary manner. It is proposed to put the estate in lottery.

A BON-MOT ABOUT WASHINGTON.

The Paris correspondent of the Times says: "The late Washington Ball at the American Legation in this city, was the subject of a bon-mot dropped by the French Minister of War, which ought to have publicity. Marshal Vaillant remonstrated with Mr. Mason previous to the ball on the inappropriateness of giving a fête during Lent, and asked if it were not a mistake. 'If it is a mistake,' replied Mr. Mason, 'it was Washington who made it, for that is his birthday, and the ball is in honor of the event.' 'Oh, that's it,' replied the Marshal; 'then it is the only mistake he ever made in his life!' The Marshal was one of the first guests at the ball—a concession he made to the name of Washington, for he is a strict observer of the requirements of Lent. When the orchestra, in opening the gayeties of the evening, commenced the national air, 'Hail Columbia!' the whole company spontaneously rose to their feet."

A STRANGE LUNATIC AT PARIS.

Some commotion was caused in the garden of the Palais Royal, the other day, by a young man, whose dress was in disorder, crying and gesticulating in a strange manner, and giving to the passers-by pieces of paper, saying, "Take and read. If you have faith you will find in letters of flame revelations of extraordinary things! And then you must act, for the fullness of time has come!" The papers, however, turned out to be blank. The man was arrested, and, on being taken before the commissary of police of the district, he fell on his knees, and, opening a Bible which he carried under his arm, he began singing a psalm. He was searched, and a small sum of money was found on him, but it was ascertained that he had distributed a larger sum. On inquiry it was found that he was a lunatic who had escaped from the asylum at Bicêtre. He was sent back to that asylum.

GERMANY.

AN APPLE OF DISCORD.

An apple of discord has been flung into Stuttgard society. A letter has come to poste restante, directed "to the fairest woman in the city." It is exhibited at the post-office window, and has some soft substance inclosed, feeling like lace, and probably of value. A committee of ladies (jury of matrons) is about to sit on the property. If men had to decide, duels would be plentiful.

INDIA.

THE COMING ATTACK ON LUCKNOW.

The Bombay correspondent of the Times writes: "In all probability the great blow has been already delivered at Lucknow by the Commander-in-Chief. Not, as we anticipated, from the direction of Futtyghur and the Ramgunga, but along the direct road from Cawnpore, by which, on the track of Havelock and Outram, he has once already marched to victory, Sir Colin advances upon the rebellious city.

"Sir Colin having, as I have said, pushed on from Futtyghur for Cawnpore, the troops followed him with all possible speed. Sir Colin went down on the 8th to see and confer with the Governor-General at Allahabad, but before that date two bridges had been thrown across the river, and the movement into Oude had commenced. A brigade under Colonel Campbell, of the Bays, crossed on the 4th, composed of the 7th Hussars, 79th Highlanders, and Major Anderson's troop of Horse-artillery.

"On the 6th went over the 9th Lancers, 1st Bengal Fusiliers, and Remington's troop of Bengal Horse-artillery. On the 10th, the 42d and 93d Highlanders, Hodson's Horse, and another troop of Horse-artillery. On the 12th, the date of our latest accounts, Sir Colin had returned from Allahabad, but had not yet crossed into Oude. The report that has reached us attributes this delay to the non-arrival of the siege-train and convoy from Agra, and adds that considerable anxiety was felt for the safety of this important addition to the attacking force. But this, I think, is a mistake, for the convoy appears to have been but two marches from Cawnpore on the 4th, with the siege-train only one march in its rear. And an officer writing from the Chief's camp on the 8th, states expressly that the train came in on the 7th, and was to cross about the 12th.

"I conclude, therefore, that Sir Colin was only waiting to see the whole force over before he himself crossed, and that within a day or two after the date of our latest accounts he once more set foot in the rebel province, at the head of probably from 12,000 to 15,000 men, and about 140 guns, some 80 of them pieces of heavy metal, and the remaining 60 field-pieces, the whole number under the command of Sir Archdale Wilson."

TRIAL OF THE KING OF DELHI.

The trial of the ex-King of Delhi commenced on Wednesday, January 27, in the Dewan Khas of the Palace. It was half past twelve o'clock before the prisoner was brought in. He appeared very infirm, and tottered into court, supported on one side by the "interesting youth," Jumma Bukht, and on the other by a confidential servant, and coiled himself into a small bundle upon the cushion assigned to him. He presented such a picture of helpless imbecility as, under other circumstances, must have awakened pity. He sat coiled up on a cushion on the left of the President and to the right of the Government prosecutor; his son, Jumma Bukht, standing a few yards to his left, and a guard of rifles beyond all.

The prosecutor read the charges against the prisoner, stating that, although the prisoner might be fully convicted by the Court, no capital sentence could be passed upon him, in consequence of his life having been guaranteed to him by General Wilson, in a promise conveyed through Captain Hodson.

The prosecutor then put the question, through the interpreter, "Guilty, or not guilty?" which the prisoner either did not, or affected not to understand; and there was some delay in explaining it to him. He then declared himself profoundly ignorant of the nature of the charges against him, although a translated copy of them was furnished and read to him, in the presence of witnesses, some twenty days previous. After some more delay the prisoner pleaded "Not guilty," and the business of the Court proceeded.

THE EVIDENCE AND VERDICT.

On the 7th and 8th days the prosecutor examined, through the interpreter, a person named Jutmull, formerly news-writer to the Lieutenant-Governor at Agra. His evidence confirmed all we have already heard concerning the cold-blooded atrocities committed absolutely under the prisoner's own apartments in the palace. The canal water, which ran through the place of execution, was, it appears, used for the purpose of washing away all traces of the bloody deed.

On the twelfth day "Golam" was examined, and gave some particulars of the massacre of Europeans inside the palace, of which he was an eye-witness.

A telegram received at Bombay states that the prisoner was found guilty, and sentenced to transportation for life to the Andamans.

BANISHMENT OF THE KING OF DELHI.

The unsatisfactory nature of the telegrams received rendered it difficult for many to understand the precise locality to which the King of Delhi has been banished. For the information of numerous correspondents we furnish the following facts respecting the settlement: Andaman Islands, or Andamans, are a chain of islands on the east side of the Bay of Bengal, consisting of four principal islands and a number of smaller. The whole chain extends from latitude 10° 10′ to 14° 55′ N.; longitude 92° 25′ to 94° 15′ E. In 1791 the English effected a settlement near the south extremity of the Great Andaman, but in 1793 removed it to Port Cornwallis, on the east side, and near the north extremity. The object of the undertaking was the procuring of a good harbor to shelter ships during the northeast monsoon, and to receive convicts from Bengal.

NENA SAHIB'S WHEREABOUTS.

There is later intelligence of the monster of cruelty, Nena Sahib. According to the natives, he was on the opposite side of the river in Oude, in the last extremity of terror and despair. Deserted by, or having himself dismissed, all his followers but a few Mahratta irregular infantry, he wanders about the country with such precipitation and impatience of delay that, in the expressive native phrase, "He dines in one place and washes his hands in another." By thus constantly shifting his position, and by equally constant changes in his dress and accoutrements, he seeks to lessen or to counteract the increasing chances of capture by an enemy against whom he knows that he has sinned too deeply to be forgiven.

WASHINGTON FROM A MOHAMMEDAN POINT OF VIEW.—[By a very obscure Member of the Turkish Admiral's Suite.]

WASHINGTON, D. C.,
31st March, 1858.

AGREEABLY to the command of his Excellency the Admiral Mohammed Pacha, I now proceed to give you the net results of our observations and experiences in Washington, after more than a fortnight's residence there and association with the Effendis and Fechas of your land.

Washington is not so large a place as Constantinople. There are not so many men there, nor so many dogs; which is the greater loss you, Editor Effendi, shall determine. Of barking and yelping, however, we had enough when we followed his Excellency into the Divan of Representatives; but—as Mirza wisely observed, that evening—whereas dogs do bark and maul at each other only when a juicy bone moveth their contention, the members of your Divan contend with each other without even the smallest morsel of bone or flesh to be won by the victors.

Of mosques there are several—poor, mean edifices, to my view—albeit the people here seem to think them monstrous fine. My pious friend Mustapha hath spent an hour extra each morning in prayer for the blind people of this region, in hopes that they may be converted to the true faith—that the Koran may be read daily in their mosques—and that a space may be cleared therein for orthodox devotion with prostrate bodies. He hath been more ardent than ever since day before yesterday, when he converted a pious American, by name Truenail Keel, a ship-builder by trade, and a man, I learn, of note in your society. His devotions at the present moment excite our earnest admiration: he spends his whole time in the perusal of the Koran, prostrates himself night and morning, bathes regularly (which, I think, was needed

ARRIVAL AT WASHINGTON.

Mussulman, and that in one of your States—Maine—that great Moslem doctrine—abstinence from spirituous liquors—has already been adopted as a general law.

I am myself a tolerant individual, and therefore when, on our arrival, a number of negroes seized us and our luggage, and carried us off hither and thither, without regard to our remonstrances, I said "Allah to praised!" and forbore to rebel against the usages of the country. I regret that on the gathering together of our party and our luggage, which Excellency should have lost much valuable property, and I a very convenient writing-desk, containing some money and many useful papers; but after all, what is written is written, and there is no use contending against the decree of fate. Who are we that we should rebel against our destiny, or assume to control the habits and customs of foreign nations? Americans submit to our usages, and I submit to theirs—though I wish I had the letters of introduction which were in my desk.

MEMBER FROM THE EAST.

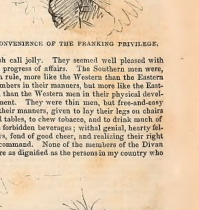
Soon after our arrival here we went to a Presidential levee. It was a very singular spectacle—at least, to us. Every body dressed as they pleased. Some seemed to have come from the plow, without even washing from their hands the dirt which their honest labor had left there. There were numbers of lovely women, all unveiled, according to the custom of your country. Two or three of them gazed at the Admiral in a manner which is well understood in our country; but his Excellency, whose virtue is truly worthy of the blessed Prophets, deputed Mustapha to communicate to them his irrevocable resolution not to enlarge his harem at present. The first to whom our venerable colleague broke the painful intelligence burst into tears; but Mustapha, in firm but respectful tones, warned her—she is the daughter of one of your principal chiefs—that neither lamentations nor tears would avail her; his Excellency's purpose was set. The next flew into furious exclamations, speaking your American language so rapidly that Mustapha could not comprehend her; but from the frequent repetition in her harangue of a sound like that, he inferred that her pride would speedily daun the torrent of her tears. He therefore applauded her resolution, and proceeded to discharge his grave duty with the third lady whose soft and eloquent eyes had told her tale of love. She, it seems, was the wife of a member of your Divan, and when Mustapha called, her husband was sitting with her drinking the unlawful but delicious beverage—Champagne. Our venerable friend delivered his message slowly and deliberately, as became his dignity. The husband started as though he was surprised, and bade our worthy colleague repeat his speech. He had not finished it—I use the words of Mustapha—before the barbarian member of the Divan rose, and seizing our colleague by the throat, shook him violently; then alleging, like the last-mentioned lady, to the prospect of damming up his feelings, actually—will you believe it?—applied the toe of his boot to a part of our friend which no respectable Turk will deposit on any thing save the softest cushion; and by consecutive and rapidly succeeding impulses, drove him into the street.

MEMBER FROM THE SOUTH.

This, too, we have agreed, is one of the customs of your country—and painful

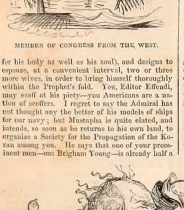
CONVENIENCE OF THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

as it was to the feelings (to speak of nothing else) of the worthy Mustapha, we have resolved to endure it with resignation.



Our next experience was in your Divan or Congress. Here we sat a whole day listening to speeches on a part of your country called Kansas, which, I am told, is very thinly populated, and not easily got at. Mirza, who is a very acute observer, felt satisfied, on watching the warmth with which the speakers debated the question, that the point at issue was whether this distant region should be supplied with population, machinery, and means to develop itself; and certainly, from the length of the speeches and the excitement of the speakers, one would infer that nothing less than the ultimate existence of the region in question was at stake. Feeling some doubt on the matter, I inquired of a member of the Divan, who was so polite as to call on us, whether Kansas would be handed over to the English, or abandoned to the wolves and buffalo, if the proposition before the Divan was rejected? He laughed a good deal (which surprised me greatly, as he had been very earnest and angry during the debate), and said: Oh no; the question was whether or no certain election returns, at places called Swindleum, and Chesteru, and Floggem, were correct; and whether they were or weren't it didn't matter, and nobody had any right to interfere.

From all which I perceived how great a people you Americans are, and how prosperous and happy you must be, when the only subject on which your legislators can quarrel is the doings of little places in wild regions on the outskirts of your country.



My friend the member of the Divan was a friend of the government. Every body in my country is a friend of our government, or pretends to be; in yours, I find, almost every body is against the government. Another illustration of the greatness of your country; for all the opposition which is made to the government does not appear to disturb it in the least. When I mentioned Mr. Buchanan's name to my friend his eyes moistened and he pressed my hand. "Mr. Turk," said he, "Buchanan is a great man—a second Washington. He has just appointed my nephew postmaster of Buchananville, in Oregon Territory."

I said that I was a great admirer of Mr. Buchanan, and that he had treated us very well.

My friend was so obliging as to point out the chief members of the House. I noticed that the Eastern men were mostly thin, spare, grave-looking men, seemingly with a great deal on their conscience. They had a hilarious and rather a cantankerous expression. The Western men, of whom there were a prodigious number, were, on the contrary, fat men, like our provincial Pachas; their face was unctuous, and their manner what the Es-

A VIGILANT GUARDIAN OF HIS CONSTITUENTS' INTERESTS.

MEMBER OF CONGRESS FROM THE WEST.

for his body as well as his soul), and designs to espouse, at a convenient interval, two or three more wives, in order to bring himself thoroughly within the Prophet's fold. You, Editor Effendi, may scoff at his piety—you Americans are a nation of scoffers. I regret to say the Admiral has not thought any the better of his models of ships for our navy; but Mustapha is quite elated, and intends, so soon as he returns to his own land, to organize a Society for the Propagation of the Koran among you. He says that one of your prominent men—one Brigham Young—is already half a occupy exalted positions; but who am I that I should undertake to judge others?

A SPEECH ON THE KANSAS QUESTION.

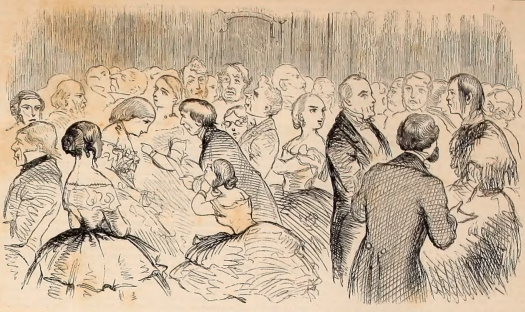
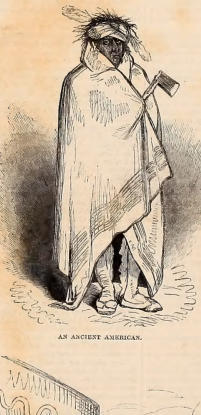
We have had many walks in the Common which they call Pennsylvania Avenue. Mirza, whose appetite is failing, crosses the Common twice before breakfast, and finds the exercise an unusual stimulus. Mustapha has tried to follow his example, but finds the distance too great: once across and back again exhausts him. It is, indeed, a monstrously wide common; why call it an avenue?

We have seen since we have been here one or two of your original Americans, and have compared them with a gentleman who has some connection with your Republican palace, and who is said to be a type of the modern American. Of course we can not judge of such matters; but to us it seems that, barring the breeches, the ancient American is the finer looking creature of the two. Is this the general opinion?



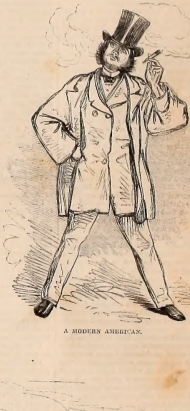
You know, of course, Editor Effendi, that, by the rules of our holy religion, no good Moslem ever tastes that heavenly but forbidden beverage which is called Champagne. Of late years, I blush to say, the wholesome rule has been honored in the breach by many to whom we had a right to look for example. Of that delicious kiosque on the Bosphorus, at Topkaneh, and of the blissful revels which it witnessed throughout many a dewy summer night, it becomes no one, much less so humble a servant of the Prophet as myself, to speak. But among us we have always—yes, always—religiously preserved ourselves pure. The other night, however, as Mirza and I were sitting enjoying our chibouks, and meditating on the uncertainty of human destinies, a member of your Divan called. He was an aged man, stout of figure, and red of face: a man monstrously puffed up, as it seemed to us, with good opinion of himself, yet ignorant of some things which even our children know—for did he not confess that he knew not the first elements of geography?—that he knew no east, no west, no north, no south? Well, this member of the Divan, after many civil speeches, announced to us that he was a manufacturer of a beverage which was especially intended for these persons who, like ourselves, religiously abstain from intoxicating drinks, and that he wished us to do him the honor of tasting it.

Mirza asked him, somewhat nervously, if he was sure it would not intoxicate?



He answered that the question having arisen in one of your Courts, an expert had been called in and plied with drink: that he had drunken bravely nine-and-forty large tumblers, until, from being a thin man when he began to drink, he had swollen to a monstrous volume before he ended: that the Court had then interrogated him, and, finding no thickness in his speech, nor uncertainty in his gait, had rendered a formal judgment that the liquor in question could not intoxicate.

Thus reassured, Mirza and I fell a drinking of the proffered beverage; and very good we found it. For my part, I take a good deal, and have found the assertion as to its harmlessness strictly true. Mirza takes more than I do, and, the other night, fell asleep on our door-step, where he was picked up by a charitable Samaritan; but as the accident occurred on the eve of the eclipse of the sun; it was readily accounted for. In our country men of Mirza's station always observe eclipses. There was no ground whatever for the profane remark made by a member of your Divan on the subject, to the effect that it was our friend, and not the sun, who had got eclipsed; nor should the accident injure the character of our favorite drink—lager beer.



Editor Effendi, I have written you a long letter. For this time I will say no more, save that I commend you to the protection of Allah.

A PRESIDENTIAL LEVEE.

AN ANCIENT AMERICAN.

A MODERN AMERICAN.

VIEW OF THE COMMON CALLED PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

LOVE'S CURE.

Ir thou will cure thine heart
Of love and all its smart,
Then sleep, dear, sleep.

And not a sorrow
Hang any tear on your eyelashes;
Lie still and deep.
Sad soul, until the sea-wave washes
The rim o' the sun to-morrow,
In eastern sky.

But with thou cure thine heart
Of love and all its smart?
Then die, dear, die.

'Tis deeper, sweeter,
Than on a stormbank to lie dreaming,
With folded eye;
And then alone amid the beaming
Of love's warm blush meet her,
In eastern sky.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A THIEF.

BY CHARLES READE.

I AM nothing that I particularly remember until I was fifteen, except born my lessons with ease and then a fight. I lived with my mother in Edinburgh. One day a parcel of gentlemanly appearance met a band of us as we were going to school, and inquired for no by name. He took me aside into a tavern, and after treating me, revealed himself to me as my father. He also gave me a crown, and promised to see me again: but was unfortunately prevented, or perhaps forgot.

My education being now considered complete, I went to receive lessons in anatomy, at which I remained for the space of nine months.

I now formed an acquaintance with a young lady. (At this time I was staying with my godfather upon my mother's decease.) But she was unfortunately a Roman, and on this account my godfather ordered me to leave off her acquaintance, which I refusing, he ordered me out of the house. I complied with this harsh mandate, but first collected all the money I could find, which amounted to about £40—and this time I went to Dumfermline, and from there to the Rumbling Brigg, where I lodged with a cousin of my wife to do: I paid my board while my money lasted—but being now empty, and my host finding I was a scholar, I agreed to give him three hours a day upon the sly, for which he privately contracted to give me secretly the remainder of his wife my board.

This lasted three months: but one evening as we were at our studies, and having neglected to lock the door, there came in three of the municipality, the wife, who had discovered our retreat, having intimated a sentence or two, which struck us upon us and falling on her knees exclaimed—

"Good gentlemen, I married to a man who does not know that three times five makes fifteen?"

and burst into a flood of tears and reproaches.

This was the last of the table he unfortunately regularly to me at the time.

His wife's confession made a counter-excitement in my pupil, and finding I had lighted a flame which would not easily be extinguished, I thought proper to retire and go back to Dumfermline. Here I learned my first trade of the many I have practiced.

I engaged myself to a master weaver and petty manufacturer. Besides learning to take drafts of patterns, etc., I used to chat sometimes: so one day he sent me to the bank to draw some money: on this I absconded with the money and went to Edinburgh.

He pursued me so closely, that, with the aid of the police, he apprehended me before I had time to spend it: to avoid punishment I gave him back the money and seventeen shillings, which was all that was a good-natured man, wished me to go back to my place; but having borne a good name in the place, and that I thought shame to go back; so I went to Newcastle after borrowing of my late master 15s. for the journey.

At Newcastle I went into a chemist's shop for some cough-lozenges: now it happened that a woman in the shop asked for some medicine, but I forgot just now what it was, but the shop-boy took down the wrong box and took down a bottle containing cannonile, I remember that—to I told the boy that he mistook the Latin term; this naturally attracted the master's attention, and he looked at me and saw I was correct; so then he asked me several questions, and finding me fit for his purpose he took me into his service—and here for a long while all my events went on as end: for I was now delight in studying my master's interests, and laying up knowledge.

He favored me with his instructions, and I enjoyed at times the company of his daughter, which was to me a comfort above all, and with whom I felt myself soon deep in love, and with her I spent many a happy hour after the business of the day was over, which put in the evenings while the moon with her bright and gentle rays gave to all things a delightful appearance, and seemed to lift up our minds to something above the groveling cares of Time—or we heard the plaintive notes of the nightingale breaking the silence of the night and calling us to join him in his songs of praise to the God of Nature. Not sweeter could be the voice of the nightingale was the voice of my companion, which was sweetest of all when its topic would turn to that portion which forms the golden part of Cupid's dart.

In these innocent joys I spent four years.

But one unfortunate evening, having a drop too much at the time, I met Miss B., as usual, and opportunity and temptation unfortunately occurring, I was guilty of a felony that has always remained in my conscience more than any of those acts I have been guilty of which the law describes to be the highest crimes.

From that night our walks beneath the moon by the river-side were no longer innocent, and we were no longer happy.

Oh cursed sight and place that robbed a virgin of her purity! and oh cursed Tyne, why did not then overflow thy banks and drive me away?—if now thy fountain-spring was to pour out streams of flaming lava, it would not purge me the disgrace out of thy dark banks; nay, if thy banks themselves were to become gold, they would not ransom the character that I this night, nor restore the rest and quiet that now fled from my pillow.

I hear much and scarce elapsed before I learned that consequences of a serious kind were to be expected.

I was in great perplexity; at last, taking a desperate course, I with much hesitation asked my master for his father's hand.

My master, who though a good-natured was a busy man, turned black and red at the idea, but recovering himself soon he turned it off as a jest.

I saw by this that he would never consent, and, dreading discovery, I got a friend of mine to write to me from Edinburgh that my sister lay at the point of death and begged to see me.

Showing this letter to my master, I got leave of absence and a present for the journey, with which I started, promising to return in a week: but I made no such intention.

I arrived at Edinburgh, and found my sister, whom I had spoken of as dying, just on the eve of marriage. I was at the wedding, but the supper I did least eat—as I was for it only recalled the thoughts of my own guilt.

I now began the world again.

I went to Stirling and obtained a situation with a baker: but the work was much too hard for me, as I felt him for days, and was glad to leave and found ten shillings; was apprehended in Glasgow and got sixty days.

On receiving my liberty I enlisted in Her Majesty service and was marched on board the Pique frigate bound for the Mediterranean.

Here I remained until we got to Plymouth, where I made my escape, but was retaken in the town and brought back to the ship and put in irons on the spar-deck under cover of a tarpaulin which was over the hatch. Immediately after this we anchored here for two days, and in the confusion of getting aboard fresh water and provisions, unperceived, and having broken my padlock the day before, I stole into the captain's cabin, he being on deck, and took from it a gold watch, chain, and dropped into the water; and the weather being calm, and having an excellent opportunity, I swam alongside a brigantine that lay at anchor in the bay, and hailing her from the surface of the water, sang out that I had fallen overboard.

"We are," was the reply, "where do you hail from?"

"What has that to do with it?" said I. So they hauled me on board.

The master finding I had been educated, sent me on shore to his brother who kept a store; and he now I was in Edinburgh.

I lived with my new master: we used to come to the shop in the morning and go home at night. He lived at what is called the Head of Leith, in a pretty Gothic house, which stood in the middle of a delightful garden, and which commanded from the front of the house an avenue of orange and lemon-trees mixed: their branches bent with the weight of their fruit, and the whole garden filled with great shaddocks and limes, that by like lamps of gold, studded among their dark-green leaves. The air too was filled with the scent of thousands of rich flowers that were scattered about, some by nature, some by art, in the garden, in short, it was an earthly paradise, in which I might have ended my days if the devil had not put it into the head of a mind with the desire to behold once more my native country—stupid fool.

I sat out, and after a slow passage reached the port of London.

Sailing down the Commercial Road till my money was nearly gone, and then I became dissonable.

Wandering one day in the Ratcliffe Highway in a new Jew Suit I met with an old acquaintance whom I had known through being in trouble together; he informed me that he had married a servant in the neighborhood, who, after a few words with my companion, told me "it was all right; we should find means of keeping me."

I went to bed, and when I wanted to get up, my clothes were gone, and with all my money I had left. Remonstrating with the landlord, he said, "Oh, it is a mistake," and disappearing for a few minutes, during which I heard high words and a bit of a tussle, he returned with my clothes and money.

The next day seeing me very dull, and concluding by that I was ripe for business, he inquired the cause of my uneasiness.

I told him my last shilling was nothing.

He laughed at the cause of my grief, saying,

"You don't know," said he, "you are in the Mint."

"In the Mint?" said I.

"Yes!" was his reply; "in the Mint my boy!" He then led me to the back up a chisel and went to the chimney and carefully removed a loose brick, and took out of the hole left by the brick a bag of gold and coins of every sort in profusion flashed upon my bewildered eyes—and not only coins, but dies for the making of all sorts for money.

"Now," said Cæsar, "having gone so far, you must take the step."

Four men and four females were then summoned, and standing in the middle of them I took a solemn oath to this effect:

"I hereby swear never to tell say one how to make 'shells' nor where I learned it, nor get to me any kind of language that may lead to the same, upon pain of death."

Here followed imprecations upon my eyes and limbs, if broken, such as are used among freemasons, etc., but not being fit for your ears, I suppress that part.

The next process was to go and change a base sovereign, which I did accordingly, returning with nineteen and sixpence, and of which sixpence went for the gin.

Behold me now a shoffle-pitcher. But it was never my way to remain at the bottom of any business that I found worth studying. I therefore in the course of six months learned to coin first a shilling, then a sovereign, then the most difficult of all, a crown; and last of all to make the moulds for each of these coins; and as soon as I found I could make a mould for a crown, I dissolved partnership, and went to Gravesend on my own bottom.

You will blame me less for this revolt if I tell you the terms which we worked with him whom I have called Cæsar, and his name did begin with a C.

He had the half of every coin we uttered—he had the cost of the metal besides, and the half of every article produced by the mint, with respect and attention, I attracted notice, and was made a member of the body, and soon after permitted to work part in a pit. I was a doctor's shop in the Commercial Head, and my share came to £50. And this was only the first of many transactions of this kind.

And as it seems every one that is in a business does not master it if possible, I will tell you how I attended to mine, trusting you will not make it a precedent, for as it is not considered honorable among us to reveal the secrets of business.

Now as the chief work of practitioners in our line is to find out where the money or valuables are kept, this was my plan:

If it was a house, I would go in and buy something, give the shopman a sovereign and notice where he put it, and from whence he took the change, and as I left the shop, time the door was fastened, whether with a lock or bar, or while my pal (for we always work in pairs) was engaging the shopman, I would take the dimensions of the name.

Or if it was a dwelling-house, I would in the evening the master with a card stating I was a china or glass-monger, a French-polisher, a teacher of music, and so on, and by every mean I got admittance into the parlor, and then you may be sure my eyes were not shut.

Or else I would go and offer the servant some article for sale as a hawker, and would chaff out her master, and if she mentioned a notion where the plate was kept, and the next week come and fetch it away.

In the course of a few weeks I had collected some where about one hundred pounds in money and valuables, and having the police hard after me, I left London, and went down by the Leith smack to Edinburgh.

Here I visited my friends and passed myself off all their society for a thriving tradesman.

I also sent home money to Miss B., not that money could repay the injury I had done her, but still it would make her friends more civil to see that she wanted for nothing.

If my real character had not got wind in Newcastle, I should have, as they would have said, married her; and I think, had as I am, I should have mended for her sake, for she was the only woman I ever really loved.

It is an old saying, that "the money which comes by the wind goes by the board."

I have made thousands, but never could keep so much as a 5*l.* note.

In a short month nearly all my money was melted, and I set out on a cruise again.

Sailing down the Thames I off hoasts in Yorkshire I met with a friend who manufactured base coin, and, having passed a quantity of it, he advised me to go on my own. I determined to study a new profession.

I therefore secluded myself from all my idle companions, took a quiet lodging, bought several medical books, and studied the human frame and the disorders to which it is subject.

I studied night and day with the same diligence as I had given to coining, horse-breaking, and all other professions.

In a short month I considered myself fit to start, which I accordingly did with as much pomp as I could command, having seen how far that goes toward success in all honest professions.

I engaged a servant with a handsome livery to deliver my bills, took respectable lodgings, and attend upon me when I addressed the public.

I had a thousand bills printed representing myself as Dr. Graham, late Court Physician, and I furnished myself with testimonials from respectable parties; I mean that would have been of this sort had the fact had no existence: and printed them at the foot of my bills.

My plan was on entering a town, first to go for the more respectable customers by putting up at a good inn, making friends with the landlord, and sending my footman round with my bills—but before leaving I used to appear in my true colors as an inveterate gambler.

In this capacity I used to harangue the people and sell my medicines.

In my public discourses I always ran down the regular practitioner, as we are all obliged to do, and the plan I used to follow was cool irony—I found this went farther than pretending to get into a heat.

Unlike most quacks I did not apply one or two remedies to every disorder, and I met with wonderful success, especially with the women: partly I think because with them imagination goes for, and my patient acquired them with more confidence than the regular doctors could, not having the gift of the gab.

While traveling as a doctor I never would accept money from any of my patients until the cure was, whatever it might be, took a turn for the better; and even then my charges were always low: but to make up I did pass a deal of base coin wherever I traveled.

The following were some of my most remarkable cures:

The landlady of a public-house at York of a dysentery.

At Wakefield I reduced an impostume which the regular doctors were going to have cut, if it had not burst for me.

At Hull I actually cured a respectable woman of a cataract, and was praised in the public journals.

These, and a hundred ordinary cures, are the benefits I rendered the public in return for the many wrongs I have done it.

I had now been practicing pharmacy some three months; when one day I received a letter from Newcastle.

It was from Miss B.'s uncle telling me I might visit her now.

The letter was very short, and there was something about it I did not, understand; so that, instead of setting me with delight on a letter would a while ago, I set out for Newcastle flesh of sash but full of perplexity.

I reached Newcastle, and lest her friends should have changed their mind again, and receive me with an officer, I went in an hide-hand carriage to her residence, and sent for her younger brother, who had never been so much against me as the rest.

He came directly, and I began to put a dozen questions to him: but he answered none: he hung his head and said, "Don't ask me—you will soon know—and since you are here, come without fear." Then he led the way in gloomy silence.

I was taken into the house and after some little delay was allowed to go into her room—I shall never forget it.

Her cheeks, that used to be like two roses, were now pale and lifeless; and her beauties—her two dull and sunk in her head; only her voice and her smile were the same as ever.

Her first word was, "I have only waited for this—" then she stretched out her hand and thanked me in a sweet and sampered voice "for coming to perform the last part of a husband's duty!" I had been told of her marriage this and the poor thing burst into a flood of tears, and I fell on my knees and sobbed and cried with her, and her relations mistook my fit that time for one to come between us any more now, and they looked at one another and left the room without any noise, and we were alone a little while.

And then I kneeled down again and prayed her to forgive me for injury I had done her then and character—and then she answered like a woman and what she said to me then was the last answer from her, and she dying, went through me like a knife, and I prayed to die for her, or at least to die with her: and remaining late unnoticed in useless grief, and groveling in anguish and remorse upon the floor, some of them came in and informed her her sake, and very properly led me away—and not in an unkind manner, for which may God bless them always.

I hope you may never feel as I did—I had no certain sense of what I felt: my head ached into bed, and my sleepless but motionless till daybreak. Then I was sent word down to the river-side and walked up and down—and at about nine, when I thought the family would be up, I went to the house.

The master and I came in sight of the house, and all the shutters were up. But it gave me scarcely any shock, for I was stone, and I seemed to know before this that all was over.

They wished me to see her, but I was unable then—but the next day before she was buried I took a last look at her—it did not seem to be her but only some shell of some thing she had once inhabited—now a ruinous heap of corruption: and that is an awful word.

Is it a castle?—there was a time when the heart of the bold soldier burned with ardor to defend it.

Is it a mansion?—there was a time when the loud applause of eloquence thundered from its roof—

Or is it a temple?—there was a time when the white-robed priest bent before the altar, that heaven to bless the sacrifice.

But here is a temple, one not made with hands, the architecture of which is too sublime for our minds to conceive—a temple that was erected to be the seat of the Most Holy, one in which not only the image but the spirit of its Creator: let me ask, then, why was it thus left desolate, and whither has its tenant gone?

Tell me, ye seas, whose waves roll still ripple as when the white-robed spirit of Jesus walked—tell me, have ye seen the airy stranger float along your surface, and whither has it gone to rest?

Tell me, ye winds, harpers of the mountain forest: methinks ye could; for there are times ye whisper so mournfully, as if ye were in solemn communion with departed spirits; tell me, have ye seen this airy stranger, and whither has she gone? Tell me, ye dazzling worlds that perform your regular but mystic dance upon the airy sea: first tell me, have ye seen the spirit—tell me, have ye seen her airy stranger float along your surface, and whither has she gone to rest?

Such thoughts as these followed the first anguish at losing her, and to all these inquiries one answer seemed to come back to me from all Creation—

"The body returns to the dust, and the soul to God who gave it."

And when I compared this answer with my own conduct, I felt I was far behind: and every poor sweet-hearth grave I vowed to amend my life—that one day I might hope to meet her again. The first three days after the funeral I tried in every direction for an honest situation.

The fourth I fell from all my good resolutions.

In my despair I had recourse to drink, and was undone. I was drunk for a whole week, and by the end of that time was penniless.

Let mankind take warning by my fate, and not fancy the habit of drink can be formed with safety. Up to this time, though like all the world I had wasted a large portion of my gains upon drink, yet I had never gone at it like a madman. But what of that? the habit was formed, it was there waiting like a lion for its prey, waiting for a great opportunity—one came—I was in despair—my appetite was gone, and drink comforted my stomach: my heart was dead, and drink made it beat. I had recourse to this solace, and became a beast. As I said before, for a whole week I was never not to say sober.

No man and no woman is safe that has once formed the fatal habit of looking to drink for solace—or cheerfulness—or comfort. While the world goes well they will likely be temperate: but the habit is built, the railroad to destruction is cut ready for use, the trains are laid down, and the station-houses erected; and the train is on the line waiting only for the locomotive. Well, the first great trouble or hopeless grief is the locomotive: it comes to us, it grapples us, and away we go in a moment down the line we have been years constructing, like a flash of lightning, to the devil.

I woke one afternoon sober and penniless.

From drunkenness to thieving is not a very wide leap even to those who are beginning an evil career—to me it was no more than crossing a gutter. I pawned my watch and got on board the steamer for London, and back to my old haunts.

I soon fell in with an old pal and borrowed £10 of him, and began first to pass and after that to coin "shoffle;" and, when that was not quick work enough, took to house-breaking and shop-lifting again.

But in the early part of this chapter of my career, having very little cash, for part of the £10 went for clothes, I was obliged to be moderate in my expenses, and I accordingly spent a week in a lodging-house kept by an old friend of mine, which I will try to describe.

The house itself is divided into two separate compartments besides the bedchambers.

The first or state apartment is for professional thieves.

The back-room is for those street trades that lie between thieving and commerce.

My friend ushered me in here, and there were more than a score of them all gazing with their mouths open at the new-comer—all engaged at various labors, and talking a dozen different branches of cant.

Some were making mats—some arranging articles for sale in their baskets or on their trays—some making matches—the "askers" selling their begged bread at three halfpence the pound—another tuning up his fiddle—the whole lot comparing notes to the detriment of the public—the beggar telling the match-maker at what house they gave him meat or money—the hawker and mat-maker exchanging the same sort of profitable information, by which many an easy-going gentleman, that thinks himself obscure, gets his habits published among the dregs of society, and perhaps a nickname tacked on to him, and more people knowing him by it than know him by his own.

Then there was the "buzzer" practicing his necromancy—presently in came a "sneaker" with half a firkin of butter for sale at 4*d.* per pound—on which the women fell to abusing their men because they had not enough money to buy ten or twelve pounds—children crying—and all in a mighty way because the fountain is not boiling.

In the corner was a handsome young female evidently a stranger, biting the end of her apron-string, her mind not being able to comprehend the fullness of the scene.

"Here is a sweet-heart for you and all," said my friend. "She is waiting for her husband to come back," added he, winking to me.

Her husband, as she had called the man who had enticed her from her friends, never came back, and indeed nobody except herself ever thought he would.

Then to amuse her mind I requested her to go an errand for me—she agreed—I gave her a base sovereign and sent her to buy groceries, which when she had done I invited her to take tea with me, and over our tea she told me her story without reserve.

Finding she was a decent girl, and apparently had never made but this one slip, I determined to enter into partnership with her if she would consent.

Strange as it may appear I felt the want of a female companion now in a way I never had until Miss B.'s death. I believe my nerves were shaken by that sad event, and I began to want to see a woman's face opposite me, and to hear the soft notes of a female voice.

Three days after our first meeting we were married according to the custom of the house—i. e., a traveler dressed in a white sheet with holes cut for his arms read a few sentences of the marriage-service to us—he then drew a line on the floor with a piece of chalk and made us leap over it in succession while he recited in a solemn voice the following:

"Leap rogue, and follow jade,
Man and wife for ever more."

Which concluded the ceremony, and we were man and wife in the eyes of all the lodgers, unless we should agree to be untied, which could only be done by the same party or his successor, and with other ceremonies, and above all—fees! We soon left this house and set up a lodging of our own. She made me very comfortable when I was at home, and I let her want for nothing.

I lived nearly three years in London this bout, and, owing to the company I kept, I got the cockney phrase and twang, so that I fear I will never entirely get rid of them. Indeed I am commonly taken for a cockney, which is a sad disgrace to a man born north of the Tweed.

At the end of this time my wife's friends sent to beg her to come home, which she asked my leave to do—I consented, and we were untied and parted with mutual expressions of esteem. Finding London rather dull after she was gone, I agreed to join a gang of us that were about to make a provincial trip.

We went to Mortimer, a village in Berkshire—the scene of our business was Reading and its neighborhood—we committed some very daring robberies in Reading and Caversham that will not soon be forgotten.

We broke into one house in Reading in open day—it was Sunday, and the whole family were gone to church—we rifled the house and left a paper on the table, on which, I am ashamed to tell you, I wrote—

"Watch as well as pray!!"

But this could not last forever. I had been out fishing all day (a sport I am very fond of) when returning toward dusk I saw a strange face at one of the windows of our house.

Not quite understanding this, I turned back and went a mile round, to where I could see the back of the house without being recognized—and my caution was not wasted.

I soon found that the house was in the possession of the police, and that all or most of my comrades were nabbed.

Having some money about me I decamped, and returning to town found two of my companions about to start for California, dazzled by the accounts we heard of the fortunes made there by digging and levying the road-side tax on those who dug.

I joined them, and after a voyage of six months we landed at San Francisco.

I will abstain from relating my adventures in the New World; in fact, they would of themselves fill a volume: suffice it to say, I had at one time twelve hundred pounds in money and gold dust; but I wasted the greater part, and by a just retribution was robbed of the rest.

I returned to London with £10 and a nugget, which I sold for £25 in Threadneedle Street.

And now, not liking the smoke of London, after one or two successful jobs which swelled my stock to a matter of £60, I bought some new clothes, and went down to Reading; but not thinking it prudent to remain there long, I crossed the river and went into Oxfordshire.

I heard of a farmer who sometimes took a lodger, and as I was well dressed and he too honest to be suspicious, we soon came to terms.

The farmer was George Fielding. I never met with such a character as his: he did not seem to know any thing about lying, far less taking any thing without paying for it.

When I first lodged with him I had of course an eye to business, but I got so fond of him I could not take any thing of his—and he was attached to me too, until one unlucky day he found out my real character; and then he insulted me—and now he despises me.

I spent four innocent months here, and I often thought if I could have such an honest man as George Fielding always close to my side all day, I could keep from taking any thing all the rest of my life—but unluckily my money gradually melted; in which state I went to a fair in the neighborhood—I saw a rich farmer take out some notes and make a payment, and put the rest back into a side-pocket; almost before it reached the bottom of his pocket it was in mine.

The country banks close at three o'clock, and it was near four at the time; I got rid, therefore, of the Bank of England notes, meaning to change the others when a good opportunity should occur.

But meantime I suppose measures were taken against me—any way the police came down from London, and I was seized, identified, and put to an open shame.

This, the last passage of my life, went nearer to drive me to despair than all the rest; for I had begun to taste the sweets of innocence, and to love honesty under the name of George Fielding.

I was convicted at the assizes, and being recognized as having been seven times in prison, and notoriously guilty of many felonies besides, they sentenced me to twelve months' imprisonment and transportation for ten years.

I have been six months in this jail, where I have met with most cruel treatment, being forced to labor beyond my strength even when weakened by sickness; and punished for mere inability: and, besides the harm this wrought my body, it hardened my heart and made me look on mankind as my enemy.

Well, Sir, when I look back upon my past life, of which what I have written here is no more than a single page out of volumes and volumes—when I think of the many opportunities I have had of doing good to myself and others, and then think of how it all ends—a convicted felon, doomed to pass the remainder of my life in shame and exile, debarred from situations where I could execute my talents, and felon printed upon me, I am whiles tempted to put the gas-pipe that is in my cell into my mouth, and suck the poisonous vapor into my lungs, and thus with crime to end a life of crime. But then your face, Mr. Chaplain, rises up before me and expostulates with a look, and bids me be patient and hope—also your words, that I ought to be thankful to God for his mercy in giving me time to reflect on the enormity of my crimes, and not cutting me down as a cumberer of the ground.

But, above all, I feel it would be ungrateful to you, and grieve you, if I was to make away with myself under your eye; or even to despair.

I will try my best to be somebody yet, if only for your sake; for it is a shame a gentleman like you should give his days and his nights, and all the blood in his heart, to saving us poor fellows from perdition, and be continually disappointed.

So once more thanking you for all kindness, and for setting me to write this, which has amused and whiled away some weary hours, and begging you to excuse all faults and blunders, for in my busy life writing is an art I have had no time to give my mind to, I close this record of the disgraceful past, and, here in my cell, envying the cripple round whom the free air plays and on whom the sun shines, I await the gloomy future.

THOMAS *
—alias WILKINSON.
—alias LYON.
—alias M'PHERSON.
—alias SCOTT.
—alias HOWARD.
—alias ROBINSON.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

BOOK VI.—CHAPTER I.

Being an Address to the Reader.

SEEING the length to which this Work has already run, and the space it must yet occupy in the columns of Maga, it is but fair to the Reader to correct any inconsiderate notion that the Author does not know "what he will do with it." Learn, then, O friendly reader, that no matter the number of months through which it may glide its way to thine eyes—learn that with the single exception of the chapter now respectfully addressed to thee, THE WHOLE OF THIS WORK HAS BEEN LONG SINCE COMPLETED AND TRANSFERRED FROM THE DESK OF THE AUTHOR TO THE HANDS OF THE PUBLISHER.

On the 22d of January last—let the day be marked with a white stone!—the Author's labors were brought to a close, and "What he will do with it" is no longer a secret—at least to the Editor of Maga.

May this information establish, throughout the rest of the journey to be traveled together, that tacit confidence between Author and Reader which is so important to mutual satisfaction!

Firstly.—The Reader may thus have the complaisance to look at each installment as the component portion of a completed whole; comprehending that it can not be within the scope of the Author's design to aim at a separate effect for each separate Number; but rather to carry on through each Number the effect which he deems most appropriate to his composition when regarded as a whole. And here may it be permitted to dispel an erroneous idea which, to judge by current criticism, appears to be sufficiently prevalent to justify the egotism of comment. It seems to be supposed that, because this work is published from month to month in successive installments, therefore it is written from month to month, as a newspaper article may be dashed off from day to day. Such a supposition is adverse to all the principles by which works that necessitate integrity of plan, and a certain harmony of proportion, are constructed; more especially those works which aim at artistic representations of human life; for, in human life, we must presume that nothing is left to chance, and chance must be no less rigidly banished from the art by which human life is depicted. That art admits no haphazard chapters, no uncertainty as to the consequences that must ensue from the incidents it decides on selecting. Would the artist, on after-thought, alter a consequence, he must reconsider the whole chain-work of incident which led to one inevitable result, and which would be wholly defective if it could be made to lead to another. Hence, a work of this kind can not be written currente calamo, from month to month; the entire design must be broadly set forth before the first page goes to press; and large sections of the whole must be always completed in advance, in order to allow time for deliberate forethought, and fair opportunity for such revisions, as an architect, having prepared all his plans, must still admit to his building, should difficulties, not foreseen, sharpen the invention to render each variation in detail an improvement consistent to the original design.

Secondly.—May the Reader—accepting this profession of the principles by which is constructed the history that invites his attention, and receiving now the assurance that the Work is actually passed out of the Author's hands, is as much a thing done and settled as any book composed by him twenty years ago—banish all fear lest each Number should depend for its average merit on accidental circumstances—such as impatient haste, or varying humor, or capricious health, or the demand of more absorbing and practical pursuits, in which, during a considerable portion of the year, it has long been the Author's lot to be actively engaged. Certes, albeit in the course of his life he has got through a reasonable degree of labor, and has habitually relied on application to supply his defects in genius; yet to do one thing at a time is the practical rule of those by whom, in the course of time, many things have been accomplished. And accordingly a work, even so trivial as this may be deemed, is not composed in the turmoil of metropolitan life, nor when other occupations demand attention, but in the quiet leisure of rural shades, and in those portions of the year which fellow-workmen devote to relaxation and amusement. For even in holidays, something of a holiday-task adds a zest to the hours of ease.

Lastly.—Since this survey of our modern world requires a large and a crowded canvas, and would be incomplete did it not intimate those points of contact in which the private touches the public life of Social Man, so it is well that the Reader should fully understand that all reference to such grand events, as political "crises" and changes of Government, were written many months ago, and have no reference whatever to the actual occurrences of the passing day. Holding it, indeed, a golden maxim that practical politics and ideal art should be kept wholly distinct from each other, and seeking in this Narrative to write that which may be read with unembittered and impartial pleasure by all classes and all parties—nay, perchance, in years to come, by the children of those whom he now addresses—the Author deems it indispensable to such ambition to preserve the neutral ground of imaginative creation, not only free from those personal portraitures which are fatal to comprehensive and typical delineations of character, but from all intentional appeals to an interest which can be but momentary, if given to subjects that best befit the leading articles of political journals. His realm, if it hope to endure, is in the conditions, the humors, the passions by which one general phase of society stands forth in the broad light of our common human nature, never to be cast aside, as obsolete and out of fashion, "into the portion of weeds and worn-out faces."

Reader! this exordium is intended, by way of preface to that more important division of this work, in which the one-half the circle rounds itself slowly on to complete the whole. Forgive the exordium; for, rightly considered, it is but an act of deference to thee. Didst thou ever reflect, O Reader! on what thou art to an Author? Art thou aware of the character of dignity and power with which he invests thee? To thee the Author is but an unit in the great sum of intellectual existence. To the Author, thou, O Reader! art the collective representative of a multifarious abiding audience. To thee the Author is but the machine, more or less defective, that throws off a kind of work usually so ephemeral that seldom wilt thou even pause to examine why it please or displease, for a day, the taste that may change with the morrow. But to him, the Author, thou art, O Reader! a confidant and a friend, often nearer and dearer than any one else in the world. All other friends are mortal as himself; they can but survive for a few years the dust he must yield to the grave. But there, in his eye, aloof and aloft forever, stands the Reader, more and more his friend as Time rolls on. 'Tis to thee that he leaves his grandest human bequest, his memory and his name. If secretly he deem himself not appreciated in his own generation, he hugs the belief, often chimerical and vain, but ever sweet and consoling, that in some generation afar awaits the Reader destined at last to do him justice. With thee, the Author is, of all men, he to whom old age comes the soonest. How quickly thou hastenest to say, "Not what he was! Vigor is waning—invention is flagging—past is his day—push him aside, and make room for the Fresh and the New." But the Author never admits that old age can fall on the Reader. The Reader to him is a being in whom youth is renewed through all cycles. Leaning on his crutch, the Author still walks by the side of that friendly Shadow as he walked on summer eves, with a school-friend of boyhood—talking of the future with artless, hopeful lips! Dreams he that a day may come when he will have no Reader! O school-boy! dost thou ever dream that a day may come when thou wilt have no friend?

CHAPTER II.

Etchings of Hyde Park in the month of June, which, if this History escapes those villains the trunk-makers, may be of inestimable value to unborn antiquarians.—Characters, long absent, reappear and give some account of themselves.

FIVE years have passed away since this History opened. It is the month of June, once more—June, which clothes our London in all its glory; fills its languid ball-rooms with living flowers, and its stony causeways with human butterflies. It is about the hour of 6 P.M. The lounge in Hyde Park is crowded; along the road that skirts the Serpentine crawl the carriages one after the other; congregate, by the rails, the lazy lookers-on—lazy in attitude, but with active eyes, and tongues sharpened on the whetstone of scandal; the Scaligers of Club windows airing their vocabulary in the Park. Slowly saunter on foot-idlers of all degrees in the hierarchy of London idlesse; dandies of established fame—youthful tyros in their first season. Yonder, in the Ride, forms less inanimate seem condemned to active exercise; young ladies doing penance in a canter; old beaux at hard labor in a trot. Sometimes, by a more thoughtful brow, a still brisker pace, you recognize a busy member of the Imperial Parliament, who, advised by physicians to be as much on horseback as possible, snatches an hour or so in the interval between the close of his Committee and the interest of the Debate, and shirks the opening speech of a well known bore. Among such truant lawgivers (grief it is to say it) may be seen that once model member, Sir Jasper Stollhead. Grim dyspepsia seizing on him at last, "relaxation from his duties" becomes the adequate punishment for all his sins.

Solitary he rides, and, communing with himself, yawns at every second. Upon chairs, beneficently located under the trees toward the north side of the walk, are interspersed small knots and coteries in repose. There, you might see the Ladies Prymme, still the Ladies Prymme—Janet and Wilhelmina; Janet has grown fat, Wilhelmina thin. But thin or fat, they are no less Prymmes. They do not lack male attendants; they are girls of high fashion, with whom young men think it a distinction to be seen talking; of high principle, too, and high pretensions (unhappily for themselves they are coheiresses), by whom young men under the rank of earls need not fear to be artfully entrapped into "honorable intentions." They coquet majestically, but they never flirt; they exact devotion, but they do not ask in each victim a sacrifice on the horns of the altar; they will never give their hands where they do not give their hearts; and being ever afraid that they are courted for their money, they will never give their hearts save to wooers who have much more money than themselves. Many young men stop to do passing homage to the Ladies Prymne; some linger to converse—safe young men, they are all younger sons. Farther on, Lady Dorset and Mr. Crampe the rival, are similarly side by side, pecking at each other with sarcastic beaks; occasionally desisting, to fasten up and clear upon that common enemy, the passing friend! The Sloanes, a numerous family, but taciturn, sit by themselves—bored to much; accosted rarely.

Note that man of good presence, somewhere about thirty, or a year or two more, who, recognized by most of the loungers, seems not at home to them. He has passed, by one of the various entries just described, inside his clearance to the Ladies Prymne, received and let go again from Lady Prest, and a laconic meet from Mr. Crampe, and exchanged silent bows with seven silent Sloanes. He has wandered on, looking high in the air, but still looking for some one, not in the least in the absolutely disengaged, in his search, comes to a full stop at length, takes off his hat, wipes his brow, utters a petulant "Pre——sterous!" and seeing, at last, in the background, the chirpless shade of a thin, emaciated, puny tree, blither he retires, and seats himself with as little care whether there to seat himself be the right thing in the right place, as if in the honey-suckle arbor of a village inn. "It serves me right," said he, to himself, "a precocious child learns in open air, to-day as to-day, makes an appointment to meet here, in these very walls, ten minutes before six; de coeur me with the promise of a dinner at Prest——room looking on the river, and fried flounders. I have the vanity to yield; I give change my habits—I leave my coal studio; I put off my cosy blouse; I imprison my free-born throat in a cravat invented by the Tinge's two days are at hand, and I walk rashly over scorching pavements in a black-cool, and a blinding hat; I annihilate 3s. 6d. in a pair of kid gloves. I arrive at this haunt of spiders; I run the gauntlet of Dreams, and Prymnes, and my cruel traitor fails me! Infâ pust sis—not a sign of him! and I wait here at Putney—among flounders? Dreams! Patience, five minutes more; if then he comes not—bench for life between him and me! Ah, voilà! there he comes, the laggard! But how those folks are catching at him! Has he asked them also to dine at Putney, and do they care for fried Flounders?"

The solitaire's eye is on a young man, much younger than himself, who is threading the motley crowd with a light quick step, but is compelled to stop at each moment to exchange a word of welcome, a shake of the hand. Evidently he has already a large acquaintance; evidently he is popular, on good terms with the world and himself. What free grace in his bearing! what go! what cool-haunt of the visible Powers above! Lady Willelmina surely blushes as she returns his bow. He has passed Mr. Frost unblighted; the Slowes evince emotion, at least the female Slowes, as he shoots by them with that step. He looks this way, that side to side, with a rapid glance of an eye in which light seems all dance and sparkle; as one in the soliloquist under the meagre tree—the pace quickens, the lips part, half laughing:

"Don't scold, Vance, I am late, I know; but I did not make allowance for the tête——s."

"Body o' me, redemptions! But you have just arrived in London, you seem to live no lack of friends."

"Friends made in Paris, and found again here at every corner, like pleasant surprises. But no friend so welcome, and dear, as Frank Vance."

"Sensible of the honor, O Lionello the magnificent. Verily you are bon Prince! The Houses of Valois and of Medici were always kind to artists. But whither would you lead me? Back into that trend-mill? Thank you, humbly; no. A crowd in fine clothes is of all ends the dullest. I can look unconcerned on the many-headed monster, wild and rampant, but when the many-headed monster puts on hats in Bond Street, and has an eye-glass at each of its inquisitive eyes, I confess I take fright. Besides, it is now seven o'clock; I dread wet vair, bile, and the flounders not fried!"

"My dear fellow, wonder, we must walk it—we can keep on the turf, and avoid the throng. But tell me honestly, Vance, do you really dislike to mix in crowds—you, with a fame, dislike the eyes that turn back to look again, and the lips that respectfully murmur, 'Vance, the Painter?' Ah, I always said you would be a great creature. And in five short years you have soared high."

"Pooh!" answered Vance, indifferently. "Nothing is great and unadulterated in London but next cream, nor carpenne pepper—least of all, Fame; mixed up with the most disparaging ingredients. Fame! did you read the Zenic criticism on my pictures in the present Exhibition? Fame, indeed! Change the subject, Leo, there's no good as flounders. Ho! is that your cab? Superb! Cut fit for the Grosvenor club cadets sure,' in Mr. Eufield's Speaker; bores, that seems compound cut of the Elgin marbles. Is he quiet?"

"Not very; but trust to my driving. You may well admire the horse—present from Darrell, chosen by Colonel Morley."

When the young man had settled themselves in the vehicle, Vance dismissed his cabman, and touching his horse, the animal trotted comfortably.

"Frank," said Leonel, shaking his dark curls with a petulant gravity, "Your cynical definitions are unworthy that matchless beard. You despise fame! what sheer affectation!

"Palverem Olympum
Collegisse juvat; metaque fervidis
Evitata rotis——"

"Take care," cried Vance; "we shall be over." For Lionel, growing excited, tensed the horse with his whip; and the horse bolting, took the cab within an inch of a water-cart.

"Fame, Fame!" cried Lionel, unheeding the interruption. "What would I not give to have said so bold a line as hers!"

"Hold an ee!, less slippery: a scorpion, less stinging!' But added Vance, observing his companion's heightened color. "But," he added seriously, and with an honest compunction, "I forget, you are a soldier, you follow the career of arms! Never heed what is said on the subject by a spectator merely. The deeds of war may be folly in civilians, in soldiers it is wisdom. Twin-born with the martial sense of honor, is patriotism. Fame is the love by device; it gives music to the whirr of the bullet, and lends the ball's splash-hop in the deep, a purl; knits civilwith the bond of brothers; comforts the survivor when the brother falls; takes off the grim aspect of contrary and from homicide itself extracts lessons that strengthen the heart to humanity. Fame inspires pipe and fife to nations. Right—pant for fame; you are a soldier!"

He was one of those bursts of high sentiment from Vance, which, as they were very rare with him, had the dramatic effect of surprise. Leonel listened to him with a thrilling delight. He could not answer, he was too moved. The artist continued, and in his peculiar manner he laughed, and rolled safely and rapidly along the road. "Let me change the subject. Two years you have spent abroad, completing your general education, you have made little progress in Art, but have evidently repertoire to the patience you have so recently chosen."

"You are right, Vance, my dear Vance. If a man's heart be set on a thing, he is always studying it. The books I loved best, and most frequently read, were such as, if they did not minister leisure, suggested hints that might turn to leisure hereafter. In the intervals of service, I never was so pleased as when I could fasten myself to some practical veteran—question and cross-question him. One picks up more sense in conversation than from books; at least I do. Besides, my mother was poor and I succeeded some day, is not that of a mere mechanician at arms. See how accomplished most great captains are. Wasn't Cæsar observer? Wasn't Napoleon—What diplomatists—what reasoners! what men of action, Vance, are not the education and had been habituated before they acted. How many stores of wisdom they brought to the judgment which hazards the sortie, or decides on the retreat?"

"Gently, gently!" cried Vance. "We shall be into that omnibus! Give me the whip—do!—there—a little more to the left—so. Yes; I am glad to see such enthusiasm in your profession—'tis half the battle. Hadlit said a cspirit rising, 'tis genius does not constitute a great Lord Mayor in his gilt coach the greatest man in the world, but the will to be so."

"Pish!" said Lionel, catching at the whip.

Vance (holding it back). "No. I apologize for having used the Latin quotation. Companions are odious. I agree with you, nothing like hardware-knowledge to make a really great soldier—Hannibal, and so forth. Cherish that conviction, my boy; meanwhile, respect human life—there is another calling, and divine."

The danger past, the artist thought it prudent to divert the conversation into some channel less exciting.

"Mr. Derrell, of course, consents to your choice of a profession?"

"Consents—approves, encourages. Wrote me such a letter—such a generous, comprehensive intelligence that man has!"

"Necessarily; since he agrees with you. Where is Derrell now?"

"I have no notion; it is some months since I heard from him. He was then at Melts, on his return from Asia Minor."

"So! you have never seen him since he bade you farewell at his old dwelling?"

"Never. He has not, I believe, been in England."

"Nor in Paris, where you seem to have chiefly resided?"

"Nor in Paris. Ah, Vance, could I but be of some comfort to him! Now that I am older, I think I understand his character better, and regard me as a boy, when he parted. Darrell is one of those men who require a home. Between us great worldly solitude, he has found the intermediate filling up which the life domestic alone supplies; it is the natural repose of the human mate—children, with whose future he could link his own toils and his ancestral remembrances. That interposition of nature among the great world and the solitude are left, each frowning on the other."

"My dear Lionel, you must have lived with very clever people; you are talking far above your years."

"Am I? True, I have lived, if not with very clever people, with those who are so to me. That is a secret I learned from Colonel Morley, to whom I must present you—the noblest intellect under the noblest exterior I have met. So tells to me, 'Would you throughout life be up to the height of your century—always in the prime of man's reason—without crudeness and without decline—look habitually, while young, with persons older, and, when old, with persons younger than yourself.'"

Vance here said, indeed. I felicitate you on the evident result of the maxim. And so Darrell has no home, no wife, and no children?"

"He has long been a widower; he lost his only son in boyhood, and his daughter—did you never hear?"

"No—what—?"

"Married so ill—a runaway match—and died many years since, without issue."

"Poor man! It was these affections, then, that soured him. And he has made him the hermit or the wanderer?"

"There," said Lionel, "I am perplexed. I find that even after his son's death and his daughter's unhappy marriage and estrangement from him, he still held it for an honor to be the fast activity of career. But certainly he did not long keep it up. It might have been as effect to which, strong as he is, he felt himself unequal; or, might he have known some fresh disappointment, some more sorrow which I was never guesses? what I have said as to his family affections was not known. But I think he will marry again. That idea seemed strong in his own mind when we parted; he brought it home."

"Honor, I suppose," said Vance, "and he convinced that he will marry, if but for the sake of an heir."

Vance. "And if so, my poor Lionel, you are ousted of——"

Lionel. (quickly interrupting). "Hush! Do not say, my dear Vance, do not you say—you—one of those who, by their things which, if said to me even by men for whom I have no excuse, make my ears tingle and my cheek blush. When I think of the debt I owe to Darrell alone for me—me who have no claim on him—it seems to me as if I were the man who stood on Calvary. 'Fear lest your benefactor find a smile at his own hearth, a child of his own blood—for you are the cause of his death in proportion as his life is desolate.'"

Vance. "You are a fine young fellow, and I beg your pardon. Take care of that milestone. Thank you. But I suspect that at least two-thirds of Darrell's friendship has dated from you on the way to me, were stretched out less to Lionello Leonel, than to Count in the Granite—than to Mr. Darrell's heir-presumptive."

Leonel. "That thought sometimes galls me, but it may be good; for it goads me on my desire to make myself some one whom the most worldly and the most selfish may be glad to own also. Oh for active service!—Oh for a sharp campaign!—Ah for fair trial how far a man in earnest can grapple Fortune to his heart with his own strong hands! You have done so, Vance; you have made a name and your own career; brush. I have no genius, but I have resolve, and resolve is perhaps as sure of its ends as genius. Vance, you have been my friend, my elements in common—Patience, Hope, Concentration."

Vance, more and more surprised, looked hard at his companion, grinning. Five years of that critical age, from seventeen to twenty-two, spent in the great capital of Europe—kept from its snares dangerous to boys partly by a powerful sense of personal dignity, partly by a temperament which, regarding love as an ideal for all tender and sublime emotions, shrunk from its gross exchanges, is not the Vance of the Yahoo of the bleaching ground, but a Vance whose mental work by the brooding ambition that takes youth out of the frivolous present into the serious future, and seeking, amid the noble and with commanding survey allers, but with the highest and greatest intellects that the free commonwealth of good society brought within his reach—Five years so spent had changed the boy's fresh impressionable into a man fit for noble action—retaining freshest youth in its enthusiasm, its elevation of sentiment, its honest candor, and divine credulity in its own unexercised resources; but borrowing from experience composure and solidity of idea—the link between speculation and practice—the power to impress on others a sense of the superiority with which he has been self-endowed by unconscious culture.

"So!" said Vance, after a prolonged pause, "I don't know whether I have resolve or genius; but, certainly, if I have made my way to some small reputation, patience, hope, and concentration of purpose must have the credit of it; and you, Lionello, who have not forgotten to name, and certainly don't evince as a characteristic, hope, my dear fellow, you are not extravagant. So poor, and yet so lofty you laugh?"

"The question is so like you, Frank—thrifty of care."

Do you think I could have painted with a calm mind, if I knew that at my door there was a duo which I could not pay? Art needs severity; and if an artist begin his career with an eye to sales to back as I had, he must place economy among the rules of perspective."

Lionel laughed again, and made some comments on economy which were certainly not smart, rather flippant, and tended not only to lower the favorable estimate of his intellectual improvement which Vance had just formed, but seriously disquieted the kindly artist. Vance knew the world—knew the peculiar temptations to which a young man in Lionel's position would be exposed—knew that contempt for economy belongs to that school of Peripatetic which reserves its last lessons for finished disciples in the sacred retreat of the Queen's Bench.

However, that was no dispassionate moment for didactic wisdom.

"Here we are" cried Lionel—"Putney Bridge."

They reached the little inn by the river-side, and while dinner was getting ready, they hired a boat, five pairs.

Vance. "Not so pretty here as by those green quiet banks along which we glided, at moonlight, five years ago."

Lionel. "Ah, no. And that innocent, charming child, whose portrait you took—you have never heard of her since?"

Vance. "Never! How should I? Have you?"

Lionel. "Only what Darrell repeated to me. His lawyer had ascertained that she and her grandfather had gone to America. e Darrell gently implied that, from what he learned of them, they scarcely merited the interest I felt in their fate. But we were not deceived—were we, Vance?"

Vance. "No; the little girl—what was her name? Sacy? Sally?—Sophy—true, Sophy—had something about her extremely prepossessing, besides her pretty face; and, in spite of her humble birth, a certain air that could never forget it."

Lionel. "Her face! Nor I. Can see it still before me!"

Vance. "Her cotton print! I see it still before me! But I must not be uncivil. Would you believe it, that little portrait, which cost me three guineas, was made, I don't say my fortune, but my fashion?"

Lionel. "How! You had the heart to sell it?"

Vance. "No; I kept it as a study for young female beauties—with variations,' as they say in music. It was by my female hands that I became the fashion; every order I have contains the condition—'But be sure, if you want your young female heads, Mr. Vance.' My female heads are as necessary to my success as Mr. Rowland's to Wouvermans' 'Beatrice.' Well, that child, who cost me three pounds, is the original of all the Beatrices announcing at Hanwell. She has been in turns a 'Psyche,' a 'Beatrice Cenci,' a 'Miranda,' a 'Portia,' and a Nobleman's Daughter,' 'Burns's Mary in Heaven,' 'The Young Gleaner,' and 'Sabrina fair,' in Milton's Comus. I have had that child through all history, sacred and profane. I have painted her in all costumes (her own natural print excepted). My female heads are my glory—even the Times critic allows that! Mr. Vance, there, is inimitable!' Mr. Vance publishes green prints, and, alas, etc.' I'll lend you the article."

Lionel. "I should never again see the original darling Sophy? You will laugh, Vance, but I have been heart-proof against all young beauties, till lately; my wish has been Sophy's eyes! In America?"

Vance. "Not so long for this time happily married to a Yankee! Yankees marry girls in their teens, and don't ask for dowries. Married to a Yankee, and not a doubt of it, for when she chaws, whittles, and keeps a 'store'!"

Lionel. "Vance, you have your tongue! Apropos of marriage, why are you still single?"

Vance. "Because I have no wish to be double'ed up! Marriage is a trap. To the wise, the unces neatly the housewife doubles him, the most cherished she lays lures for him. Next her cue a man once doubled know how often he may be doubled. Not only his wife folds him, but he finds every child carries him a new double, till what was a wide and handsome substance, has become a thin and mean lessen, dwindles into a pitiful square that will not cover one platter—all pockets and creases—smaller and smaller, with every fresh child, every double a new crease. Then, my friend, comes the washing bill! and, hardest of all, the tears one receives in the mangle, considers the heavy wear and tear of the linen-press. In short, marriage systematizes the high life, and depicts the double in the famous line—which is no doubt founded on the practical of marriage—

'Double, double, toil and trouble.'

Besides, no single man can be fairly called poor. What double man can with certainty be called rich? A double man can only be double, and dine on a herring; nobody knows, nobody cares. Let him marry, and he invites the world to witness where he lives, and how he dines. The first necessary a wife demands is the most ruinous, the most costly of luxuries—it is Society according to what her neighbors call genteel. Gentility commences with the honey-moon; it is its sickness, its longitude—it is its declines. When the honey is all gone, your bride says, 'We can have out no without sugar when quite alone, love; but in ese Gentility drop in, here's a loaf for silver sugar-tongs!' That's why I'm single."

"Economy again, Vance."

"Prudence—thrift—dignity," answered Vance, seriously; and sinking into a reverie that seemed gloomy, he shot back to shore.

TRAVEL NOTES IN BIBLE LANDS.

No. XXX.

Pilmos and the Vision of John.—The Seven Churches —Smyrna and the Ladies.—A Horse kicks a Lady and we get into the Harbor.—Ephesus and Diana.—The way to our Distances in the East.—Smyrna to Ephesus. —Ephesus and the Ruins.—Burial-place of John the Divine and the Virgin Mary.

So we commenced our journey to the sites of the Seven Churches, which were to be ours.

Far out in the wild sea, over whose waves we had sailed along to the Gulf of Smyrna, there was a rocky isle that rises abruptly from the azure the ancient waters. Over those waters the songs of Homer and other Greek bards had resounded in the old, old days. But the songs of Homer were human songs, of the brave past—stories of stout men battling with the fierce Trojans—tales of thought-grand, but which in the long annals of eternity still seem but passing ripples on the sea of existence.

On that rocky island once sat an old and wayworn man. John the beloved, last of all the Lord's disciples, had loved Him and been loved of Him first of all, and now, in the inscrutable will of his Master kept longest on earth, and away from Him. Longing with a desire that could not be more thoroughly expressed in the words in his last half-prayerful, half-exultant cry, "Surely I come quickly; amen! even so, come, Lord Jesus!" the disciple whose head had lain so often on the breast of his master, lay on a rocky pillow at Patmos, while by God's will his soul was in the divine presence. The head of the beloved disciple was white now as snow, and his face, once fair, was wrinkled with age. But now across the Holy Sea he sang a prophecy, an utterance of the Divine voice through the lips of man, goes to the Seven Churches in Asia. Never before, never since, have the waters of the Archipelago heard such eloquence of poetry, such grandeur of inspiration. If I were an infidel, I could not doubt that the Revelation to John was the grandest poem or dream that human lips ever uttered to the ears of men. Believing it, as I do, the voice of God himself, I am not ashamed to say that, standing on the hill above Smyrna, and looking down on the city and out on the sea, I believed that I was on holy ground, and I seemed to hear a voice above me, forever sounding in the sunshine and the starlight alike over the city, "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life!"

Pardon me. I am not to write of thoughts, feelings, or emotions. I have promised you that these letters shall be simple records of what I do, am, and see. But before I write further let me ask you to open your Bible and just read over the 5th, 6th, 7th, 7th, and 8th verses of the first chapter of the Revelation of St. John the Divine, and then you will surely be able to appreciate the feelings of one who has landed at Smyrna with the idea of visiting the ruins of those great cities which once heard those words, fresh from the lips of the beloved disciple.

But Smyrna the modern has no relics of Smyrna of that time: this you know. It is a busy, active city, where the people seem to have something of the Western spirit of money-making. In the harbor lie ships of all nations, and in the bazars are men who speak nearly every language under the sun.

We were in Smyrna three weeks. Long enough, you will say, to know something of it. I assure you it was. We knew it tolerably well, and we had some incidents of adventure that might be worth relating. Thus the old baronet got into a scrape with a Smyrna lady that afforded us lots of amusement, and Miss Grandison, the queenly lady Kate, actually found herself involved in an intrigue without knowing it herself, and John Stonebanger fought a duel with the husband of a pretty Greek woman, as impromptu duel, growing out of the fact that John wouldn't pay her the attention she wanted, at which her husband was properly resentful, and—the catalogue is endless. Every body that visits Smyrna gets into some scrape with the ladies. Every body except myself. I got into none, but I got into a harem.

You will recollect that Stonebanger had done this once or twice by accident. But I did it a more legitimate way.

Oulaf Effendi is a wealthy Turk of Smyrna, who lives in gorgeous style, with the full Mohammedan allowance of four wives and I do not know but four hundred slaves. Never was more superb harem, and between ourselves never was more beauty in a harem.

Miss Grandison bought a horse, or her father for her, of Oulaf Effendi. The horse was recommended as gentle and kind; he was, in fact, a perfect devil. The first day she rode him I was with her, and in one of the upper streets the animal plunged into a little flock of ladies, and out flew his feet and over went a lady with a shriek, and it turned out to be one of Oulaf Effendi's favorite slaves. We picked her up and carried her into the house, which was close by. Miss Grandison led the way into the women's apartments, and I remained outside till I was accosted by one of the black guardians as a hakim, and asked to go in and see the wounded lady. I went, of course, for little as my medical skill is, it was at all events enough to give me the name of Doctor, in this country where charms and incantations answer the purpose of pills and plasters. Miss Grandison had convinced them that I was a physician of magical powers, and I was ushered into the holiest of Eastern places.

LOOKING OUT AT THE LATTICE.

The word haram, literally translated into English, may be understood to be sacred, forbidden ground, or what the Sandwich Islanders call Tobo. It is applied to all mosques, and all holy places. No infidel, unbeliever, or stranger may enter a harem. Eunuchs are employed to guard the mosques as they are the apartments of the women.

The wounded lady was lying on a magnificent couch. That she was the favorite was sufficiently evident from the deference paid her on all sides, and the fact that I was admitted to her presence was accounted for only by the sudden and terrible anxiety of her lord and master, who sat at her feet and eyed me, when I entered, with a look of fierce anger that was rather amusing to one who understood how dependent he felt himself on my skill.

Miss Grandison sat at her side, and fortunately the Turk understood Arabic, so that we got along well enough. I gave him to understand in very short order that I would have no insolence; that if he and his household were not perfectly respectful, I would let him and his go to Shitan as rapidly as their natural proclivities would lead them.

Then I examined the lady. She had a glorious eye, a shoulder and arm that were of the mould of the Venus of Milo, and a lip that the old Turk might well have been proud of possessing. She was not seriously hurt. That was comforting, since my skill as a physician was not brought into very dangerous requisition. I sang a stave or two out of an old song, by way of incantation, burned a handful of feathers by way of suffocating the by-standers, and after using up ten minutes in similar nonsense I came away, with Miss Kate, both of us exceedingly gratified at the opportunity we had enjoyed of seeing the interior of a magnificent harem.

Next day I called, physician like, and my beldames prescribed me an entrance to the lady's rooms again. My coming was sudden. Oulaf himself led me in and gave the warning of my approach, but I can not help thinking the ladies intentionally disregarded the voice; and one, who wished to show me her face, came to me so that Oulaf's curtain was finally, turned from a lattice as I entered and let the full glance of her countenance fall on me. Certainly Oulaf Effendi was mistaken. This one was far more beautiful than the favorite.

Times are slowly changing among the Turks. It is not long since a Christian lakim would have been slain on the threshold of the harem, rather than permit his entrance. Now it is not infrequent for them to be called in, and as the doctors insist always upon seeing face and tongue, the worthy pashas have quite gotten used to the thing. In Smyrna, perhaps, it is different from other cities. Here there are so many Greek ladies who use strumpas always as freely as we do in America, that the Turkish families are getting more accustomed to it.

Smyrna abounds in pretty women. It is celebrated for that throughout the Levant. The Greek belles of Smyrna are of fine form, and clear complexion, good features, and sparkling eyes.

But I must not pause longer in Smyrna. We left it with camp equipage, and are here among the ruins of Ephesus. I can not even save time to sketch the journey of two days which we accomplished by aid of large camels, noble animals surpassing in size the camels of the Hejaz, but very slow in gait. We are living now in our tents where the great fane of Diana once reared its gorgeous walls.

Do you wish to know what now remains of Ephesus the magnificent? A waste, on which lie a few walls, a few broken columns, a ruined theatre, and nothing more. The harlot is a ruin. The temple of Diana is utterly gone. Never was desolation more complete, ruin more total. God did come, and did "remove the candlestick out of its place," and the city of the first of the Seven Churches become a wild ruin, a haunt of the jackal and the owl.

Yet here is holy ground. For this dust that I hold in my hand was once the dust of John, and this flower that I have plucked at the side of a broken column sprang from the grave of Mary, the mother of the Lord. Yet, even so, John and Mary died and were buried at Ephesus, and though they show at Jerusalem the tomb of the Virgin in the valley of Jehoshaphat, yet she lies here in the dust of Ephesus, and the memory of Diana fades before the splendor of her memory who was honored among all women as being the mother of the Son of God.

How in the few days that we have rested here this memory has come over us and made the very atmosphere seem holy you may well imagine. We are no Mariolaters; but we do honor to the grave of the mother of the Immaculate. Though we do not believe her immaculate, we nevertheless believe that she is first of women in heaven, and that it is a pious duty to be homage to her grave here among the ruins of the great city.

REMAINS OF EPHESUS.

John Schweinfurter sits by the hour en ruins, and wonders if this is her grave, or that, or this, or that; Miss Grandison plucks flowers every where, and presses them to be sure of some particle of the dust. Sir John strolls quietly about the desolate ruins, and once in a while looks up at me and expresses himself briefly and sententiously thus:

"Deuced lonesome, isn't it?" and I, standing quiet in the sunshine, in the lulls with splendour and grandeur consecrated, or sitting on a fallen column, or a fragment that may have been an altar-piece of Rome, remember John, and his Lord's last charge, and how well he kept it.

I thought I had left Holy Land, but I find it here in Ephesus.

Miscellany.

A TASTE FOR READING.

"If I were to pray," says Herschel, "for a taste, which should assist me under every variety of circumstances, and be a source of happiness and cheerfulness to me through life, and a shield against its ills, however things might go amiss and the world frown upon me, it would be a taste for reading. I speak of it, of course, only as a worldly advantage, and not in the slightest degree derogating from the higher aims and more real and unspeakable privileges of religious principles, but as a taste, an instrument, and a mode of pleasurable gratification. Give a man this taste, and the means of gratifying it, and you can hardly fail of making him a happy man, unless, indeed, you put into his hands the perverse selection of books. You place him in contact with the best society in the most agreeable society, with the wisest, with the wittiest, with the tenderest, the bravest, and the purest characters who have adorned humanity. You make him a denizen of all nations, a contemporary of all ages. The world has been created for his benefit.

"It is indeed possible but the character should take a higher and better tone from his constant habit of conversing in thought with a class of beings, or, to say the least of it, above the average of humanity. It is morally impossible that the man who assumes should not a tinge of good-breeding and civilization from having constantly before our eyes the way in which best-bred and finest-tempered men have talked and conducted themselves in their intercourse with each other. There is no manner so perfectly irresistible coercion in a habit of reading, well directed, over the whole tenor of a man's character and conduct, which is not the less influential because it works insensibly, and because it is really by that living lesson that we learn the exercise of men, and suffers them not to remain barbarous."

A NEWSPAPER.

It was Bishop Horne's opinion that there was no better moralist than the newspaper. Of it he said: "It gathers, and conveys to successive ages of multitudes, displayed in a newspaper, are so many beacons continually burning to turn others from the rocks on which they have been shipwrecked. What more powerful dissuasive from suspicion, jealousy, and envy than the story of one friend murdered by another in a duel? What caution more likely to be effective against gambling and profligacy than the manifold relation of ruin, confusion, or the fate of a despairing suicide? What finer lecture on the necessity of economy than the cautions of estates, houses, and furniture? Only take a newspaper, and consider it well, pay for it, and it will instruct you."

CREED AND CONDUCT.

To make speculative belief the rule absolute of conduct is not to act. The "flesh" wields not our powers us. Yet even in defeat the intellect vindicates its superiority, and feels the best possible reason for its defeat. A Spanish priest, once, exhorting the soldiers to fight like lions, added, in the ardor of enthusiasm, "Reflect, my brethren, that whoever falls to-day in battle sups to-night in paradise." The wonders of paradise subdued the regiment. The fight began, the ranks wavered, the priest took to his heels, when a soldier stopping him referred reproachfully to the pompous supper in paradise. "True, my son, true," said the priest, "but I never believed it!" Is not every man a moralist? Many believe firmly in predestination. "Do you believe in predestination?" said the captain of a Mississippi steamer to a clergyman who happened to be traveling with him. "Of course I do." "Well, I'm glad to hear it." "Why so?" "Because I intend to pass that boat ahead in fifteen consecutive minutes, if there be any virtue in pine-knots and bullet-safety-valves. So don't be alarmed, for if the boilers ain't to burst they won't." And the action began partially to prove true, and looking very much like backing out, which the captain observing said, "I thought you said you believed in predestination, and that it was to be well in." "So I do; but I prefer being a little nearer the stern when it does burst." The reasoning against sin principles of predestination is arguing in a circle. A thief tried to excuse himself to his judge by informing his lordship that he was by from all eternity been destined to commit the particular theft which he was tried. "Then," the judge answered the judge, "and I was destined to send you to the treadmill."

FRENCH PIETY.

MANY of our people were of the west orthos, evangelical class in France and Switzerland—such persons as the French respectfully designate as dévots, or contemptuously as Methodists. Those from Geneva were followers of Merle d'Aubigné and Cesar Malan; those from France, of such men as Frederick and Adolphe Monod. Frederick in Europe I had encountered no characters of the kind —no approach, even, to the serious piety and incessant Christianizing zeal of these my present companions. They seemed to me the most charming possible examples of those who are commonly called pious people; amiable in manners, cheerful in conversation, conscious of the beauty of earth and of their brotherhood with humanity, yet never forgetful of their mystic life, their heavenly calling, the price of their redemption. In short, they combined the existence of this world and the existence of the invisible more easily, gracefully, and lovingly than any class of persons that I had ever been seen.—In Forest's European Acquaintance.

THE FORCE OF HABIT.

HABIT eats a terrible chasm in humanity that, instead of constituting no more than his second nature, it expels the first, usurping the sovereignty. Our minds may turn like the poles, but it is the same direction that never again can we look quite straight. Thoughts, passions, affections, once sanctioned by custom till, like barn-door fowl, they will always eat their meat from the same platter, and sings on the same roost.

WOMEN AND MEN.

PERHAPS at no age since Eve's were women found so evidently their own mistresses—almost apart from positiveliterary or tyrannical depreciation; at no time in the world's history judged so entirely by their individual merits, and estimated according to the respect which they earn for themselves. And if these rules overturn the insanity to consider this unjust? Shall we not rather accept our position, difficult, indeed, and requiring from us more than the men have required before, but from its very difficulty rendered the more honourable? Let us not be afraid of men. They suppose, lies at the root of all these amiable hesitations. "Gentlemen don't like such and such things." "Gentlemen object to such and such principles." My dear little foolish cowards, do you think a man—any manly man—can possibly hate over love a woman the more for reverencing her the less? Or likes her better for transferring all her instincts of right and wrong, from herself to science to his ideas? Or even supposing he did like it, is a woman's dignity to be sacrificed to him? And here, piercing to the foundation of all truth, we may find the truth concerning self-deference, which is only another form of selfishness. Self-deference is not in self at all; when its strength is drawn, and from man's love, from that which is the only source whence every individual soul proceeds, and to which alone it is accountable. As soon as any woman, all of whose instincts are right, not a vague, sentimental belief, but as a tangible, practical law of life, makes submission to the laws she parts; she recognizes the glory, honor, and beauty of her existence; she is no longer afraid of its opinions or its power, she is conscious of its responsibilities to another; she is content to take it as it is in the sweetness of its daily duties, and to only care long as to fulfill it, that while the world at large may recognize and profit by her self-abnegations, they, knowing them to be the source of strength, lies in the deepest humility, recognizes, solely and alone in her dependence upon God.

PETER THE GREAT.

HE was a very tall man, exceedingly well made, rather thin, his face somewhat round, a high forehead, good eyebrows, a very full nose, but not too short, and large at the end, rather thick lips, complexion inclining to brown, but very clear, light, piercing, and well open. His looks majestic and gracious when he liked; but when he counterfeited severe and angry, the twitching of the face not often occurring, but which appeared to control his eyes and all his countenance, was frightful and fit to see—it lasted a moment, gave him a wild and terrible air, and passed away. All his temperament was his intellect, his quickness, and his greatness, and was not devoid of a certain grace. He wore commonly a coarse cloth, brown wig, without hair-powder, and which did not reach to his shoulders; a brown camlet light frock coat, and, with gold buttons; vest, breeches, stockings, no gloves or ruffles, the star of his order over his coat, and the ribbon under it, the cut of which, frequently quite unbuttoned, his hat upon the table, but never crushed under arm out of respect. With this simplicity, ill-accompanied or ill-mounted as he might be, the air of greatness natural to him could not be mistaken.—Memoirs of St. Simon.

THE INFINITE.

In mathematics any finite quantity added to infinity is infinity. Thus the finite life of the good qualities in man, and add infinity to them, and you think you have some conception of the Divine Being. But you have lost in the bargain; for all the good in man is nothing, and God is all in all—he is infinite, and eternal.

WATER AS FOOD.

TELL the first man you meet that water is, on the whole, a more nutritious article than beef, and that common salt, or bone ash, is as much an edible as the white of egg, and it is probable that he will, with a contemptuous glance, assure his nose to assure himself your keeper is at hand. Make the same announcement to the next person you meet, and the chances are that he will think you very ignorant of organic chemistry, or that you are talking in your sleep. Nevertheless, it is demonstrably true, and never would have worn the air of a paradox but for the prejudices and errors of the system of an alimentary substance. That is an element which nourishes; whatever we find in the organism, or which mingle with all it contains, do not forming part of its structure or one of the conditions of vital processes, that, and that only, serves the name of aliment. If "to nourish the body" mean to sustain its force and repair its waste —if food enters into the living structure—and if all the integral constituents of that structure are derived from food—where can be nothing improper in designating as nutritious substances which have an enormous preponderance among the integral constituents? Why, then, should it be ridiculed to call water food will cause their surprise on learning that water forms two-thirds of the living body.

HOME.

HOME! To be at home is the wish of the seaman on stormy seas and lonely watch. Home is the wish of the soldier, and tender visions mingle with the dreadful dreams of trench and tented field. Where the pale-trees waves its graceful plumes, and birds of perfect hues flash and flicker among gorgeous flowers, the exile sits staring upon vacancy; a far-away home lies on his heart; and, borne on the wings of fancy over intervening seas and lands, he has swept away home, and hears the lark singing above his father's fields, and sees the sunbaired boy-brother, with light feet and childhood's glee, chasing his butterfly by his native stream. And in his best hours, home is his ostensible home, a home with his Father above that sky, will in the midst of joy he remembers. He looks around him—the world is full of suffering; he is distressed by its sorrows and vexed by its sins. He looks within him—his own mark of his own corruption to grieve for. In the language of a heart repelled, disgusted, and wearied, he often turns his eye upward, saying, "I would not live here always. No, not for all the gold of the world's mines—not for all the wealth of her argosies—but all the pleasures of his flashing forty-up—not for all the crowns of her kingdoms—would I live here always." He is at home, and about to migrate to those sunny lands where no winter sheds her snows or strips the grove, or binds the streams in crystal, he will often, in spirit, be planning his wing for the hour of his flight to glory.—Cuyler.

THE HEART OF NAPOLEON.

WHEN the body of Napoleon was opened, at St. Helena, his heart was taken out, and, preparatory to its final deposit, was placed in a basin of spirits of water, and left, for the night, on a table in the bedroom of the man who had charge of the matter. In the course of the night the doctor was awakened from a light slumber by a heavy splash on the floor, and starting up, alarmed, he rested on his elbow, and, by the light of a taper, looked eagerly round him to determine what should spring from bed. Not the shadow of an intruder was to be seen. What had moved the basin? Was that mighty heart, strong to be quelled even by death, regained some of its terrible energies? Was it still beating? Was it? Ha! catching the appearance of something moving in the corner of the room, he saw the heart of Bonaparte going into the basin of water, jumping from bed to bed, and in time to seize and rescue it from the teeth of a rat.

DISTINCTIONS IN SNORING.

THE variety of sounds which the nasal organ is great. You have the piano snore, commencing on a weak key and passing away into a faint whistle. You have sometimes the snore of the wind playing through the keyhole or some other cranny. Then there is the great consequential snore, by which you know the house in the silence of the night. We once had a visitor with such gifted nostrils, and we can suppose that children of a half-awake traveler who had to engage his chamber in a forlorn fit of horking. It is a new terror to them, and we had the greatest difficulty of explaining to Billy and Bessy that the noise was meant—that no invasion of the premises was threatened—that it was ver y generous solid. The great snore, we have varied by wild unearthly cadences, harmonizing with the howling wind without; and in listening to such a performance, we are free to confess that sometimes on our solitary pillow we have felt a little eerie. But the most remarkable snore we have ever met with is a short, quick, convulsive snore, properly described as a snort. It is the snore of a man who has had his ear-bore, or to that of the starting, struggling locomotive, for which it has been more than once mistaken by a half-awake traveler who had to go by an early train. The locomotive seems clearly to be getting under the human engine. Mr. Buckland wishes to study the subject, let him take his station during night in the lobby of the bedrooms of the Great Western. His opportunities will be better if the hotel is much frequented by commercial gentlemen. Let him then listen to the engine-lobby in which they indulge previous to retiring form a good basis for a full nocturnal disquisition.

"Prose knows no metre, and yet prose must rule."

Dropping semicolonal fears and snorting fire."

A full rush expresses the appropriate manner of sustaining the instrument. It is a vulgar error to suppose that a large pedalcock is necessarily an organ of great power. On the contrary, in large cavern the air seems to lose itself; and we have seen an insignificant pedal-cock in a cave have outmoved the most exaggerated Roman variety.

THE LOVE OF HOME.

IT is only shallow-minded pretenders who make either domestic relations a matter of personal merit, or, if obscure origin a matter of personal reproach. A man who is ashamed of his parentage will not be ashamed of his early condition. It did happen to me to be born in a log-cabin, raised among the rough forms of pioneer life, and have passed as early that, when the smoke first rose from its rude chimney, and curled among the forest boughs, there was no similar evidence of a white man's habitation between it and the settlements on the rivers of Canada. I am indebted to that fact for my annual visit. I carry my children to it, to teach them the hardships endured by the generation that built the primitive family abode; I wrap to think that none of those who inhabited it are now among the living. And if ever I fail in affectionate veneration for him who raised it, and defended it against savage violence and destruction, cherished all domestic comforts beneath its roof, and, through the fire and blood of seven years' revolutionary war, shrunk from no toil, no sacrifice, to serve his country, and to raise his children to a condition better than his own, may my name and the name of my children be blotted from the memory of mankind.!—Daniel Webster.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

ASH FOUNDER.—If your friend is made of honey, do not eat him up at once. Let him live. Study the nature of the animal, and you will find that you are the animal, after all. When you are the honey, you are the bee, and will. He who eats not take a bite, can not comprehend a long explanation. Take counsel of one grocer, and one less than yourself, and, afterward, form your own opinion.

MARKET HOUSE.—The places are flat, and heavy, and dull, whatsoever be the brick, cherbark and stone, are drugs, starch is slithering, and paper is stationery. There is no pith in them, and they contain no nourishment for the chemist.

Ladies don't know whether they like smoking or not. With special favorites, they like it: with general favorites, they don't dislike it, and with no favorites, they do not like it.

Colonel Mordecai Topp, making a speech at Memphis, Tennessee, recently observed that "the Indian had no law progress with wanshed, however obvious they may appear to the solvay," meaning, we suppose, reversed.

The action of sighing arises from very similar causes to those of yawning. But in sighing, the nervous depression is owing to grief, rather than to pain. In the result of fatigue. In sighing, the effect is generally caused by an oppression proceeding, as in hysterics. The mind, wearied and weakened by sorrow, has omitted, for a few moments, to continue the respiratory process; and then, suddenly, there comes an involuntary respiration—that is, something like a faint sound as it passes the organs of the voice.

It is better to yield a little than quarrel a great deal. The habit of standing up, as people call it, for their dignity rights is one of the most disgraceful and unprofitable in the world. Life is too short for the perpetual bickering which others can earn a disposition to foster. It is a very monotonous affair indeed, where other people's claims and interests are not considered, and it is not wise, happier, and more prudent to yield somes that of our precious time to their sensibilities.—Sunday Times.

A youth that was jilted said once, to a wag,

"My love, O, Jemima, has forsaken me."

"Oh, think not of flopping," replied he, "I pray, But choose the best method of going your way."

Never look sad—there's nothing so bad

As getting familiar with sorrow;

Always look glad, and your friends will be many,

And hold such advice quantities to-morrow.

A gentleman, after an audible nature observed, he could boast of two negative qualifications, viz., that he never wore a pea-jacket, nor ever lay down in one.

A gentleman, at a tea-party, overhearing one lady say to another, "I have something for your private ear," immediately turned round, "I prithee then, dear, let me have it in a large pinkcushion."

Pastor.—Jemima Jones, what for them cauticisms?—ask for them cauticisms?—ant them cauticisms?—ik ant them knowledge?—ocy? Do you know the meaning of them prudently—cautipy them lawfully—impart them knowledge?—ocy? Do you know the meaning of them cauticisms? —can them attentively—forego them easily—reign them willingly.

PEACE OR MUSIC.—Quiet of mind and ease within is a perfect blessing, which the world can neither give nor take. Nothing, without this, can make one's life happy. The purest enjoyment can be had, and nothing can disturb the inward tranquillity. Our whole trouble in our let in the world arises from the disagreement we have with ourselves. Let the mind be brought to the int, and the whole matter is finally looked.

"Let the toast be—dear woman!" as the hungry husband said to his wife, who was in a hurry to clear off the breakfast.

Old Sir James Herring was remarrietated with for sale by petty-vendors. You make by any mind to it," said he, "but I can not make up my body."

It is not great calamities that embitter existence: it is the petty vexations, the small annoyances, the little disappointments, the minor miseries, that make the head gray before its time, and the heart old. The rose that grows would not destroy; it is merely the small, invisible fingernails, except in some very rare cases, when it is linked by nature to a poisonous thorn. Even the most noble rage seldom mends the matter. Keep in good-humor.

During a lesson on the animal kingdom, the teacher put the following question: "Can any boy name me an animal of the genus ridiculous?" "Yes, sir, the schoolmaster!" A boy echoes face beamed with pleasure at the prospect of a good thrashing. "I am," said he, "what is the animal?" asked the teacher. "My grandmother, sir," said the boy, as he ran off.

The company of a good-humored man is a perpetual feast; he is always welcome. He has a welcome at his approach, and dolliculties vanish in his presence. Friendship is beautiful, social-hearted and kind, and in the country in the old Congress as Adams's fire or Jefferson's wisdom. He cannot be found in a seeking out of it is not like the steak.

The following words, if spelled backward or forward, are the same: "Name no one man."

"I talk a good deal, but I talk well," said an ingenious fellow. "I dare say," said the friend replied a gentleman.

The gallant Colonel M'Clung was addicted to fits of abstract thinking, even in the presence of his fair-sex friends. On one of these occasions the ladies and the epigrammatic mode of thought which made it so. I was once sitting at a dinner-party with Colonel M'Clung when he was an antediluvian duck, which I was making devilish hot with cayenne pepper, when the Colonel interrupting me with a steady smile, and remarked, "Colonel, you appear to be peppering that duck considerably." Sir, replied he, "I was thinking why the term devil was used as a word of reproach, when it must have been a compliment."

The editors of one of the New Orleans papers announce the death of a subscriber in the following style: "Departed and Bishop elect of the Methodist Episcopal Church South." The announcement must have taken the Rev. Winkle nap; or the mails in those parts must be very slow—the event must have occurred a thousand years ago!

INFECTIOUS LITTLE BOY.—Is very fat old gentlemen, who is trying to get along on foot to his run, but with very indifferent success. "I say, old fellow, you would get on a jolly sight quicker if you would lie down on the pavement and let me roll you along."

An advertisement in the Liverpool Daily Post states that an active servant is wanted, "who must be a quiet sober man, and can have no objection to wear whiskers." Are the advertiser cannibals? And can not only the whiskers go, which what sense do they not little boys five years old?

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, April 5, 1858.

THE fortnight ends of the part for the last two months past as follows with that of the corresponding week of 1857.

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending April 3, 1858	$3,718,625	$1,344,883
Corresponding week, 1857	8,646,229	1,150,749
Decrease	$1,327,604	$149,077

Some $139,700 was exported in specie during the week. Money continues to be abundant at 5@7 per cent.; many of the Banks are willing to loan at the former rate on call, and 6, and money is left with brokers at 5, and in some cases even lower. Exchange has risen about one per cent. Sterling is held at 107¾@ 108¼ @ 108¾.

The stock market has continued to be dull throughout the week; the speculators for the fall coming to have complete control of the market. The total sales for the week are 31,000, when the rise culminated, is from 180 to 188 per cent. on the speculative list; generally the rest of the stocks have sympathized.

The following table shows the movement during the week:

STOCKS OF THE STOCK EXCHANGE FOR THE WEEK.

	Sold.		Sold.
N. Y. Central	1,400	Reading	1,300
Erie	1,000	Rock Island	75
Michigan Sou.	611	Panama	1,000
Tennessee	87	Pacific Mail	1,000
California	1,000	M. Southern	1,000
Ill. Cen. Bonds	1,000	M. South'n pref.	1,000
Ill. Cen. Stock	1,000	N. Cen. Rlr.	1,000
Cumberland	1,000	Toledo	1,000
La Crosse	1,000	Galena	1,000
La Crosse L. Gr. Bd.	1,000	Hudson	1,000

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, April 5, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets have been more active for their width since a week ago, but with no up tendency. Wheat has been in moderate supply and demand. Prices have favored buyers. Corn is scarce, has prevailed for Corn at advancing rates. Rye, Barley, and Oats have attracted considerable attention. Coffee has been quite heavy and irregular, closing, however, with symptoms of returning vigor.—Provisions have been in fair request, and prices generally exhibit more firmness.—The grocery trade has varied much in any respect.—Hay has been more freely offered and purchased at reduced prices.—The movements in Dry Goods have been to a moderate extent, inclining a shade more for the buyer's favor. The receipts of Dry Goods entered at the Custom House for the week ending April 3, 1858, were $2,118,752 the corresponding week in 1857. The imports into the port for the week ending April 3, 1858 against $2,912,852 same time in 1857.—The movements in other commodities were unimportant, and unproductive of any remarkable alterations.—We append a revised list of the changes noticed for the week, as follows:

Ordinary to extra State Flour, per bbl. $4 95 @ $4 60
Superfine to Eastern Western do. 4 30 @ 4 65
Extra Western Flour, do. 4 45 @ 4 70
Fancy to extra Genesee, per barrel 4 45 @ 4 70
Super to Extra Canadian, per barrel 4 45 @ 4 70
Mixed to Extra Southern, per barrel 4 70 @ 5 80
Low to superfine Rye Flour, per bbl. 3 00 @ 3 50
Ordinary to fine Corn Meal 3 75 @ 3 90
White Wheat, per bushel 1 15 @ 1 50
Red Wheat, per bushel 1 00 @ 1 39
New Crop Corn, per bushel 67½ @ 71
Rye, per bushel 67 @ 70
Barley, per bushel 66 @ 74
Western Oats, per bushel 43 @ 46
State Oats, per bushel 45 @ 46
Jersey and Penn. Oats, per bushel 50 @ 52
Southern Oats, per bushel 50 @ 52
Cotton, middling, per pound 10½ @ 11
Mess Pork, per barrel 13 75 @ 14 00
Prime Mess Pork, per barrel 13 75 @ 13 75
Country Mess Beef, per barrel 9 00 @ 9 50
Country Prime Beef, per barrel 7 75 @ 8 00
Prime Mess Beef, per tierce 15 00 @ 16 00
Beef Hams, per barrel 10 00 @ 18 75
Cut Meats, per pound 6 @ 8
Lard, per pound 10½ @ 10½
State Butter, per pound 15 @ 16
Western Butter, per pound 13 @ 16
Cheese, per pound 6 @ 8
Rice, per 100 pounds 2 25 @ 4 00
Rio Coffee, per pound 9½ @ 10
Cuba Sugar, per pound 5½ @ 6
Cuba Molasses, per gallon 25 @ 30
New Orleans Sugar, per pound 5½ @ 6
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon 34 @ 36
Hyson Teas, per pound 30 @ 65
Oolong Teas, per pound 32 @ 55
Domestic Whiskey, per gallon 22 @ 23
Bale Hay, per 100 pounds 60 @ 75
Hops, Crop of 1857, per pound 5 @ 6
Crude Turpentine, per 280 pounds 3 81½ @ 3 75
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon 45 @ 46
Common Resin, per 112 pounds 1 75½ @ 1 75
Stock of several Articles in the New York Market, April 1.

	1857.	1858.
Ashes, barrels	1,713	1,533
Coffee, packages	95,413	100,503
Cotton, bales	84,341	43,901
Drygoods, bales	552	1,090
Hemp, tons	191	99
Hides, number	111,731	59,721
Hides, number	245,118	246,118
Leather, sole, sides	68,100	210,909
Molasses, hogsheads	6,301	4,909
Molasses, barrels	5,273	2,011
Pork, barrels	35,761	40,642
Beef, tierces and barrels	24,239	23,413
Rice, tierces	2,466	1,414
Rice, bags	410	1,000
Sugars, hogsheads	22,063	7,450
Sugars, bags	16,540	34,709
Sugars, boxes	3,000	3,767
Tobacco, cases, hogsheads	4,731	4,929
Tobacco, bales	1,000	1,000
Tobacco, Manufactured, packages	27,663	28,023
Turpentine, casks, barrels	unknown.	7,000
Turpentine, rosin, barrels	unknown.	17,000

Freights were quite dispersed. For Liverpool—Cotton, by sail, per pound, 5-16@ 7-32; do. by steam, 7-32; Grain, 8d. @ 9d. per bushel; Resin, 1s. 9d. @ 2s. per barrel; Pork, 40s. @ 45s. per barrel; Beef, 40s. @ 45s. per tierce; and Heavy Goods, 15s. @ 20s. per ton. For other ports prices unquotably low. The return of vessels, of all classes, in port on Saturday was 640.

The Wool Market last Wednesday week was fairly supplied with Fleeces, which were in fair request, and 1@2 cents higher; somewhat more doing in Pulled, and moving and selling slowly.—Coal Values were pleniher and lower.—Hides were in fair supply and request, and were 1@2 cents more abundant, yet, having been in good demand, closed firm.—Tallow was in moderate request, and inquired for at slightly improved prices.—Among the petrol receipts of Live Stock during each of the last two weeks compare thus:

	Week ending March 29.	Week ending March 31.
Beeves	3,648	2,192
Milch Cows	72	77
Veal Calves	629	747
Sheep and Lambs	2,816	3,315
Swine	5,647	5,023

Of the Forty-fourth Street Market supply of Beeves last Wednesday there were received from

Illinois	200	Ohio	1,000
Ohio	721	Kentucky	65
Virginia	747	Western States	1,000

The range of prices according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the leading yards during the fortnight was as follows:

Prime to first class Beeves, per pound... 9 7 @ 9 10½
Common to ex. Milch Cows, per head.. 35 00 @ 60 00
Veal Calves, per pound..... 4 @ 7
Sheep and Lambs, per head..... 2 00 @ 10 00
" per pound..... 4 @ 6
Live Swine, per pound..... 4½ @ 6
Dressed " ..... 6 @ 7½

The Country Produce Markets have been more amply supplied with nearly all the leading kinds of produce. The demand has not been brisk. The alterations in prices have been of a comparatively trifling character.

WHOLESALE PRICES OBTAINED BY PRODUCERS AT NEW MARKET.

Apples, per barrel	$3 75	@ $4 25
Apples, dried, per pound	4	@ 5
Peaches, dried, per pound	9	@ 11
Beans, dried, per bushel	75	@ 1 00
Peanuts, per bushel	60	@ 1 25
Cauliflowers, per dozen	13 50	@ 18 00
Potatoes, per barrel	1 75	@ 2 50
" per bushel	37½	@ 50
" sweet, per bushel	50	@ 60
Onions, per barrel of 3 bushels	1 00	@ 1 50
Turnips, per barrel	1 00	@ 1 50
Cabbages, per dozen	1 50	@ 2 00
Parsnips, per barrel	1 00	@ 1 50
Carrots, per barrel	2 00	@ —
Beets, per 100 bunches	2 00	@ 3 00
Garlic, per 100	2 00	@ 3 00
Eggs, per dozen	8	@ 10
Eggs, Fresh, per dozen	15	@ 16
Chickens, per pair	50	@ 62½
Fowls, per pound	11	@ 13
Turkeys, per pair	50	@ 62½
Ducks, per pound	18	@ 20
" per couple	1 00	@ 1 25
Turkeys, per pound	16	@ 17
Geese, per pound	13	@ 14
Quinces, dried, per bushel	1 75	@ 2 00
Prairie Hens, per pair	87	@ 1 00
Partridge, per pair	1 00	@ 1 25
Quail, per dozen	1 50	@ 2 75
Rabbits, per pair	1 00	@ 1 25
Rabbits, each	13	@ 25
Venison, per pound	21	@ 25
Venison, per pound	8	@ 10

ADVERTISEMENTS.

LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS IN AFRICA.

AVOID IMPOSITION!

CAUTION!

Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS take this opportunity of cautioning the Public against several spurious publications, which, by evading the Copyright Laws, have sought to prejudice the sale of the genuine work by Dr. Livingstone. They are authorized to say that Dr. Livingstone repudiates their inaccuracy, and is not responsible, further than that the present work is the

ONLY AUTHENTIC NARRATIVE OF HIS ADVENTURES AND TRAVELS IN AFRICA.

8vo, Price, $1 00.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE,
NEW YORK.

☞ This work will be sent to any address in the United States under 3000 miles' distance upon receipt of Three Dollars.

WHEELER & WILSON MFG CO'S
SEWING MACHINES,
OFFICE 343 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
Agencies throughout the Union.

Send for a Circular.

We prefer them for family use.—Tribune.
The best in use.—Evening Post.
The machine for family use.—Advocate & Journal.
The best and cheapest machine we have seen.—Examiner.
We give it our satisfaction.—Observer.
The best ever invented.—Christian Inquirer.
In looking for the best, use them.—Examiner.
Admirably adapted for family use.—Chronicle.
They praise it with justice.—Commercial Bulletin.
Worthy of the highest award.—Sabbath Recorder.

BRODIE'S
SPRING MANTILLAS.

A BEAUTIFUL ASSORTMENT OF HOME-MADE
SILK AND OTHER MANTLES.
ALSO,
His USUAL LARGE STOCK OF LACE STYLES,
AT
FRENCH AND SCOTCH GOODS.
OLD ST. NEW NO. 339 CANAL STREET,
NEW YORK.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

For all manufacturing purposes SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES are decided lindispensable. The public is not upon hand to purchase clothes, made by them. SINGER'S FAMILY SEWING MACHINE is the latest presented for consumers, and has been arranged with full knowledge of the defects of other machines for similar work, and is unquestionably the best. It is the handsomest Sewing Machine ever made, and the easiest to learn to operate. Using one of these machines is an elegant amusement. Price $100, with iron table complete.
I. M. SINGER & CO. No. 458 Broadway, New York.

RICH CLOTH COVERS
FOR
VOLUME I OF HARPER'S WEEKLY
ARE NOW READY.
PRICE FIFTY CENTS.

The Trade and Bookbinders will be supplied at TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT. DISCOUNT.

VOL. I OF HARPER'S WEEKLY,
handsomely bound in
CLOTH EXTRA,
is now ready.
Price $3 50.

N.B. Title Volume and Index for Mail on account of its weight. It will be sent by Express, if so desired, freight to be paid by the Purchaser.

HARPER & BROTHERS
LIST OF NEW EDITIONS.

MRS. SIGOURNEY'S WORKS. Engravings. 16 vols. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents per Volume. The Volumes sold separately or in sets.

THE RISE OF THE DUTCH REPUBLIC. By John Lothrop Motley. Portrait of William of Orange. 3 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $6 00.

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF SCOTLAND. By Agnes Strickland. 6 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00 per Volume.

DEBIT AND CREDIT. Translated from the German of GUSTAV FREYTAG. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

MISS SEDGWICK'S MARRIED OR SINGLE? 2 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $1 75.

MISS SEDGWICK'S LIVE AND LET LIVE. 12mo, Muslin, 63 cents.

HISTORICAL STORIES FOR YOUNG PERSONS. 12mo, Muslin, 63 cents.

A LADY'S LIFE OF WASHINGTON. 2 vols. 12mo, Muslin, 90 cents.

ANTHON'S FIRST GREEK LESSONS. 12mo. Sheep extra, 75 cents.

ANTHON'S HORACE. 12mo, Sheep extra, $1 25.

ANTHON'S LATIN-ENGLISH DICTIONARY. Small 8vo, Sheep, $1 00.

ANTHON'S MANUAL OF ROMAN ANTIQUITIES. 12mo, Sheep extra, 87½ cents.

ANTHON'S GREEK PROSODY AND METRE. 18mo, Sheep extra, 75 cents.

ANTHON'S LATIN PROSE COMPOSITION. 12mo, Sheep extra, 75 cents.

ANTHON'S XENOPHON'S ANABASIS. 12mo, Sheep extra, $1 25.

ANTHON'S CÆSAR. 12mo, Sheep extra, $1 00.

ANTHON'S JACOB'S GREEK READER. 12mo, Sheep extra, $1 00.

PRIME'S TENT LIFE IN THE HOLY LAND. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

TRAVELS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. By SAMUEL IRELAND PRIME. 2 vols. Large 12mo, Muslin, $2 00.

LIVINGSTONE'S SOUTH AFRICA. 8vo, Muslin, $2 00.

GUY LIVINGSTONE; or, "Thorough." 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

BARNES'S NOTES ON THE NEW TESTAMENT. 11 vols. 12mo, Muslin, To cents per Volume.

ARTHUR'S TONGUE OF FIRE. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

ABBOTT'S ILLUSTRATED HISTORIES. 22 vols. 16mo, Muslin, 40 cents per Volume.

CARLYLE'S FRENCH REVOLUTION. 2 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $2 00.

CARLYLE'S OLIVER CROMWELL. 2 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $2 00.

MACAULAY'S PAST AND PRESENT. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

MACAULAY'S TRIGONOMETRY AND TABLES. 8vo, 544 pages, Sheep extra, $1 50.

MACAULAY'S TREATISE ON ALGEBRA. 8vo, 324 pages, Sheep extra, $1 00.

CURRER BELL'S JANE EYRE. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

CURRER BELL'S SHIRLEY. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

CURRER BELL'S VILLETTE. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

DRAPER'S TEXT-BOOK ON CHEMISTRY. 12mo, Sheep extra, 75 cents.

DRAPER'S TEXT-BOOK ON NATURAL PHILOSOPHY. 12mo, Sheep extra, 75 cents.

MCLINTOCK'S SECOND BOOK IN LATIN. 12mo, Sheep extra, 75 cents.

SIR WILLIAM HAMILTON'S WORKS. 8vo, Muslin, $2 00.

CRABB'S ENGLISH SYNONYMS, 8vo, Sheep extra, $1 50.

DUFF'S BOOK-KEEPING. 8vo, Muslin, $1 50.

MRS. MARKHAM'S FRANCE. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

BEETHOVEN'S LIFE. 2 vols. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

GEORGIA SCENES. 12mo, Muslin, 00 cents.

DAVIS'S CHINA. 2 vols. 12mo, Muslin, 50 cents.

LIVES OF CELEBRATED CRIMINALS. 2 vols. 18mo, Muslin, 50 cents.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, N. Y.

 For Full Titles to the above Works see HARPER & BROTHERS' Catalogue, a new Edition of which is now ready, and may be had on application to the Publishers personally, or by letter inclosing SIX CENTS in Postage stamps.

F. DERBY & COMPANY,
Importing Tailors
Will exhibit their first delivery of Spring Importations, on Thursday morning,
FROM MONDAY, MARCH 29.
Not offered elsewhere by the display of former years, and at economical prices.
No. 257 BROADWAY,
near Broadway.
Together with Spring
SILK WAISTCOATINGS,
IN STYLE.
STREET THROUGHOUT,
From 259 to 261.

No. 81 WALKER STREET,
WEST SIDE OF AND NEAR BROADWAY.

A NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE of HARPER & BROTHERS' PUBLICATIONS, with an Alphabetical Table of Contents, is now ready for distribution, and may be obtained gratuitously on application to the Publishers personally, or by letter inclosing SIX CENTS in Postage Stamps.

The attention of gentlemen, in town or country, designing to form Libraries or enrich their library collections, is respectfully invited to this Catalogue, which will be found to comprise a large proportion of the standard and most valuable Works in English Literature—comprehending more than two thousand Volumes, which are offered at prices much less than one half the cost of similar productions in England.

The Catalogue will be found interleaved with Collapse, Schools, &c., who are not furnished as a retailer guide in forming the true estimate of literary productions, it is believed this Catalogue will prove especially valuable as a manual of reference.

To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, wherever books can not be obtained through any bookseller or local agent, applications with remittance should be addressed direct to the Publishers, which will be promptly attended to.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, New York.

POSTAGE STAMPS FOR SALE,
IN ANY QUANTITY,
BY
HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square.

HUNT, WEBSTER & CO'S
IMPROVED TIGHT-STITCH
SEWING MACHINES.

☞ WE ARE NOW PREPARED TO EXHIBIT this newly-invented and valuable machine, and would respectfully solicit a call from all persons in want of a Sewing Machine whose qualities have only to be said to be duly appreciated.

We have opened commodious rooms at 429 BROADWAY, for the sale of these Machines, and all interested are respectfully invited to call and decide upon their merits for themselves.

HUNT, WEBSTER & CO.,
No. 429 Broadway, New York.
No. 7 Winter Street, corner Bromfield, Boston.
No. 629 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

PHONOGRAPHY; or, PHONETIC SHORTHAND. The Principles and Progress of the Phonographic Association for 1858, and List of Works (free), Address ISAAC PITMAN, Cincinnati, O.

GROVER & BAKER'S
CELEBRATED
FAMILY SEWING MACHINES,
495 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
18 SUMMER STREET, BOSTON,
730 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

☞ These Machines are justly admitted to be the best in the market for family sewing.

BURNETT'S COCOAINE.

☞ A compound of Cocoanut Oil, &c., for dressing the Hair. It is efficacy and excellence, it is without a rival.

It prevents the hair from falling off
It promotes its healthy and vigorous growth.
It is not greasy or sticky.
It leaves no disagreeable odor.
It softens the hair when hard and dry.
It soothes the irritated scalp skin.
It affords the richest lustre.
It remains longest in effect.
It costs fifty cents for a half pint bottle.

A single trial will convince readers the hair we matter how stiff and dry soft and glossy for several days. It is recommended by all who have used it to be the best and cheapest Hair Dressing in the World. Prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston. Sold by druggists.

KISS-ME-QUICK. Exquisite Perfume, distilled from fragrant Tulips.
Sold by druggists and fancy goods dealers, 409 Broadway.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.
Thousands of the very worst cases of Scrofula have been entirely cured by this great Sarsaparilla. Let no one fear its purifying influence upon the blood is immediate. Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 Fulton Street, New York.

DIESSE & LUDIN'S FRANGIPANNI.
An Eternal Perfume from the Holy City. The Perfume, Soap, Sachet, Incense, Powder. Alkahest is fragrance.
LUDIN, Chemist and Importer, 639 Broadway.
Sole Agents for the United States.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

SIR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL, "THE VIRGINIANS," illustrated by many hundred engravings by the Author, was commenced in the DECEMBER Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. It is printed from early sheets—received from the Author in advance of publication in London. The first chapter of the Novel was given by Mr. Thackeray the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.

BULWER'S BRILLIANT ROMANCE, entitled "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?" pronounced to be the masterpiece of the distinguished author, and finest novelist, by special arrangement with the Author, appears in HARPER'S WEEKLY simultaneously with its publication in England.

TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three Copies for one Year (each) . . 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Two Subscribers.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for One Year $2 00
One Copy for Two Years 3 00
One Copy for Three Years 4 00
Five Copies for One Year 8 00
Ten Copies for One Year 15 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 30 00
An Extra Copy is allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE Subscribers.

The numbers of "HARPER'S WEEKLY," handsomely bound in Muslin, Gilt, will be sent by Express, the Freight on Covers are furnished to those who wish their Numbers bound at HARPER'S STEAM PRINTING HOUSE. The Discount allowed to Booksellers and the Trade for Binding is Twenty-five per cent. "HARPER'S WEEKLY," when taken together, are supplied at Four Dollars per annum.

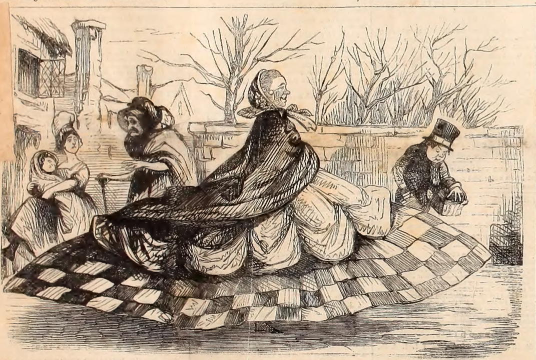
The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" must be paid quarterly in advance when they are received. When prepaid quarterly in advance, the Postage upon HARPER'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE and Twenty-six Cents a year on the WEEKLY.

Persons residing in the British Provinces will remit, in addition to their Subscription, Thirty-six Cents a year MAGAZINE, and Twenty-six Cents on the WEEKLY, for the American postage.

 Persons living in the City of New York wishing HARPER'S WEEKLY left at their houses, will please send their names and residences, with the subscription money, to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

SKETCHES OF THE "FANCY."



Metropolitan Policeman. "Say, Jim, Old Boy, here's a go: I've got a Warrant against you. Ain't it prime! Now, what'll you have? Will you knock me down at the first corner, and make tracks, or will you go before the Courts and take your chance? I'm agreeable to any thing."

Member of the Fancy. "Well, Thomas, as I've been dull lately, and need some excitement, I think I'll go to Prison. There ain't no risk in it."

First Juvenile. "Who's that with Judge Bullyem, Billy?"

Second Juvenile. "You're green, you are, Jack, not to know Jim Swipe the Prize-fighter. Isn't he the man as bit the other man's nose off the other night, and stabbed the Officer in Broadway? My, would'nt I like to know him? And doesn't Judge Bullyem seem proud of his acquaintance?"

Miss Smith, of New York, pays a short visit to Scotland, and out of compliment to the people of Balmoral, wears the fashion which they are supposed to have introduced.

A CONGRESSIONAL SCENE.

(From the Washington Globe.)

During the protracted session of the Senate last week, Senator Clark having the floor, said: "If it be the pleasure of the Senate to adjourn now, it would be very agreeable to me. I have had nothing to eat since 8 o'clock, neither bread nor any thing else." But the Senate wouldn't adjourn, and he proceeded till 8¼ o'clock, when, during an explanation by Mr. Green, having spoken over three hours and a half, he availed himself of the opportunity to indulge in that beverage which "cheers but not inebriates," with accompanying muffins and sandwiches, which gave his desk the social aspect of a cosy tea-table. The Hon. Senator retained his right to the floor, with a cup of hot tea in one hand, and a huge sandwich in the other. The scene was novel; but a twelve hours' fast had created an inexorable stomach. By the call of the Yeas and Nays he was afforded ample time to finish his repast.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

TO ADVERTISERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A MAGNIFICENTLY ILLUSTRATED PAPER,
Circulating in every Section of the Union,

Offers unusual inducements to those who desire to bring their business prominently before the community.

1. Only a limited space is devoted to Advertisements.

2. The character and diffusion of the circulation are unequaled.

3. The Paper is generally preserved for Binding.

4. The Advertising Pages are rendered attractive, and can not escape the attention of the reader.

5. None but the most respectable class of Advertisements are admitted.

6. The charges are not as large, proportionally, as those of any other Weekly or Daily Paper.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for Three Months or more.

Terms.—Fifty Cents a Line.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

PRIVATE INSTITUTION for IMBECILES, and all that class of children, whose mental peculiarities prevent their education under the common modes of instruction.
The Institution has now been in operation ten years, and merits the attention of all persons interested in the welfare of this class of unfortunates. Address
GEO. BROWN, M.D., Superintendent, Barre, Mass.

AT 361 BROADWAY.—
GREAT BROADWAY SALE.
$200,000 WORTH OF SHAWLS AND NEW MANTILLAS,
BEING BULPIN'S WHOLESALE STOCK,
NOW SELLING 40 AND 50 PER CENT. BELOW WHOLESALE PRICES.
In consequence of
REMOVAL ON FIRST OF MAY,
OBSERVE THE FOLLOWING PRICES:—
A MISCELLANEOUS LOT OF SILK AND LACE MANTILLAS, now clearing out at one dollar.
Do. do. LARGER IN SIZE,
at two dollars.
Do. do. STILL LARGER,
at three dollars.
Do. do. WITH DEEP RUFFLES,
at four dollars.
All the finer goods proportionately cheap.
Very pretty BROCHE BORDERED STELLA SHAWLS,
at three dollars.
Do. do. RICHER IN QUALITY,
at four dollars.
VERY RICH BEAUTIFUL NEW BORDERS,
at five dollars and a half.
The reduced prices will continue till 1st of May only, when the present store will positively be closed.
GEO. BULPIN, 361 Broadway.

TO LET.—AN ELEGANTLY-FURNISHED HOUSE.
A family leaving town desire to let to a good tenant their first-class brown stone front house, containing all the modern improvements and conveniences, gas, hot and cold water, bath-rooms, &c., and completely and elegantly-furnished in the latest modern style. House is situated in Twenty-first Street, near Sixth Avenue. Apply to H. M. W., care of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, or to either member of the firm.
☞ Boarding-house keepers need not apply. To a careful and responsible tenant terms will be reasonable.

ALL OF BULPIN'S STOCK,
Amounting to over
TWO HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS,
Now selling until the first of May,
At 40 and 50 per cent. below regular wholesale prices.
BEAUTIFUL NEW SHAWLS,
BEAUTIFUL NEW MANTILLAS.
All to be cleared out in consequence of removal.
The store will positively be closed
On Friday, 30th of April.
No. 361 Broadway.

UP THE MEDITERRANEAN.

PLEASURE VOYAGE.
By Steamer "ERICSSON."
A. B. LOWBER, Commander.
The ERICSSON will leave NEW YORK on SATURDAY, May 1st, at 1 o'clock, P.M., on the above voyage, stopping at Gibraltar 1 day; Malta 2 days; Alexandria 8 days; Jaffa (for Jerusalem) 15 days; Constantinople 6 days; Athens 3 days; Naples 5 days; Marseilles 4 days. An experienced traveler will accompany the ship and make arrangements for the land travel. Those who intend to go, but have not yet paid, should take passage immediately; for, unless 100 berths be paid for prior to April 15, the ship will be placed on another route.
Full steamer fare for the voyage......$750
No berth secured till paid for.
For further particulars, apply to
DUNHAM & CO.,
13 William Street, New York.

THE HUMAN HAIR.
☞ How many persons abuse this delicate and beautiful ornament by burning it with alcoholic washes and plastering it with grease, which has no affinity for the skin, and is not absorbed. Burnett's Cocoaine, a compound of Cocoanut Oil, &c., is unrivaled as a dressing for the hair—is readily absorbed, and is peculiarly adapted to its various conditions, preventing its falling off, and promoting its healthy growth. For sale by all druggists.

REMOVAL.
HOUSEKEEPING HARDWARE.

WINDLE & CO., since the fire in Maiden Lane, have resumed business at
No. 21 JOHN STREET, where they offer, at lowest market rates, Direct Importations of Tea Trays,
Silver-Plated Ware,
Moderator Lamps,
Fire-Irons, Mats,
Cutlery, Gongs,
Hammocks, &c.
Of their own and other American Manufacturers,
Planished Tin Ware,
Toilet Sets,
Water Coolers,
Bathing Apparatus,
Refrigerators,
Tin Ware, Plain and Japanned.

E. WALKER & SONS,
114 FULTON STREET,
New York.
BOOKBINDERS.

All work executed with promptness, and in as good style, and at as low prices, as at any other establishment. Special attention given to the binding of HARPER'S MAGAZINE and WEEKLY.

MYSTIC HALL SEMINARY for YOUNG LADIES, 5 miles from Boston. Calisthenics, Horseback Riding, Salt-water Bathing, &c. For Catalogue, address MRS. T. P. SMITH, Principal, Boston, Mass.

$150 WILL PAY FOR BOARD AND TUITION in the FLUSHING FEMALE COLLEGE one year. Address Rev. WILLIAM H. GILDER, A.M., President, at Flushing, Long Island.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

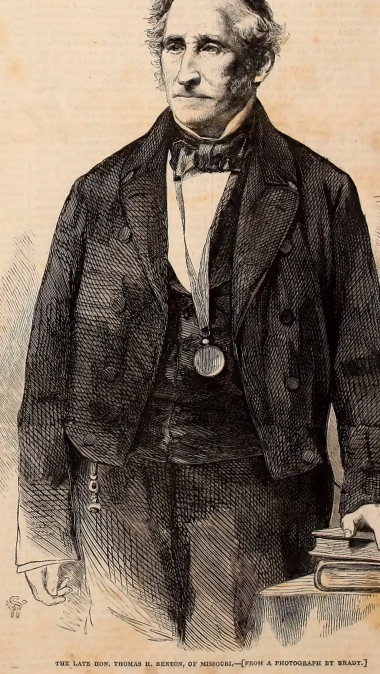
VOL. II.—No. 68.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 17, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

CONTENTS.

I. THE LATE HON. THOMAS H. BENTON, WITH PORTRAIT.
II. EDITORIALS.
III. THE LOUNGER.
IV. HOPE AND DISAPPOINTMENT, TWO BEAUTIFUL ILLUSTRATIONS.
V. THE CHINESE MISSIONARY MARTYR IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY, WITH TWO ILLUSTRATIONS.
VI. LITERARY.
VII. DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.
VIII. FOREIGN NEWS.
IX. SPRING IN CITY AND COUNTRY, WITH TWO SPLENDID ILLUSTRATIONS.
X. LEAVES.
XI. ANAIE TUMOR, THE SORCERESS.
XII. THE MUSICAL REVIEW.
XIII BULWER'S "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?"—Continued.
XIV. THE GREAT PANIC OF SEVENTEEN,WITH THREE ILLUSTRATIONS.
XV. MISCELLANY.
XVI. THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.
XVII. MARKET AND FINANCIAL REVIEW, POEM.
XVIII. CONSOLATIVES.

THE LATE HON. THOMAS H. BENTON.

THE portrait which accompanies these lines will recall to many thousands of our readers the well-known features of one of the patriarchs of American politics—almost the last survivor of that circle of great men who shed lustre upon the country in the days of Jackson—THOMAS HART BENTON, for thirty years United States Senator from the State of Missouri, who died at Washington on Saturday, April 10th, of cancer in the stomach.



Mr. Benton was born at Hillsborough, Orange County, North Carolina, on March 14, 1782, and was therefore seventy-six years of age at the time of his death. We are told that his father died when he was quite young; that his education was not as carefully watched over as might have been wished; that he removed when a mere boy to the wilds of the young State of Tennessee, and helped his mother establish herself on a tract of land which she had obtained from her husband. Under whatever disadvantages he may have labored, his progress at the profession which he chose on reaching manhood—the bar—was unusually rapid. Andrew Jackson was at that time the leading man of Tennessee; he was pleased with young Benton, sought his friendship, and gave him his powerful assistance in fighting his way in the world. When the war with England broke out, Benton gladly accepted the post of aid-de-camp to Jackson, and rendered him substantial service. Unhappily, before the war was over, the two friends quarreled, and, according to the ferocious custom of the age in that locality, vented their mutual wrath in a fierce street fray, in which each was aided by a posse of seconds. Years elapsed before the bitter feelings engendered by this conflict passed away from the minds of the combatants; but they did pass away at last, and General Jackson had no stronger or abler friend during his Presidency than the man whom he had fought with pistol and dagger in the streets of Nashville.

Toward the close of the war, Colonel Benton was commissioned by the War Department as Lieutenant-Colonel in the Regular army. Peace having been declared, however, before he reached the theatre of war, he resigned his commission, and settled at St. Louis. There he devoted his time to the practice of law and the editorship of a paper called the Missouri Argus. When the territory became a State, and was admitted into the Union, Colonel Benton took his seat as one of the Senators from MISSOURI—a post he filled continuously for nearly thirty years. It will be remembered that the admission of Missouri was attended by almost as much difficulty as the more recent admissions of California and Kansas; Colonel Benton and his colleague were kept waiting a year after their election. It is understood that he made good use of the time in acquiring a knowledge of foreign languages, and mapping out that prodigious course of study which he pursued throughout his life, and which rendered him the best-read man in the Senate.

His first labors in the Senate were directed to the encouragement of the settlement of the public lands, by favoring a reduction in their cost, by facilitating pre-emptions to actual settlers, and by urging forward the opening up of the wilderness by means of roads. Nearly forty years ago he took strong ground in favor of the necessity of exploration for a road from the Mississippi to the Pacific; using, in support of his views, the very arguments which are urged to-day in support of the Pacific Railroad. Throughout his career he has been a consistent advocate of liberal expenditures for the discovery of the best line for such a road; most of the explorations which have been made—among others that of Colonel Fremont—were planned by him.

Soon after General Jackson's inauguration the war between the Government and the United States Bank commenced. The leading athletes of the Senate took ground against the President; and that body so far sympathized with the great financial institution as to pass resolutions censuring the removal of the deposits from the United States Bank as a high-handed measure, "in derogation of the Constitution of the United States." Upon the side of the Administration Colonel Benton rose to the first place. His logical mind, ample stores of information, and undaunted courage, fitted him to be a parliamentary leader; and throughout the long and bitter struggle which commenced with the removal of the deposits from the United States Bank and ended with the revulsion of 1837, Colonel Benton led the Administration party in the Senate. Every one who is familiar with history will remember the extraordinary asperity of the conflicts of those memorable years—1833–37. In all these conflicts THOMAS H. BENTON bore a conspicuous part. He had the peculiar satisfaction, after four years of incessant warfare, of seeing the triumph of his party in the Senate, and the reversal of the sentence which had been pronounced on General Jackson at the commencement of the war. The resolutions which censured the President for the removal of the deposits were formally expunged. Colonel Benton has so vividly described the last night's debate on the question, that the passage is worth quoting:

"Midnight was now approaching. The dense masses which filled every room in the lobbies and the galleries remained immovable. No one went out—no one could get in. The floor of the Senate was crammed with privileged persons, and it seemed that all Congress was there. Expectation and determination to see the conclusion was depicted on every countenance. It was evident there was to be no adjournment until the vote should be taken—until the deed was done; and this aspect of inflexible determination had its effect upon the ranks of the opposition. They began to falter under a useless persistence, for they alone now did the speaking; and while Mr. Webster was yet reciting his protest, two Senators from the opposite side, who had been bestable to maintain their equanimity, came round to Mr. Benton, and said, 'This question has degenerated into a trial of nerves and muscles. It has become a question of physical endurance; and we see no use in wearing ourselves out to keep off for a few hours longer what has to come before we separate. We see that you are able and determined to carry your measure, so call the vote as soon as you please. We shall say no more.' Mr. Webster concluded. No one rose. There was a pause—a dead silence—and an intense feeling. Presently the silence was invaded by the single word 'Question,' —the parliamentary call for a vote —rising from the seats of different Senators. One blank in the resolve remained to be filled—the date of its adoption. It was done. The acting President of the Senate, Mr. King, of Alabama, then directed the roll to be called. The passage of the resolution was announced from the chair. Mr. Benton rose and said that nothing remained but to execute the order of the Senate, which he moved be done forthwith. It was ordered accordingly. The Secretary thereupon produced the original manuscript journal of the Senate, and opening at the page which contained the condemnatory sentence of March 28, 1834, proceeded in open Senate to draw a square of broad black lines around the sentence, and to write across its face in strong letters these words: 'Expunged, by order of the Senate, this 16th day of March, 1837.' Up to this moment the crowd in the great circular gallery, looking down upon the Senate, though silent and menacing in their looks, had made no manifestation of feeling; and it was, doubtless, not the intention of Mr. Webster to excite that manifestation when he referred to their numbers, and expressed his ignorance of the feeling with which they would see the deed done which he so much deprecated. Doubtless no one intended to excite that crowd, naturally composed, as usual since the bank question began, of friends of that institution; but its appearance became such that Senator Linn, the colleague of Senator Benton, Mr. George W. Jones, since Senator from Iowa, and others, sent out and brought in arms; other friends gathered about him, among them Mrs. Benton, who, remembering what had happened to General Jackson, and knowing that, after him, her husband was next obnoxious to the bank party, had her anxiety sufficiently excited to wish to be near him in this concluding scene of a seven years' contest with that great moneyed power. Things were in this state when the Secretary of the Senate began to perform the expunging process on the manuscript journal. Instantly a storm of hooting, yelling, and vociferations arose from the left wing of the circular gallery, over the head of Senator Benton, the presiding officer promptly gave the order which the rules prescribe in such cases, to clear the gallery. Mr. Benton repeated the order, saying:

THE LATE HON. THOMAS H. BENTON, OF MISSOURI.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

"I hope the galleries will not be cleared, as many innocent persons are excluded when a few have been guilty of no violation of order. Let the ruffians who have made the disturbance alone be punished; let them be apprehended. I call upon the sergeant-at-arms will be directed to enter the gallery and seize the ruffians, ascertaining who they are in the best way he can. Let him apprehend them and bring them to the bar of the Senate. Let him seize the bank ruffians. I hope that they will now be suffered to insult the Senate, as they did when it was under the power of the bank. Let the United States, when ruffians, with arms upon them, insulted us with impunity. Let them be taken and brought to the bar of the Senate. Here is one just above me that may easily be identified."

His motion was agreed to. The order to clear the galleries was revoked; the order to seize the disturbers was given, and immediately executed by the energetic Sergeant-at-arms, Mr. John Shackford, and his assistants. The ruffian who was seized and brought to the bar. This sudden example intimidated the rest, and the expunging process was performed in quiet. The effect upon was impressive.

This great victory, achieved after a seven years' war, was the culminating point of Mr. Benton's fame and power. Though he continued for fifteen years to occupy a leading post in the public service—though he was, to the day of his death, a very prominent public character—he never was, from since 1837, the crowning rank which he filled when he defeated the "bank ruffians" on the resolution to expunge.

Under General Harrison, and generally under Captain Tyler, he was in opposition. He opposed the Tariff of 1842, and opposed the Bank Bills; he was for a hard-money currency exclusively; for a sub-treasury; against every measure which Mr. Clay advocated, as the Administration leader in the Senate. When Mr. Polk came into office, Mr. Benton's influence returned. As Chairman of the Committee of the Senate on Military Affairs he had much to do with the conduct of the war. He was even appointed Commander-in-Chief of the United States Forces in the Mexican Department of California, but the bill raising him to that rank did not pass; he was not confirmed by the Senate; and thus he never left Washington.

During the Oregon dispute he took strong ground against the prevailing notion, "Fifty-four forty or fight." It was mainly to his influence that the Government of the United States was induced to be content with the line forty-nine and peace.

With the first of the Slavery questions which grew out of the Mexican war Mr. Benton was not with his usual ardor; and his violent antipathy to Mr. Calhoun exercising an slight influence on his judgment, he began to show a leaning toward what has since become known as Northern sentiment. He fought Mr. Calhoun on the admission of the Missouri Compromise to Oregon. He fought Mr. Clay on the compromise measures of 1850. He fought the Kansas-Nebraska Bill; and, still more lately, he fought the Dred Scott Decision and the Lecompton Constitution. He was the author of the Benton Democracy of the State of Missouri, whose cardinal doctrine is the emancipation of the slaves.

This departure from the policy of the party with which Colonel Benton had acted during his career in the Senate was, no doubt, the real cause of his defeat when he sought a re-election to that body in 1851. He ran for Congress, and was elected. But on presenting himself anew, at the close of his term, he was defeated by a like fallen strength when he put forth to become Governor of Missouri. It is due to Mr. Benton's memory to say that he never, in any of the latter occasions against his inclinations, and solely in obedience to the earnest desires of his friends and old political associates.

The last years of his life were spent in arduous literary labor. He wrote a comprehensive review of the political history of the country during the thirty years which he spent in the Senate; and his contemporaries, when he died, a year since, in Congressional debates. He literally died with the manuscript of that work in his hand. He had but his voice, and could only, and with great pain, utter words in a low whisper, he still continued to dictate sentences to his daughter. He succeeded against disease and death with Roman energy, and showed in his death-bed that the courage and resolution which had rendered him so dreaded an opponent in the time of Jackson were nowise abated by age.

One who knew him well thus writes of his personal character:

"The tone, manner, and bearing of Mr. Benton in the Senate were such suited to his popular character adapted to win the partiality of the mass of his Senatorial brethren. His tone was bold and imperious, his manner precise, and somewhat dictatorial and dogmatical, and his bearing that of a giant among the pigmies. He was by many men considered a savage, egotistical, selfish, vain-glorious, and loquacious old aristocrat; and yet, in solid substance, his peculiar, as great and noble traits, were will favorably compare with the best whether other man of our country has produced; while his real character, in fact, was that of a most practical Democrat. As the head of a family, husband, father, companion, and host, he was a model of affection, simplicity, and hospitality. Among his neighbors, no man could be more popular. Among his children and grandchildren, he was literally worshiped as their best friend, their teacher, their companion, and their guide. At his own table or by his own fireside, his genial spirit, his extensive readings, his great experience, and his reflections upon concerning men and things, and his wonderful memory, rendered his conversation positively charming, upon whatever subject they might turn. And upon the little trifles of everyday gossip he would talk by the hour and give an every lady of the lady's bonnet and the changes of the fashions as readily as upon the affairs of the Church."

Colonel Benton married a daughter of Governor M'Dowell, of Virginia, a very accomplished lady, called Miss Elizabeth. They had two daughters, all daughters, who have married respectively Colonel Frémont, Mr. W. Carey Jones, Mr. Jacob, a celebrity farmer, & Mr. Sulleau, French Consul-General at Calcutta.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 17, 1858.

WILL THERE BE WAR IN UTAH?

AS we intimated last week, the President has appointed civil Commissioners to accompany the military expedition ordered to Utah by Gen. M'Clellogh. These gentlemen are instructed to endeavor to bring Brigham Young to reason before forcible measures are resorted to, and it is stated to be the opinion of Mr. Bernhisel, the Mormon delegate to Congress, that, had they been sent three months ago, the whole matter between us and the Utah expedition might have been spared.

At the time our latest advices left Utah Territory, the difficulties between Mr. Young and Mr. Powell had notified General Johnston that he and his force must vacate their quarters and betake themselves hereward to the Great Salt Lake by March. It may be that this notice was merely intended as a bravado. The Mormons are known at the age of Mr. Young. That the notice was intended seriously—if it be the design of the Mormons really to insist on the withdrawal of the United States troops from Utah Territory, we know enough of General Johnston's character and intentions to feel certain that a terrible conflict must already have taken place, and that either our little army has been severely cut up, or that it has cut its way into Salt Lake City, or either event is to follow. But the attitude of the Peace Commissioners, on arriving at the scene of action, will be somewhat ridiculous.

We regretted, last week, over the efforts of the policy of dispatching civil Commissioners in the midst of an army as to be likely to embarrass the masters to the general commanding. However, as the new commander of the Utah army, General Scott, has already had to contend against the appointment of Powell and M'Culloch, we presume he does not anticipate that any inconvenience will arise from it. It is his affair.

But, at any rate, the Administration seems to be in a pitiful position. Its civil Peace Commissioners settle the business without fighting, how will the President reconcile it to his conscience to have spent so much money and to have sent the necessary military expedition—the mere loss in cattle amounting to many hundreds of thousands of dollars, and the very barrel of provisions by the army having cost the Government, it is said, one hundred dollars? And if the Mormons fight, how will the President get out his only sending Peace Commissioners to the scene of action when the battle has been fought?

HINTS TO SENSIBLE PEOPLE.

VERY few persons, outside of the foreign trading community, comprehend the whole importance of the statement which has been strewed upon the public mind by the fact that the rate of exchange between the United States and Great Britain is 100: that is to say, when Mr. Baring in England can buy dollars at 109, there is no current of money flowing either way. When we are debtors of England—as we usually are—and owing America also, as to France, Germany, South America, China, and almost all our foreign customers—exchanging to England to pay our debts, at some rate between 109 and 110, or 111. When, on the contrary, we are the creditors, and foreigners in all parts of the world, exchange on London falls below par, that is to say, below 109. The meaning, therefore, is that the foreign creditors generally of the United States are liquidating our foreign debt, and piling up abroad a balance in our favor.

This announcement is practically explained by the Custom-house returns at this port, which, at every one knows, is the largest importing port in the United States. During the three months ending on March the 31st, our importations of foreign goods fell short of those of the corresponding months of last year by thirty-six millions of dollars. Our importations for the nine months which have elapsed of the current fiscal year—including the last three of the most direful months of enormous speculation, importation, and general commercial activity last fall—fall short of those of the corresponding period of the former fiscal year by nearly thirty millions of dollars. In other words, assuming the operations of the past three months as the basis of calculation, the people of the United States are at the present time retrenching their consumption of foreign merchandise and manufactures to two-thirds of what they were before the late panic. The consequence of this we see in the fall of foreign exchange.

Another fact is, the present moment becoming creditors of the world at large. Whether we shall remain so depends upon the conduct of the next fiscal year. We could pay our gold to foreign countries, in round figures, three hundred and sixty-two millions of our produce, and took from them in return three hundred and seventy-six millions of produce and manufactures. If we had dispensed with one-third of these latter we would have had a balance of gold, instead of a balance not of two, but of one hundred and twenty-two millions of dollars in our favor, which we could have drawn at pleasure in specie.

It rests with the people of the United States to decide whether they will, or will not, humble the bankers of the world. If they resolutely determine to curtail their consumption of foreign merchandise—by say six silks, laces, watches, jewelry, wines, foreign hardware, cottons, woolens, and linens, tea, coffee, sugar, and fruits, as they habitually now require—in a very few years New York will occupy the place now filled by London in the commercial community, and this will be the greatest bank of the trading world. Foreigners can not dispense with our cotton, corn, wool, and tobacco; we can do without a great portion of their manufactures. It only needs a little resolute economy on the part of the Amerikan people. If every father of a family would make a rule to use no foreign luxuries of any kind, the battle would be won. If every lady would appear in public dress with fewer silks and laces for two or three years, half the work would be accomplished. If wine-drinkers would resort to the temperate Champagne and claret of 1862, there would be no need of self-denial after that date.

The solution of the problem rests with the consumers—that is to say, the great public of the United States. So long as they will buy, consumption must. So long as they will support on the scale of recent years, we shall, as a nation, accumulate nothing. It is simply a question of a few years' abstinence from unnecessary luxuries.

The question has been confused by foolish endeavors of the trading world to throw it on the protectionist dispute. People who would gladly exclude foreigners from our markets have been led by their interests to join the selfish efforts of certain classes here to obtain a legislative monopoly of those markets. In reality, there is no need of legislation on the subject. If people are resolved to spend their money on foreign luxuries, all the laws in the world will not prevent them, and the balance of trade will remain against us; if, on the contrary, the American people set about this important reformation, leaving creditors, instead of debtors, of the foreign world, they will, without any laws, cease to consume more than is absolutely necessary for foreign merchandise, and the United States will rapidly become the mart, centre, and focus of the commercial world.

OUR FOREIGN MINISTERS.

IT was well understood, when Mr. Buchanan was inaugurated, that notwithstanding the identity of political principle between him and his predecessor, the foreign representatives of the United States would all give place to new men. It was considered convenient that, in addition to reward his supporters, the new President should have the patronage of the foreign appointments, but no proposition of the kind has succeeded a chief magistrate of a hostile party. There was a reason for this independent of the exigencies of party. The foreign service under Mr. Pierce's domestic service had been miserably inefficient. With the exception of Mr. Buchanan himself, some of Mr. Pierce's representatives seem to have done any thing at all. Their performance had been confined to drawing their salary, and occasionally filling and writing American letters of quite coffee. They had achieved no purpose whatever, as far as the national interests were concerned. It was therefore very generally argued that the nation would bear up bravely against their dismissal, and the appointment of new men in their stead.

Hitherto Mr. Buchanan seems to have been true to his habits in diplomatic vacancies which the rule of rotation laid open to him. He has sent a new man to Prussia, another to Sweden, another to Mexico, several to South and Central America, and one or two others to other second-rate courts. But the most important missions are still filled by the appointees of Mr. Pierce. Mr. Dallas still represents the country in England, and Mr. Mason continues to entertain with genial hospitality in Paris.

So far as England is concerned, it seems likely that the important negotiations still pending between the United States and that kingdom are now to be settled at Washington; and in this view, Mr. Dallas's retention of his post becomes a matter of very secondary moment. But the case is very different with regard to France. According to Mr. Claiborne's report to the State Department, France lately took from us in a single year over fifty millions' worth of our produce, and we consumed no less than ninety-eight millions of French manufactures and wines. All this trade was carried on at a gross loss disadvantage to us. Our produce paid exorbitant duties on entering France; the French manufactures which we consumed were admitted in favor of the French empire; and our ships were obliged to contribute their share toward the maintenance of Louis Napoleon on the plunder of differential tolls. It should be the business, it would seem, of an active diplomatic agent to insist upon this government at least putting the policy of rectifying the unequal regulations under which our trade is carried on. If Mr. Mason has devoted himself to the matter in evidence of his labors has transpired; and it is fair to assume either that he has failed in his purpose, or that he has made no endeavor to achieve any reform at all. In either case it would appear to be proper to give some one else an opportunity of attempting to do something.

Mr. Buchanan's administration is now so far advanced that but little advantage can be reaped by the retention of patronage. Let us have new ministers abroad at all the foreign courts, and perhaps the country may cease to consider the diplomatic service a dead loss.

THE LOUNGER.

THE FINE ARTS.

PICTURES and music must have the place of honor, or again this week. So great an advent as that of Mozart, and so important a work as the opening of the Academy, are not to be dismissed with a solitary mention.

The weather graciously lends itself to every kind of festivity. Never was such a soft, sweet April. The trees were only in bud, and the plants in flower, it would pass as the ideal May of the poets—that kind season so "longed for, never here," except in the cloud-land of the mind poet. The air is full not only of the songs of birds, but of lovely perfumes. The Academy of Musical Luxury is described as fully resolved to come and concur us. He will bring the Piccolomini, who is a young Italian singer, and who, they say, can't act better than she sings. If, however, she be pretty in person and fine in manner, she will not sing orchly or sweetly, and act like a lady, her success is sure. We are not very terrible critics. We are very captivated in our admiration of a novelist in art, but never in our homage to an artist who has an atom of talent.

When the pretty Piccolomini arrives, the great question will be opened again for solution, whether we truly love the Opera, and how much it can be supported. No manager must hope to answer that question until he feels able to compete with Barnum. The Opera itself, as we have had it this winter, is really better than any where else in the world, except in London and Paris, and sometimes the Perseberg—much better than the usual Opera in Italy and Germany. But in the smaller cities in those countries have this advantage over us, that they do not begin every year with wondering whether they have the means of state to support an Opera. After the question has been practically asked and answered a thousand times, they drop it for some other inquiry.

The brotherly love upon the Delaware can expend in vigor only to the same question. Last year they went freely to hear their special impertation La Vestvali from Gazzaniga, but they may stay at home. Gazzaniga sings as sweetly, the house is as pretty, as ever. But hard times have taken the people out of hearing. The same true in vain; and genuine Philadelphia probably welcomes why he Gazzaniga is but an Opera-house.

Here, however, there is no room for skepticism. Novelty follows novelty—attraction paralyzes attraction; and the question Ultima is doing precisely what Barnum did when he engaged Jenny Lind; he is giving the people all he can get, and blowing his own trumpet with such a sonorous blast that the White Hills and the Alleghanies echo the reply. He has contracts innumerable with the great Jullien (whom he rather contemptuously insinuates to be a swell) conducted by Jullien. One heard the orchestra, but saw Jullien. So through Maurel and Huguenots and Fornasi and La Grange. Jullien through a certain gauze drapery of various patterns, we behold Napoleon Ultimus. What advertisements! What announcements! What puffs! And who so surly as not to listen with satisfaction to the clink of rapidly-dropping dollars into the manager's lap? Let Mr. Barnum, Maurel, Fornasi, Huguenots, and more of the same, who does not agree with his, and, in the name of the trumpet, cry, "Hooray! hooray! bis, bravo!"

PRACTICAL PIETY.

THE minor movement of the spring season is over, and now the nasty major resumes its dominance. Now the streets are heart sick could wish. The streets were gayly crowded; the dresses hinted of change and that that had flowed and culmination of the long Lenten mortification, THE EASTER BONNET, was all that the soul of any lady's mind could desire.

It is a beautiful bringing of religion into the daily business of life, this mingling of millinery and church festivals. Scarcely a belle in town who has bonded through the winter from hall to ball, but knows perfectly that no Lent sets in—but will tell you the very moment, like a prayer-book to whom she will consult—and dresses accordingly. Tied having for six long weeks strewn her cheek with ashes (of roses), how truly she names the very Sunday which is consecrated by the great triumph of her faith, and which with all the ardor of a Christian soul she celebrates with a new bonnet. This year will be collect practical glory.

The same thing is carried a little further, perhaps, in Florence, where, on Christmas-eve, at the church of the Annunziata, the bens monde assemblies—and does not dance.

A friend of the Lounger's sally offended the loveliest of her sex by asking her if she took a lorgnette to church on Easter Sunday. She looked shocked and grieved and said, "Oh, no! But, indeed, I My dearest Lucilla, you were just telling me how becoming white bonnets were, and Arethusa, and what a pretty walking-dress Mrs. Plumbnly had, and what a darling ribbon and gloves to match your cousin's wagon had, and what an elegant sermon Aunt Jemko's Calhoun shawl, and I only thought how much nicer it would be on a summer day for you it would be to take a lorgnette and study these pretty things more carefully. A church is a large place, you know, and a glass diminishes the distance."

But Lucilla is obdurate. She says he makes fun of sacred things. And she adds, in proof of the probability of this being so, that on this very Easter Sunday, while she was getting ready for church, and wondering which bracelets to wear with her new dress, she heard Edward in the parlor whistling the hymn from the Huguenots!

A HERO.

Bergoni this paragraph is printed it is possible that Colonel Benton will have finished his work in his world. But he does not mind publishing even until the last moment, and working so long as a ray of day is left. The list of Benton's published books of the speech succeeding Jefferson and Madison, the contemporary of some of the most celebrated of our modern public men—of Jackson, of Clay, Webster, and Calhoun—he has been giving the latest years of his life to record services of which he had always labored; and it will be said of him, hereafter, "Death found him armed at his post."

A man of great industry, and of great experience, and of vast political knowledge, he was also an acknowledged defeat. He had a bold, bluff, Western genius; distinguished for prowess rather than prostration; a warm friend; a fierce opponent; an indomitable politician; his tough tenacity of purpose in making more conspicuous than the polished resolution with which, during the last few years, he has worked upon his "Thirty Years in the Senate," and his "Abridgment of the Debates in Congress." Twenty years ago it used to be said of him, that in the summer-time he went about the ways in Washington, stuffing himself at the Library of Congress.

If we must not call him a great man, he was a noted man, and of great influence in the history of our politics. And how much is forgotten of the men given by the bedside of a man who dies bravely! Congress will soon be voted his eulogies; the newspapers will be full of his biography; forgotten chapters of political history will be opened; he will be overpraised and overcriticised; but the old brave stand and defend himself, his tall form towering with conscious endeavor; and whoever recalls our public history of the last thirty years, will be surprised and overshadowed by the figure that rises before him, swaying, confused, and tumultuous, yet not full as much as the broad shoulders of Benton floating on the strife, like Fingal, "advancing his spear, and raising his voice on high."

A TWELFTH NIGHT PICTURE.

Were the opening of spring the National Academy opens the doors of its splendid exhibition, or later year, whatever chances and changes mark the current events of affairs, it regularly comes to pass that the results of the year's study, and inspiration, and enthusiasm of the studios. During eleven months of the year the quiet sedentary life of artists is hidden beneath the more noisy life of the country, but it is sure to show its fruits in company with spring muslins and early violets.

The exhibition of this year is in the new building of the Academy in Twenty-third street. The Belmont and English pictures were shown. A Lounger is naturally a frequenter of the rooms, and will have, from week to week, various observations to make upon the pictures. This week he wishes to speak of one which has been much noticed, and will have a historical interest.

On Twelfth Night of last year the Century Club, an association of gentlemen interested in art and literature, and whose foundation as a club is esthetic entirely, and includes none of the responsibilities in every profession in the city, inaugurated their new clubhouse with a delightful supper party to the season. A king, a queen, an almoner, heralds, pursuivants, and whatever else was proper for such a display, were duly announced. The scene was the great hall, or drawing-room, of the club, the guests those of the club and their friends, and the performance was so picturesque, and pleasing, and successful, that the club resolved to perpetuate its memory.

Mr. Louis Lang, the artist, who had been charged, with his scenic artists and designs, with the decoration of the occasions, had prepared a transparency—a kind of allegorical representation of the scene—which he was commissioned to paint, to make the study of such a picture as he thought suitable for the commemoration. The picture was executed can sower, and it now hangs upon the Academy walls. It represents a Twelfth Night procession in all the fantastic and glittering array of the old festival moving through the court of a medieval castle. The king and queen are borne aloft, throned beneath a canopy. A white-bearded harper moves before, followed by chanting boys. A herald, with his trumpet, announces the coming of the reverend almoner follows, and man at arms; and a throng of knights, pages, standard-bearers, and ladies in the perspectives. In a gallery above are seated various spectators of the scene, and the whole effect is brilliant, animated, and unique.

But the peculiar interest of the picture lies in the fact that the faces are all portraits of various members of the club. The likenesses are even striking in many instances, and yet not such as to destroy the propriety of the work as an old-time pageant. In the gallery, a presiding genius of the scene, is the genial and benignant face of Gulian C. Verplanck, whose antiquarian lore and taste revoked in the original spectacle, and who has prepared a dainty little volume, privately published by and for the club, containing a history of the proceedings of the evening. He is represented by Cozzens, Lorge, Kensett, Hemple, and Parsons, familiar and honored faces on the club; while below the eye alights first upon Bryant, "the harper hoar," striking his harp, while Sparrowgrass Costar, whom the herald's trumpet "calls," and King Viola sits built beside the Queen, to whom every heart is given, and who has gladly changed out her reign. Jester Wainwright, Pursuivant Mcdonough, Almoner Gourlie, Rossiter, Hicks, Duly, Hamilton, Bryant, and others, as quaint and curious guise, pass, smiling, by.

The picture will attract attention, not only from this secret and personal cause, but from its own merits as a bright and cheerful reminiscence of the old revel. It will remind the families of "Portrait of a Gentleman," "Portrait of a Lady," which are in the Academy exhibition, the brilliant walls of the Exhibition, and to the friends of the Century will be a lasting memorial of a happy evening and beautiful festival.

A UNIVERSITY.

Half of the public institutions in Europe, built with money derived from the people, are called Royal and Imperial, so that a Lounger, who thinks only kings and emperors are likely to found galleries, libraries, parks, and museums, is not singular, in this country, we are showing the possibilities of democratic institutions even in the same directions.

The Astor Library, the Girard College, the Lowell Institute, the Lawrence School, the Cooper Institute, are instances familiar and near at hand. And now it is announced that Mr. Charles M'Kicknen, of Cincinnati, has bequeathed his splendid libraries to that city to establish a free university, educational and charitable. It is desirable to be liberal, free, and orphans from the age of five to fourteen are to be supported out of the endowment—those who are capable to be taught to read, write, and cipher, to be taught trades or whatever may seem to be most useful."

Nothing, at this time and in this country, is such a monument—not of munificence, for any rich man may be generous—but of wisdom, as this practical popular University. That is to say, a University in which not only the professions and learned pursuits shall carry the student as far as he can be carried at any institution in the world. Our Lounger at present is not able to express any opinion upon a childish plan. Scholastic traditions are almost tougher than creeds, and are to be found more riches and more various than any other in the world, a distinct professorship of Belles Lettres, Language and literature is almost a luxury in our colleges. There is a Greek professor—and a Latin—and a Modern Language—but the Professor of Logic, or Philosophy, or Rhetoric, is usually charged with the duties of performing the pupils that there is such a thing as English Literature. Consequently, there are plenty of men who have read Greek and Latin and mathematics, and physics, who have stuttered and stumbled through Virgil and Homer, and Cicero and Terence—who know whom Spenser, and Milton, and the great English drama are, practically, unknown.

Here is only a dawn of education. What we want in a University after the College—an arena where, daily, after the hours of lecture, and in habits of study, they may apply those habits to the branches in which they are really interested, and which they have only touched upon before. The College might begin at ten, and at sixteen, or fourteen, the pupil be sent to the University.

Then this University should be amply endowed, and entirely free to the whole world. The severest scholar of the professorship should be paid so as to tempt the most learned and accomplished scholars to fill the chairs. Libraries, and museums, and laboratories should enable us to dispense with the rogue; and while the professorship and most eloquent men in every department of science, and literature, who came for the love of learning, learning would speak, make class-lectures to the University of Berlin and Bologna, of Salamanca and Pisa, be more than verified.

Who will catch your hare!" First, find your Charles M'Kicken or your Peter Cooper, and then have, immediately after the College, a place that can always get the best men in each chair. What committee or ex officio board of trustees, or what single man, would not gladly accept the noble, privileged, unique and very delicate situation? There is the place—but then that is the place of honor and power.

Here, in New York, the great building of the Cooper Institute is almost completed—the noble purpose of its founder will be carried out. The work of commencing its career—but what is that career to be? What kind of college or school are we to have?

Within its resources, might it not be something such as we have hinted at? In view of the vast amplitude of endowment, with Columbia College, and the above any town or city in the country, it is not quite as well instructed in such departments as may be established as they are in that or any other college? And where, by reason of intermediate fees and a hundred details, a Columbia professor lectures to forty or fifty, might not a Cooper professor lecture to four or five hundred? If nothing more in the way of instruction is possible, might not the Cooper Institute be another Astor or a Lowell Institute in Boston?

We have "high schools" are so many that we may as well wait and see what may be and is. But, meanwhile, remember the name of Charles M'Kicken.

A WOMAN.

Among the brilliant instances of woman's heroism the recent conduct of Mrs. Baker, wife of the jailer of the Watertown prison, in this State, may well be counted.

A prisoner feigned to be ill, and sent a confederate, at two in the morning, to rouse Mr. Baker. He came into the cell, and, while attending the false patient, he was knocked down by the accomplices and locked into the cell. The prisoners then rifled up their effects, and prepared to depart. But Mrs. Baker had heard the noise, comprehended the case, and placed herself at the door of the outer hall, with a revolver in hand, and its six small mouth muzzle commanding, through the opening in the door, the entire passage, along which the prisoners were to pass.

"Advance one step farther, and you die!" said the fine, delicate voice of the wife.

The prisoners looked at her, but laughed, and jeered, and threatened, and did not come on, but consulted together what was to do. They then told Mrs. Baker to take her choice—either to see her husband's brains knocked out, or retire. She did not quail, but stood firmly, repeating her warning. until a messenger whom she had dispatched for help returned with a party of men, who relieved her from her post, drove back the prisoners, and rescued the jailer from his perilous position.

This is all the story of Mrs. Col. Arnold of the Maid of Saragossa, of Grace Darling, and of Mrs. Patten, and of all the splendid women whose name rise to enthusiastic mention upon the popular lip.

BEFORE THE BETROTHAL.

As when the impatient traveler
Pauses to watch the lowering skies,
The storm-cloud drifting here and there,
Resolved, yet unresolved, and says,
"It will be fair."

Ah! no, not yet: the rain's not o'er!
And look, still, in the radiant bow,
God veils the sunny side to cover
So thou, my sweet, reluctant one,
Dost long to go and yet to stay:
Fearing that clouds may hide the sun—
That danger lurks in the way.

Then weep, my love—its not in vain—
Yet hey adds thy timid fears:
The brightest days are cool and rain,
The perfect love brings smiles and tears.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—An Ethanol Boy, in Baltimore, sends the Lounger a letter describing his life and that of his other errand boys. It is too long to print, but it is really interesting, and even picturesque. It begins with the following lively and popular rhymes:

"Early in the morn I rise,
Before light has left the skies;
Put on my clothes—wash my hair—
Grope my way to the stairs.
Open the cupboard for something to eat—
Find a piece of bread or meat—
Cram it in loose down my throat;
Not on my bed and button my coat:
Then—NOW begins my day's fleet—
Quick I hurry in the street.

* * * *

When the servant comes, rubbing her eyes,
And yawning as she leaves the stairs;
I grasp them, and as quick as before,
Away, away, I shake to the stairs:
I rush it at length by a speedy run,
